Publishers' Note

For two hundred and fifty years Matthew Henry's Commentary has been the most widely used of all Bible Commentaries. The complete Commentary was originally published in five volumes, and is still available in an attractive modern setting in six handsome library volumes.

The need for a condensed version of this great work, which would retain all the best of the larger work in a form easier of access to the busy student, and unencumbered by material now of little help or quite out of date, has long been apparent.

Rev. Dr. Leslie F. Church, formerly President, and for many years Connexional Editor to the Methodist Church in Great Britain and Ireland (Epworth Press), was so greatly impressed with this need that, in the midst of an extremely busy period of his life, he consented to read, examine with care, and reduce the contents of the six volumes into one handy book. The masterly way with which this brilliant piece of editorial work has been done will be readily discerned by all who are familiar with the larger work, and will arouse the admiration of older students. It was a monumental undertaking, and it has given a new lease of life to one of the most useful books of reference ever produced for the Bible student.

The Publishers take this opportunity of expressing very sincere thanks to the Editor for his great achievement. They would like also to make acknowledgment of the help given to the Editor by the Rev. C. Lester Johnson, B.Sc., and to express their appreciation of the diligence and care of the Rev. F. S. Fitzsimmonds, B.A., B.D., M.Th., in the formidable task of reading the proofs.

C. H. Spurgeon is reported to have said that "every minister ought to read Matthew Henry entirely and carefully through once at least". That these ministers have been able to give the time to do much more than that and bring to their task the necessary thought, critical appreciation and editorial work, places all who will use this book greatly in their debt.

All the best in Matthew Henry—the expositions, commentary, the metaphors, analogies and illustrations of the complete work—has been retained here in Matthew Henry's own words in condensed form. This preserves for a new generation of Bible students all that is most valuable in the larger work, which has been the mainstay of preaching for more than two centuries.

Foreword

The Commentary

The Commentary on the Bible by Matthew Henry is, in many senses, unique. It has continued to be useful for two and a half centuries, and, in spite of increasing knowledge, its profound insight into spiritual and eternal truth makes its essential teaching invaluable today.

It is a practical and devotional work written by a man who has been described as one of the greatest commentators of all time. It was not produced by a recluse, isolated in his study and concerned only with academic values, but is the outcome of personal and pastoral experience. In family worship in his father's home, and later in daily prayers with his own family, and in the homes of his neighbours, he not only studied the Scriptures but learned how best to apply them to the lives and needs of people young and old, rich and poor.

Matthew Henry described his work as "methodized and practical expositions . . . in plain and homely dress". Its purpose, he said, was "to promote knowledge of the Scriptures, in order to the reforming of men's hearts and lives". Realizing the chronological and textual problems involved, he was not dogmatic in his interpretations, but agreed with Augustine that the Word of God "had enough in it that is easy to nourish the meanest to life eternal" but enough, also, to demand the industry and humility of the greatest scholars.

He wrote with confidence and authority on the basic principles of conduct and belief, but with a modesty which commanded, and should still command, respect. "I have no sufficiency of my own," he said, "but by the grace of God I am what I am, and that grace will, I trust, be sufficient for me."

As he set himself to his tremendous task, whilst fulfilling a busy pastoral ministry, he besought his friends to pray that he "might be given understanding . . . and be found the faithful servant of the Lord Jesus, who am less than the least of all that call Him Master".

With a deep sense of vocation he began his work not as one who wanted to be remembered as a scholar—though he was familiar with the Classics and Patristics—but rather as a pastor anxious to guide his flock. That is why his work is valuable, not only historically as descriptive of the Puritan outlook, but as a challenging exposition of the mercy and justice of God, and as a reliable guide to the right conduct of all who try to do His will.

No wonder that George Whitefield read the Commentary through four times—read it literally on his knees—and spoke always of "the great Matthew Henry" to whom he owed so much. The direct influence of his writing on the religious leaders of the 18th century was felt indirectly by many of the great personalities of the period and they, in turn, have passed it down the years to us. The hymns of William Cowper, for example, were undoubtedly inspired by the spirit and even the phrasing of Matthew Henry. Without him we should never have had the poignant prayer "O for a closer walk with God", nor the sturdy comfort of "God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform".

In reading Matthew Henry's comment on Leviticus viii. 35, one recognises words that Charles Wesley later used in his great hymn, "A charge to keep I have". This is part of Matthew Henry's actual command: "They attended to keep the charge of the Lord: we have every one of us a charge to keep, an eternal God to glorify, an immortal soul to provide for, needful duty to be done, our generation to serve; and it must be our daily care to keep this charge, for it is the charge of the Lord our Master."

Some of the terse epigrams and unforgettable phrases have become proverbial to the English-speaking people everywhere. But, what is more important, many of his interpretations of the Word of God have helped to create and strengthen the standards of morality by which the Christian may shape and direct his life.

Matthew Henry: The Commentator

In Broad Oak, a Welsh farmhouse at Iscoid, Flintshire, Matthew Henry was born, on October 18, 1662. His father, Philip Henry, a well-known clergyman, was one of two thousand who resigned or were ejected from their livings because they "dissented" to the conditions laid down in the Act of Uniformity, and were afterwards called "Dissenters". His mother was of an ancient and honourable family. She had a modest inheritance, so Philip Henry was able to live at Broad Oak and exercise a selfless ministry amongst the people of the district. Matthew was their second son—so frail at his birth that he was baptised when he was only a day old, lest he died within the week. As a boy he was physically weak, but mentally and, indeed, spiritually strong. (He is said to have read aloud a chapter of the Bible when he was only three years old!)

In Broad Oak, Philip Henry frequently boarded and trained a candidate for the ministry, who repaid him by acting as tutor to the children. One of these young students, a certain William Turner, gave Matthew his first love for Latin, and in the Commentary there are many apposite quotations from the Classics. Until he was eighteen, the education of Matthew was supervised by his father, a considerable scholar and a gifted teacher. Because of the increasing laxity at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, Matthew was sent, in 1680, to the Academy at Islington, London. (The "Dissenting Academies" which were established in 1662 and the following years maintained a high standard of academic education at a time when the ancient universities had betrayed their trust and forfeited the respect of serious-minded educationists, who desired intellectual freedom.) At Islington the famous Thomas Doolittle, M.A. (late of Pembroke College, Cambridge), was the Principal, and his Assistant Tutor was Thomas Vincent, M.A. (Christ Church, Oxford). Like other Academies it was forced, by persecution, to move from place to place on five occasions, but, in spite of such breaks in continuity, it was considered by many to be the foremost Presbyterian Academy. Of its Principal, Matthew Henry said, "He was very studious and diligent", but of its accommodation he described its rooms as "very straight and little". When the Academy was compelled to remove to Battersea, London, Matthew returned home, in 1682. At Broad Oak, though he was of considerable help to his father in pastoral work, he realised that there was not much likelihood of his getting a "call" to a settled pastorate. The village was remote, the restrictions on dissenting ministers were severe, and he had no desire to live in comparative idleness.

He decided to return to London to go to Gray's Inn and study Law. It was soon apparent that his remarkable memory and easy eloquence promised well for a distinguished future. But at this time he was greatly influenced by the preaching of Dr. Stillingfleet at St. Andrew's, Holborn, and by Dr. Tillotson at Lawrence Jewry. At this time, also, he gathered some of his friends in a small group which met for prayer and Bible study, just as, later, the Wesleys founded the Holy Club at Oxford.

Returning to Broad Oak, he began to preach as a candidate for the ministry. The people who heard him in Chester were so impressed that they asked him to become their pastor. After much self-examination, he decided to answer the "call". Certain London ministers ordained him, privately, on May 9th 1687, but in 1702 he obtained a document certifying the regularity of his Presbyterian ordination fifteen years earlier.

He held the pastorate in Chester from 1687 to 1712.

His first wife, Katherine Hardware, died of small-pox, as she gave birth to a child. Subsequently he married the grand-daughter of Peter Warburton, a judge of the Court of Common Pleas. Though three of their nine children died in infancy, this marriage was as happy as the first had been. No domestic tragedy could mar the beauty of his home life. It was moulded on the pattern of Broad Oak, where his father's house was often described as "a house of God and a gate of heaven". In Chester Matthew Henry conducted family prayers in his home at the beginning and the end of the day. In the morning he expounded the Old Testament, and in the evening the New Testament. Probably these expositions, amended as the result of questions and comments from his family and his neighbours, were the basis of his Commentary.

In public services he usually prayed for half an hour, preached for an hour, and joined in singing Psalms from a selection he himself had made. His sermons were expository, never political but always practical in their application to the problems of ordinary life. They frequently contained some reference to the condition of the people of the Reformed Churches, who were suffering severe persecution on the Continent.

On Saturday afternoons he held catechism classes for children, in preparation for their attendance at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which, he stressed, was a fulfilment of their baptismal covenant.

Though he had strong personal convictions on the cardinal doctrines, he was not intolerant, and visited all who were in need, whatever might be the communion to which they belonged. He preached on six days a week to various congregations within a radius of thirty miles, but always contrived to be in his own pulpit at Chester on Sunday. His influence in the city grew rapidly, and a new meeting-house was built to accommodate the large congregations which now came to hear him.

After recovering from a serious illness in 1704, he began his Notes on the New Testament, and the entry in his diary concluded with a typical prayer: "The Lord help me to set about it with great humility."

Six years later, in 1710, an urgent "call" came to him from the congregation in Silver Street, Hackney, London. He was reluctant to leave Chester, but felt that his work on the Commentary would be helped by easier access to books and to Biblical scholars in London. "I look back with sorrow for leaving Chester," he said; "I look forward with fear; but unto Thee, O Lord, do I look up."

It was not surprising that his attempt to discharge the duties of a large pastorate and, at the same time, to write a detailed commentary on the whole Bible overtaxed his physical resources.

He was troubled by the poor quality of religious life in England, and this increased his weakness. In 1714, whilst paying a visit to his old friends in Chester, he died, from apoplexy, at Nantwich. He was only fifty-two, and it seemed a tragic ending; but as one of his relatives said: "I believe it was most agreeable to him to have so short a passage from his work to his reward." To have exercised so virile and continuous a ministry, to have been a pastor with such intimate insight into the problems of his people, and to have produced so monumental a work as his Commentary, was an astonishing achievement. For two and a half centuries innumerable people have been enlightened and inspired by his interpretation of the Scriptures. Its essentials have stood the test of time, as, in his own day, they stood the test of human experience. The explanation is, surely, that it had its origin in his fellowship with his Master and in his constant concern for the deepest needs of the people committed to his care.

The New Edition of the Commentary

Matthew Henry began his Commentary, November 1704. The first volume was published 1708 (folio). This first volume with four others appeared in uniform edition 1710 (folio). Before he died he completed volume 6 up to Acts and after his death, the Epistles and Revelation were prepared by thirteen nonconformist divines.

For many years a standard six-volume edition has been, and indeed remains, very popular. There has been, however, in recent years a persistent and increasing demand for a shorter version which, at a lower price, should be available to an even wider public.

In reducing the six volumes to one, certain principles have been strictly observed.

1. The work is still produced in Matthew Henry's words. Even archaisms have frequently been retained, since emphasis is strengthened by the very quaintness of their appeal. Abbreviation has not been accomplished by any kind of paraphrase.
2. Obvious anachronisms have been, in the light of present knowledge, omitted.
3. Factual errors in minor details of background material have also been corrected, but the corrections are such as Matthew Henry himself would have sanctioned, for the sake of accuracy. For example, references to the "seasons" do not correspond with natural conditions in the Middle East. The physical features and climate of Palestine and Syria make the times of harvest quite different from those in the Western world.
4. Many quaint phrases and aphorisms have been retained, since, although they are not used in modern speech, they reveal the personality of the commentator, and often express truth with point and piquancy.
5. Where, in certain places, imagination has dispensed with evidence, we have not included such unimportant passages; e.g. of Noah's drunkenness Matthew Henry comments, "We have reason to believe he was never drunk before nor since" (Gen. 9, 21).

This one-volume edition we hope will be justified by its usefulness in private devotions, in groups for Bible study, and in the public and private exposition of eternal Truth as revealed in Holy Scripture.

This is a valuable aid to the preacher and speaker. It is not a museum-piece, but a sincere and vivid interpretation. It may be that you will not agree with all its conclusions, but it cannot but help you to form your own with confidence.

THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

GENESIS

We have now before us the holy Bible, or book, for so bible signifies. We call it the book, for it is incomparably the best book that ever was written, the book of books. We call it the holy book, because it was written by holy men, and indited by the Holy Ghost. The great things of God's law and gospel are here written for us, that they might be transmitted to distant places and ages more pure and entire than possibly they could be by report and tradition. This is the light that shines in a dark place (2 Pet. i. 19), and a dark place indeed the world would be without the Bible.

We have before us that part of the Bible which we call the Old Testament. This is called a testament, or covenant (Διαθήκη), because it was a settled declaration of the will of God concerning man in a federal way, and had its force from the designed death of the great testator, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. It is called the Old Testament, with relation to the New, which does not cancel and supersede it, but crowns and perfects it, by the bringing in of that better hope which was typified and foretold in it.

We have before us that part of the Old Testament which we call the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses. In our Saviour's distribution of the books of the Old Testament into the law, the prophets, and the psalms, or Hagiographa, these are the law.

We have before us the first and longest of those five books, which we call Genesis, written, some think, when Moses was in Midian, for the instruction and comfort of his suffering brethren in Egypt: I rather think he wrote it in the wilderness, after he had been in the mount with God, where, probably, he received full and particular instructions for the writing of it. Genesis is a name borrowed from the Greek. It signifies the original, or generation: it is a history of originals—the creation of the world, the entrance of sin and death into it, the invention of arts, the rise of nations, and especially the planting of the church, and the state of it in its early days. It is also a history of the generations of Adam, Noah, Abraham, &c. The beginning of the New Testament is called Genesis too (Matt. i. 1), Βίβλος γενέσεως, the book of the genesis, or generation, of Jesus Christ. Blessed be God for that book which shows us our remedy, as this opens our wound. Lord, open our eyes, that we may see the wondrous things both of thy law and gospel!

CHAP. I

A plain and full account of the creation of the world—in answer to that first enquiry "Where is God my Maker?" Concerning this the pagan philosophers wretchedly blundered, some asserting the world's eternity and self-existence, others ascribing it to a fortuitous concourse of atoms: thus "the world by wisdom knew not God", but took a great deal of pains to lose him. The holy scripture by revealed religion lays down, at first, this principle That this world was, in the beginning of time, created by a Being of infinite wisdom and power, who was himself before all time and all worlds. The first verse of the Bible gives us a surer and better, a more satisfying and useful, knowledge of the origin of the universe, than all the volumes of the philosophers.

We have three things in this chapter:—I. A general idea given us of the work of creation, ver. 1, 2. II. A particular account of the several days' work, registered, as in a journal, distinctly and in order. The review and approbation of the whole work, ver. 31.

Verses 1 2

The work of creation in its epitome and in its embryo.

1. In its epitome, v. 1, where we find the first article of our creed, that God the Father Almighty is the Maker of heaven and earth.

1. Observe, in this verse, four things:—

(1) The effect produced—the whole frame and furniture of the universe. The world is a great house, consisting of upper and lower stories, the structure stately and magnificent, uniform and convenient, and every room well and wisely furnished. The heavens are not only beautified to our eye with glorious lamps which garnish its outside, of whose creation we here read, but they are within replenished with glorious beings, out of our sight. In the visible world it is easy to observe, [1] Great variety, several sorts of beings vastly differing in their nature and constitution from each other. [2] Great beauty. The azure sky and verdant earth are charming to the eye of the curious spectator. How transcendent then must the beauty of the Creator be! [3] Great exactness and accuracy. To those that, with the help of microscopes, narrowly look into the works of nature, they appear far more fine than any of the works of art. [4] Great power. It is not a lump of dead and inactive matter, the earth itself has a magnetic power. [5] Great order, a mutual dependence of beings, an exact harmony of motions, and an admirable chain and connection of causes. [6] Great mystery. There are phenomena in nature which cannot be solved. But from what we see of heaven and earth we may infer the eternal power and Godhead of the great Creator. Our duty as Christians is always to keep heaven in our eye and the earth under our feet.

(2) The author and cause of this great work—GOD. The Hebrew word is Elohim, which bespeaks, [1] The power of God the Creator. El signifies the strong God; and what less than almighty strength could bring all things out of nothing? [2] The plurality of persons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This plural name of God, in Hebrew, which speaks of him as many though he is one, confirming our faith in the doctrine of the Trinity, which, though but darkly intimated in the Old Testament, is clearly revealed in the New. We are often told that the world was made by him, and nothing made without him, John i. 3, 10; Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2.

(3) The manner in which this work was effected: God created it, that is, made it out of nothing. There was not any pre-existent matter out of which the world was produced. No artificer can work, unless he has something to work on. But by the almighty power of God it is not only possible that something should be made of nothing (the God of nature is not subject to the laws of nature), but in the creation it is impossible it should be otherwise, for nothing is more injurious to the honour of the Eternal Mind than the supposition of eternal matter.

(4) When this work was produced: In the beginning, that is, in the beginning of time, when that clock was first set a-going: time began with the production of those beings that are measured by time. Before the beginning of time there was none but that Infinite Being that inhabits eternity. But to us it is enough to say, In the beginning was the Word, John i. 1.

2. Let us learn hence, (1) That atheism is folly, and atheists are the greatest fools in nature; for they see there is a world that could not make itself, and yet they will not own there is a God that made it. (2) That God is sovereign Lord of all by an incontestable right. (3) That with God all things are possible, and therefore happy are the people that have him for their God, and whose help and hope stand in his name, Ps. cxxi. 2; cxxiv. 8. (4) That the God we serve is worthy of all blessing and praise, Neh. ix. 5, 6. If all is of him, all must be to him.

II. The work of creation in its embryo, v. 2, where we have an account of the first matter and the first mover.

1. A chaos was the first matter. It is here called the earth; it is also called the deep, both for its vastness and because the waters which were afterwards separated from the earth were now mixed with it. The Creator could have made his work perfect at first, but by this gradual proceeding he would show what is, ordinarily, the method of his providence and grace. Observe the description of this chaos. (1) There was nothing in it desirable to be seen, for it was without form and void. Tohu and Bohu, confusion and emptiness; so these words are rendered, Isa. xxxiv. 11. To those who have their hearts in heaven this lower world, in comparison with that upper, still appears to be nothing but confusion and emptiness. (2) If there had been anything desirable to be seen, yet there was no light to see it by; for darkness, thick darkness, was upon the face of the deep. This chaos represents the state of an unregenerate graceless soul: there is disorder, confusion, and every evil work; it is empty of all good, for it is without God; it is dark till almighty grace effects a blessed change.

2. The Spirit of God was the first mover: He moved upon the face of the waters. The Spirit of God begins to work, and, if he work, who or what shall hinder? God is said to make the world by his Spirit, Ps. xxxiii. 6; Job xxvi. 13; and by the same mighty worker the new creation is effected. He moved upon the face of the deep. God is not only the author of all being, but the fountain of life and spring of motion. Dead matter would be for ever dead if he did not quicken it. And this makes it credible to us that God should raise the dead.

We have here a further account of the first day's work, in which observe, 1. That the first of all visible beings which God created was light, that by it we might see his works and his glory in them, and might work our works while it is day. Light is the great beauty and blessing of the universe. In the new creation, the first thing wrought in the soul is light: the blessed Spirit captivates the will and affections by enlightening the understanding. Those that by sin were darkness by grace become light in the world. 2. That the light was made by the word of God's power. He said, Let there be light; he willed and appointed it, and it was done immediately. The word of God is quick and powerful. Christ is the Word, the essential eternal Word, and by him the light was produced, for in him was light, and he is the true light, the light of the world, John i. 9; ix. 5. The divine light which shines in sanctified souls is wrought by the power of God, giving the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ, as, at first, God commanded the light to shine out of darkness, 2 Cor. iv. 6. 3. That the light which God willed, when it was produced, he approved of: God saw the light that it was good. If the light is good, how good is he that is the fountain of light, from whom we receive it. 4. That God divided the light from the darkness. Yet he divided time between them, the day for light and the night for darkness, in a constant and regular succession to each other. Though the darkness was now scattered by the light, yet it takes its turn with the light, and has its place, because it has its use; for, as the light of the morning befriends the business of the day, so the shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night, and draw the curtains about us, that we may sleep the better. 5. That God divided them from each other by distinguishing names: He called the light day, and the darkness he called night. He gave them names, as the Lord of both. Let us acknowledge God in the constant succession of day and night, and consecrate both to his honour, by working for him every day and resting in him every night. 6. That this was the first day's work, and a good day's work it was. The evening and the morning were the first day. This was not only the first day of the world, but the first day of the week. I observe it to the honour of that day, because the new world began on the first day of the week likewise, in the resurrection of Christ, as the light of the world, early in the morning. In him the dayspring from on high has visited the world.

Verses 6–8

We have here an account of the second day's work, the creation of the firmament, in which observe, 1. The command of God concerning it: Let there be a firmament, an expansion, so the Hebrew word signifies, like a sheet spread, or a curtain drawn out. This firmament is not a wall of partition, but a way of intercourse. See Job xxvi. 7; xxxvii. 18; Ps. civ. 3; Amos ix. 6. 2. The creation of it. Lest it should seem as if God had only commanded it to be done, and someone else had done it, he adds, And God made the firmament. What God requires of us he himself works in us, or it is not done. He that commands faith, holiness, and love, creates them by the power of his grace going along with his word. 3. The use and design of it—to divide the waters from the waters, that is, to distinguish between the waters that are wrapped up in the clouds and those that cover the sea. God has, in the firmament of his power, chambers, store-chambers, whence he watereth the earth. O what a great God is he who has thus provided for the comfort of all that serve him. 4. The naming of it: He called the firmament heaven. It is the visible heaven, the pavement of the holy city; above the firmament God is said to have his throne (Ezek. i. 26). We should be led by the contemplation of the heavens that are in our eye to consider our Father who is in heaven. The height of the heavens should remind us of God's supremacy and the infinite distance there is between us and him; the brightness of the heavens and their purity should remind us of his glory, and majesty, and perfect holiness; the vastness of the heavens, their encompassing of the earth, and the influence they have upon it, should remind us of his immensity and universal providence.

Hitherto the power of the Creator had been employed about the upper part of the visible world; the light of heaven was kindled, and the firmament of heaven fixed: but now he descends to this lower world, the earth, which was designed for the children of men, designed both for their habitation and for their maintenance; and here we have an account of the fitting of it for both, the building of their house and the spreading of their table.

I. How the earth was prepared to be a habitation for man, by the gathering of the waters together, and the making of the dry land to appear. 1. The waters which had covered the earth were ordered to retire, and to gather into one place. The waters thus collected he called seas. Waters and seas often, in scripture, signify troubles and afflictions, Ps. xlii. 7; lxix. 2, 14, 15. God's own people are not exempted from these in this world; but it is their comfort that they are only waters under the heaven (there are none in heaven), and that they are all in the place that God has appointed them and within the bounds that he has set for them. 2. The dry land was made to appear, and emerge out of the waters, and was called earth, and given to the children of men. The earth, it seems, was in being before; but it was of no use, because it was under water. Thus many of God's gifts are received in vain, because they are buried; make them to appear, and they become serviceable.

II. How the earth was furnished for the maintenance and support of man, v. 11, 12. Present provision was now made, by the immediate products of the upstart earth. It became fruitful, and brought forth grass for the cattle and herb for the service of man. Provision was likewise made for time to come, every one having its seed in itself after its kind, that, during the continuance of man upon the earth, food might be fetched out of the earth for his use and benefit. Observe here, 1. That not only the earth is the Lord's, but the fulness thereof, and he is the rightful owner and sovereign disposer, not only of it, but of all its furniture. The earth was emptiness (v. 2), but now, by a word's speaking, it has become full of God's riches. 2. That common providence is a continued creation, and in it our Father worketh hitherto. The earth still remains under the efficacy of this command, to bring forth grass, and herbs, and its annual products. They are standing instances of the unwearied power and unexhausted goodness of the world's great Maker and Master. 3. That though God, ordinarily, makes use of the agency of second causes, according to their nature, yet he neither needs them nor is tied to them. 4. That it is good to provide things necessary before we have occasions to use them: before the beasts and man were made, here were grass and herbs prepared for them. 5. That God must have the glory of all the benefit we receive from the products of the earth.

This is the history of the fourth day's work, the creating of the sun, moon, and stars, that garniture which is not only so much the beauty of the upper world, but so much the blessing of this lower. Of the creation of the lights of heaven we have an account,

I. In general, v. 14, 15, where we have, 1. The command given concerning them: Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven. God had said, Let there be light (v. 3), and there was light; but this was, as it were, a chaos of light, scattered and confused: now it was collected and modelled, and so rendered both more glorious and more serviceable. God is the God of order, and not of confusion; and, as he is light, so he is the Father and former of lights. 2. The use they were intended to be to this earth. (1) They must be for the distinction of times, of day and night, summer and winter, and thus, under the sun, there is a season to every purpose, Eccl. iii. 1. (2) They must be for the direction of actions. They are for signs of the change of weather, that the husbandman may order his affairs with discretion, foreseeing, by the face of the sky, when second causes have begun to work, whether it will be fair or foul, Matt. xvi. 2, 3. They do also give light upon the earth, that we may walk (John xi. 9), and work (John ix. 4), according as the duty of every day requires. The lights of heaven shine for us, for our pleasure and advantage. The lights of heaven are made to serve us, and they do it faithfully, and shine in their season, without fail: but we are set as lights in this world to serve God; and do we in like manner answer the end of our creation? We burn our Master's candles, but do not mind our Master's work.

II. In particular, v. 16–18.

1. Observe, The lights of heaven are the sun, moon, and stars; and all these are the work of God's hands. (1) The sun is the greatest light of all. Let us learn from Ps. xix. 1–6 how to give unto God the glory due unto his name, as the Maker of the sun. (2) The moon is a less light, and yet is here reckoned one of the greater lights. Those are most valuable that are most serviceable; and those are the greater lights, not that have the best gifts, but that humbly and faithfully do the most good with them. (3) He made the stars also, for the scriptures were written, not to gratify our curiosity and make us astronomers, but to lead us to God, and make us saints. Now these lights are deputy-governors, rulers under him. Here the less light, the moon, is said to rule the night; but in Ps. cxxxvi. 9 the stars are mentioned as sharers in that government: The moon and stars to rule by night. The best and most honourable way of ruling is by giving light and doing good: those command respect that live a useful life, and so shine as lights.

2. Learn from all this, (1) The sin and folly of that ancient idolatry, the worshipping of the sun, moon, and stars. But the account here given of them plainly shows that they are both God's creatures and man's servants; and therefore it is both a great affront to God and a great reproach to ourselves to make deities of them and give them divine honours. (2) The duty and wisdom of daily worshipping that God who made all these things, and to offer the solemn sacrifice of prayer and praise every morning and evening.

We do not read of the creation of any living creature till the fifth day, of which these verses give us an account. It was on the fifth day that the fish and fowl were created, and both out of the waters. Observe, 1. The making of the fish and fowl, at first, v. 20, 21. God commanded them to be produced. He said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly. This command he himself executed: God created great whales, &c. Insects, which perhaps are as various and as numerous as any species of animals, and their structure as curious, were part of this day's work. Mr. Boyle (I remember) says he admires the Creator's wisdom and power as much in an ant as in an elephant. The curious formation of the bodies of animals, their different sizes, shapes, and natures, with the admirable powers of the sensitive life with which they are endued, when duly considered, serve, not only to silence and shame the objections of atheists and infidels, but to raise high thoughts and high praises of God in pious and devout souls, Ps. civ. 25, &c. 2. The blessing of them, in order to their continuance. Life is a wasting thing. Its strength is not the strength of stones. It is a candle that will burn out, if it be not first blown out; and therefore the wise Creator not only made the individuals, but provided for the propagation of the several kinds: God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, v. 22.

We have here the first part of the sixth day's work, and this day were made the beasts of the earth, the cattle, and the creeping things that pertain to the earth. Here, as before, 1. The Lord gave the word; he said, Let the earth bring forth. 2. He also did the work; he made them all after their kind, not only of divers shapes, but of divers natures, manners, food, and fashions—some living upon grass and herbs, others upon flesh—some bold, and others timorous—some for man's service, and not his sustenance, as the horse—others for his sustenance, and not his service, as the sheep—others for both, as the ox—and some for neither, as the wild beasts.

The second part of the sixth day's work, the creation of man.

I. That man was made last of all the creatures, that it might not be suspected that he had been, in any way, a helper to God in the creation of the world. Yet it was both an honour and a favour to him that he was made last: an honour, for the method of the creation was to advance from that which was less perfect to that which was more so; and a favour, for it was not fit he should be lodged in the palace designed for him till it was completely fitted up and furnished for his reception. Man, as soon as he was made, had the whole visible creation before him, both to contemplate and to take the comfort of.

II. That man's creation was a more signal and immediate act of divine wisdom and power than that of the other creatures. Hitherto, it had been said, "Let there be light," and "Let there be a firmament," and "Let the earth, or waters, bring forth" such a thing; but now the word of command is turned into a word of consultation, "Let us make man, for whose sake the rest of the creatures were made: this is a work we must take into our own hands." In the former he speaks as one having authority, in this as one having affection; as if he had said, "Having at last settled the preliminaries, let us now apply ourselves to the business, Let us make man." Man was to be a creature different from all that had been hitherto made. Flesh and spirit, heaven and earth, must be put together in him, and he must be allied to both worlds. And therefore God himself not only undertakes to make him, but is pleased so to express himself as if he called a council to consider of the making of him: Let us make man. The three persons of the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, consult about it and concur in it. Let him rule man who said, Let us make man.

III. That man was made in God's image and after his likeness, two words to express the same thing and making each other the more expressive; image and likeness denote the likest image. Still between God and man there is an infinite distance. Christ only is the express image of God's person, as the Son of his Father, having the same nature. It is only some of God's honour that is put upon man, who is God's image only as the shadow in the glass, or the king's impress upon the coin. God's image upon man consists in these three things:—1. In his nature and constitution, not those of his body (for God has not a body), but those of his soul. This honour indeed God has put upon the body of man, that the Word was made flesh, the Son of God was clothed with a body like ours and will shortly clothe ours with a glory like that of his. But it is the soul, the great soul, of man, that does especially bear God's image. The soul of man, considered in its three noble faculties, understanding, will, and active power, is perhaps the brightest, clearest looking-glass in nature, wherein to see God. 2. In his place and authority: Let us make man in our image, and let him have dominion. As he has the government of the inferior creatures, he is, as it were, God's representative, or viceroy, upon earth. Yet his government of himself by the freedom of his will has in it more of God's image than his government of the creatures. 3. In his purity and rectitude. God's image upon man consists in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10. Thus holy, thus happy, were our first parents, in having the image of God upon them.

IV. That man was made male and female, and blessed with the blessing of fruitfulness and increase. God said, Let us make man, and immediately it follows, So God created man; he performed what he resolved. With us saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God. It would seem that of the rest of the creatures God made many couples; but of man did not he make one? Whence Christ gathers an argument against divorce, Matt. xix. 4, 5. Our first father, Adam, was confined to one wife; and, if he had put her away, there was no other for him to marry, which plainly intimated that the bond of marriage was not to be dissolved at pleasure. God made but one male and one female, that all the nations of men might know themselves to be made of one blood, descendants from one common stock, and might thereby be induced to love one another. He gave them, 1. A large inheritance: Replenish the earth; it is this that is bestowed upon the children of men. They were made to dwell upon the face of all the earth, Acts xvii. 26. This is the place in which God has set man to be a probationer for a better state. 2. A numerous lasting family, to enjoy this inheritance.

V. That God gave to man, when he had made him, a dominion over the inferior creatures, over the fish of the sea and over the fowl of the air. Though man provides for neither, he has power over both. God designed hereby to put an honour upon man. God's providence continues so much of it to the children of men as is necessary to the safety and support of their lives.

Verses 29–30

The third part of the sixth day's work, a gracious provision of food for all flesh, Ps. cxxxvi. 25.

I. Food provided for man, v. 29. Herbs and fruits must be his meat. See here, 1. That which should make us humble. As we were made out of the earth, so we are maintained out of it. There is meat that endures to everlasting life; the Lord evermore give us this. 2. That which should make us thankful. The Lord is for the body; from him we receive all the supports and comforts of this life. He gives us all things richly to enjoy, not only for necessity, but plenty, dainties, and varieties, for ornament and delight. 3. That which should make us temperate and content with our lot. If God gives us food for our lives, let us not, with murmuring Israel, ask food for our lusts, Ps. lxxviii. 18; see Dan. i. 15.

II. Food provided for the beasts, v. 30. Doth God take care for oxen? Yes, certainly, he provides food convenient for them, and not for oxen only, but even the young lions and the young ravens are the care of his providence. He is a great housekeeper, a very rich and bountiful one, that satisfies the desire of every living thing. He that feeds his birds will not starve his babes.

The approbation and conclusion of the whole work of creation.

I. The review God took of his work: He saw that every thing that he had made. So he does still; all the works of his hands are under his eye. Omniscience cannot be separated from omnipotence. But this was the Eternal Mind's solemn reflection upon the copies of its own wisdom and the products of its own power. God has hereby set us an example of reviewing our works. When we have finished a day's work, and are entering upon the rest of the night, we should commune with our own hearts about what we have been doing that day.

II. The complacency God took in his work. He did not pronounce it good till he had seen it so, to teach us not to answer a matter before we hear it. 1. It was good. Good, for it is all agreeable to the mind of the Creator, just as he would have it to be. Good, for it answers the end of its creation, and is fit for the purpose for which it was designed. Good, for it is serviceable to man, whom God had appointed lord of the visible creation. Good, for it is all for God's glory. 2. It was very good. Of each day's work (except the second) it was said that it was good, but now, it is very good. For, (1) Now man was made, who was the chief of the ways of God, who was designed to be the visible image of the Creator's glory and the mouth of the creation in his praises. (2) Now all was made; every part was good, but all together very good. The glory and goodness, the beauty and harmony, of God's works, both of providence and grace, as this of creation, will best appear when they are perfected. Therefore judge nothing before the time.

III. The time when this work was concluded: The evening and the morning were the sixth day; so that in six days God made the world. We are not to think but that God could have made the world in an instant. He that said, Let there be light, and there was light, could have said, "Let there be a world," and there would have been a world, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as at the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 52. But he did it in his own way and in his own time. So much would the sabbath conduce to the keeping up of religion in the world that God had an eye to it in the timing of his creation.

CHAP. II

This chapter is an appendix to the history of the creation, more particularly explaining and enlarging upon that part of the history which relates immediately to man. We have in it, I. The institution and sanctification of the sabbath, ver. 1–3. II. A more particular account of man's creation, ver. 4–7. III. A description of the garden of Eden, and the placing of man in it under the obligations of a law and covenant, ver. 8–17. IV. The creation of the woman, her marriage to the man, and the institution of the ordinance of marriage, ver. 18, &c.

Verses 1–3

I. The settlement of the kingdom of nature, in God's resting from the work of creation, v. 1, 2. Here observe, 1. The creatures made both in heaven and earth are disciplined, and under command. Every one knows and keeps his place. 2. The heavens and the earth are finished pieces, and so are all the creatures in them. 3. After the end of the first six days God ceased from all works of creation. He has so ended his work. In miracles, he has controlled nature, but never changed its settled course. 4. The eternal God did not rest, as one weary, but as one well-pleased.

II. The commencement of the kingdom of grace, in the sanctification of the sabbath day, v. 3. Observe, 1. The solemn observance of one day in seven, as a day of holy rest and holy work, to God's honour, is the indispensable duty of all those to whom God has revealed his holy sabbaths. 2. Sabbaths are as ancient as the world; and I see no reason to doubt that the sabbath, being now instituted in innocency, was religiously observed by the people of God throughout the patriarchal age. 3. The sabbath of the Lord is truly honourable, and we have reason to honour it in obedience to him. 4. The sabbath day is a blessed day, for God blessed it, and that which he blesses is blessed indeed. God has promised, on that day, to meet us and bless us. 5. The sabbath day is a holy day, for God has sanctified it.

In these verses, I. Here is a name given to the Creator which we have not yet met with, and that is Jehovah—the LORD, in capital letters, which are constantly used in our English translation to intimate that in the original it is Jehovah. All along, in the first chapter, he was called Elohim—a God of power; but now Jehovah Elohim—a God of power and perfection, a finishing God. Jehovah is that great and incommunicable name of God which denotes his having his being of himself, and his giving being to all things.

II. Further notice taken of the production of plants and herbs, because they were made and appointed to be food for man, v. 5, 6. Here observe, 1. The earth did not bring forth its fruits of itself, but purely by the almighty power of God. Thus grace in the soul, that plant of renown, grows not of itself in nature's soil, but is the work of God's own hands. 2. Rain also is the gift of God; it came not till the Lord God caused it to rain. 3. Though God, ordinarily, works by means, yet he is not tied to them. 4. Some way or other God will take care to water the plants that are of his own planting. Though as yet there was no rain, God made a mist equivalent to a shower, and with it watered the whole face of the ground. Divine grace descends like a mist, or silent dew, and waters the church without noise, Deut. xxxii. 2.

III. A more particular account of the creation of man, v. 7. Man is a little world, consisting of heaven and earth, soul and body. Now here we have an account of the origin of both.

1. The mean origin, and yet the curious structure, of the body of man. (1) The matter was despicable. He was made of the dust of the ground, a very unlikely thing to make a man of; but the same infinite power that made the world of nothing made man, its masterpiece, of next to nothing. He was not made of gold-dust, powder of pearl, or diamond dust, but common dust, dust of the ground. Our fabric is earthly, and the fashioning of it like that of an earthen vessel, Job x. 9. What have we then to be proud of? (2) Yet the Maker was great, and the make fine. Of the other creatures it is said that they were created and made; but of man that he was formed, which denotes a gradual process in the work with great accuracy and exactness. The workmanship exceeded the materials. Let us present our bodies to God as living sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1).

Man consisting of body and soul, a body made out of the earth and a rational immortal soul the breath of heaven, we have, in these verses, the provision that was made for the happiness of both; he that made him took care to make him happy, if he could but have kept himself so and known when he was well off.

I. A description of the garden of Eden, which was intended for the mansion and demesne of this great lord, the palace of this prince. The inspired penman, in this history, writing for the Jews first, and calculating his narratives for the infant state of the church, describes things by their outward sensible appearances, and leaves us, by further discoveries of the divine light, to be led into the understanding of the mysteries couched under them. Therefore he does not so much insist upon the happiness of Adam's mind as upon that of his outward state.

1. The place appointed for Adam's residence was a garden; not an ivory house nor a palace overlaid with gold, but a garden, furnished and adorned by nature, not by art. The heaven was the roof of Adam's house, and never was any roof so curiously ceiled and painted. The earth was his floor, and never was any floor so richly inlaid. The shadow of the trees was his retirement; under them were his dining-rooms, his lodging-rooms, and never were any rooms so finely hung as these: Solomon's, in all their glory, were not arrayed like them. Nature is content with a little and that which is most natural, grace with less, but lust with nothing.

2. The contrivance and furniture of this garden were the immediate work of God's wisdom and power. The Lord God planted this garden. No delights can be agreeable nor satisfying to a soul but those that God himself has provided and appointed for it; no true paradise, but of God's planting.

3. The situation of this garden was extremely sweet. It was in Eden, which signifies delight and pleasure. The place is here particularly pointed out by such marks and bounds as were sufficient. Let it be our care to make sure of a place in the heavenly paradise, and then we need not perplex ourselves with a search after the place of the earthly paradise.

4. The trees with which this garden was planted. (1) It had all the best and choicest trees. God, as a tender Father, consulted not only Adam's profit, but his pleasure; for there is a pleasure consistent with innocency, nay, there is a true and transcendent pleasure in innocency. But, (2) It had two extraordinary trees peculiar to itself; on earth there were not their like. [1] There was the tree of life in the midst of the garden, which was chiefly intended to be a sign and seal to Adam, assuring him of the continuance of life and happiness, even to immortality and everlasting bliss, through the grace and favour of his Maker, upon condition of his perseverance in this state of innocency and obedience. Of this he might eat and live. Christ is now to us the tree of life (Rev. ii. 7; xxii. 2). [2] There was the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, so called, not because it had any virtue in it to beget or increase useful knowledge, but, First, Because there was an express positive revelation of the will of God concerning this tree, so that by it he might know moral good and evil. What is good? It is good not to eat of this tree. What is evil? It is evil to eat of this tree. The distinction between all other moral good and evil was written in the heart of man by nature; but this, which resulted from a positive law, was written upon this tree. Secondly, Because, in the event, it proved to give Adam an experimental knowledge of good by the loss of it and of evil by the sense of it. As the covenant of grace has in it, not only Believe and be saved, but also, Believe not and be damned (Mark xvi. 16), so the covenant of innocency had in it, not only "Do this and live," which was sealed and confirmed by the tree of life, but "Fail and die," which Adam was assured of by this other tree: "Touch it at your peril; " so that, in these two trees, God set before him good and evil, the blessing and the curse, Deut. xxx. 19. These two trees were as two sacraments.

5. The rivers with which this garden was watered, v. 10–14. These four rivers (or one river branched into four streams) contributed much both to the pleasantness and the fruitfulness of this garden. In the heavenly paradise there is a river infinitely surpassing these; for it is a river of the water of life, not coming out of Eden, as this, but proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb (Rev. xxii. 1), a river that makes glad the city of our God, Ps. xlvi. 4. Havilah had gold, and spices, and precious stones; but Eden had that which was infinitely better, the tree of life, and communion with God. So we may say of the Africans and Indians: "They have the gold, but we have the gospel. The gold of their land is good, but the riches of ours are infinitely better."

II. The placing of man in this paradise of delight, v. 15, where observe,

1. How God put him in possession of it. (1) Man was made out of paradise; for, after God had formed him, he put him into the garden: he was made of common clay, not of paradise-dust. He could not plead a tenant-right to the garden, for he was not born upon the premises, nor had anything but what he received. (2) The same God that was the author of his being was the author of his bliss. He that made us is alone able to make us happy. (3) It adds much to the comfort of any condition if we have plainly seen God going before us and putting us into it. If we have not forced providence, but taken the hints of direction it has given us, we may hope to find a paradise. See Ps. xlvii. 4.

2. How God appointed him to dress the garden and to keep it. Paradise itself was not a place of exemption from work. Note here, (1) We were none of us sent into the world to be idle. He that made us these souls and bodies has given us something to work with; he that gave us being has given us business, to serve him and our generation, and to work out our salvation. (2) Secular employments will very well consist with a state of innocency and a life of communion with God. (3) The husbandman's calling is an ancient and honourable calling; it was needful even in paradise. It was a calling giving man an opportunity of admiring the Creator. While his hands were about his trees, his heart might be with his God. (4) There is a true pleasure in the business which God calls us to, and employs us in.

III. The command which God gave to man in innocency, and the covenant he then took him into. Hitherto we have seen God as man's powerful Creator and his bountiful Benefactor; now he appears as his Ruler and Lawgiver.

Observe here, I. God's authority over man, as a creature that had reason and freedom of will. The Lord God commanded the man, who stood now as the father and representative of all mankind, to receive law, as he had lately received a nature. The brute-creatures have their respective instincts; but man was made capable of performing reasonable service, and therefore received, not only the command of a Creator, but the command of a Prince and Master.

II. The particular act of this authority, in prescribing to him what he should do.

1. A confirmation of his present happiness to him, in that grant, Of every tree in the garden thou mayest freely eat. This was not only an allowance of liberty to him, but it was, withal, an assurance of life to him, immortal life, upon his obedience. Thus, upon condition of perfect personal and perpetual obedience, Adam was sure of paradise to himself and his heirs for ever.

2. A trial of his obedience, upon pain of the forfeiture of all his happiness: "Know, Adam, that thou art now upon thy good behaviour, thou art put into paradise upon trial; be observant, be obedient, and thou art made for ever; otherwise thou wilt be as miserable as now thou art happy." Here,

(1) Adam is threatened with death in case of disobedience. Observe, [1] Even Adam, in innocency, was awed with a threatening. [2] The penalty threatened is death. [3] This was threatened as the immediate consequence of sin.

(2) Adam is tried with a positive law, not to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. [1] Because the reason of it is fetched purely from the will of the Law-maker. Adam had in his nature an aversion to that which was evil in itself, and therefore he is tried in a thing which was evil only because it was forbidden. [2] Because the restraint of it is laid upon the desires of the flesh and of the mind, which, in the corrupt nature of man, are the two great fountains of sin. This prohibition checked both his appetite towards sensitive delights and his ambition of curious knowledge, that his body might be ruled by his soul and his soul by his God.

I. An instance of the Creator's care of man and his fatherly concern for his comfort, v. 18. He lets him know, for his encouragement in his obedience, that he was a friend.

1. How God graciously pitied his solitude. He that made him knew both him and what was good for him, better than he did himself, and he said, "It is not good that he should continue thus alone." (1) It is not for his comfort; for man is a sociable creature. Perfect solitude would turn a paradise into a desert, and a palace into a dungeon. (2) It is not for the increase and continuance of his kind. God could have made a world of men at first, to replenish the earth. God saw fit to make up that number by a succession of generations, which, as God had formed man, must be from two, and those male and female; one will be ever one.

2. How God graciously resolved to provide society for him. The result of this reasoning concerning him was this kind resolution, I will make a help-meet for him. Note hence, (1) In our best state in this world we have need of one another's help. (2) It is God only who perfectly knows our wants, and is perfectly able to supply them all, Phil. iv. 19. In him alone our help is, and from him are all our helpers. (3) A suitable wife is a help-meet, and is from the Lord. (4) Family-society, if it is agreeable, is a redress sufficient for the grievance of solitude. He that has a good God, a good heart, and a good wife, to converse with, and yet complains he wants conversation, would not have been easy and content in paradise.

II. An instance of the creatures' subjection to man, and his dominion over them (v. 19, 20). Thus God gave man livery and seisin of the fair estate he had granted him, and put him in possession of his dominion over the creatures. God brought them to him, that he might name them, and so might give, 1. A proof of his knowledge, as a creature endued with the faculties both of reason and speech. And, 2. A proof of his power. It is an act of authority to impose names. God gave names to the day and night, to the firmament, to the earth, and to the sea; and he calleth the stars by their names, to show that he is the supreme Lord of these. But he gave Adam leave to name the beasts and fowls, as their subordinate lord; for, having made him in his own image, he thus put some of his honour upon him.

III. An instance of the creatures' insufficiency to be a happiness for man: But (among them all) for Adam there was not found a help-meet for him. Observe here, 1. The dignity and excellency of the human nature. 2. The vanity of this world and the things of it; put them all together, and they will not make a help-meet for man. They will not suit the nature of his soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its just desires, nor run parallel with its never-failing duration.

Here we have, I. The making of the woman, to be a help-meet for Adam. Observe, 1. That Adam was first formed, then Eve (1 Tim. ii. 13). If man is the head, she is the crown, a crown to her husband, the crown of the visible creation. The man was dust refined, but the woman was dust double-refined, one remove further from the earth. 2. That Adam slept while his wife was in making as one that had cast all his care on God, with a cheerful resignation of himself and all his affairs to his Maker's will and wisdom. Jehovah-jireh, let the Lord provide when and whom he pleases. 3. That God caused a sleep to fall on Adam, and made it a deep sleep. While he knows no sin, God will take care he shall feel no pain. 4. That the woman was made of a rib out of the side of Adam; not made out of his head to rule over him, nor out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, but out of his side to be equal with him, under his arm to be protected, and near his heart to be beloved.

II. The marriage of the woman to Adam. Marriage is honourable, but this surely was the most honourable marriage that ever was, in which God himself had all along an immediate hand. Marriages (they say) are made in heaven: we are sure this was, for the man, the woman, the match, were all God's own work; he, by his power, made them both, and now, by his ordinance, made them one. 1. God, as her Father, brought the woman to the man, as his second self, and a help-meet for him. That wife that is of God's making by special grace, and of God's bringing by special providence, is likely to prove a help-meet for a man. 2. From God, as his Father, Adam received her. God's gifts to us are to be received with a humble thankful acknowledgment of his wisdom in suiting them to us, and his favour in bestowing them on us. Further, in token of his acceptance of her, he gave her a name, not peculiar to her, but common to her sex: She shall be called woman, Ishah, a she-man, differing from man in sex only, not in nature.

III. The institution of the ordinance of marriage, and the settling of the law of it, v. 24. The sabbath and marriage were two ordinances instituted in innocency, the former for the preservation of the church, the latter for the preservation of the world of mankind. It appears (by Matt. xix. 4, 5) that it was God himself who said here, "A man must leave all his relations, to cleave to his wife." 1. See here how great the virtue of a divine ordinance is; the bonds of it are stronger even than those of nature. 2. See how necessary it is that children should take their parents' consent along with them in their marriage. 3. See what need there is both of prudence and prayer in the choice of this relation, which is so near and so lasting. 4. See how firm the bond of marriage is, not to be divided and weakened by having many wives (Mal. ii. 15) nor to be broken or cut off by divorce, for any cause but fornication, or voluntary desertion. 5. See how dear the affection ought to be between husband and wife, such as there is to our own bodies, Eph. v. 28.

IV. An evidence of the purity and innocency of that state wherein our first parents were created, v. 25. They were both naked. They needed no clothes for defence against cold nor heat. Nay, they needed none for decency; they were naked, and had no reason to be ashamed. They knew not what shame was, so the Chaldee reads it. Those that had no sin in their conscience might well have no shame in their faces, though they had no clothes to their backs.

CHAP. III

We have here an account of the sin and misery of our first parents, the wrath and curse of God against them, the peace of the creation disturbed, and its beauty stained and sullied, all bad, very bad. I. The innocent tempted, ver. 1–5. II. The tempted transgressing, ver. 6–8. III. The transgressors arraigned, ver. 9, 10. IV. Upon their arraignment, convicted, ver. 11–13. V. Upon their conviction, sentenced, ver. 14–19. VI. After sentence, reprieved, ver. 20, 21. VII. Notwithstanding their reprieve, execution in part done, ver. 22–24. And, were it not for the gracious intimations here given of redemption by the promised seed, they, and all their degenerate guilty race, would have been left to endless despair.

Verses 1–5

I. The tempter, and that was the devil, in the shape and likeness of a serpent.

1. It is certain it was the devil that beguiled Eve. The devil and Satan is the old serpent (Rev. xii. 9), a malignant spirit, by creation an angel of light and an immediate attendant upon God's throne, but by sin become an apostate from his first state and a rebel against God's crown and dignity. He knew he could not destroy man but by debauching him. The game therefore which Satan had to play was to draw our first parents to sin, and so to separate between them and their God. The whole race of mankind had here, as it were, but one neck, and at that Satan struck.

2. It was the devil in the likeness of a serpent. (1) Many a dangerous temptation comes to us in gay fine colours that are but skin-deep, and seems to come from above; for Satan can seem an angel of light. And, (2) Because it is a subtle creature. Many instances are given of the subtlety of the serpent. Observe, There is not anything by which the devil serves himself and his own interest more than by unsanctified subtlety.

II. The person tempted was the woman, now alone, and at a distance from her husband, but near the forbidden tree. It was the devil's subtlety. 1. To assault the weaker vessel with his temptations. 2. It was his policy to enter into discourse with her when she was alone. There are many temptations to which solitude gives great advantage; but the communion of saints contributes much to their strength and safety. 3. He took advantage by finding her near the forbidden tree, and probably gazing upon the fruit of it, only to satisfy her curiosity. Those that would not eat the forbidden fruit must not come near the forbidden tree. 4. Satan tempted Eve, that by her he might tempt Adam.

III. The temptation itself, and the artificial management of it. That which the devil aimed at was to persuade Eve to eat forbidden fruit; and to do this, he took the same method that he does still. He questioned whether it was a sin or no, v. 1. He denied that there was any danger in it, v. 4. He suggested much advantage by it, v. 5. And these are his common topics.

1. He questioned whether it was a sin or no to eat of this tree, and whether really the fruit of it was forbidden.

(1) He said to the woman, Yea, hath God said, You shall not eat? The first word intimated something said before, perhaps some discourse Eve had with herself, which Satan took hold of, and grafted this question upon. Observe here, [1] He does not discover his design at first, but puts a question which seemed innocent: "I hear a piece of news, pray is it true ? Has God forbidden you to eat of this tree ?" [2] He quotes the command fallaciously as if it were a prohibition, not only of that tree, but of all. [3] He seems to speak it tauntingly, upbraiding the woman with her shyness of meddling with that tree. [4] It is the subtlety of Satan to blemish the reputation of the divine law as uncertain or unreasonable, and so to draw people to sin.

(2) In answer to this question the woman gives him a plain and full account of the law they were under, v. 2, 3. Here observe, [1] It was her weakness to enter into discourse with the serpent. It is a dangerous thing to treat with a temptation, which ought at first to be rejected with disdain and abhorrence. The garrison that sounds a parley is not far from being surrendered. [2] It was her wisdom to take notice of the liberty God had granted them. "Yea," says she, "we may eat of the fruit of the trees, thanks to our Maker, we have plenty and variety enough allowed us." [3] It was an instance of her resolution that she adhered to the command, and faithfully repeated it, as of unquestionable certainty: "We must not eat, therefore we will not touch. It is forbidden in the highest degree, and the authority of the prohibition is sacred to us." [4] She seems a little to waver about the threatening, all she makes of that is, Lest you die.

2. He denies that there was any danger in it, insisting that, though it might be the transgressing of a precept, yet it would not be the incurring of a penalty: You shall not surely die, v. 4. Either, (1) "It is not certain that you shall die," so some. Satan teaches men first to doubt and then to deny; he makes them sceptics first, and so by degrees makes them atheists. Or, (2) "It is certain you shall not die," so others. He avers his contradiction with the same phrase of assurance that God had used in ratifying the threatening. He concealed his own misery, that he might draw them into the like: thus he still deceives sinners into their own ruin. Hope of impunity is a great support to all iniquity.

3. He promises them advantage by it, v. 5. He could not have persuaded them to run the hazard of ruining themselves if he had not suggested to them a great probability of bettering themselves.

(1) He insinuates to them the great improvements they would make by eating of this fruit. And he suits the temptation to the pure state they were now in, intellectual delights and satisfactions. These were the baits with which he covered his hook. [1] "Your eyes shall be opened; you shall have much more of the power and pleasure of contemplation than now you have; you shall see further into things than now you do." [2] "You shall be as gods, as Elohim, mighty gods; not only omniscient, but omnipotent too." [3] "You shall know good and evil, that is, every thing that is desirable to be known." To support this part of the temptation, he abuses the name given to this tree: he perverts the sense of it, as if this tree would give them a speculative notional knowledge of the natures, kinds, and originals, of good and evil. And [4] All this presently: "In the day you eat thereof you will find a sudden and immediate change for the better." Now in all these insinuations he aims to beget in them, First, Discontent with their present state. Secondly, Ambition of preferment, as if they were fit to be gods.

(2) He insinuates to them that God had no good design upon them, in forbidding them this fruit, as if he durst not let them eat of that tree because then they would know their own strength, and would be able to cope with him. Now, [1] This was a great affront to God, and the highest indignity that could be done him, a reproach to his power, as if he feared his creatures, and much more a reproach to his goodness, as if he hated the work of his own hands and would not have those whom he has made to be made happy. [2] It was a most dangerous snare to our first parents, as it tended to alienate their affections from God.

Satan, at length, gains his point, and the stronghold is taken by his wiles.

I. We have here the inducements that moved them to transgress. 1. She saw no harm in this tree, more than in any of the rest. It seemed as good for food as any of them, and why should this be forbidden them rather than any of the rest? We are often betrayed into snares by an inordinate desire to have our senses gratified. It was the more coveted because it was prohibited. In us (that is, in our flesh, in our corrupt nature) there dwells a strange spirit of contradiction. Nitimur in vetitum—We desire what is prohibited. 2. She imagined more virtue in this tree than in any of the rest, that it was a tree not only not to be dreaded, but to be desired to make one wise. See here how the desire of unnecessary knowledge, under the mistaken notion of wisdom, proves hurtful and destructive to many. Our first parents, who knew so much, did not know this—that they knew enough.

II. The steps of the transgression, not steps upward, but downward. 1. She saw. She should have turned away her eyes from beholding vanity; but she enters into temptation, by looking with pleasure on the forbidden fruit. Observe, a great deal of sin comes in at the eyes. 2. She took. It was her own act and deed. The devil did not take it, and put it into her mouth, whether she would or no; but she herself took it. Satan may tempt, but he cannot force; may persuade us to cast ourselves down, but he cannot cast us down, Matt. iv. 6. 3. She did eat. Perhaps she did not intend, when she looked, to take, nor, when she took, to eat; but this was the result. Note, The way of sin is down-hill; a man cannot stop himself when he will. Suppress the first emotions of sin, and leave it off before it be meddled with. Obsta principiis—Nip mischief in the bud. 4. She gave also to her husband with her. She gave it to him, persuading him with the same arguments that the serpent had used with her, adding this to all the rest, that she herself had eaten of it, and found it so far from being deadly that it was extremely pleasant and grateful. As was the devil, so was Eve, no sooner a sinner than a tempter. 5. He did eat, overcome by his wife's importunity. In neglecting the tree of life of which he was allowed to eat, and eating of the tree of knowledge which was forbidden, he plainly showed a contempt of the favours God had bestowed on him, and a preference given to those God did not see fit for him. He would be both his own carver and his own master, would have what he pleased and do what he pleased: his sin was, in one word, disobedience (Rom. v. 19). The human nature being lodged entirely in our first parents, henceforward it could not but be transmitted from them under an attainder of guilt, a stain of dishonour, and an hereditary disease of sin and corruption. And can we say, then, that Adam's sin had but little harm in it?

III. The immediate consequences of the transgression.

1. Shame seized them unseen, v. 7.

(1) The strong convictions they fell under, in their own bosoms: The eyes of them both were opened. It is not meant of the eyes of the body, but the eyes of their consciences were opened, their hearts smote them for what they had done. Now, when it was too late, they saw the folly of eating forbidden fruit. They saw the happiness they had fallen from, and the misery they had fallen into. They saw a law in their members warring against the law of their minds. The text tells us that they saw that they were naked, that is, [1] That they were stripped, deprived of all the honours and joys of their paradise-state. They were disarmed; their defence had departed from them. [2] That they were shamed. They saw themselves laid open to the contempt and reproach of heaven, and earth, and their own consciences. Now see here, First, What a dishonour and disquietment sin is; it makes mischief wherever it is admitted. Secondly, What a deceiver Satan is. He told our first parents, when he tempted them, that their eyes should be opened; and so they were, but not as they understood it; they were opened to their shame and grief.

(2) The sorry shift they made to palliate these convictions, and to arm themselves against them: They sewed, or platted, fig-leaves together; and to cover, at least, part of their shame from one another, they made themselves aprons. See here what is commonly the folly of those that have sinned. [1] That they are more solicitous to save their credit before men than to obtain their pardon from God. [2] That the excuses men make, to cover and extenuate their sins, are vain and frivolous. Like the aprons of fig-leaves, they make the matter never the better, but the worse; the shame, thus hidden, becomes the more shameful.

2. Fear seized them immediately upon their eating the forbidden fruit, v. 8. Observe here, (1) What was the cause and occasion of their fear: They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day. It was the approach of the Judge that put them into a fright; and yet he came in such a manner as made it formidable only to guilty consciences. He came in the cool of the day, not in the night, when all fears are double fearful, nor in the heat of day, for he came not in the heat of his anger. They heard his voice, and probably it was a still small voice, like that in which he came to enquire after Elijah. (2) What was the effect and evidence of their fear: They hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God—a sad change! God had become a terror to them, and then no marvel that they had become a terror to themselves. Their own consciences accused them, and set their sin before them in its proper colours. Their fig-leaves failed them, and would do them no service. Knowing themselves guilty, they durst not stand a trial, but absconded, and fled from justice. See here, [1] The falsehood of the tempter. He promised them they should be safe, but now they cannot so much as think themselves so; he promised them they should be knowing, but they see themselves at a loss, and know not so much as where to hide themselves; he promised them they should be as gods, great, and bold, and daring, but they are as criminals discovered. [2] The folly of sinners, to think it either possible or desirable to hide themselves from God. [3] The fear that attends sin. All that amazing fear of God's appearances, the accusations of conscience, the approaches of trouble, the assaults of inferior creatures, and the arrests of death, which is common among men, is the effect of sin.

The arraignment of these deserters before the righteous Judge.

I. The startling question with which God pursued Adam and arrested him: Where art thou? Not, In what place? but, In what condition? "Is this all thou hast gotten by eating forbidden fruit? Note, 1. This enquiry after Adam may be looked upon as a gracious pursuit, in kindness to him, and in order to his recovery. Note, 2. If sinners will but consider where they are, they will not rest till they return to God.

II. The trembling answer which Adam gave to this question: I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, v. 10. He does not own his guilt, and yet in effect confesses it by owning his shame and fear.

The offenders found guilty by their own confession, and yet endeavouring to excuse and extenuate their fault.

I. How their confession was extorted from them. God put it to the man: Who told thee that thou wast naked? v. 11. "How camest thou to be sensible of thy nakedness as thy shame?" Hast thou eaten of the forbidden tree? Note, Though God knows all our sins, yet he will know them from us,'and requires from us an ingenuous confession of them; not that he may be informed, but that we may be humbled. The question put to the woman was, What is this that thou hast done? v. 13. Note,'It concerns those who have eaten forbidden fruit themselves, and especially those who have enticed others to eat it likewise, seriously to consider what they have done. In eating forbidden fruit, we have offended a great and gracious God. In enticing others to eat of it, we do the devil's work, make ourselves guilty of other men's sins, and accessory to their ruin.

II. How their crime was extenuated by them in their confession. It was to no purpose to plead not guilty. Instead of aggravating the sin, and taking shame to themselves, they excuse the sin, and lay the shame and blame on others. 1. Adam lays all the blame upon his wife. Learn, hence, never to be brought to sin by that which will not bring us off in the judgment; let us therefore never act against our consciences, nor ever displease God, to please the best friend we have in the world. But this is not the worst of it. He not only lays the blame upon his wife, but expresses it so as tacitly to reflect on God himself. He insinuates that God was accessory to his sin: he gave him the woman, and she gave him the fruit. Note, There is a strange proneness in those that are tempted to say that they are tempted of God, as if our abusing God's gifts would excuse our violation of God's laws. 2. Eve lays all the blame upon the serpent: The serpent beguiled me. Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own, a sign that it is a scandalous thing. Learn hence, (1) That Satan's temptations are all beguilings, his arguments are all fallacies, his allurements are all cheats. Sin deceives us, and, by deceiving, cheats us. It is by the deceitfulness of sin that the heart is hardened. See Rom. vii. 11; Heb. iii. 13. (2) Satan's subtlety will not justify us in sin: though he is the tempter, we are the sinners; and indeed it is our own lust that draws us aside and entices us, Jam. i. 14.

God immediately proceeds to pass sentence; and, in these verses, he begins (where the sin began) with the serpent, because he was already convicted of rebellion against God.

I. The sentence passed upon the tempter may be considered as lighting upon the serpent. The devil's instruments must share in the devil's punishments. Now, 1. The serpent is here laid under the curse of God: Thou art cursed above all cattle. Unsanctified subtlety often proves a great curse to a man; and the more crafty men are to do evil the more mischief they do. 2. He is here laid under man's reproach and enmity. (1) He is to be for ever looked upon as a vile and despicable creature. His crime was that he tempted Eve to eat that which she should not; his punishment was that he was necessitated to eat that which he would not: Dust thou shalt eat. (2) He is to be for ever looked upon as a venomous noxious creature, and a proper object of hatred and detestation. The serpent is hurtful to man, and often bruises his heel, because it can reach no higher; nay, notice is taken of his biting the horses' heels, ch. xlix. 17. But man is victorious over the serpent, and bruises his head, that is, gives him a mortal wound, aiming to destroy the whole generation of vipers. This sentence pronounced upon the serpent is much fortified by that promise of God to his people, Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder (Ps. xci. 13), and that of Christ to his disciples, They shall take up serpents (Mark xvi. 18). Observe here, The serpent and the woman had just now been very familiar and friendly in discourse about the forbidden fruit, and a wonderful agreement there was between them; but here they are irreconcilably set at variance. Note, Sinful friendships justly end in mortal feuds: those that unite in wickedness will not unite long.

II. This sentence may be considered as levelled at the devil, who only made use of the serpent as his vehicle in this appearance, but was himself the principal agent.

1. A perpetual reproach is here fastened upon that great enemy both to God and man. Under the cover of the serpent, he is here sentenced to be, (1) Degraded and accursed of God. How art thou fallen, O Lucifer! He that would be above God, and would head a rebellion against him, is justly exposed here to contempt, and God will humble those that will not humble themselves. (2) Detested and abhorred of all mankind. He is here condemned to a state of war and irreconcilable enmity. (3) Destroyed and ruined at last by the great Redeemer, signified by the breaking of his head. His subtle politics shall all be baffled, his usurped power shall be entirely crushed.

2. A perpetual quarrel is here commenced between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of the devil among men. It is the fruit of this enmity, (1) That there is a continual conflict between grace and corruption in the hearts of God's people. (2) That there is likewise a continual struggle between the wicked and the godly in this world.

3. A gracious promise is here made of Christ, as the deliverer of fallen man from the power of Satan. It was said in the hearing of our first parents, who, doubtless, saw a door of hope opened to them. Here was the dawning of the gospel day. No sooner was the wound given than the remedy was provided and revealed. Notice is here given them of three things concerning Christ:—(1) His incarnation, that he should be the seed of the woman, the seed of that woman; therefore his genealogy (Luke iii) goes so high as to show him to be the son of Adam, but God does the woman the honour to call him rather her seed, because she it was whom the devil had beguiled, and on whom Adam had laid the blame; herein God magnifies his grace, in that, though the woman was first in the transgression, yet she shall be saved by childbearing (as some read it), that is, by the promised seed who shall descend from her, 1 Tim. ii. 15. He was likewise to be the seed of a woman only, of a virgin. (2) His sufferings and death, pointed at in Satan's bruising his heel, that is, his human nature. Satan tempted Christ in the wilderness, to draw him into sin; and some think it was Satan that terrified Christ in his agony, to drive him to despair. It was the devil that put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ, of Peter to deny him, of the chief priests to prosecute him, of the false witnesses to accuse him, and of Pilate to condemn him, aiming in all this, by destroying the Saviour, to ruin the salvation; but, on the contrary, it was by death that Christ destroyed him that had the power of death, Heb. ii. 14. Christ's heel was bruised when his feet were pierced and nailed to the cross, and Christ's sufferings are continued in the sufferings of the saints for his name. The devil tempts them, casts them into prison, persecutes and slays them, and so bruises the heel of Christ, who is afflicted in their afflictions. But, while the heel is bruised on earth, it is well that the head is safe in heaven. (3) His victory over Satan thereby. Satan had now trampled upon the woman, and insulted her; but the seed of the woman should be raised up in the fulness of time to triumph over him, Col. ii. 15. He shall bruise his head that is, he shall destroy all his politics and all his powers, and give a total overthrow to his kingdom and interest. Christ baffled Satan's temptations; by his death, he gave a fatal blow to the devil's kingdom, a wound to the head of this beast, that can never be healed.

We have here the sentence passed upon the woman for her sin.

I. She is here put into a state of sorrow, one particular of which only is specified, that in bringing forth children; but it includes grief and fear. Note, Sin brought sorrow into the world; had we known no guilt, we should have known no grief. The sorrows are here said to be multiplied; greatly multiplied. No marvel that our sorrows are multiplied when our sins are: both are innumerable evils. The sorrows of child-bearing are multiplied; and if the children prove wicked and foolish, they are, more than ever, the heaviness of her that bore them.

II. Wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; but the entrance of sin has made that duty a punishment, which otherwise it would not have been. If Eve had not eaten forbidden fruit herself, and tempted her husband to eat it, she would never have complained of her subjection; therefore it ought never to be complained of, though harsh; but sin must be complained of, that made it so. Those wives who not only despise and disobey their husbands, but domineer over them, do not consider that they not only violate a divine law, but thwart a divine sentence.

III. Observe here how mercy is mixed with wrath in this sentence. The woman shall have sorrow, but it shall be in bringing forth children, and the sorrow shall be forgotten for joy that a child is born, John xvi. 21. The sentence was not a curse, to bring her to ruin, but a chastisement, to bring her to repentance.

The sentence passed upon Adam, which is prefaced with a recital of his crime.

I. God put marks of his displeasure on Adam in three instances:—

1. His habitation is, by this sentence, cursed: Cursed is the ground for thy sake; and the effect of that curse is, Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee. What good fruits it produces must be extorted from it by the ingenuity and industry of man. But observe a mixture of mercy in this sentence. (1) Adam himself is not cursed, as the serpent was (v. 14). God had blessings in store for him. (2) He is yet above ground. The earth does not open and swallow him up, notwithstanding its degeneracy from its primitive beauty and fruitfulness.

2. His employments and enjoyments are all embittered to him.

(1) His business shall henceforth become a toil to him, and he shall go on with it in the sweat of his face, v. 19. His business, before he sinned, was a constant pleasure to him; the garden was then dressed without any uneasy labour. If Adam had not sinned, he had not sweated. Labour is our duty, which we must faithfully perform.

(2) His food shall henceforth become (in comparison with what it had been) unpleasant to him. In sorrow (v. 17) and in the sweat of his face (v. 19) he must eat of it. All, even the happiest in this world, have some allays to their joy: troops of diseases, disasters, and deaths, in various shapes, entered the world with sin, and still ravage it. Yet, in this part of the sentence, there is also a mixture of mercy. He shall sweat, but his toil shall make his rest the more welcome when he returns to his earth, as to his bed; he shall grieve, but he shall not starve; he shall have sorrow, but in that sorrow he shall eat bread, which shall strengthen his heart under his sorrows.

3. His life also is but short. Considering how full of trouble his days are, it is in favour to him that they are few; yet death being dreadful to nature (yea, even though life be unpleasant) that concludes the sentence. "Thou shalt return to the ground out of which thou wast taken; thy body, that part of thee which was taken out of the ground, shall return to it again; for dust thou art." "Thy body shall be forsaken by thy soul, and become itself a lump of dust; and then it shall be lodged in the grave, the proper place for it, and mingle itself with the dust of the earth," our dust, Ps. civ. 29. Earth to earth, dust to dust. Observe here, (1) That man is a mean frail creature, little as dust, the small dust of the balance —light as dust, altogether lighter than vanity—weak as dust, and of no consistency. (2) That he is a mortal dying creature. A great man is but a great mass of dust, and must return to his earth. (3) That sin brought death into the world. If Adam had not sinned, he would not have died, Rom. v. 12.

II. We must not go off from this sentence upon our first parents till we have considered two things:— 1. How fitly the sad consequences of sin upon the soul of Adam and his sinful race were represented. Though that misery only is mentioned which affected the body, yet that was a pattern of spiritual miseries, the curse that entered into the soul. (1) The pains of a woman in travail represent the terrors and pangs of a guilty conscience, awakened to a sense of sin. (2) The state of subjection to which the woman was reduced represents that loss of spiritual liberty and freedom of will which is the effect of sin. (3) The curse of barrenness which was brought upon the earth, and its produce of briars and thorns, are a fit representation of the barrenness of a corrupt and sinful soul in that which is good and its fruitfulness in evil. (4) The toil and sweat bespeak the difficulty which, through the infirmity of the flesh, man labours under, in the service of God and the work of religion.

2. How admirably the satisfaction our Lord Jesus made by his death and sufferings answered to the sentence here passed upon our first parents. (1) Did travailing pains come in with sin? We read of the travail of Christ's soul (Isa. liii. 11). (2) Did subjection come in with sin? Christ was made under the law, Gal. iv. 4. (3) Did the curse come in with sin? Christ was made a curse for us, died a cursed death, Gal. iii. 13. (4) Did thorns come in with sin? He was crowned with thorns for us. (5) Did sweat come in with sin? He for us did sweat as it were great drops of blood. (6) Did sorrow come in with sin? He was a man of sorrows, his soul was, in his agony, exceedingly sorrowful. (7) Did death come in with sin? He became obedient unto death. Thus is the plaster as wide as the wound. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ!

God having named the man, and called him Adam, which signifies red earth, Adam named the woman, Eve, that is, life. Adam bears the name of the dying body, Eve that of the living soul. The reason of the name is here given: Because she was (that is, was to be) the mother of all living. He had before called her Ishah—woman, as a wife; here he calls her Evah—life, as a mother. Now, 1. If this was done by divine direction, it was an instance of God's favour, and was a seal of the covenant, and an assurance to them that he had not reversed that blessing wherewith he had blessed them: Be fruitful and multiply. It was likewise a confirmation of the promise now made, that the seed of the woman, of this woman, should break the serpent's head. 2. If Adam did it of himself, it was an instance of his faith in the word of God. (1) The blessing of a reprieve, that he should spare such sinners to be the parents of all living. (2) The blessing of a Redeemer, the promised seed, to whom Adam had an eye, in calling his wife Eve—life.

Verse 21

We have here a further instance of God's care concerning our first parents, notwithstanding their sin. Though he corrects his disobedient children, yet he does not disinherit them, but, like a tender father, provides the herb of the field for their food and coats of skins for their clothing. God is to be acknowledged with thankfulness, not only in giving us food, but in giving us clothes also, ch. xxviii. 20. The wool and the flax are his, as well as the corn and the wine, Hos. ii. 9. Adam and Eve made for themselves aprons of fig-leaves, a covering too narrow for them to wrap themselves in, Isa. xxviii. 20. Such are all the rags of our own righteousness. But God made them coats of skins, large, and strong, and durable, and fit for them; such is the righteousness of Christ. Therefore put on the Lord Jesus Christ.

Sentence being passed upon the offenders, we have here execution, in part, done upon them immediately.

I. How they were justly disgraced and shamed before God and the holy angels, by the ironical upbraiding of them with the issue of their enterprise: "Behold, the man has become as one of us, to know good and evil ! A goodly god he makes ! Does he not ?" This was said to awaken and humble them, and to bring them to a sense of their sin and folly, and to repentance for it. God thus fills their faces with shame, that they may seek his name, Ps. lxxxiii. 16. He puts them to this confusion, in order to their conversion.

II. How they were justly discarded, and shut out of paradise.

1. The reason God gave why he shut man out of paradise; not only because he had put forth his hand, and taken of the tree of knowledge, which was his sin, but lest he should again put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and flatter himself with a conceit that thereby he should live for ever.

2. The method God took in expelling and excluding him from this garden of pleasure. He turned him out, and kept him out.

(1) He turned him out, from the garden to the common. This signified the exclusion of him, and all his guilty race, from that communion with God which was the bliss and glory of paradise. His acquaintance with God was lessened and lost, and that correspondence which had been settled between man and his Maker was interrupted and broken off. But whither did he send him when he turned him out of Eden ? He might justly have chased him out of the world (Job xviii. 18), but he only chased him out of the garden. But man was only sent to till the ground out of which he was taken. He was sent to a place of toil, not to a place of torment. He was sent to the ground, not to the grave—to the workhouse, not to the dungeon, not to the prison-house—to hold the plough, not to drag the chain. His tilling the ground would be recompensed by his eating of its fruits; and his converse with the earth whence he was taken was improvable to good purposes, to keep him humble, and to remind him of his latter end. Observe, then, that though our first parents were excluded from the privileges of their state of innocency, yet they were not abandoned to despair, God's thoughts of love designing them for a second state of probation upon new terms.

(2) He kept him out, and forbade him all hopes of a re-entry; for he placed at the east of the garden of Eden a detachment of cherubim, God's hosts, armed with a dreadful and irresistible power, to keep the way that led to the tree of life, so that he could neither steal nor force an entry. Now this intimated to Adam, [1] That God was displeased with him. [2] That the angels were at war with him; no peace with the heavenly hosts, while he was in rebellion against their Lord and ours. [3] That the way to the tree of life was shut up, namely, that way which, at first, he was put into, the way of spotless innocency. It was henceforward in vain for him and his to expect righteousness, life, and happiness, by virtue of the first covenant, for it was irreparably broken. We are all undone if we be judged by that covenant. God revealed this to Adam, not to drive him to despair, but to oblige and quicken him to look for life and happiness in the promised seed, by whom the flaming sword is removed. God and his angels are reconciled to us, and a new and living way into the holiest is consecrated and laid open for us.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter we have both the world and the church in a family. As all mankind were represented in Adam, so that great distinction of mankind into saints and sinners was here represented in Cain and Abel, and an early instance is given of the enmity which was lately put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. We have here, I. The birth, names, and callings, of Cain and Abel, ver. 1, 2. II. Their religion, and different success in it, ver. 3, 4 and part of ver. 5. III. Cain's anger at God, and the reproof of him for that anger, ver. 5–7. IV. Cain's murder of his brother, and the process against him for that murder. The murder committed, ver. 8. The proceedings against him. 1. His arraignment, ver. 9, former part. 2. His plea, ver. 9, latter part. 3. His conviction, ver. 10. 4. The sentence passed upon him, ver. 11, 12. 5. His complaint against the sentence, ver. 13, 14. 6. The ratification of the sentence, ver. 15. 7. The execution of the sentence, ver 15, 16. V. The family and posterity of Cain, ver. 17–24. VI. The birth of another son and grandson of Adam, ver. 25, 26.

Adam and Eve had many sons and daughters, ch. v. 4. But Cain and Abel seem to have been the two eldest.

I. The names of their two sons. 1. Cain signifies possession; for Eve, when she bore him, said with joy, and thankfulness, and great expectation, I have gotten a man from the LORD. Observe, Children are God's gifts, and he must be acknowledged in the building up of our families. It doubles and sanctifies our comfort in them when we see them coming to us from the hand of God, who will not forsake the works and gifts of his own hand. 2. Abel signifies vanity. When she thought she had obtained the promised seed in Cain, she was so taken up with that possession that another son was as vanity to her.

II. The employments of Cain and Abel. 1. They both had a calling. God gave their father a calling, even in innocency, and he gave them one. Note, It is the will of God that we should every one of us have something to do in this world. Parents ought to bring up their children to business. "Give them a Bible and a calling (said good Mr. Dod), and God be with them." 2. Their employments were different, that they might trade and exchange with one another, as there was occasion. The members of the body politic have need one of another, and mutual love is helped by mutual commerce. 3. Their employments belonged to the husbandman's calling, their father's profession. 4. Abel, though the younger brother, yet entered first into his calling, and probably his example drew in Cain. 5. Abel chose that employment which most befriended contemplation and devotion, for to these a pastoral life has been looked upon as being peculiarly favourable.

Here we have, I. The devotions of Cain and Abel. In the process of time Cain and Abel brought to Adam, as the priest of the family, each of them an offering to the Lord. God would thus try Adam's faith in the promise and his obedience to the remedial law; he would thus settle a correspondence again between heaven and earth, and give shadows of good things to come. Observe here, 1. That the religious worship of God is no novel invention, but an ancient institution. It is that which was from the beginning (1 John i. 1); it is the good old way, Jer. vi. 16. 2. That it is a good thing for children to be well taught when they are young, and trained up betimes in religious services, that when they come to be capable of acting for themselves they may, of their own accord, bring an offering to God. 3. That we should every one of us honour God with what we have, according as he has prospered us. 4. That hypocrites and evil doers may be found going as far as the best of God's people in the external services of religion. Cain brought an offering with Abel; nay, Cain's offering is mentioned first, as if he were the more forward of the two. The Pharisee and the publican went to the temple to pray, Luke xviii. 10.

II. The different success of their devotions. That which is to be aimed at in all acts of religion is God's acceptance: we speed well if we attain this, but in vain do we worship if we miss of it, 2 Cor. v. 9. God had respect to Abel and to his offering, and showed his acceptance of it, probably by fire from heaven; but to Cain and his offering he had not respect.

1. There was a difference in the characters of the persons offering. Cain was a wicked man and therefore his sacrifice was a vain oblation, Isa. i. 13. God had no respect to Cain himself, and therefore no respect to his offering. But Abel was a righteous man; he is called righteous Abel (Matt. xxiii. 35); his heart was upright and his life was pious. God had respect to him as a holy man, and therefore to his offering as a holy offering.

2. There was a difference in the offerings they brought. It is expressly said (Heb. xi. 4), Abel's was a more excellent sacrifice than Cain's: either, (1) In the nature of it, or, (2) In the qualities of the offering. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, any thing that came next to hand, what he had not occasion for himself. But Abel was curious in the choice of his offering: not the lame, nor the lean, nor the refuse, but the firstlings of the flock—the best he had, and the fat thereof—the best of those best.

3. The great difference was this, that Abel offered in faith, and Cain did not. There was a difference in the principle upon which they went. Abel offered with an eye to God's will as his rule, and God's glory as his end, but Cain did what he did only for company's sake, or to save his credit, not in faith, and so it turned into sin to him. Abel was a penitent; Cain was unhumbled; his confidence was within himself.

III. Cain's displeasure at the difference God made between his sacrifice and Abel's. Cain was very wroth, which presently appeared in his very looks. This anger bespeaks, 1. His enmity to God. He should have been angry at himself for his own infidelity and hypocrisy, by which he had forfeited God's acceptance. Note, It is a certain sign of an unhumbled heart to quarrel with those rebukes which we have, by our own sin, brought upon ourselves. 2. His envy of his brother. He conceived a hatred of him as an enemy. Note, (1) It is common for those who have rendered themselves unworthy of God's favour to have indignation against those who are dignified by it. The Pharisees walked in this way of Cain, when they neither entered into the kingdom of God themselves nor suffered those that were entering to go in, Luke xi. 52. (2) Envy is a sin that commonly carries with it its own punishment, in the rottenness of the bones.

God is here reasoning with Cain, to convince him of the sin and folly of his anger and discontent, and to bring him into a good temper again, that further mischief might be prevented. Thus the father of the prodigal argued the case with the elder son (Luke xv. 28, &c.).

I. God puts Cain himself upon enquiring into the cause of his discontent: Why is thy countenance fallen? Observe, 1. That God takes notice of all our sinful passions and discontents. 2. "Why am I wroth? Is there a real cause, a just cause, a proportionable cause for it? Why am I so soon angry?"

II. To reduce Cain to his right mind again, it is here made evident to him,

1. That he had no reason to be angry at God.

(1) God sets before Cain life and a blessing: either, [1] "If thou hadst done well, as thy brother did, thou shouldst have been accepted, as he was." Or, [2] "If now thou do well, if thou repent of thy sin, reform thy heart and life, and bring thy sacrifice in a better manner, thou shalt yet be accepted, thy sin shall be pardoned, thy comfort and honour restored, and all shall be well." See how early the gospel was preached, and the benefit of it here offered even to one of the chief of sinners.

(2) He sets before him death and a curse: "If now thou wilt not do well, if thou persist in this wrath, and, instead of humbling thyself before God, harden thyself against him, sin lies at the dooor," that is, [1] Further sin. "Now that anger is in thy heart, murder is at the door." Or, [2] The punishment of sin. So near akin are sin and punishment that the same word in Hebrew signifies both. If sin be harboured in the house, the curse waits at the door, like a bailiff, ready to arrest the sinner whenever he looks out. "If thou doest not well, sin (that is, the sin-offering), lies at the door, and thou mayest take the benefit of it." The same word signifies sin and a sacrifice for sin. Christ, the great sin-offering, is said to stand at the door, Rev. iii. 20. All this considered, Cain had no reason to be angry at God, but at himself only.

2. That he had no reason to be angry at his brother: "Unto thee shall be his desire, he shall continue his respect to thee as an elder brother, and thou, as the first-born, shalt rule over him as much as ever." God's acceptance of Abel's offering did not transfer the birth-right to him. God did not so intend it; Abel did not so interpret it; why then should he be so much exasperated?

Abel's murder, which may be considered two ways:—

I. As Cain's sin; and a scarlet, crimson, sin it was, a sin of the first magnitude. See in it, 1. Adam's eating forbidden fruit seemed but a little sin, but it opened the door to the greatest. 2. A fruit of the enmity which is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. So early did he that was after the flesh persecute him that was after the Spirit. 3. See also what comes of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness; if they be indulged and cherished in the soul, they are in danger of involving men in the horrid guilt of murder itself. Many were the aggravations of Cain's sin. (1) It was his own brother that he murdered, his younger brother, whom he ought to have protected. (2) He was a good brother, one who had never done him any wrong. (3) God himself had told him what would come of it, yet he persisted in his barbarous design. (4) He covered it with a show of friendship and kindness. According to the Septuagint Cain said to Abel, Let us go into the field. The Chaldee paraphrase adds that Cain maintained that there was no judgment to come, no future state, and that when Abel spoke in defence of the truth Cain took that occasion to fall upon him. However, (5) That which the scripture tells us was the reason why he slew him was a sufficient aggravation of the murder; it was because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous. Nay, (6) In killing his brother, he directly struck at God himself; he hated Abel because God loved him.

II. As Abel's suffering. Death reigned ever since Adam sinned, but we read not of any taken captive by him till now; and now, 1. The first that dies is a saint, one that was accepted and beloved of God. The first that went to the grave went to heaven. Nay, 2. The first that dies is a martyr, and dies for his religion. Abel's death has not only no curse in it, but it has a crown in it.

The trial and condemnation of the first murderer.

I. The arraignment of Cain: The Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? He asks him, that he may draw from him a confession of his crime, for those who would be justified before God must accuse themselves, and the penitent will do so.

II. Cain's plea: he pleads not guilty, and adds rebellion to his sin. For, 1. He endeavours to cover a deliberate murder with a deliberate lie: I know not. Thus, in Cain, the devil was both a murderer and a liar from the beginning. Those are strangely blind that think it possible to conceal their sins from a God that sees all, and those are strangely hard that think it desirable to conceal them from a God who pardons those only that confess. 2. He impudently charges his Judge with folly and injustice, in putting this question to him: Am I my brother's keeper? He should have humbled himself, and have said, Am I not my brother's murderer? Some think he reflects on God and his providence, as if he had said, "Art not thou his keeper? If he be missing, on thee be the blame, and not on me, who never undertook to keep him." Note, Those who are unconcerned in the affairs of their brethren, and take no care, when they have opportunity, to prevent their hurt in their bodies, goods, or good name, especially in their souls, do, in effect, speak Cain's language. See Lev. xix. 17; Phil. ii. 4.

III. The conviction of Cain, v. 10. "The evidence against thee is clear and incontestable: The voice of thy brother's blood cries." He speaks as if the blood itself were both witness and prosecutor, before God's own knowledge testified against him. Observe here, 1. Murder is a crying sin, none more so. The patient sufferers cried for pardon (Father, forgive them), but their blood cries for vengeance. 2. The blood is said to cry from the ground, the earth, which is said to open her mouth to receive his brother's blood from his hand, v. 11. 3. In the original the word is plural, thy brother's bloods, not only his blood, but the blood of all those that might have descended from him. How well is it for us that the blood of Christ speaks better things than that of Abel! Heb. xii. 24. Abel's blood cried for vengeance, Christ's blood cries for pardon.

IV. The sentence passed upon Cain: And now art thou cursed from the earth, v. 11.

1. He is cursed. The curse for Adam's disobedience terminated on the ground: Cursed is the ground for thy sake; but that for Cain's rebellion fell immediately upon himself: Thou art cursed. We have all deserved this curse, and it is only in Christ that believers are saved from it and inherit the blessing, Gal. iii. 10, 13.

2. He is cursed from the earth. Cain found his punishment where he chose his portion and set his heart. Two things we expect from the earth, and by this curse both are denied to Cain and taken from him: sustenance and settlement. (1) Sustenance out of the earth is here withheld from him. It is a curse upon him in his enjoyments, and particularly in his calling: When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee its strength. (2) Settlement on the earth is here denied him: A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth. By this he was condemned, [1] To perpetual disgrace and reproach among men. [2] To perpetual disquietude and horror in his own mind. His own guilty conscience should haunt him wherever he went, and make him Magormissabib, a terror round about. What rest can those find, what settlement, that carry their own disturbance with them in their bosoms wherever they go? Those must needs be fugitives that are thus tossed.

This was the sentence passed upon Cain; and even in this there was mercy mixed, inasmuch as he was not immediately cut off, but had space given him to repent; for God is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish.

A further account of the proceedings against Cain.

I. Here is Cain's complaint of the sentence passed upon him, as hard and severe. Some make him to speak the language of despair. There is forgiveness with the God of pardons for the greatest sins and sinners; but those forfeit it who despair of it. Just now Cain made nothing of his sin, but now he is in the other extreme: Satan drives his vassals from presumption to despair. He thinks himself rigorously dealt with when really he is favourably treated; and he cries out of wrong when he has more reason to wonder that he is out of hell. Now, to justify this complaint, Cain descants upon the sentence. 1. He sees himself excluded by it from the favour of his God. 2. He sees himself expelled from all the comforts of this life, and concludes that, being a fugitive, he is, in effect, driven out this day from the face of the earth. 3. He sees himself exposed by it to the hatred and ill-will of all mankind: It shall come to pass that everyone that finds me shall slay me. Wherever he wanders, he goes in peril of his life, at least he thinks so; and, like a man in debt, thinks everyone he meets a bailiff. There were none alive but his near relations; yet even of them he is justly afraid who had himself been so barbarous to his brother. He sees the whole creation armed against him.

II. Here is God's confirmation of the sentence; for when he judges he will overcome, v. 15. 1. How Cain is protected from wrath by this declaration, notified, we may suppose, to all that little world which was then in being: Whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him seven-fold, because thereby the sentence he was under (that he should be a fugitive and a vagabond) would be defeated. God having said in Cain's case, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, it would have been a daring usurpation for any man to take the sword out of God's hand. 2. The Lord set a mark upon Cain, to distinguish him from the rest of mankind and to notify that he was the man that murdered his brother.

A further account of Cain, and what became of him after he was rejected of God.

I. He tamely submitted to that part of his sentence by which he was hidden from God's face; for (v. 16) he went out from the presence of the Lord, that is, he willingly renounced God and religion, and was content to forego its privileges, so that he might not be under its precepts. Cain went out now from the presence of the Lord, and we never find that he came into it again, to his comfort.

II. He endeavoured to confront that part of the sentence by which he was made a fugitive and a vagabond; for,

1. He chose his land. He went and dwelt on the east of Eden, somewhere distant from the place where Adam and his religious family resided. But his attempt to settle was in vain; for the land he dwelt in was to him the land of Nod (that is, of shaking or trembling), because of the continual restlessness and uneasiness of his own spirit. Note, Those that depart from God cannot find rest anywhere else. After Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, he never rested. "Return therefore to thy rest, O my soul, to thy rest in God; else thou art for ever restless."

2. He built a city for a habitation, v. 17. He was building a city, so some read it, ever building it, but, a curse being upon him and the work of his hands, he could not finish it. (1) Cain's defiance of the divine sentence. God said he should be a fugitive and a vagabond. Had he repented and humbled himself, this curse might have been turned into a blessing. (2) See what was Cain's choice, after he had forsaken God; he pitched upon a settlement in this world, as his rest for ever. (3) See what method Cain took to defend himself against the terrors with which he was perpetually haunted. He undertook this building, to divert his thoughts from the consideration of his own misery, and to drown the clamours of a guilty conscience with the noise of axes and hammers. Thus many baffle their convictions by thrusting themselves into a hurry of worldly business. (4) See how wicked people often get the start of God's people, and out-go them in outward prosperity. Cain and his cursed race dwell in a city, while Adam and his blessed family dwell in tents.

3. His family also was built up. Here is an account of his posterity, at least the heirs of his family, for seven generations.

Some particulars concerning Lamech, the seventh from Adam in the line of Cain.

Though he sinned, in marrying two wives, yet he was blessed with children by both, and those such as lived to be famous in their generation, not for their piety but for their ingenuity. They were not only themselves men of business, but men that were serviceable to the world, and eminent for the invention, or at least the improvement, of some useful arts. 1. Jabal was a famous shepherd. 2. Jubal was a famous musician, and particularly an organist, and the first that gave rules for the noble art or science of music. When Jabal had set them in a way to be rich, Jubal put them in a way to be merry. Jabal was their Pan and Jubal their Apollo. 3. Tubalcain was a famous smith, who greatly improved the art of working in brass and iron, for the service both of war and husbandry. He was their Vulcan. Even those who are destitute of the knowledge and grace of God may be endued with many excellent and useful accomplishments, which may make them famous and serviceable in their generation. Common gifts are given to bad men, while God chooses to himself the foolish things of the world.

By this speech of Lamech, which is here recorded, and probably was much talked of in those times, he further appears to have been a wicked man, as Cain's accursed race generally were. He owns himself a man of a fierce and cruel disposition, that would lay about him without mercy, and kill all that stood in his way. His wives, knowing what manner of spirit he was of, how apt both to give and to resent provocation, were afraid lest somebody or other would be the death of him. "Never fear," says he, "I defy any man to set upon me; whosoever does, let me alone to make my part good with him; I will slay him, be he a man or a young man."

This is the first mention of Adam in the story of this chapter. No question, the murder of Abel, and the impenitence and apostasy of Cain, were a very great grief to him and Eve, and the more because their own wickedness did now correct them and their backslidings did reprove them. But here we have that which was a relief to our first parents in their affliction.

I. God gave them to see the re-building of their family, which was sorely shaken and weakened by that sad event. For, 1. They saw their seed, another seed instead of Abel, v. 25. Observe God's kindness and tenderness towards his people, in his providential dealings with them; when he takes away one comfort from them, he gives them another instead of it, which may prove a greater blessing to them than that was in which they thought their lives were bound up. Those who slay God's servants hope by this means to wear out the saints of the Most High; but they will be deceived. Christ shall still see his seed; God can out of stones raise up children for him, and make the blood of the martyrs the seed of the church. This son, by a prophetic spirit, they called Seth (that is, set, settled, or placed), because, in his seed, mankind should continue to the end of time, and from him the Messiah should descend. While Cain, the head of the apostasy, is made a wanderer, Seth, from whom the true church was to come, is one fixed. In Christ and his church is the only true settlement. 2. They saw their seed's seed, v. 26. To Seth was born a son called Enos.

II. God gave them to see the reviving of religion in their family: Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord, v. 26. It is small comfort to a good man to see his children's children, if he do not, withal, see peace upon Israel, and those that come of him walking in the truth. 1. The worshippers of God began to stir up themselves to do more in religion than they had done. Now men began to worship God, not only in their closets and families, but in public and solemn assemblies. 2. The worshippers of God began to distinguish themselves. The margin reads it, Then began men to be called by the name of the Lord, or to call themselves by it.

CHAP. V

We have here an account, I. Concerning Adam, ver. 1–5. II. Seth, ver. 6–8. III. Enos, ver. 9–11. IV. Cainan, ver. 12–14. V. Mahalaleel, ver. 15–17. VI. Jared, ver. 18–20. VII. Enoch, ver. 21–24. VIII. Methuselah, ver. 25–27. IX. Lamech and his son Noah, ver. 28–32. All scripture, being given by inspiration of God, is profitable, though not all alike profitable.

The first words of the chapter are the title or argument of the whole chapter: it is the book of the generations of Adam. The genealogy begins with Adam himself.

I. His creation, v. 1, 2, where we have a brief rehearsal of what was before related concerning the creation of man. Observe here, 1. That God created man. Man is not his own maker, therefore he must not be his own master; but the Author of his being must be the director of his motions and the centre of them. 2. That there was a day in which God created man. He was not from eternity, but of yesterday. 3. That God made him in his own likeness, righteous and holy, and therefore, undoubtedly, happy. 4. That God created them male and female (v. 2), for their mutual comfort as well as for the preservation and increase of their kind.

II. The birth of his son Seth, v. 3. That which is most observable here concerning Seth is that Adam begat him in his own likeness, after his image. Adam was made in the image of God; but, when he was fallen and corrupt, he begat a son in his own image.

We have here all that the Holy Ghost thought fit to leave upon record concerning five of the patriarchs before the flood. Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, and Jared. There is nothing observable concerning any of these particularly, though we have reason to think they were men of eminence, both for prudence and piety, in their day.

I. Concerning each of them, except Enoch, it is said, and he died. It is implied in the numbering of the years of their life that their life, when those years were numbered and finished, came to an end; and yet it is still repeated, and he died, to show that death passed upon all men without exception. Such a one was a strong healthy man, but he died; such a one was a great and rich man, but he died; such a one was a wise politic man, but he died; such a one was a very good man, perhaps a very useful man, but he died, &c.

II. That which is especially observable is that they all lived very long. Long life to the pious patriarchs was a blessing and made them blessings.

The accounts here run on for several generations without anything remarkable, or any variation but of the names and numbers; but at length there comes in one that must not be passed over so, of whom special notice must be taken, and that is Enoch, the seventh from Adam: the rest, we may suppose, did virtuously, but he excelled them all, and was the brightest star of the patriarchal age. It is but little that is recorded concerning him; but this little is enough to make his name great, greater than the name of the other Enoch, who had a city called by his name. Here are two things concerning him:—

I. His gracious conversation in this world, which is twice spoken of: Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah (v. 22), and again, Enoch walked with God, v. 24.

1. The nature of his religion and the scope and tenor of his conversation: he walked with God, which denotes, (1) True religion; what is godliness, but walking with God? The ungodly and profane are without God in the world, they walk contrary to him: but the godly walk with God, which presupposes reconciliation to God, for two cannot walk together except they be agreed (Amos iii. 3). To walk with God is to set God always before us, and to act as those that are always under his eye. It is to live a life of communion with God both in ordinances and providences. It is to make God's word our rule and his glory our end in all our actions. It is to comply with his will, to concur with his designs, and to be workers together with him. (2) Eminent religion. He was entirely dead to this world, and did not only walk after God, as all good men do, but he walked with God, as if he were in heaven already. (3) Activity in promoting religion among others. Executing the priest's office is called walking before God, 1 Sam. ii. 30, 35, and see Zech. iii. 7. Enoch, it should seem, was a priest of the most high God. Now the Holy Spirit instead of saying, Enoch lived, says, Enoch walked with God; for it is the life of a good man to walk with God. This was, [1] The business of Enoch's life. [2] It was the joy and support of his life.

II. His glorious removal to a better world. As he did not live like the rest, so he did not die like the rest (v. 24): He was not, for God took him; that is, as it is explained (Heb. xi. 5), He was translated that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him.

Whenever a good man dies, God takes him, fetches him hence, and receives him to himself. The apostle adds concerning Enoch that, before his translation, he had this testimony, that he pleased God. Those whose conversation in the world is truly holy shall find their removal out of it truly happy.

Methuselah signifies, he dies. However, this is observable, that the longest liver that ever was carried death in his name, that he might be reminded of its coming surely, though it came slowly.

Verses 28–32

The first mention of Noah, of whom we shall read much in the following chapters.

I. His name, with the reason of it: Noah signifies rest; his parents gave him that name, with a prospect of his being a more than ordinary blessing to his generation.

II. His children, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. It should seem that Japheth was the eldest (ch. x. 21), but Shem is put first because on him the covenant was entailed, as appears by ch. ix. 26, where God is called the Lord God of Shem. To him, it is probable, the birth-right was given, and from him, it is certain, both Christ the head, and the church the body, were to descend. Therefore he is called Shem, which signifies a name, because in his posterity the name of God should always remain, till he should come out of his loins whose name is above every name; so that in putting Shem first Christ was, in effect, put first, who in all things must have the pre-eminence.

CHAP. VI

The most remarkable thing we have upon record concerning the old world is the destruction of it by the universal deluge, the account of which commences in this chapter, wherein we have, I. The abounding iniquity of that wicked world, ver. 1–5, and ver. 11, 12. II. The righteous God's just resentment of that abounding iniquity, and his holy resolution to punish it, ver. 6, 7. III. The special favour of God to his servant Noah, 1. In the character given of him, ver. 8–10. 2. In the communication of God's purpose to him, ver. 13, 17. 3. In the directions he gave him to make an ark for his own safety, ver. 14–16. 4. In the employing of him for the preservation of the rest of the creatures, ver. 18–21. Lastly, Noah's obedience to the instructions given him, ver. 22.

Now here we have an account of two things which occasioned the wickedness of the old world:—1. The increase of mankind: Men began to multiply upon the face of the earth. This was the effect of the blessing (ch. i. 28), and yet man's corruption so abused and perverted this blessing that it was turned into a curse. The more sinners the more sin. Infectious diseases are most destructive in populous cities; and sin is a spreading leprosy. 2. Mixed marriages (v. 2): The sons of God (that is, the professors of religion) married the daughters of men, that is, those that were profane, and strangers to God and godliness. The posterity of Seth did not keep by themselves, as they ought to have done. They intermingled themselves with the excommunicated race of Cain: They took them wives of all that they chose. But what was amiss in these marriages? (1) They chose only by the eye: They saw that they were fair, which was all they looked at. (2) They followed the choice which their own corrupt affections made. But, (3) That which proved of such bad consequence to them was that they married strange wives, were unequally yoked with unbelievers, 2 Cor. vi. 14. The bad will sooner debauch the good than the good reform the bad.

This comes in here as a token of God's displeasure.

I. God's resolution not always to strive with man by his Spirit. Note, 1. The blessed Spirit strives with sinners, by the convictions and admonitions of conscience, to turn them from sin to God. 2. If the Spirit be resisted, quenched, and striven against, though he strive long, he will not strive always, Hos. iv. 17.

II. The reason of this resolution: For that he also is flesh, that is, incurably corrupt, and carnal, and sensual. Note, 1. It is the corrupt nature, and the inclination of the soul towards the flesh, that oppose the Spirit's strivings and render them ineffectual. 2. None lose the Spirit's strivings but those that have first forfeited them.

III. A reprieve granted, notwithstanding: Yet his days shall be one hundred and twenty years. Note, The time of God's patience and forbearance towards provoking sinners is sometimes long, but always limited: reprieves are not pardons.

A further account of the corruption of the old world.

I. The temptation they were under to oppress and do violence. They were giants, and they were men of renown. 1. With their great bulk, as the sons of Anak, Num. xiii. 33. 2. With their great name, as the king of Assyria, Isa. xxxvii. 11. Note, Those that have so much power over others as to be able to oppress them have seldom so much power over themselves as not to oppress.

II. The charge exhibited and proved against them, v. 5. Now what did God take notice of? 1. He observed all the streams of sin that flowed along in men's lives, and the breadth and depth of those streams. The oppressors were mighty men and men of renown; and, then, God saw that the wickedness of man was great. Note, The wickedness of a people is great indeed when the most notorious sinners are men of renown among them. Wickedness is then great when great men are wicked. Note, All the sins of sinners are known to God the Judge. 2. He observed the fountain of sin that was in men's hearts. Anyone might see that the wickedness of man was great, for they declared their sin as Sodom; but God's eye went further: He saw that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. (1) The thoughts of the heart were so. (2) The imagination of the thoughts of the heart was so, that is, their designs and devices were wicked. They did not do evil through mere carelessness, but they did evil deliberately and designedly, contriving how to do mischief.

Here is, I. God's resentment of man's wickedness. He did not see it as an unconcerned spectator, but as one injured and affronted by it; he saw it as a tender father sees the folly and stubbornness of a rebellious and disobedient child, which not only angers him, but grieves him. 1. This language does not imply any passion or uneasiness in God (nothing can create disturbance to the Eternal Mind), but it expresses his just and holy displeasure against sin and sinners. Does God thus hate sin? And shall we not hate it? Has our sin grieved him to the heart? And shall not we be grieved and pricked to the heart for it? 2. It does not imply any change of God's mind, but it expresses a change of his way. But, now that man had apostatized, he could not do otherwise than show himself displeased; so that the change was in man, not in God. God repented that he had made man; but we never find him repenting that he redeemed man.

II. God's resolution to destroy man for his wickedness, v. 7. We do but mock God in saying that we are sorry for our sin, and that it grieves us to the heart, if we continue to indulge it. The original word is very significant: I will wipe off man from the earth (so some), as dirt or filth is wiped off from a place which should be clean. Those forfeit their lives that do not answer the end of their living. God took up this resolution concerning man after his Spirit had been long striving with him in vain. None are ruined by the justice of God but those that hate to be reformed by the grace of God.

We have here Noah distinguished from the rest of the world, and a peculiar mark of honour put upon him. 1. When God was displeased with the rest of the world, he favoured Noah: there being one good man, he found him out, and smiled upon him. He was made a vessel of God's mercy. God made him greater and more truly honourable than all the giants that were in those days, who became mighty men and men of renown. Those are highly favoured whom God favours. 2. Noah kept his integrity: Noah was a just man, v. 9. This character of Noah comes in here either, (1) As the reason of God's favour to him. God loves those that love him: or, (2) As the effect of God's favour to him. It was God's good-will to him that produced this good work in him. He was a very good man, but he was no better than the grace of God made him, 1 Cor. xv. 10. Now observe his character. [1] He was a just man, that is, justified before God by faith in the promised seed; for he was an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, Heb. xi. 7. God has sometimes chosen the foolish things of the world, but he never chose the knavish things of it. [2] He was perfect, not with a sinless perfection, but a perfection of sincerity; and it is well for us that by virtue of the covenant of grace, upon the score of Christ's righteousness, sincerity is accepted as our gospel perfection. [3] He walked with God. He lived a life of communion with God. God looks down with an eye of favour upon those who sincerely look up to him with an eye of faith. It is easy to be religious when religion is in fashion; but it is an evidence of strong faith and resolution to swim against a stream to heaven, and to appear for God when no one else appears for him.

The wickedness of that generation is here again spoken of. 1. All kinds of sin was found among them, for it is said (v. 11) that the earth was, (1) Corrupt before God. (2) The earth was also filled with violence and injustice towards men. Wickedness, as it is the shame of human nature, so it is the ruin of human society. Take away conscience and the fear of God, and men become beasts and devils to one another. Sin fills the earth with violence, and so turns the world into a wilderness, into a cock-pit. 2. The proof and evidence of it were undeniable; for God looked upon the earth, and was himself an eye-witness of the corruption that was in it. 3. That which most aggravated the matter was the universal spreading of the contagion: All flesh had corrupted his way. When wickedness has become general then universal ruin is not far off; while there is a remnant of praying people in a nation, to empty the measure as it fills, judgments may be kept off a great while.

It appears indeed that Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

I. God here makes Noah the man of his counsel, communicating to him his purpose to destroy this wicked world by water, as, afterwards, he told

Abraham his resolution concerning Sodom (ch. xviii. 17). The secret of the Lord was with his servants the prophets (Amos iii. 7), by a spirit of revelation, informing them particularly of his purposes; it is with all believers by a spirit of wisdom and faith, enabling them to understand.

1. God told Noah, in general, that he would destroy the world (v. 13). Noah, it is likely, in preaching to his neighbours, had warned them, and now God seconds his endeavours.

2. He told him, particularly, that he would destroy the world by a flood of waters: And behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, v. 17. The reasons, we may be sure, were wise and just, though to us unknown. God has many arrows in his quiver, and he may use which he please. He intimates the certainty of the judgment: I, even I, will do it.

II. God here makes Noah the man of his covenant, another Hebrew periphrasis of a friend (v. 18): But with thee will I establish my covenant. 1. The covenant of providence, that the course of nature shall be continued to the end of time, notwithstanding the interruption which the flood would give to it. This promise was immediately made to Noah and his sons, ch. ix. 8, &c. They were as trustees for all this part of the creation. 2. The covenant of grace, that God would be to him a God and that out of his seed God would take to himself a people.

III. God here makes Noah a monument of sparing mercy. Singular piety shall be recompensed with distinguishing salvations.

1. God directs Noah to make an ark, v. 14–16. This ark was like the hulk of a ship, fitted not to sail upon the waters (there was no occasion for that, when there should be no shore to sail to), but to float upon the waters, waiting for their fall. God chose to employ him in making that which was to be the means of his preservation, both for the trial of his faith and obedience and to teach us that none shall be saved by Christ but those only that work out their salvation. We cannot do it without God, and he will not without us. God gave him very particular instructions concerning this building. (1) It must be made of gopher-wood. (2) He must make it three stories high within. (3) He must divide it into cabins, with partitions, places fitted for the several sorts of creatures, so as to lose no room. (4) Exact dimensions were given him. Those that work for God must take their measures from him and carefully observe them. (5) He must pitch it within and without —without, to shed off the rain, and to prevent the water from soaking in—within, to take away the bad smell of the beasts when kept close. (6) He must make a little window towards the top, to let in light. (7) He must make a door in the side of it, by which to go in and out.

2. God promises Noah that he and his shall be preserved alive in the ark (v. 18): Thou shalt come into the ark. Observe, (1) The care of good parents; they are solicitous not only for their own salvation, but for the salvation of their families, and especially their children. (2) The happiness of those children that have godly parents. Their parents' piety often procures them temporal salvation, as here; and it furthers them in the way to eternal salvation, if they improve the benefit of it.

IV. God here makes Noah a great blessing to the world, and herein makes him an eminent type of the Messiah. 1. God made him a preacher to the men of that generation. 2. God made him a saviour to the inferior creatures, to keep the several kinds of them from perishing and being lost in the deluge, v. 19–21. (1) He was to provide shelter for them, that they might not be drowned. (2) He was to provide sustenance for them, that they might not be starved, v. 21. Herein also he was a type of Christ, to whom it is owing that the world stands, by whom all things consist, and who preserves mankind from being totally cut off and ruined by sin. Noah saved those whom he was to rule, so does Christ, Heb. v. 9.

Noah's care and diligence in building the ark may be considered, 1. As an effect of his faith in the word of God. 2. As an act of obedience to the command of God. His neighbours would ridicule him for his credulity, and he would be the song of the drunkards; his building would be called Noah's folly. But these, and a thousand such objections, Noah by faith got over. He did all exactly according to the instructions given him, and, having begun to build, did not leave off till he had finished it; so did he, and so must we do. 3. We must prepare to meet the Lord in his judgments on earth, especially prepare to meet him at death and in the judgment of the great day, build upon Christ the Rock (Matt. vii. 24), go into Christ the Ark. 4. Every blow of his axes and hammers was a call to repentance, a call to them to prepare arks too.

CHAP. VII

In this chapter we have the performance of what was foretold in the foregoing chapter, both concerning the destruction of the old world and the salvation of Noah. Now here we see what was the end thereof, the end of his care and of their carelessness. We have, in this chapter, I. God's gracious call to Noah to come into the ark (ver. 1). II. Noah's obedience to this heavenly vision, ver. 5, an account of which is repeated (ver. 13–16), to which is added God's tender care to shut him in. III. The coming of the threatened deluge (ver. 10); the causes of it (ver. 11, 12); the prevalency of it, ver. 17–20. IV. The dreadful desolations that were made by it. V. The continuance of it in full sea, before it began to ebb, one hundred and fifty days, ver. 24.

I. A gracious invitation of Noah and his family into a place of safety, v. 1.

1. The call itself is very kind, like that of a tender father to his children, to come indoors, when he sees night or a storm coming. God does not bid him go into the ark, but come into it, implying that God would go with him, would lead him into it, accompany him in it, and in due time bring him safely out of it. It was this that made Noah's ark, which was a prison, to be to him not only a refuge, but a palace. This call to Noah was a type of the call which the gospel gives to poor sinners. Christ is an ark already prepared, in whom alone we can be safe when death and judgment come.

2. The reason for this invitation is a very honourable testimony to Noah's integrity. Observe, (1) Those are righteous indeed that are righteous before God, who searches the heart, and cannot be deceived in men's characters. (2) God takes notice of and is pleased with those that are righteous before him: The Lord knows those that are his. (3) God, that is a witness to, will shortly be a witness for, his people's integrity. (4) God is, in a special manner, pleased with those that are good in bad times and places. (5) Those that keep themselves pure in times of common iniquity God will keep safe in times of common calamity.

II. Here are necessary orders given concerning the brute-creatures that were to be preserved alive with Noah in the ark, v. 2, 3. They were not capable of receiving the warning, therefore man is charged with the care of them: being under his dominion, they must be under his protection.

III. Here is notice given of the now imminent approach of the flood. 1. "It shall be seven days yet, before I do it." God grants them a reprieve of seven days longer, but all in vain; these seven days were trifled away, after all the rest; they continued secure and sensual until the day that the flood came. 2. "It shall be but seven days." While Noah told them of the judgment at a distance, they were tempted to put off their repentance, because the vision was for a great while to come; but now he is ordered to tell them that it is at the door.

Here is Noah's ready obedience to the commands that God gave him. Observe, 1. He went into the ark, upon notice that the flood would come after seven days, though probably as yet there appeared no visible sign of its approach. He went into it by faith in this warning that it would come quickly, though he did not see that the second causes had yet begun to work. In every step he took, he walked by faith, and not by sense. 2. He took all his family along with him, his wife, his sons, and his sons' wives, that by them, not only his family, but the world of mankind, might be built up. 3. The brute creatures readily went in with him.

The date of this great event; this is carefully recorded, for the greater certainty of the story.

The years of the old world are reckoned, not by the reigns of the giants, but by the lives of the patriarchs; saints are of more account with God than princes. Noah was now a very old man, even as men's years went then. Note, 1. The longer we live in this world the more we see of the miseries and calamities of it. 2. Sometimes God exercises his old servants with extraordinary trials of obedient patience. The oldest of Christ's soldiers must not promise themselves a discharge from their warfare till death discharge them. Still they must gird on their harness, and not boast as though they had put it off.

II. The second causes that concurred to this deluge.

1. In the self-same day that Noah was fixed in the ark, the inundation began. See what was done on that day, that fatal day to the world of the ungodly. (1) The fountains of the great deep were broken up. The waters of the sea returned to cover the earth, as they had done at first, ch. i. 9. (2) The windows of heaven were opened, and the waters which were above the firmament were poured out upon the world. The rain, which ordinarily descends in drops, then came down in streams, or spouts, as they call them in the Indies, where clouds have been often known to burst, as they express it there, when the rain descends in a much more violent torrent than we have ever seen in the greatest shower.

2. Now learn from this, (1) That all the creatures are at God's disposal, and that he makes what use he pleases of them, whether for correction, or for mercy. (2) That God often makes that which should be for our welfare to become a trap, Ps. lxix. 22. Nothing is more needful nor useful than water, both the springs of the earth and the showers of heaven; and yet now nothing was more hurtful, nothing more destructive: every creature is to us what God makes it. (3) That it is impossible to escape the righteous judgments of God when they come against sinners with commission.

Here is repeated what was related before of Noah's entrance into the ark, with his family and the creatures that were marked for preservation.

I. It is thus repeated for the honour of Noah, whose faith and obedience herein shone so brightly.

II. Notice is here taken of the beasts going in each after his kind, according to the phrase used in the history of the creation (ch. i. 21–25), and that this preservation was as a new creation: a life remarkably protected is, as it were, a new life.

III. It is added, The Lord shut him in, v. 16. As Noah continued his obedience to God, so God continued his care of Noah. God shut the door, 1. To secure him, and keep him safe in the ark. 2. To exclude all others. Hitherto the door of the ark stood open, and if any, even during the last seven days, had repented and believed, for aught I know they might have been welcomed into the ark; but now the door was shut.

IV. There is much of our gospel duty and privilege to be seen in Noah's preservation in the ark. Observe then, 1. It is our great duty, in obedience to the gospel call, by a lively faith in Christ, to come into that way of salvation which God has provided for poor sinners. When Noah came into the ark, he quitted his own house and lands; so must we quit our own righteousness and our worldly possessions, whenever they come into competition with Christ. Noah must, for a while, submit to the confinements and inconveniences of the ark, in order to his preservation for a new world; so those that come into Christ to be saved by him must deny themselves, both in sufferings and services. 2. Those that come into the ark themselves should bring as many as they can in with them, by good instructions, by persuasions, and by a good example. There is room enough in Christ for all comers. 3. Those that by faith come into Christ, the ark, shall by the power of God be shut in, and kept as in a stronghold by the power of God, 1 Pet. i. 5.

I. How long the flood was increasing—forty days, v. 17. The profane world, who believed not that it would come, probably when it came flattered themselves with hopes that it would soon abate; but it prevailed. The gradual approaches of God's judgments, which are designed to bring sinners to repentance, are often abused to the hardening of them in their presumption.

II. To what degree they increased: they rose so high that not only the low flat countries were deluged, but to make sure work, and that none might escape, the tops of the highest mountains were overflowed—fifteen cubits, that is, seven yards and a half. Thus the refuge of lies was swept away. There is no place on earth so high as to set men out of the reach of God's judgments, Jer. xlix. 16; Obad. 3, 4.

III. What became of Noah's ark when the waters thus increased: It was lifted up above the earth (v. 17), and went upon the face of the waters, v. 18. Observe, 1. The waters which broke down everything else bore up the ark. 2. The more the waters increased the higher the ark was lifted up towards heaven. Thus sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions.

I. The general destruction of all flesh by the waters of the flood.

1. All the cattle, fowl, and creeping things, died, except the few that were in the ark. The destruction of the creatures was their deliverance from the bondage of corruption, which deliverance the whole creation now groans after, Rom. viii. 21, 22.

2. All the men, women, and children, that were in the world (except what were in the ark) died. Now, (1) We may easily imagine what terror and consternation seized on them when they saw themselves surrounded. (2) We may suppose that they tried all ways and means possible for their preservation, but all in vain. Those that are not found in Christ, the ark, are certainly undone.

Let us now pause awhile and consider this tremendous judgment! Eliphaz appeals to this story as a standing warning to a careless world (Job xxii. 15, 16), Hast thou marked the old way, which wicked men have trodden, who were cut down out of time, and sent into eternity, whose foundation was overflown with the flood?

II. The special preservation of Noah and his family. Observe, 1. Noah lives. When all about him were monuments of justice, thousands falling on his right hand and ten thousands on his left, he was a monument of mercy. We have reason to think that, while the long-suffering of God waited, Noah not only preached to, but prayed for, that wicked world, and would have turned away the wrath; but his prayers return into his own bosom, and are answered only in his own escape, which is plainly referred to, Ezek. xiv. 14, Noah, Daniel, and Job, shall but deliver their own souls. 2. He but lives. Noah remains alive, and this is all; he is, in effect, buried alive—cooped up in a close place. But he comforts himself with this, that he is in the way of duty and in the way of deliverance.

CHAP. VIII

In the close of the foregoing chapter we left the world in ruins. Now the scene alters, the brighter side of that cloud which there appeared so black and dark; for, though God contend long, he will not contend for ever, nor be always wrath. We have here, I. The earth made anew, by the recess of the waters, and the appearing of the dry land. 1. The increase of the waters is stayed, ver. 1, 2. 2. They begin sensibly to abate, ver. 3. 3. After sixteen days' ebbing, the ark rests, ver. 4. 4. After sixty days' ebbing, the tops of the mountains appeared, ver. 5. 5. After forty days' ebbing, and twenty days before the mountains appeared, Noah began to send out his spies, a raven and a dove, to gain intelligence, ver. 6–12. 6. Two months after the appearing of the tops of the mountains, the waters had gone, and the face of the earth was dry (ver. 13), though not dried so as to be fit for man till almost two months after, ver. 14. II. Man placed anew upon the earth 1. Noah's discharge and departure out of the ark, ver. 15–19. 2. His sacrifice of praise, which he offered to God upon his enlargement, ver. 20. 3. God's acceptance of his sacrifice, and the promise he made thereupon not to drown the world again, ver. 21, 22. And thus, at length, mercy rejoices against judgment.

I. An act of God's grace: God remembered Noah and every living thing. This is an expression after the manner of men; for not any of his creatures (Luke xii. 6), much less any of his people, are forgotten of God, Isa. xlix. 15, 16. God's remembering Noah was the return of his mercy to mankind, of whom he would not make a full end. Noah himself, though one that had found grace in the eyes of the Lord, yet seemed to be forgotten in the ark, and perhaps began to think himself so; for we do not find that God had told him how long he should be confined and when he should be released. Very good men have sometimes been ready to conclude themselves forgotten of God, especially when their afflictions have been unusually grievous and long. Perhaps Noah, though a great believer, yet when he found the flood continuing so long after it might reasonably be presumed to have done its work, was tempted to fear lest he that shut him in would keep him in, and began to expostulate. How long wilt thou forget me? But at length God returned in mercy to him, and this is expressed by remembering him.

II. An act of God's power over wind and water, both of which are at his beck, though neither of them is under man's control.

1. He commanded the wind, and said to that, Go, and it went, in order to the carrying off of the flood: God made a wind to pass over the earth. See here, (1) What was God's remembrance of Noah: it was his relieving him. (2) What a sovereign dominion God has over the winds. Even stormy winds fulfil his word, Ps. cxlviii. 8. Now God sent a wind, a drying wind, such a wind as God sent to divide the Red Sea before Israel, Exod. xiv. 21.

2. He commanded the waters, and said to them, Come, and they came. (1) He took away the cause. Note, As God has a key to open, so he has a key to shut up again, and to stay the progress of judgments by stopping the causes of them: and the same hand that brings the desolation must bring the deliverance. He that wounds is alone able to heal. See Job xii. 14, 15. (2) Then the effect ceased; not all at once, but by degrees. God usually works deliverance for his people gradually, that the day of small things may not be despised, nor the day of great things despaired of, Zech. iv. 10. See Prov. iv. 18.

Here we have the effects and evidences of the ebbing of the waters. 1. The ark rested. This was some satisfaction to Noah, to feel the house he was in upon firm ground, and no longer movable. It rested upon a mountain, whither it was directed, not by Noah's prudence (he did not steer it), but by the wise and gracious providence of God, that it might rest the sooner. Note, God has times and places of rest for his people after their tossings; and many a time he provides for their seasonable and comfortable settlement without their own contrivance and quite beyond their own foresight. 2. The tops of the mountains were seen, like little islands, appearing above the water. We must suppose that they were seen by Noah and his sons; for there were none besides to see them. It is probable that they had looked through the window of the ark every day, like the longing mariners, after a tedious voyage, to see if they could discover land. They felt ground above forty days before they saw it, according to Dr. Lightfoot's computation, whence he infers that, if the waters decreased proportionably, the ark drew eleven cubits in water.

An account of the spies which Noah sent forth to bring him intelligence from abroad, a raven and a dove.

I. That though God had told Noah particularly when the flood would come, yet he did not give him a particular account by revelation at what times, and by what steps, it should go away, 1. Because the knowledge of the former was necessary to his preparing the ark, but the knowledge of the latter would serve only to gratify his curiosity, and the concealing of it from him would be the needful exercise of his faith and patience. And, 2. He could not foresee the flood, but by revelation; but he might, by ordinary means, discover the decrease of it.

II. That though Noah by faith expected his enlargement, and by patience waited for it, yet he was inquisitive concerning it, as one that thought it long to be thus confined. He that believes does not make haste to run before God, but he does make haste to go forth to meet him, Isa. xxviii. 16. Particularly, 1. Noah sent forth a raven through the window of the ark, which went forth, as the Hebrew phrase is, going forth and returning, that is, flying about, but returning to the ark for rest; probably not in it, but upon it. This gave Noah little satisfaction; therefore, 2. He sent forth a dove, which returned the first time with no good news, but probably wet and dirty; but, the second time, she brought an olive-leaf in her bill, which appeared to be first plucked off, a plain indication that now the trees, the fruit-trees, began to appear above water. Note here, (1) That Noah sent forth the dove the second time seven days after the first time, and the third time was after seven days too; and probably the first sending of her out was seven days after the sending forth of the raven. This intimates that it was done on the sabbath day, which, it should seem, Noah religiously observed in the ark. (2) The dove is an emblem of a gracious soul, which finding no rest for its foot, no solid peace or satisfaction in this world, returns to Christ as to its ark. The carnal heart, like the raven, takes up with the world, and feeds on the carrions it finds there. And as Noah put forth his hand, and took the dove, and pulled her in to him, into the ark, so Christ will graciously preserve, and help, and welcome, those that fly to him for rest. (3) The olive-branch, which was an emblem of peace, was brought, not by the raven, a bird of prey, nor by a gay and proud peacock, but by a mild, patient, humble, dove. It is a dove-like disposition that brings into the soul earnests of rest and joy. (4) Some make these things an allegory. The law was first sent forth like the raven, but brought no tidings; therefore, in the fulness of time, God sent forth his gospel, as the dove, in the likeness of which the Holy Spirit descended, and this presents us with an olive-branch and brings in a better hope.

I. The ground dry (v. 13), that is, all the water carried off it, of which, upon the first day of the first month (a joyful new-year's-day it was), Noah was himself an eyewitness. He removed the covering of the ark to give him a prospect of the earth about it; and a most comfortable prospect he had. For behold, behold and wonder, the face of the ground was dry. Note, (1) It is a great mercy to see ground about us. Noah was more sensible of it than we are; for mercies restored are much more affecting than mercies continued. (2) The divine power which now renewed the face of the earth can renew the face of an afflicted troubled soul and of a distressed persecuted church. 2. The ground dried (v. 14), so as to be a fit habitation for Noah. Note, God consults our benefit rather than our desires. We would go out of the ark before the ground is dried: and perhaps, if the door be shut, are ready to remove the covering. God's time of showing mercy is certainly the best time, when the mercy is ripe for us and we are ready for it.

I. Noah's dismission out of the ark, v. 15–17. Observe, 1. Noah did not stir till God bade him. Those only go under God's protection that follow God's direction and submit to his government. 2. Though God detained him long, yet at last he gave him his discharge. 3. God had said, Come into the ark, which intimated that God went in with him; now he says, not Come forth, but Go forth, which intimates that God, who went in with him, stayed with him all the while, till he sent him out safely.

II. Noah's departure when he had his dismission. When he found himself preserved there, not only for a new life, but for a new world, he saw no reason to complain of his long confinement. Now observe, 1. Noah and his family came out alive. 2. Noah brought out all the creatures that went in with him, except the raven and the dove, which, probably, were ready to meet their mates at their coming out. Noah was able to give a very good account of his charge; for of all that were given to him he had lost none.

I. Noah's thankful acknowledgment of God's favour to him, in completing the mercy of his deliverance, v. 20. 1. He built an altar. God is pleased with free-will offerings, and praises that wait for him. Noah was now turned out into a cold and desolate world, where, one would have thought, his first care would have been to build a house for himself; but, behold, he begins with an altar for God: God, that is the first, must be first served; and he begins well that begins with God. 2. He offered a sacrifice upon his altar, of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl. Here observe, (1) He offered only those that were clean. (2) Though his stock of cattle was so small, and that rescued from ruin at so great an expense of care and pains, yet he did not grudge to give God his dues out of it. Serving God with our little is the way to make it more; and we must never think that wasted with which God is honoured. (3) See here the antiquity of religion: the first thing we find done in the new world was an act of worship, Jer. vi. 16. We are now to express our thankfulness, not by burnt-offerings, but by the sacrifices of praise and the sacrifices of righteousness, by pious devotions and a pious conversation.

II. God's gracious acceptance of Noah's thankfulness.

1. God was well pleased with the performance, v. 21. He smelt a sweet savour, or, as it is in the Hebrew, a savour of rest, from it. He was well pleased with Noah's pious zeal, and these hopeful beginnings of the new world. Having caused his anger to rest upon the world of sinners, he here caused his love to rest upon this little remnant of believers.

2. Hereupon, he took up a resolution never to drown the world again. Good security is here given, and that which may be relied upon.

(1) That this judgment should never be repeated. Noah might think, "To what purpose should the world be repaired, when, in all probability, for the wickedness of it, it will quickly be in like manner ruined again?" "No," says God, "it never shall." Neither will I again smite any more every living thing. "I will no more take this severe method; for," First, "He is rather to be pitied, for it is all the effect of sin dwelling in him; and it is but what might be expected from such a degenerate race: he is called a transgressor from the womb, and therefore it is not strange that he deals so very treacherously," Isa. xlviii. 8. Thus God remembers that he is flesh. Secondly, "He will be utterly ruined, for, if he be dealt with according to his deserts, one flood must succeed another till all be destroyed." See here, 1. That outward judgments, though they may terrify and restrain men, yet cannot of themselves sanctify and renew them; the grace of God must work with those judgments. 2. That God's reasons of mercy are all drawn from himself, not from any thing in us.

(2) That the course of nature should never be discontinued (v. 22): "While the earth remaineth, and man upon it, there shall be summer and winter (not all winter as had been this last year), day and night," not all night, as probably it was while the rain was descending. It is plainly intimated that this earth is not to remain always. As long as it does remain God's providence will carefully preserve the regular succession of times and seasons, and cause each to know its place. To this we owe it that the world stands, and the wheel of nature keeps its track. See here how changeable the times are and yet how unchangeable. First, The course of nature always changing—day and night, summer and winter, counter-changed. Secondly, Yet never changed. It is constant in this inconstancy. These seasons have never ceased, nor shall cease, while the sun continues such a steady measurer of time and the moon such a faithful witness in heaven. This is God's covenant of the day and of the night, the stability of which is mentioned for the confirming of our faith in the covenant of grace, which is no less inviolable, Jer. xxxiii. 20, 21.

CHAP. IX

Both the world and the church were now again reduced to a family, the family of Noah, of the affairs of which this chapter gives us an account. Here is, I. The covenant of providence settled with Noah and his sons, ver. 1–11. In this covenant 1. God promises them to take care of their lives, so that, (1) They should replenish the earth, ver. 1, 7. (2) They should be safe from the insults of the brute-creatures, ver. 2. (3) They should be allowed to eat flesh; only they must not eat blood, ver. 3, 4. (4) The world should never be drowned again, ver. 8–11. 2. God requires of them to take care of one another's lives and of their own, ver. 5, 6. II. The seal of that covenant, namely, the rainbow, ver. 12–17. III. A story concerning Noah and his sons, 1. Noah's sin and shame, ver. 20, 21. 2. Ham's impudence and impiety, ver. 22. 3. The pious modesty of Shem and Japheth, ver. 23. 4. The curse of Canaan, and the blessing of Shem and Japheth, ver. 24–27. IV. The age and death of Noah, ver. 28, 29.

In general, God blessed Noah and his sons (v. 1), that is, he assured them of his good-will to them and his gracious intentions concerning them. We read (ch. viii. 20) how Noah blessed God, by his altar and sacrifice.

Now here we have the Magna Charta—the great charter of this new kingdom of nature which was now to be erected, and incorporated, the former charter having been forfeited and seized.

I. The grants of this charter are kind and gracious to men.

1. A grant of lands of vast extent, and a promise of a great increase of men to occupy and enjoy them. The first blessing is here renewed: Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth (v. 1). Now, (1) God sets the whole earth before them, tells them it is all their own, while it remains, to them and their heirs. Though it is not a paradise, but a wilderness rather; yet it is better than we deserve. Blessed be God, it is not hell. (2) He gives them a blessing, so that in a little time all the habitable parts of the earth should be more or less inhabited. Though death should still reign, yet the earth should never again be dispeopled as now it was, but still replenished, Acts xvii. 24–6.

2. A grant of power over the inferior creatures, v. 2. Man in innocence ruled by love, fallen man rules by fear. Now this grant remains in force, and thus far we have still the benefit of it. Now here see, (1) That God is a good Master, and provides, not only that we may live, but that we may live comfortably, in his service; not for necessity only, but for delight. (2) That every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, 1 Tim. iv. 4.

II. The precepts and provisos of this charter are no less kind and gracious, and instances of God's good-will to man. The Jewish doctors speak so often of the seven precepts of Noah, or of the sons of Noah, which they say were to be observed by all nations, that it may not be amiss to set them down. The first against the worship of idols. The second against blasphemy, and requiring to bless the name of God. The third against murder. The fourth against incest and all uncleanness. The fifth against theft and rapine. The sixth requiring the administration of justice. The seventh against eating of flesh with the life.

1. Man must not prejudice his own life by eating that food which is unwholesome and prejudicial to his health (v. 4); they must not be greedy and hasty in taking their food; they must not be barbarous and cruel to the inferior creatures. During the continuance of the law of sacrifices, in which the blood made atonement for the soul (Lev. xvii. 11), signifying that the life of the sacrifice was accepted for the life of the sinner, blood must not be looked upon as a common thing, but must be poured out before the Lord (2 Sam. xxiii. 16). But, now that the great and true sacrifice has been offered, the obligation of the law ceases with the reason of it.

2. Man must not take away his own life: Your blood of your lives will I require, v. 5. Our lives are not so our own as that we may quit them at our own pleasure, but they are God's.

3. The beasts must not be suffered to hurt the life of man. This was confirmed by the law of Moses (Exod. xxi. 28), and I think it would not be unsafe to observe it still. Thus God showed his hatred of the sin of murder, that men might hate it the more, and not only punish, but prevent it.

4. Wilful murderers must be put to death. This is the sin which is here designed to be restrained by the terror of punishment. (1) God will punish murderers. One time or other, in this world or in the next, he will both discover concealed murders, which are hidden from man's eyes, and punish avowed and justified murders, which are too great for man's hand. (2) The magistrate must punish murderers (v. 6). There are those who are ministers of God for this purpose, to be a protection to the innocent, by being a terror to the malicious and evildoers, and they must not bear the sword in vain, Rom. xiii. 4. It is a sin which the Lord would not pardon in a prince (2 Kings xxiv. 3, 4), and which therefore a prince should not pardon in a subject. To this law there is a reason annexed: For in the image of God made he man at first. Man is a creature to his Creator, and therefore ought to be so to us. God put honour upon him, let not us then put contempt upon him. Such remains of God's image are still even upon fallen man as that he who unjustly kills a man defaces the image of God and does dishonour to him.

Here is, I. The general establishment of God's covenant with this new world, and the extent of that covenant, v. 9, 10. Here observe, 1. That God is graciously pleased to deal with man in the way of a covenant, wherein God greatly encourages man's duty and obedience. 2. That all God's covenants with man are of his own making: I, behold, I. 3. That God's covenants are established more firmly than the pillars of heaven or the foundations of the earth, and cannot be disannulled. 4. That God's covenants are made with the covenanters and with their seed; the promise is to them and their children.

II. The particular intention of this covenant. It was designed to secure the world from another deluge: There shall not any more be a flood. It is owing to God's goodness and faithfulness, not to any reformation of the world, that it has not often been deluged, and that it is not deluged now. As the old world was ruined to be a monument of justice, so this world remains to this day, a monument of mercy, according to the oath of God, that the waters of Noah should no more return to cover the earth, Isa. liv. 9. If the sea should flow but for a few days, as it does twice every day for a few hours, what desolation would it make! Let us give him the glory of his mercy in promising and of his truth in performing.

Articles of agreement among men are usually sealed. God therefore, being willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his councils, has confirmed his covenant by a seal (Heb. vi. 17). The seal of this covenant of nature was natural enough; it was the rainbow. Now, concerning this seal of the covenant, observe, 1. This seal is affixed with repeated assurances of the truth of that promise of which it was designed to be the ratification: I do set my bow in the cloud (v. 13); it shall be seen in the cloud (v. 14), that the eye may affect the heart and confirm the faith; and it shall be the token of the covenant (v. 12, 13), and I will remember my covenant, that the waters shall no more become a flood, v. 15. 2. The rainbow appears when the clouds are most disposed to wet, and returns after the rain; when we have most reason to fear the rain prevailing. Thus God obviates our fears. 3. The thicker the cloud the brighter the bow in the cloud. Thus, as threatening afflictions abound, encouraging consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. i. 5. 4. The rainbow appears when one part of the sky is clear, which intimates mercy remembered in the midst of wrath; and the clouds are hemmed as it were with the rainbow, that they may not overspread the heavens, for the bow is coloured rain or the edges of a cloud gilded. A bow bespeaks terror, but this bow has neither string nor arrow, and a bow alone will do little execution. It is a bow, but it is directed upwards, not towards the earth; for the seals of the covenant were intended to comfort, not to terrify.

Here is, I. Noah's family and employment. The business Noah applied himself to was that of a husbandman, Heb. a man of the earth, that is, a man dealing in the earth, that kept ground in his hand, and occupied it. Noah was by his calling led to trade in the fruits of the earth. He began to be a husbandman, that is, he returned to his old employment, from which he had been diverted by the building of the ark first, and probably afterwards by the building of a house on dry land for himself and family. For this good while he had been a carpenter, but now he began again to be a husbandman.

II. Noah's sin and shame: He planted a vineyard; and, when he had gathered his vintage, probably he appointed a day of mirth and feasting in his family, and had his sons and their children with him, to rejoice with him in the increase of his house as well as in the increase of his vineyard; and perhaps he appointed this feast with a design, at the close of it, to bless his sons. At this feast he drank of the wine. But he drank too liberally, for he was drunk. Observe, how he came now to be overtaken in this fault. It was his sin, and a great sin, so much the worse for its being so soon after a great deliverance; but God left him to himself, and has left this miscarriage of his upon record, to teach us, 1. That the fairest copy that ever mere man wrote since the fall had its blots and false strokes. 2. That sometimes those who, with watchfulness and resolution, have, by the grace of God, kept their integrity in the midst of temptation, have, through security, and carelessness, and neglect of the grace of God, been surprised into sin, when the hour of temptation has been over. 3. That we have need to be very careful, when we use God's good creatures plentifully, lest we use them to excess. Now the consequence of Noah's sin was shame. He was made naked to his shame, as Adam when he had eaten forbidden fruit. Observe here the great evil of the sin of drunkenness. (1) It discovers men. What infirmities they have, they betray when they are drunk, and what secrets they are entrusted with are then easily got out of them. Drunken porters keep open gates. (2) It disgraces men, and exposes them to contempt. Men say and do that when drunk which when they are sober they would blush at the thoughts of, Hab. ii. 15, 16.

III. Ham's impudence and impiety: He saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren, v. 22. 1. He pleased himself with the sight. Perhaps Ham had sometimes been himself drunk. It is common for those who walk in false ways themselves to rejoice at the false steps which they sometimes see others make. But charity rejoices not in iniquity. 2. He told his two brethren in a scornful deriding manner, that his father might seem vile unto them. It is very wrong, (1) To make a jest of sin (Prov. xiv. 9). And, (2) To publish the faults of any, especially of parents, whom it is our duty to honour.

IV. The pious care of Shem and Japheth to cover their poor father's shame, v. 23. 1. There is a mantle of love to be thrown over the faults of all, 1 Pet. iv. 8. 2. Besides this, there is a robe of reverence to be thrown over the faults of parents.

I. Noah comes to himself. He awoke from his wine.

II. The spirit of prophecy comes upon him, and, like dying Jacob, he tells his sons what shall befall them, ch. xlix. 1.

1. He pronounces a curse on Canaan the son of Ham (v. 25), in whom Ham is himself cursed. The particular curse is, A servant of servants (that is, the meanest and most despicable servant) shall he be, even to his brethren. Note, (1) God often visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, when the children inherit the fathers' wicked dispositions, and imitate the fathers' wicked practices, and do nothing to cut off the entail of the curse. (2) Disgrace is justly put upon those that put disgrace upon others, especially that dishonour and grieve their own parents.

2. He entails a blessing upon Shem and Japheth. (1) He blesses Shem, or rather blesses God for him. Observe, [1] He calls the Lord the God of Shem. All blessings are included in this. Shem is sufficiently recompensed for his respect to his father by this, that the Lord himself puts this honour upon him, to be his God. [2] He gives to God the glory of that good work which Shem had done. When we see men's good works we should glorify, not them, but our Father, Matt. v. 16. It is an honour and a favour to be employed for God and used by him in doing good. [3] He foresees that God's gracious dealings with Shem and his family would be evidence to all the world that he was the God of Shem. [4] It is intimated that the church should be built up and continued in the posterity of Shem; for of him came the Jews, who were, for a great while, the only professing people God had in the world.

(2) He blesses Japheth, and, in him, the isles of the Gentiles, which were peopled by his seed: God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, v. 27. Now, Some make this to belong wholly to Japheth, and to denote either, First, His outward prosperity, that his seed should be so numerous and so victorious that they should be masters of the tents of Shem, which was fulfilled when the people of the Jews, the most eminent of Shem's race, were tributaries to the Grecians first and afterwards to the Romans, both of Japheth's seed. Or, Secondly, It denotes the conversion of the Gentiles, and the bringing of them into the church; and then we should read it, God shall persuade Japheth (for so the word signifies), and then, being so persuaded, he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, that is, Jews and Gentiles shall be united together in the gospel fold. Note, It is God only that can bring those again into the church who have separated themselves from it. Souls are brought into the church, not by force, but by persuasion, Ps. cx. 3. They are persuaded by reason to be religious.

Here see, 1. How God prolonged the life of Noah; this long life was a further reward of his signal piety, and a great blessing to the world. 2. How God put a period to his life at last. Noah lived to see two worlds, but, being an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, when he died he went to see a better than either.

CHAP. X

This chapter shows the origin of nations; and yet perhaps there is no nation but that of the Jews that can be confident from which of these seventy fountains (for so many there are here) it derives its streams. Through the want of early records, the mixtures of people, the revolutions of nations, and distance of time, the knowledge of the lineal descent of the present inhabitants of the earth is lost. I. Of the posterity of Japheth, ver. 2–5. II. The posterity of Ham (ver. 6–20), and in this particular notice is taken of Nimrod, ver. 8–10. III. The posterity of Shem, ver. 21, &c.

The posterity of Japheth were allotted to the isles of the Gentiles (v. 5), which were divided among them, and probably this island of ours among the rest; all places beyond the sea from Judæa are called isles (Jer. xxv. 22), and this directs us to understand that promise (Isa. xlii. 4), the isles shall wait for his law, of the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ.

That which is observable and improvable in these verses is the account here given of Nimrod, v. 8–10. He is here represented as a great man in his day: he was resolved to tower above his neighbours. The same spirit that actuated the giants before the flood now revived in him. There are some in whom ambition and affectation of dominion seem to be bred in the bone. Nothing on this side hell will humble and break the proud spirits of some men. Now,

I. Nimrod was a great hunter; with this he began, and for this became famous to a proverb. 1. Some think he did good with his hunting, served his country by ridding it of the wild beasts which infested it. 2. Others think that under pretence of hunting he gathered men under his command, in pursuit of another game he had to play, which was to make himself master of the country. Note, Great conquerors are but great hunters. Alexander and Cæsar would not make such a figure in scripture-history as they do in common history. Nimrod was a mighty hunter against the Lord, so the LXX; that is, (1) He set up idolatry. That he might set up a new government, he set up a new religion. Babel was the mother of harlots. Or, (2) He carried on his oppression and violence in defiance of God himself.

II. Nimrod was a great ruler: The beginning of his kingdom was Babel, v. 10. Some way or other, by arts or arms, he got into power, and so laid the foundations of a monarchy. If Nimrod and his neighbours began, other nations soon learned to incorporate under one head for their common safety and welfare, which, however it began, proved so great a blessing to the world that things were reckoned to go ill indeed when there was no king in Israel.

III. Nimrod was a great builder. Probably he was architect in the building of Babel, and there he began his kingdom; but, when his project to rule all the sons of Noah was baffled by the confusion of tongues, out of that land he went forth into Assyria (so the margin reads it, v. 11) and built Nineveh, &c.

Observe here, 1. The account of the posterity of Canaan, of the families and nations that descended from him, and of the land they possessed, very pleasantly situated. Canaan here has a better land than either Shem or Japheth, and yet they have a better lot, for they inherit the blessing.

Verses 21–32

Two things especially are observable in this account of the posterity of Shem:—

I. The description of Shem, v. 21. We have not only his name, Shem, which signifies a name, but two titles to distinguish him by:—

1. He was the father of all the children of Eber. Eber was his great grandson; but why should he be called the father of all his children, rather than of all Arphaxad's, or Salah's, &c.? Probably because Abraham and his seed, God's covenant-people, not only descended from Heber, but from him were called Hebrews; ch. xiv. 13, Abram the Hebrew. The holy tongue being commonly called from him the Hebrew, it is probable that he retained it in his family, in the confusion of Babel, as a special token of God's favour to him. Now, when the inspired penman would give Shem an honourable title, he calls him the father of the Hebrews. As Ham, though he had many sons, is disowned by being called the father of Canaan, so Shem, though he had many sons, is dignified with the title of the father of Eber, on whose seed the blessing was entailed. Goodness is true greatness.

2. He was the brother of Japheth the elder. The sacred historian had mentioned it as Shem's honour that he was the father of the Hebrews; but, lest Japheth's seed should therefore be looked upon as for ever shut out from the Church, he here reminds us that he was the brother of Japheth, not in birth only, but in blessing; for Japheth was to dwell in the tents of Shem.

CHAP. XI

We have, in this chapter, I. The dispersion of the sons of men at Babel (ver. 1–9), where we have, 1. Their presumptuous design to build a city and a tower, ver. 1–4. 2. The righteous judgment of God upon them by confounding their language, and so scattering them, ver. 5–9. II. The pedigree of the sons of God down to Abraham (ver. 10–26), with a general account of his family, and removal out of his native country, ver. 27, &c.

The close of the foregoing chapter tells us that by the sons of Noah, or among the sons of Noah, the nations were divided in the earth after the flood, that is, were distinguished into several tribes, and it was either appointed by Noah, or agreed upon among his sons, which way each several tribe or colony should steer its course. But the sons of men, it should seem, were loth to disperse into distant places; they thought the more the merrier and the safer, and therefore they contrived to keep together, thinking themselves wiser than either God or Noah. Now here we have,

I. The advantages which befriended their design of keeping together, 1. They were all of one language, v. 1. Now, while they all understood one another, they would be the more likely to love one another, and the more capable of helping one another, and the less inclinable to separate one from another. 2. They found a very convenient commodious place to settle in (v. 2), a plain in the land of Shinar, a spacious plain, able to contain them all, and a fruitful plain, able, according as their present numbers were, to support them all.

II. The method they took to bind themselves to one another, and to settle together in one body. Instead of coveting to enlarge their borders by a peaceful departure under the divine protection, they contrived to fortify them. Their unanimous resolution is, Let us build ourselves a city and a tower. Observe here,

1. How they excited and encouraged one another to set about this work. They said, Go to, let us make brick (v. 3), and again, (v. 4), Go to, let us build ourselves a city; by mutual excitements they made one another more daring and resolute.

2. What materials they used in their building. The country, being plain, yielded neither stone nor mortar, yet this did not discourage them from their undertaking, but they made brick to serve instead of stone, and slime or pitch instead of mortar. What shift those will make that are resolute in their purposes: were we but thus zealously affected in a good thing, we should not stop our work so often as we do, under pretence that we want conveniences for carrying it on.

3. For what ends they built. Three things, it seems, they aimed at in building this tower:—

(1) It seems designed for an affront to God himself; for they would build a tower whose top might reach to heaven, which bespeaks a defiance of God, or at least a rivalship with him.

(2) They hoped hereby to make themselves a name, and to give posterity to know that there had been such men as they in the world. They would leave this monument of their pride and ambition, and folly. We do not find in any history the name of so much as one of these Babel-builders.

(3) They did it to prevent their dispersion. It is probable that the hand of ambitious Nimrod was in all this. He aimed at universal monarchy, in order to which, under pretence of uniting for their common safety, he contrives to keep them in one body, that, having them all under his eye, he might not fail to have them under his power. It is God's prerogative to be universal monarch, Lord of all, and King of kings; the man that aims at it offers to step into the throne of God, who will not give his glory to another.

We have here the quashing of the project of the Babel-builders.

I. The cognizance God took of the design that was on foot. God is incontestibly just and fair in all his proceedings against sin and sinners, and condemns none unheard. They were the sons of Adam, so it is in the Hebrew; nay, of that Adam, that sinful disobedient Adam, whose children are by nature children of disobedience. Pious Eber is not found among this ungodly crew; for he and his are called the children of God.

II. The counsels and resolves of the Eternal God concerning this matter.

1. He suffered them to proceed a good way in their enterprise before he put a stop to it, that they might have space to repent.

2. God had tried, by his commands and admonitions, to bring them off from this project, but in vain; therefore he must take another course to keep the world in some order and to tie the hands of those that will not be checked by law. Now observe here, The mercy of God, in moderating the penalty, and not making it proportionable to the offence; for he deals not with us according to our sins. He does not say, "Let us go down now in thunder and lightning, and consume those rebels in a moment." No; only, "Let us go down, and scatter them." They deserved death, but are only banished or transported; for the patience of God is very great towards a provoking world. Three things were done:—

1. Their language was confounded. Those unhappy controversies which are strifes of words, and arise from our misunderstanding one another's language, for aught I know are owing to this confusion of tongues.

2. Their building was stopped: They left off to build the city. This was the effect of the confusion of their tongues; for it not only incapacitated them for helping one another, but probably struck such a damp upon their spirits that they could not proceed, since they saw, in this, the hand of the Lord gone out against them. It is wisdom to leave off that which we see God fights against.

3. The builders were scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth, v. 8, 9. They departed in companies, after their families, and after their tongues (ch. x. 5, 20, 31), to the several countries and places allotted to them. They left behind them a perpetual memorandum of their reproach, in the name given to the place. It was called Babel, confusion. Those that aim at a great name commonly come off with a bad name. The children of men were now finally scattered, and never did, nor ever will, come all together again, till the great day, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and all nations shall be gathered before him, Matt. xxv. 31, 32.

We have here a genealogy, not an endless genealogy, for here it ends in Abram, the friend of God, and leads further to Christ, the promised seed, who was the son of Abram, and from Abram the genealogy of Christ is reckoned (Matt. i. 1, &c.). 1. Nothing is left upon record concerning those of this line but their names and ages, the Holy Ghost seeming to hasten through them to the story of Abram. How little do we know of those that have gone before us in this world, even those that lived in the same places where we live, as we likewise know little of those that are our contemporaries in distant places! we have enough to do to mind the work of our own day, and let God alone to require that which is past, Eccl. iii. 15. 2. There was an observable gradual decrease in the years of their lives. Shem reached to 600 years, which yet fell short of the age of the patriarchs before the flood; the next three came short of 500; the next three did not reach to 300; after them we read not of any that attained to 200, except Terah; and, not many ages after this, Moses reckoned seventy, or eighty, to be the utmost men ordinarily arrive at. 3. Eber, from whom the Hebrews were denominated, was the longest-lived of any that was born after the flood, which perhaps was the reward of his singular piety and strict adherence to the ways of God.

Here begins the story of Abram, whose name is famous, henceforward, in both Testaments.

I. His country: Ur of the Chaldees. This was the land of his nativity, an idolatrous country, where even the children of Eber themselves had degenerated. Note, Those who are, through grace, heirs of the land of promise, ought to remember what was the land of their nativity, what was their corrupt and sinful state by nature, the rock out of which they were hewn.

II. His relations, mentioned for his sake, and because of their interest in the following story. 1. His father was Terah, of whom it is said (Josh. xxiv. 2) that he served other gods, on the other side of the flood, so early did idolatry gain footing in the world, and so hard is it even for those that have some good principles to swim against the stream. We have, 2. Some account of his brethren. (1) Nahor, out of whose family both Isaac and Jacob had their wives. (2) Haran, the father of Lot, of whom it is here said (v. 28) that he died before his father Terah. Note, Children cannot be sure that they shall survive their parents; for death does not go by seniority, taking the eldest first. The shadow of death is without any order, Job x. 22. It is likewise said that he died in Ur of the Chaldees, before the happy removal of the family out of that idolatrous country. 3. His wife was Sarai, who, some think, was the same with Iscah, the daughter of Haran. Abram himself says of her that she was the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother, ch. xx. 12. She was ten years younger than Abram.

III. His departure out of Ur of the Chaldees, with his father Terah, his nephew Lot, and the rest of his family, in obedience to the call of God, of which we shall read more, ch. xii. 1, &c. This chapter leaves them in Haran, or Charran, a place about midway between Ur and Canaan, where they dwelt till Terah's head was laid, probably because the old man was unable, through the infirmities of age, to proceed in his journey. Many reach to Charran, and yet fall short of Canaan; they are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither.

CHAP. XII

Henceforward Abram and his seed are almost the only subject of the sacred history. In this chapter we have, I. God's call of Abram to the land of Canaan, ver. 1–3. II. Abram's obedience to this call, ver. 4, 5. III. His welcome to the land of Canaan, ver. 6–9. IV. His journey to Egypt, with an account of what happened to him there. Abram's flight and fault, ver. 10–13. Sarai's danger and deliverance, ver. 14–20.

We have here the call by which Abram was removed out of the land of his nativity, into the land of promise, and which was designed both to try his faith and obedience and also to separate him and set him apart for God, and for special services. We may be somewhat helped to the knowledge of the circumstances of the call by Stephen's speech, Acts vii. 2, where we are told, 1. That the God of glory appeared in such displays of his glory as left Abram no room to doubt the divine authority of this call. God spoke to him afterwards in divers manners; but this first time, when the correspondence was to be settled, he appeared to him as the God of glory, and spoke to him. 2. That this call was given him in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. Some think that Haran was in Chaldea, and so was still a part of Abram's country, or that Abram, having stayed there five years, began to call it his country, and to take root there, till God let him know this was not the place he was intended for. Note, If God loves us, and has mercy in store for us, he will not suffer us to take up our rest anywhere short of Canaan, but will graciously repeat his calls, till the good work begun be performed, and our souls repose in God only. In the call itself we have a precept and a promise.

I. A trying precept: Get thee out of thy country, v. 1.

1. By this precept he was tried whether he loved his native soil and dearest friends, and whether he could willingly leave all, to go along with God. His country had become idolatrous, his kindred and his father's house were a constant temptation to him, and he could not continue with them without danger of being infected by them. This command which God gave to Abram is much the same with the gospel call by which all the spiritual seed of faithful Abram are brought into covenant with God. For, (1) Natural affection must give way to divine grace. (2) Sin, and all the occasions of it, must be forsaken, and particularly bad company; we must abandon all the idols of iniquity which have been set up in our hearts, willingly parting with that which is dearest to us, when we cannot keep it without hazard of our integrity. (3) The world, and all our enjoyments in it, must be looked upon with a holy indifference; we must no longer look upon it as our country, or home, but as our inn, and must accordingly sit loose to it, live above it, and get out of it in affection.

2. By this precept he was tried whether he could trust God further than he saw him; for he must leave his own country, to go to a land that God would show him. He does not say, "It is a land that I will give thee," but merely, "a land that I will show thee." He must follow God with an implicit faith, though he had no particular securities given him that he should be no loser by leaving his country, to follow God.

II. Here is an encouraging promise, nay, it is a complication of promises, many, and exceedingly great and precious. Note, All God's precepts are attended with promises to the obedient. If we obey the command, God will not fail to perform the promise. Here are six promises:—

1. I will make of thee a great nation. When God took him from his own people, he promised to make him the head of another; he cut him off from being the branch of a wild olive, to make him the root of a good olive. This promise was, (1) A great relief to Abram's burden; for he had now no child. Note, God knows how to suit his favours to the wants and necessities of his children. He that has a plaster for every sore will first provide one for that which is most painful. (2) A great trial to Abram's faith; for his wife had been long barren.

2. I will bless thee. Leave thy father's house, and I will give thee a father's blessing.

3. I will make thy name great. By deserting his country, he lost his name there. Having no child, he feared he should have no name; but God will make him a great nation, and so make him a great name.

4. Thou shalt be a blessing; that is, (1) "Thy happiness shall be a sample of happiness, so that those who would bless their friends shall only pray that God would make them like Abram"; as Ruth iv. 11. (2) "Thy life shall be a blessing to the places where thou shalt sojourn."

5. I will bless those that bless thee and curse him that curseth thee. This made it a kind of a league, offensive and defensive, between God and Abram.

6. In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed. This was the promise that crowned all the rest; for it points to the Messiah, in whom all the promises are yea and amen. Note, (1) Jesus Christ is the great blessing of the world, the greatest that ever the world was blessed with. He is a family blessing, by him salvation is brought to the house (Luke xix. 9).

I. Abram's removal out of his country, out of Ur first and afterwards out of Haran, in compliance with the call of God. He went out, not knowing whither he went (Heb. xi. 8), but knowing whom he followed.

II. His age when he removed: he was seventy-five years old, an age when he should rather have had rest and settlement; but, if God will have him to begin the world again now in his old age, he will submit. Here is an instance of an old convert.

III. The company and cargo that he took with him.

1. He took his wife, and his nephew Lot, with him. Note, It is very comfortable when husband and wife agree to go together in the way to heaven. Lot also, his kinsman, was influenced by Abram's good example, who was perhaps his guardian after the death of his father, and he was willing to go along with him too.

2. They took all their effects with them—all their substance and movable goods, that they had gathered. To have thrown away his substance, because God had promised to bless him, would have been to tempt God, not to trust him.

IV. Here is their happy arrival at their journey's end: They went forth to go into the land of Canaan; so they did before (ch. xi. 31), and then took up short, but now they held on their way, and, by the good hand of their God upon them, to the land of Canaan they came, where by a fresh revelation they were told that this was the land God promised to show them.

One would have expected that Abram having had such an extraordinary call to Canaan some great event should have followed upon his arrival there.

Little notice is taken of him for God will have him to live by faith.

I. How little comfort he had in the land he came to; for, 1. He had it not to himself: He found the country peopled and possessed by Canaanites, who were likely to be but bad neighbours and worse landlords. 2. He had not a settlement in it. All good people must look upon themselves as strangers and sojourners in this world, and by faith sit loose to it as a strange country. We must be journeying, and going on still from strength to strength, as having not yet attained.

II. How much comfort he had in the God he followed.

1. God spoke to him good words and comfortable words: Unto thy seed will I give this land. Enemies may part us and our tents, us and our altars, but not us and our God. Mercies to the children are mercies to the parents. "I will give it, not to thee, but to thy seed"; it is a grant in reversion to his seed, which Abram understood also as a grant to himself, for he looked for a heavenly country, Heb. xi. 16.

2. Abram built an altar unto the Lord who appeared to him, and called on the name of the Lord, v. 7, 8. Thus he returned God's visit, and kept up his correspondence with heaven, as one that resolved it should not fail on his side. Wherever he had a tent God had an altar, and that an altar sanctified by prayer. The souls he had gotten in Haran, being discipled, must be further taught. The way of family worship is a good old way, is no novel invention, but the ancient usage of all the saints. Wherever we go, let us not fail to take our religion along with us.

Here is, I. A famine in the land of Canaan, a grievous famine, and a very sore trial it was; it tried what he would think. Nothing short of a strong faith could keep up good thoughts of God under such a providence. Now he was tried whether he could preserve an unshaken confidence that the God who brought him to Canaan would maintain him there, and whether he could rejoice in him as the God of his salvation when the fig-tree did not blossom, Hab. iii. 17, 18. It is possible for a man to be in the way of duty, and in the way to happiness, and yet meet with great troubles and disappointments.

II. Abram's removal into Egypt, upon occasion of this famine. See how wisely God provides that there should be plenty in one place when there was scarcity in another. We must not expect needless miracles. When he must, for a time, quit Canaan, he chooses to go to Egypt, which lay south-west, the contrary way, that he might not so much as seem to look back. See Heb. xi. 15, 16.

III. A great fault which Abram was guilty of, in denying his wife, and pretending that she was his sister. The scripture is impartial in relating the misdeeds of the most celebrated saints, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition, that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall. 2. That which was at the bottom of it was a jealous timorous fancy he had that some of the Egyptians would be so charmed with the beauty of Sarai that, if they should know he was her husband, they would find some way or other to take him off, that they might marry her. The grace Abram was most eminent for was faith; and yet he thus fell through unbelief and distrust of the divine Providence, even after God had appeared to him twice. Alas ! what will become of the willows, when the cedars are thus shaken ?

Here is, I. The danger Sarai was in of having her chastity violated by the king of Egypt. They recommended her to the king, and she was presently taken into Pharaoh's house, as Esther into the seraglio of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 8), in order to her being taken into his bed.

II. The deliverance of Sarai from this danger. For if God did not deliver us we should soon be ruined. He deals not with us according to our deserts.

1. God chastised Pharaoh, and so prevented the progress of his sin. Those are happy chastisements that hinder us in a sinful way, and effectually bring us to our duty.

2. Pharaoh reproved Abram, and then dismissed him with respect.

(1) The reproof was calm, but very just: What is this that thou hast done ? Pharaoh reasons with him: Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife ? intimating that, if he had known this, he would not have taken her into his house. We have often found more of virtue, honour, and conscience, in some people than we thought they possessed; and it ought to be a pleasure to us to be thus disappointed, as Abram was here, who found Pharaoh to be a better man than he expected. Charity teaches us to hope the best.

(2) The dismission was kind and very generous. He restored him his wife without offering any injury to her honour. Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him. He appointed them, when Abram was disposed to return home, after the famine, to conduct him safely out of the country, as his convoy.

Observe a resemblance between this deliverance of Abram out of Egypt and the deliverance of his seed thence: 430 years after Abram went into Egypt on occasion of a famine they went thither on occasion of a famine also; he was fetched out with great plagues on Pharaoh, so were they. For God's care of his people is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

CHAP. XIII

In this chapter we have a further account concerning Abram. I. In general, of his condition and behaviour in the land of promise. 1. His removes, ver. 1, 3, 4, 18. 2. His riches, ver. 2. 3. His devotion, ver. 4, 18. II. A particular account of a quarrel that happened between him and Lot. 1. The unhappy occasion of their strife, ver. 5, 6. III. The making up of the quarrel, by the prudence of Abram, ver. 8, 9. IV. Lot's departure from Abram to the plain of Sodom, ver. 10–13. V. God's appearance to Abram, to confirm the promise of the land of Canaan to him, ver. 14, &c.

1. Abram's return out of Egypt, v. 1. He came himself and brought all his with him back again to Canaan.

II. His wealth: He was very rich, v. 2. He was very heavy, so the Hebrew word signifies; for riches are a burden. There is a burden of care in getting them, fear in keeping them, temptation in using them, guilt in abusing them, sorrow in losing them, and a burden of account, at last, to be given up concerning them. God, in his providence, sometimes makes good men rich men, and teaches them how to abound, as well as how to suffer want. Though it is hard for a rich man to get to heaven, yet it is not impossible, Mark x. 23, 24. Outward prosperity, if well managed, furnishes an opportunity of doing so much the more good.

III. His removal to Beth-el, v. 3, 4. Thither he went, not only because there he had formerly had his tent, but because there he had formerly had his altar. Long afterwards God sent Jacob to this same place on that errand (ch. xxxv. 1). We have need to be reminded of our solemn vows; and perhaps the place where they were made may help to bring them afresh to mind, and it may therefore do us good to visit it.

IV. His devotion there. His altar was gone, so that he could not offer sacrifice; but he called on the name of the Lord, as he had done, ch. xii. 8. Abram did not leave his religion behind him in Egypt, as many do in their travels.

An unhappy falling out between Abram and Lot, who had hitherto been inseparable companions.

I. The occasion of their quarrel was their riches. Riches are often an occasion of strife and contention. Poverty and travail, wants and wanderings, could not separate between Abram and Lot; but riches did. Friends are soon lost; but God is a friend from whose love neither the height of prosperity nor the depth of adversity shall separate us.

II. The strife began between the herdsmen of Abram's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle, v. 7. They strove which should have the better pasture or the better water.

III. The aggravation of the quarrel was that the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land; this made the quarrel, 1. Very dangerous. 2. Very scandalous. The quarrels of professors are the reproach of profession, and give occasion, as much as anything, to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme.

IV. The making up of this quarrel was very happy. It is best to preserve the peace, that it be not broken; but the next best is, if differences do happen, with all speed to accommodate them. The motion for staying this strife was made by Abram.

1. His petition for peace was very affectionate: Let there be no strife, I pray thee. Abram knew how to turn away wrath with a soft answer; he made the first overture of reconciliation. The people of God should always approve themselves a peaceable people; whatever others are for, they must be for peace.

2. His plea for peace was very cogent. (1) "Let there be no strife between me and thee. Let the Canaanites and Perizzites contend about trifles; but let not thee and me fall out, who know better things, and look for a better country." The remembrance of old friendships should quickly put an end to new quarrels which at any time happen. (2) Let it be remembered that we are brethren. We are rational creatures, and should be ruled by reason. We are men, and not brutes, men, and not children. We are brethren. Men of the same nature, of the same kindred and family, of the same religion, companions in obedience, companions in patience.

3. His proposal for peace was very fair. "Why should we quarrel for room, while there is room enough for us both?" He offers him a sufficient share of the land they were in. He gives him his choice, and offers to take up with his leavings: If thou wilt take the left hand, I will go to the right. There was all the reason in the world that Abram should choose first; yet he recedes from his right. It is a noble conquest to be willing to yield for the sake of peace; it is the conquest of ourselves, and our own pride and passion, Matt. v.

The choice that Lot made when he parted from Abram. Abram having offered him the choice, without compliment he accepted it, and made his election. Passion and selfishness make men rude.

I. How much he had an eye to the goodness of the land. He beheld all the plain of Jordan, the flat country in which Sodom stood, that it was admirably well watered everywhere. It would yield him a comfortable settlement, and in such a fruitful soil he should certainly thrive, and grow very rich: and this was all he looked at. But what came of it? Why, the next news we hear of him is that he is in the briars among them, he and his carried captive. At last, God fired the town over his head, and forced him to the mountain for safety who chose the plain for wealth and pleasure. Sensual choices are sinful choices, and seldom speed well. In all our choices this principle should overrule us, That that is best for us which is best for our souls.

II. But the men of Sodom were wicked, v. 13. Some sinners are the worse for living in a good land. So the Sodomites were. Filthy Sodomites dwell in a city, in a fruitful plain, while faithful Abram and his pious family dwell in tents upon the barren mountains. Now Lot's coming to dwell among the Sodomites may be considered a great mercy to them, and a likely means of bringing them to repentance; for now they had a prophet among them and a preacher of righteousness, and, if they had hearkened to him, they might have been reformed, and the ruin prevented.

An account of a gracious visit which God paid to Abram, to confirm the promise to him and his.

I. When it was that God renewed and ratified the promise: 1. After the quarrel was over. 2. After Abram's humble self-denying condescensions to Lot for the preserving of peace. 3. After he had lost the comfortable society of his kinsman, and his heart was saddened, then God came to him with these good words and comfortable words. Lot perhaps had the better land, yet Abram had the better title. Lot had the paradise, such as it was, but Abram had the promise.

II. The promises themselves with which God now comforted and enriched Abram. Two things he assures him of—a good land, and a numerous issue to enjoy it.

1. Here is the grant of a good land, a land famous above all lands, for it was to be the holy land, and Immanuel's land. Note, That which God has to show is infinitely better and more desirable than anything that the world has to offer to our view. He secures this land to him and his seed for ever (v. 15).

2. Here is the promise of a numerous issue to replenish this good land, so that it should never be lost for want of heirs (v. 16). The same God that provides the inheritance provides the heirs.

We are told what Abram did when God had thus confirmed the promise to him, v. 18. 1. He removed his tent. In compliance with God's will herein, he removes his tent, conforming himself to the condition of a pilgrim. 2. He built there an altar, in token of his thankfulness to God.

CHAP. XIV

We have four things in the story of this chapter. I. A war with the king of Sodom and his allies, ver. 1–11. II. The captivity of Lot in that war, ver. 12. III. Abram's rescue of Lot from that captivity, ver. 13–16. IV. Abram's return from the expedition (ver. 17). Here we have that promise to Abram in part fulfilled, that God would make his name great.

An account of the first war that ever we read of in scripture.

I. The parties engaged in it. The invaders were four kings, two of them no less than kings of Shinar and Elam (that is, Chaldea and Persia). The invaded were the kings of five cities that lay near together in the plain of Jordan, namely, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar.

II. The occasion of this war was the revolt of the five kings from under the government of Chedorlaomer. Twelve years they served him. Small joy they had of their fruitful land, while thus they were tributaries to a foreign power, and could not call what they had their own. In the thirteenth year, beginning to be weary of their subjection, they rebelled, denied their tribute, and attempted to shake off the yoke and retrieve their ancient liberties. In the fourteenth year, after some pause and preparation, Chedorlaomer, in conjunction with his allies, set himself to chastise and reduce the rebels.

III. The progress and success of the war. The four kings laid the neighbouring countries waste and enriched themselves with the spoil of them (v. 5–7). 1. The forces of the king of Sodom and his allies were routed. 2. The cities were plundered, v. 11. 3. Lot was carried captive, v. 12. They took Lot among the rest, and his goods. Many an honest man fares the worse for his wicked neighbours. It is therefore our wisdom to separate ourselves and so deliver ourselves, Rev. xviii. 4. Note, When we go out of the way of our duty we put ourselves from under God's protection, and cannot expect that the choices which are made by our lusts should issue to our comfort.

We have here an account of the only military action we ever find Abram engaged in, and this he was prompted to, not by his avarice or ambition, but purely by a principle of charity; it was not to enrich himself, but to help his friend.

I. The tidings brought him of his kinsman's distress. 1. He is here called Abram the Hebrew, that is, the son and follower of Heber, in whose family the profession of the true religion was kept up in that degenerate age. 2. The tidings were brought by one that had escaped with his life for a prey.

II. The preparations he made for this expedition. This shows that Abram was, 1. A great man, who had so many servants depending upon him. 2. A good man, who not only served God himself, but instructed all about him in the service of God. 3. A wise man, for, though he was a man of peace, yet he disciplined his servants for war. Though our holy religion teaches us to be for peace, yet it does not forbid us to provide for war.

III. His allies and confederates in this expedition. He prevailed with his neighbours, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, to go along with him. Those who depend on God's help, yet, in times of distress, ought to make use of men's help, as Providence offers it; else they tempt God.

IV. His courage and conduct were very remarkable. 1. There was a great deal of bravery in the enterprise itself, considering the disadvantages he lay under. What could one family of husbandmen and shepherds do against the armies of four princes, who now came fresh from blood and victory? Religion tends to make men, not cowardly, but truly valiant. The true Christian is the true hero. 2. There was a great deal of policy in the management of it. Note, Honest policy is a good friend both to our safety and to our usefulness. The serpent's head (provided it be nothing akin to the old serpent) may well become a good Christian's body, especially if it have a dove's eye in it, Matt. x. 16.

V. His success was very considerable, v. 15, 16. He defeated his enemies, and rescued his friends; and we do not find that he sustained any loss.

1. He rescued his kinsman; twice here he is called his brother Lot. The remembrance of the relation that was between them, both by nature and grace, made him forget the little quarrel that had been between them. Note, (1) We ought to be ready, whenever it is in the power of our hands, to succour and relieve those that are in distress. (2) Though others have been wanting in their duty to us, yet we must not therefore deny our duty to them. Some have said that they can more easily forgive their enemies than their friends; but we shall see ourselves obliged to forgive both.

2. He rescued the rest of the captives, for Lot's sake, though they were strangers to him and such as he was under no obligation to at all. Note, As we have opportunity we must do good to all men.

This paragraph begins with the mention of the respect which the king of Sodom paid to Abram, but, before a particular account is given of this, the story of Melchizedek is briefly related.

I. Who he was. He was king of Salem and priest of the most high God; and other glorious things are said of him, Heb. vii. 1, &c. 1. Rabbinical writers conclude that Melchizedek was Shem the son of Noah. But why should his name be changed? And how came he to settle in Canaan? 2. Many Christian writers have thought that this was an appearance of the Son of God himself. He appeared to him as a righteous king, owning a righteous cause, and giving peace. It is difficult to imagine that any mere man should be said to be without father, without mother, and without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, Heb. vii. 3. 3. The most commonly received opinion is that Melchizedek was a Canaanitish prince, that reigned in Salem, and kept up the true religion there; but, if so, why should his name occur here only in all the story of Abram? The Arabic Catena gives this account of Melchizedek, That he was the son of Heraclim, the son of Peleg, the son of Eber, and that his mother's name was Salathiel, the daughter of Gomer, the son of Japheth, the son of Noah.

II. What he did. 1. He brought forth bread and wine, for the refreshment of Abram and his soldiers, and in congratulation of their victory. This he did as a king. 2. As priest of the most high God, he blessed Abram, which we may suppose a greater refreshment to Abram than his bread and wine were. Thus God, having raised up his Son Jesus, has sent him to bless us, as one having authority; and those whom he blesses are blessed indeed.

III. What he said, v. 19, 20. Two things were said by him:—1. He blessed Abram from God. Observe the titles he here gives to God, which are very glorious. (1) The most high God. (2) Possessor of heaven and earth, that is, rightful owner, and sovereign Lord, of all the creatures, because he made them. 2. He blessed God for Abram (v. 20): and blessed be the most high God.

IV. What was done to him: Abram gave him tithes of all, that is, of the spoils, Heb. vii. 4. This may be looked upon, 1. As a gratuity presented to Melchizedek, by way of return for his tokens of respect. 2. As an offering vowed and dedicated to the most high God, and therefore put into the hands of Melchizedek his priest. (1) When we have received some signal mercy from God, it is very fit that we should express our thankfulness by some special act of pious charity. (2) That the tenth of our increase is a very fit proportion to be set apart for the honour of God and the service of his sanctuary. (3) That Jesus Christ, our great Melchizedek, is to have homage done him, and to be humbly acknowledged by every one of us as our king and priest; and not only the tithe of all, but all we have, must be surrendered and given up to him.

We have here an account of what passed between Abram and the king of Sodom.

I. The king of Sodom's grateful offer to Abram (v. 21): Give me the soul, and take thou the substance; so the Hebrew reads it. Here he fairly begs the persons, but as freely bestows the goods on Abram.

II. Abram's generous refusal of this offer. He not only resigned the persons to him, but he restored all the goods too. He would not take from a thread to a shoe-latchet. What are all the ornaments and delights of sense to one that has God and heaven ever in his eye?

1. Abram ratifies this resolution with a solemn oath. The ceremony used in this oath: I have lifted up my hand. In religious swearing we appeal to God's knowledge of our truth and sincerity and imprecate his wrath if we swear falsely, and the lifting up of the hand is very significant and expressive of both.

2. He backs his refusal with a good reason: Lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich, which would reflect reproach, (1) Upon the promise and covenant of God. And, (2) Upon the piety and charity of Abram. The people of God must, for their credit's sake, take heed of doing anything that looks mean or mercenary, or that savours of covetousness and self-seeking.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter we have a solemn treaty between God and Abram concerning a covenant that was to be established between them. In the former chapter we had Abram in the field with kings; here we find him in the mount with God; and, though there he looked great, yet, methinks, here he looks much greater. The covenant to be settled between God and Abram was a covenant of promises; accordingly, here is, I. A general assurance of God's kindness and good-will to Abram, ver. 1. II. A particular declaration of the purposes of his love concerning him, in two things:—1. That he would give him a numerous issue, ver. 2–6. 2. That he would give him Canaan for an inheritance, ver. 7–21. The promised seed and the promised land, comforts indeed to this great believer, were both typical of those two invaluable blessings, Christ and heaven.

The time when God made this treaty with Abram. 1. After that famous act of generous charity which Abram had done, in rescuing his friends and neighbours out of distress, and that, not for price nor reward. 2. After that victory which he had obtained over four kings.

II. The manner in which God conversed with Abram: which supposes Abram awake, and some visible appearance of the Shechinah, or some sensible token of the presence of the divine glory.

III. The gracious assurance God gave him of his favour to him.

1. He called him by name—Abram. God's good word does us good when it is spoken by his Spirit to us in particular. The word says, Ho, every one (Isa. lv. 1), the Spirit says, Ho, such a one.

2. He cautioned him against being disquieted and confounded: Fear not, Abram. Let the sinners in Sion be afraid, but fear not, Abram.

3. He assured him of safety and happiness, that he should for ever be, (1) As safe as God himself could keep him. Not only the God of Israel, but a God to Israel. (2) As happy as God himself could make him: I will be thy exceedingly great reward; not only thy rewarder, but thy reward. Abram had generously refused the rewards which the king of Sodom offered him.

The assurance given to Abram of a numerous offspring which should descend from him.

I. Abram's repeated complaint, v. 2, 3. This was that which gave occasion to this promise. The great affliction that sat heavy upon Abram was the want of a child. Though we must never complain of God, yet we have leave to complain to him, and it is some ease to a burdened spirit to open its case to a faithful and compassionate friend: such a friend God is. Now his complaint is four-fold:—1. That he had no child (v. 3). 2. That he was never likely to have any, intimated in that, I go, or "I am going, childless, going into years, going down the hill apace." 3. That his servants were for the present and were likely to be to him instead of sons. 4. That the want of a son was so great a trouble to him that it took away the comfort of all his enjoyments: "All is nothing to me, if I have not a son." But, If we suppose that Abram, herein, had an eye to the promised seed, the importunity of his desire was very commendable: all was nothing to him, if he had not an assurance of his relation to the Messiah, of which God had already encouraged him to maintain the expectation. "This, and the other, I have; but what will all this avail me, if I go Christless?"

II. God's gracious answer to this complaint. 1. God gave him an express promise of a son, v. 4. This that is born in thy house shall not be thy heir, as thou fearest, but one that shall come forth out of thy own bowels shall be thy heir. 2. To affect him the more with this promise, he took him out, and showed him the stars, and then tells him, So shall thy seed be, v. 5. (1) So numerous; the stars seem innumerable to a common eye: Abram feared he should have no child at all. (2) So illustrious, resembling the stars in splendour. Abram's seed, according to his flesh, were like the dust of the earth (ch. xiii. 16), but his spiritual seed are like the stars of heaven, not only numerous, but glorious, and very precious.

III. Abram's firm belief of the promise God now made him, and God's favourable acceptance of his faith, v. 6. See how the apostle magnifies this faith of Abram, and makes it a standing example, Rom. iv. 19–21. God counted it to him for righteousness; that is, upon the score of this he was accepted of God, and, as the rest of the patriarchs, by faith he obtained witness that he was righteous, Heb. xi. 4. This is urged in the New Testament to prove that we are justified by faith without the works of the law (Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iii. 6). All believers are justified as Abram was, and it was his faith that was counted to him for righteousness.

The assurance given to Abram of the land of Canaan for an inheritance.

I. God declares his purpose concerning it, v. 7. Those that are sure of an interest in the promised seed will see no reason to doubt of a title to the promised land. If Christ is ours, heaven is ours. When he believed the former promise (v. 6) then God explained and ratified this to him. Three things God here reminds Abram of, for his encouragement concerning the promise of this good land:—

1. What God is in himself: I am the Lord Jehovah. "I can give it to thee, whatever opposition may be made, though by the sons of Anak." God never promises more than he is able to perform, as men often do.

2. What he had done for Abram. He had brought him out of Ur of the Chaldees. The Jewish writers have a tradition that Abram was cast into a fiery furnace for refusing to worship idols, and was miraculously delivered. A foundation mercy, the beginning of mercy, peculiar mercy to Abram, and therefore a pledge and earnest of further mercy, Isa. lxvi. 9.

3. What he intended to do yet further for him: "I brought thee hither, on purpose to give thee this land to inherit it, not only to possess it, but to possess it as an inheritance, which is the sweetest and surest title." The great thing God designs in all his dealings with his people is to bring them safely to heaven.

II. Abram desires a sign: Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?, v. 8. 1. For the strengthening and confirming of his own faith; he believed (v. 6), but here he prays, Lord, help me against my unbelief. Now he believed, but he desired a sign to be treasured up against an hour of temptation. 2. For the ratifying of the promise to his posterity, that they also might be brought to believe it.

III. God directs Abram to make preparations for a sacrifice, intending by that to give him a sign, and Abram makes preparation accordingly (v. 9–11). Those that would receive the assurances of God's favour, and would have their faith confirmed, must attend instituted ordinances, and expect to meet with God in them. Abram took as God appointed him, though as yet he knew not how these things should become a sign to him. This was not the first instance of Abram's implicit obedience. He divided the beasts in the midst, according to the ceremony used in confirming covenants, Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19, where it is said, They cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts. While God's appearing to own his sacrifice was deferred, Abram continued waiting, and his expectations were raised by the delay; when the fowls came down upon the carcases to prey upon them, Abram drove them away (v. 11). When vain thoughts, like these fowls, come down upon our sacrifices, we must drive them away, and attend on God without distraction.

A full and particular discovery made to Abram of God's purposes concerning his seed.

I. The time when God came to him with this discovery: When the sun was going down, or declining, about the time of the evening oblation. God often keeps his people long in expectation of the comforts he designs them, for the confirmation of their faith; but though the answers of prayer, and the performance of promises, come slowly, yet they come surely.

II. The preparatives for this discovery. 1. A deep sleep fell upon Abram, not a common sleep through weariness or carelessness, but a divine ecstasy. The doors of the body were locked up, that the soul might be private and retired, and might act the more freely. 2. With this sleep, a horror of great darkness fell upon him. This great darkness, which brought horror with it, was designed, (1) To strike an awe upon the spirit of Abram, and to possess him with an holy reverence. Holy fear prepares the soul for holy joy; the spirit of bondage makes way for the spirit of adoption. (2) To be a specimen of the methods of God's dealings with his seed. They must first be in the horror and darkness of Egyptian slavery, and then enter with joy into the good land.

III. The prediction itself. Several things are here foretold.

1. The suffering state of Abram's seed for a long time, v. 13. He must know that the promised seed should be a persecuted seed. Now we have here,

(1) The particulars of their sufferings. [1] They shall be strangers. Thus the heirs of heaven are first strangers on earth. [2] They shall be servants. The Canaanites serve under a curse, the Hebrews under a blessing. [3] They shall be sufferers. Those whom they serve shall afflict them; see Exod. i. 11.

(2) The continuance of their sufferings—four hundred years. This was a long time, but a limited time.

2. The judgment of the enemies of Abram's seed: That nation whom they shall serve, even the Egyptians, will I judge, v. 14. Though God may suffer persecutors and oppressors to trample upon his people a great while, yet he will certainly reckon with them at last; for his day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 12, 13.

3. The deliverance of Abram's seed out of Egypt. That great event is here foretold: afterwards shall they come out with great substance. It is here promised, (1) That they should be enlarged. The destruction of oppressors is the redemption of the oppressed. (2) That they should be enriched. God took care they should have, not only a good land to go to, but a good stock to carry with them.

4. Their happy settlement in Canaan, v. 16. They shall not only come out of Egypt, but they shall come hither again, hither to the land of Canaan, wherein thou now art.

5. Abram's peaceful quiet death and burial, before these things should come to pass, v. 15. Note, Good men are sometimes greatly favoured by being taken away from the evil to come, Isa. lvii. 1. Let this satisfy Abram, that, for his part,

(1) He shall go to his fathers in peace. Note, [1] Even the friends and favourites of Heaven are not exempted from the stroke of death. [2] Good men die willingly; they are not fetched, they are not forced, but they go. [3] At death we go to our fathers, godly fathers that have gone before us to the state of the blessed, Heb. xii. 23. Outward peace, to the last, is promised to Abram, peace and truth in his days, whatever should come afterwards (2 Kings xx. 19); peace with God, and everlasting peace, are sure to all the seed.

(2) He shall be buried in a good old age. He shall not only die in peace, but die in honour. Old age is a blessing, a great opportunity for usefulness.

The covenant ratified (v. 17); the sign which Abram desired was given.

1. The smoking furnace signified the affliction of his seed in Egypt.

2. The burning lamp denotes comfort in this affliction; and this God showed to Abram, at the same time that he showed him the smoking furnace. (1) Light denotes deliverance out of the furnace. (2) The lamp denotes direction in the smoke. God's word was their lamp: this word to Abram was so, it was a light shining in a dark place. (3) The burning lamp denotes the destruction of their enemies who kept them so long in the furnace.

3. The passing of these between the pieces was the confirming of the covenant God now made with him. It is probable that the furnace and lamp, which passed between the pieces, burnt and consumed them, and so completed the sacrifice, and testified God's acceptance of it, as of Gideon's (Judges vi. 21). 1. So it intimates, (1) That God's covenants with man are made by sacrifice (Ps. l. 5), by Christ, the great sacrifice: no agreement without atonement. (2) God's acceptance of our spiritual sacrifices is an earnest of further favours.

II. The covenant repeated and explained: Unto thy seed have I given this land, v. 18. Here is,

1. A rehearsal of the grant. God's promises are God's gifts, and are so to be accounted. The possession is as sure, in due time, as if it were now actually delivered to them. What God has promised is as sure as if it were already done; hence, it is said, He that believes hath everlasting life (John iii. 36), for he shall as surely go to heaven as if he were there already.

2. A recital of the particulars granted, such as is usual in the grants of lands. The land granted is here described in its utmost extent because it was to be a type of the heavenly inheritance, where there is room enough: in our father's house are many mansions.

CHAP. XVI

Hagar is the person mostly concerned in the story of this chapter, an obscure Egyptian woman. Probably she was one of those maid-servants whom the king of Egypt bestowed upon Abram, ch. xii. 16. Concerning her, we have four things in this chapter:—

I. Her marriage to Abram her master, ver. 1–3. II. Her misbehaviour towards Sarai her mistress, ver. 4–6. III. Her discourse with an angel that met her in her flight, ver. 7–14. IV. Her delivery of a son, ver. 15, 16.

We have here the marriage of Abram to Hagar, who was his secondary wife. It seems to have proceeded from an irregular desire to build up families for the speedier peopling of the world and the church. Certainly it must not be so now. Christ has reduced this matter to the first institution, and makes the marriage uinon to be between one man and one woman only.

I. The maker of this match was Sarai herself. It is the policy of Satan to tempt us by our nearest and dearest relations. It would have been much more for Sarai's interest if Abram had kept to the rule of God's law instead of being guided by her foolish projects.

II. The inducement to it was Sarai's barrenness. She used this as an argument with Abram to marry his maid; and he was prevailed upon by this argument to do it.

Abram's compliance with Sarai's proposal, we have reason to think, was from an earnest desire of the promised seed, on whom the covenant should be entailed. God had told him that his heir should be a son of his body, but had not yet told him that it should be a son by Sarai; therefore he thought, "Why not by Hagar, since Sarai herself proposed it?" Fleshly wisdom, as it anticipates God's time of mercy, so it puts us out of God's way. This would be happily prevented if we would ask counsel of God by the word and by prayer, before we attempt that which is important and suspicious.

The immediate bad consequences of Abram's unhappy marriage to Hagar. A great deal of mischief it made quickly. When we do not well both sin and trouble lie at the door. See it in this story.

I. Sarai is despised, and thereby provoked and put into a passion, v. 4. Hagar thinks herself a better woman than Sarai, more favoured by Heaven, and likely to be better beloved by Abram, and therefore she will not submit as she has done. 2. We justly suffer by those whom we have sinfully indulged, and it is a righteous thing with God to make those instruments of our trouble whom we have made instruments of our sin.

II. Abram is clamoured upon, and cannot be easy while Sarai is out of humour; she unjustly charges him with the injury (v. 5). She rashly appeals to God in the case: The Lord judge between me and thee; as if Abram had refused to right her. When passion is upon the throne, reason is out of doors, and is neither heard nor spoken. 2. Those are not always in the right who are most loud and forward in appealing to God. Rash and bold imprecations are commonly evidences of guilt and a bad cause.

III Hagar is afflicted, and driven from the house, v. 6. She herself had first given the provocation, by despising her mistress.

The first mention we have in scripture of an angel's appearance.

I. How the angel arrested her in her flight, v. 7. She was making towards her own country, towards Egypt. It were well if our afflictions would make us think of our home. But Hagar was now out of the way of her duty, and going further astray. 2. God suffers those that are out of the way to wander awhile, that when they see their folly, they may be the better disposed to return. Hagar was not stopped till she was in the wilderness. God brings us into a wilderness, and there meets us, Hos. ii. 14.

II. How he examined her, v. 8. Observe,

1. He called her Hagar, Sarai's maid. Though she was Abram's wife, yet he calls her Sarai's maid, to humble her. Note, Though civility teaches us to call others by their highest titles, yet humility and wisdom teach us to call ourselves by the lowest. Sarai's maid ought to be in Sarai's tent, and not wandering in the wilderness and sauntering by a fountain of water.

2. The questions the angel put to her were proper and very pertinent. (1) "Whence comest thou?" Consider that thou art running away from duty. (2) "Whither wilt thou go? Thou art running thyself into sin, in Egypt, and into danger, in the wilderness." Note, Those who are forsaking God and their duty would do well to remember not only whence they have fallen, but whither they are falling.

3. Her answer was honest, and a fair confession: I flee from the face of my mistress.

4. How he sent her back, with suitable and compassionate counsel: "Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hand, v. 9.

We may suppose that the angel having given Hagar that good counsel (v. 9) to return to her mistress she immediately promised to do so, and was setting her face homeward; and then the angel went on to encourage her with an assurance of the mercy God had in store for her and her seed: for God will meet those with mercy that are returning to their duty. I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest, Ps. xxxii. 5.

I. A prediction concerning her posterity given her for her comfort in her present distress. Note, It is a great comfort to women with child to think that they are under the particular cognizance and care of the divine Providence. Now, 1. The angel assures her of a safe delivery, and that of a son, which Abram desired. She was saved in child-bearing, not only by providence, but by promise. 2. He names her child, which was an honour both to her and it: Call him Ishmael, God will hear; and the reason is, because the Lord has heard. Even where there is little cry of devotion, the God of pity sometimes graciously hears the cry of affliction. Tears speak as well as prayers. 3. He promises her a numerous offspring, v. 10. It is supposed that the Turks at this day descend from Ishmael; and they are a great people. He gives a character of the child she should bear. He will be a wild man; a wild ass of a man (so the word is), rude and bold, and fearing no man—untamed, untractable, living at large, and impatient of service and restraint. His hand against every man —this is his sin; and every man's hand against him— this is his punishment. Note, Those that have turbulent spirits have commonly troublesome lives. And yet, he should live in safety. Note, Many that are much exposed by their own imprudence are yet strangely preserved by the divine Providence, so much better is God to them than they deserve.

II. Hagar's pious reflection upon this gracious appearance of God to her, v. 13, 14. Observe in what she said,

1. Her awful adoration of God's omniscience and providence, with application of it to herself: Thou God seest me; this should be, with her, his name for ever. God is (as the ancients expressed it) all eye. He that sees all sees me, as David (Ps. cxxxix. 1), O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. It is a proper word for a penitent:—"Thou seest the sincerity and seriousness of my return and repentance."

2. Her humble admiration of God's favour to her: "Have I also here looked after him that seeth me?"

Probably she knew not who it was that talked with her till he was departing and then she looked after him, with a reflection like that of the two disciples, Luke xxiv. 31, 32. Not only in Abram's tent and at his altar, but here also, in this wilderness? Here, where I never expected it, where I was out of the way of my duty? Lord, how is it?" John xiv. 22.

III. The name which this gave to the place: Beer-lahai-roi, The well of him that liveth and seeth me, v. 14. This was the place where the God of glory manifested the special care he took of a poor woman in distress.

Verses 15–16

It is here taken for granted that Hagar did as the angel commanded her, returning to her mistress and then, in the fulness of time, she brought forth her son.

CHAP. XVII

This chapter contains articles of agreement covenanted and concluded upon between the Father of mercies, on the one part, and Abram, the father of the faithful, on the other part. Abram is therefore called "the friend of God," not only because he was the man of his counsel, but because he was the man of his covenant; both these secrets were with him. Mention was made of this covenant (ch. xv. 18), but here it is put into the form of a covenant. Here are, I. The circumstances of the making of this covenant, the time and manner (ver. 1), and the posture Abram was in, ver. 3. II. The covenant itself. 1. That he should be the father of many nations (ver. 4, 6), and, in token of this, his name was changed, ver. 5. 2. That God would be a God to him and his seed, and would give them the land of Canaan, ver. 7, 8. And the seal of this part of the covenant was circumcision, ver. 9–14. 3. That he should have a son by Sarai, and, in token thereof, her name was changed, ver. 15, 16. This promise Abram received, ver. 17. And his request for Ishmael (ver. 18) was answered, ver. 19–22. III. The circumcision of Abram and his family, according to God's appointment, ver. 23, &c.

Here is, I. The time when God made Abram this gracious visit: full thirteen years after the birth of Ishmael. There are some special comforts which are not the daily bread, no, not of the best saints, but they are favoured with them now and then. On this side heaven they have convenient food, but not a continual feast. So long the promise of Isaac was deferred. Perhaps to correct Abram's over-hasty marrying of Hagar.

II. The way in which God made this covenant with him: The Lord appeared to Abram, in the shechinah, some visible display of God's immediate glorious presence with him.

III. The posture Abram put himself into upon this occasion: He fell on his face while God talked with him, v. 3. 1. As one overcome by the brightness of the divine glory. 2. As one ashamed of himself, and blushing to think of the honours done to one so unworthy.

IV. The general scope and summary of the covenant laid down as the foundation on which all the rest was built; it is no other than the covenant of grace still made with all believers in Jesus Christ, v. 1.

1. What we may expect God to be to us: I am the Almighty God. By this name he chose to make himself known to Abram rather than by his name Jehovah, Exod. vi. 3. He used it to Jacob, ch. xxxv. 11. They called him by this name, ch. xxviii. 3; xliii. 14; xlviii. 3. After Moses, Jehovah is more frequently used, and this, El-shaddai, very rarely; it bespeaks the almighty power of God, either, (1) As an avenger, or, (2) As a benefactor. He is a God that is enough; or, as our old English translation reads it here very significantly, I am God all-sufficient.

2. What God requires that we should be to him. The covenant is mutual: Walk before me, and be thou perfect. Observe, (1) That to be religious is to walk before God in our integrity. It is to be inward with him, in all the duties of religious worship, for in them particularly we walk before God (1 Sam. ii. 30). I know no religion but sincerity. (2) That upright walking with God is the condition of our interest in his all-sufficiency.

The covenant of grace is a covenant of God's own making; this he glories in (as for me), and so may we.

I. It is promised to Abram that he should be a father of many nations; that is, (1) That his seed after the flesh should be very numerous. 2. That all believers in every age should be looked upon as his spiritual seed, and that he should be called, not only the friend of God, but the father of the faithful.

II. In token of this his name was changed from Abram, a high father, to Abraham, the father of a multitude. This was, 1. To put an honour upon him. 2. To encourage and confirm his faith.

Here is, I. The continuance of the covenant, intimated in three things:—1. It is established; not to be altered nor revoked. 2. It is entailed; it is a covenant, not with Abraham only but with his seed after him, not only his seed after the flesh, but his spiritual seed. 3. It is everlasting in the evangelical sense and meaning of it. The covenant of grace is everlasting.

II. The contents of the covenant: it is a covenant of promises. Here are two which indeed are all-sufficient:—1. That God would be their God, v. 7, 8. What God is himself, that he will be to his people: his wisdom theirs, to guide and counsel them; his power theirs, to protect and support them; his goodness theirs, to supply and comfort them. 2. That Canaan should be their everlasting possession, v. 8. It must be looked upon as a type of heaven's happiness, that everlasting rest which remains for the people of God, Heb. iv. 9. Canaan is here said to be the land wherein Abraham was a stranger; and the heavenly Canaan is a land to which we are strangers, for it does not yet appear what we shall be.

III. The token of the covenant, and that is circumcision, for the sake of which the covenant is itself called the covenant of circumcision, Acts vii. 8. It is called a sign and seal (Rom. iv. 11), for it was, 1. A confirmation to Abraham and his seed of those promises which were God's part of the covenant. (1) Circumcision was a bloody ordinance; for all things by the law were purged with blood, Heb. ix. 22. See Exod. xxiv. 8. But, the blood of Christ being shed, all bloody ordinances are now abolished; circumcision therefore gives way to baptism. (2) It was peculiar to the males, though the women were also included in the covenant, for the man is the head of the woman. (3) It was the flesh of the foreskin that was to be cut off, because it is by ordinary generation that sin is propagated. Christ having not yet offered himself for us, God would have man to enter into covenant by the offering of some part of his own body. It is a secret part of the body; for the true circumcision is that of the heart, 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24. (4) The ordinance was to be administered to children when they were eight days old. (5) The children of the strangers, of whom the master of the family was the true domestic owner, were to be circumcised (v. 12, 13), which looked favourably upon the Gentiles, who should in due time be brought into the family of Abraham, by faith. See Gal. iii. 14. (6) The contempt of circumcision was a contempt of the covenant; if the parents did not circumcise their children, it was at their peril, as in the case of Moses, Exod. iv. 24, 25.

I. The promise made to Abraham of a son by Sarai, for she also shall be a mother of nations, and kings of people shall be of her, v. 16. Note, 1. God reveals the purposes of his good-will to his people by degrees. God had told Abram long before that he should have a son, but never till now that he should have a son by Sarai. 2. The blessing of the Lord makes fruitful, and adds no sorrow with it, no such sorrow as was in Hagar's case. 3. Civil government and order are a great blessing to the church. It is promised, not only that people, but kings of people, should be of her; not a headless rout, but a well-modelled well-governed society.

II. The ratification of this promise was the change of Sarai's name into Sarah (v. 15). Sarai signifies my princess, as if her honour were confined to one family only. Sarah signifies a princess—namely, of multitudes.

III. Abraham's joyful, thankful, entertainment of this gracious promise, v. 17. Upon this occasion he expressed, 1. Great humility: He fell on his face. 2. Great joy: He laughed. It was a laughter of delight, not of distrust. There is the joy of faith as well as the joy of fruition. 3. Great admiration: Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old?

IV. Abraham's prayer for Ishmael: O that Ishmael might live before thee! v. 18. This he speaks, not as desiring that Ishmael might be preferred before the son he should have by Sarah; but, dreadful lest he should be abandoned and forsaken of God. Though we ought not to prescribe to God, yet he gives us leave, in prayer, to be humbly free with him, and particular in making known our requests, Phil. iv. 6. It is the duty of parents to pray for their children, for all their children, as Job, who offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all, Job i. 5. The great thing we should desire of God for our children is that they may live before him, that is, that they may be kept in covenant with him, and may have grace to walk before him in their uprightness.

V. God's answer to his prayer; and it is an answer of peace.

1. Common blessings are secured to Ishmael (v. 20): As for Ishmael, whom thou art in so much care about, I have heard thee; he shall find favour for thy sake; I have blessed him. His posterity shall be numerous: I will multiply him exceedingly, more than his neighbours. They shall be considerable: Twelve princes shall he beget.

2. Covenant blessings are reserved for Isaac, and appropriated to him, v. 19, 21. (1) God repeats to him the promise of a son by Sarah. (2) He names that child—calls him Isaac, laughter, because Abraham rejoiced in spirit when this son was promised him. God's mercies promised shall in due time be our exceeding joy. Christ will be laughter to those that look for him. (3) He entails the covenant upon that child.

We have here Abraham's obedience to the law of circumcision. He himself and all his family were circumcised, so receiving the token of the covenant and distinguishing themselves from other families, that had no part nor lot in the matter. 1. It was an implicit obedience. 2. It was a speedy obedience: In the self-same day, v. 23, 26. Sincere obedience is not dilatory, Ps. cxix. 60. 3. It was a universal obedience: He did not circumcise his family and excuse himself, but set them an example. Ishmael is blessed, and therefore circumcised.

CHAP. XVIII

We have an account in this chapter of another interview between God and Abraham. Here is, I. The kind visit which God made him. II. The matters discoursed of between them. 1. The purposes of God's love concerning Sarah, ver. 9–15. 2. The purposes of God's wrath concerning Sodom. (1) The discovery God made to Abraham of his design to destroy Sodom, ver. 16–22. (2) The intercession Abraham made for Sodom, ver. 23, &c.

This appearance of God to Abraham seems to have had in it freedom and familiarity, and therefore resembles that great visit when the Word would be made flesh, and appear as one of us.

I. How Abraham expected strangers, and how richly his expectations were answered (v. 1). God graciously visits those in whom he has first raised the expectation of him. Those that have been forward to entertain strangers have entertained angels, to their unspeakable honour and satisfaction. Where we see no cause to suspect ill, charity teaches us to hope well and to show kindness accordingly. It is better to feed five drones, or wasps, than to starve one bee.

II. How Abraham entertained those strangers, and how kindly his entertainment was accepted. Forgetting his age and gravity, he ran to meet them in the most obliging manner, and with all due courtesy. Religion does not destroy, but improve, good manners, and teaches us to honour all men. It becomes those whom God has blessed with plenty to be liberal and open-hearted. His entertainment, though it was very free, was yet plain and homely. His dining-room was an arbour under a tree. His feast was a joint or two of veal, and some cakes baked on the hearth. Here were no dainties, but good, plain, wholesome food, though Abraham was very rich and his guests were very honourable. He and his wife were busy, in accommodating their guests with the best they had. Sarah herself is cook and baker; Abraham runs to fetch the calf, brings out the milk and butter, and thinks it not below him to wait at table. Hearty friendship will stoop to anything but sin. Christ himself has taught us to wash one another's feet, in humble love.

These heavenly guests return his kindness. He receives angels, and has angels' rewards, a gracious message from heaven, Matt. x. 41.

I. Care is taken that Sarah should be within hearing. The women did not sit at meat with men, at least not with strangers, but confined themselves to their own apartments; therefore Sarah is here out of sight: but she must not be out of hearing. Where is Sarah thy wife? say the angels. Behold, in the tent, says Abraham. "Where should she be else? There she is in her place, as she uses to be." Those are most likely to receive comfort from God and his promises that are in their place and in the way of their duty, Luke ii. 8.

II. The promise is then renewed and ratified, that she should have a son (v. 10). Note, 1. The same blessings which others have from common providence believers have from the promise, which makes them very sweet and very sure. 2. The spiritual seed of Abraham owe their life, and joy, and hope, and all, to the promise. They are born by the word of God, 1 Pet. i. 23.

III. Sarah thinks this too good news to be true, and therefore cannot as yet find her heart to believe it: Sarah laughed within herself, v. 12—a laughter of doubting and mistrust. The great objection which Sarah could not get over was her age: "I am waxed old, and past child-bearing in the course of nature." Human improbability often sets up in contradiction to the divine promise. It is hard to cleave to the first Cause, when second causes frown.

IV. The angel reproves the indecent expressions of her distrust, v. 13, 14. God gave this reproof to Sarah by Abraham her husband. To him he said, Why did Sarah laugh? Our unbelief and distrust are a great offence to the God of heaven. He justly takes it ill to have the objections of sense set up in contradiction to his promise, as Luke i. 18. Is any thing too hard for the Lord?

V. Sarah foolishly endeavours to conceal her fault (v. 15): She denied, saying, I did not laugh; she told this lie, because she was afraid. There seems to be in Sarah a retraction of her distrust. Now she perceived, by laying circumstances together, that it was a divine promise which had been made concerning her, she renounced all doubting distrustful thoughts about it. There was withal a sinful attempt to cover a sin with a lie. It is a shame to do amiss, but a greater shame to deny it.

The messengers from heaven had now despatched one part of their business, which was an errand of grace to Abraham and Sarah, but now they have before them work of another nature. Sodom is to be destroyed.

I. The honour Abraham did to his guests: He went with them to bring them on the way, as one that was loth to part with such good company, and was desirous to pay his utmost respects to them.

II. The honour they did to him; for those that honour God he will honour. God communicated to Abraham his purpose to destroy Sodom.

1. But why must Abraham be of the cabinet-council? The Jews suggest that because God had granted the land of Canaan to Abraham and his seed therefore he would not destroy those cities which were a part of that land, without his knowledge and consent. But God here gives two other reasons:—

(1) Abraham must know, for he is a friend and a favourite. Those who by faith live a life of communion with God cannot but know more of his mind than other people. They have a better insight than others into what is present (Hos. xiv. 9; Ps. cvii. 43), and a better foresight of what is to come.

(2) Abraham must know, for he will teach his household. Those that expect family blessings must make conscience of family duty. If our children be the Lord's they must be nursed for him; if they wear his livery, they must be trained up in his work. Abraham made it his care and business to promote practical religion in his family. He did not fill their heads with matters of nice speculation, or doubtful disputation; but he taught them to keep the way of the Lord, and to do judgment and justice, that is, to be serious and devout in the worship of God and to be honest in their dealings with all men. Abraham was in care that his household after him should keep the way of the Lord, that religion might flourish in his family when he was in his grave.

2. God's friendly talk with Abraham. He tells him of the evidence there was against Sodom. Some sins, and the sins of some sinners, cry aloud to heaven for vengeance. Men are apt to suggest that his way is not equal; but let them know that his judgments are the result of an eternal counsel, and are never rash or sudden resolves. Perhaps the decree is here spoken of as not yet peremptory, that room and encouragement might be given to Abraham to make intercession for them. Thus God looked to see if there were any to intercede, Isa. lix. 16.

Communion with God is kept up by the word and by prayer. In the word God speaks to us; in prayer we speak to him. God had revealed to Abraham his purposes concerning Sodom; now from this Abraham takes occasion to speak to God on Sodom's behalf. Note, God's word then does us good when it furnishes us with matter for prayer and excites us to it.

I. The solemnity of Abraham's address to God on this occasion: Abraham drew near, v. 23. The expression intimates, 1. A holy concern: He engaged his heart to approach to God, Jer. xxx. 21. 2. A holy confidence: He drew near with an assurance of faith.

II. The general scope of this prayer. It is the first solemn prayer we have upon record in the Bible; and it is a prayer for the sparing of Sodom. Though sin is to be hated, sinners are to be pitied and prayed for. God delights not in their death, nor should we desire, but deprecate, the woeful day. 1. He begins with a prayer that the righteous among them might be spared, having an eye particularly to just Lot. 2. He improves this into a petition that all might be spared for the sake of the righteous that were among them, God himself countenancing this request.

III. The particular graces eminent in this prayer.

1. Here is great faith; and it is the prayer of faith that is the prevailing prayer. (1) Note, [1] The righteous are mingled with the wicked in this world. Among the best there are, commonly, some bad, and among the worst some good: even in Sodom, one Lot. [2] Though the righteous be among the wicked, yet the righteous God will not, certainly he will not, destroy the righteous with the wicked.

(2) That the righteous shall not be as the wicked, v. 25. Though they may suffer with them, yet they do not suffer like them.

2. Here is great humility.

(1) A deep sense of his own unworthiness (v. 27): Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, who am but dust and ashes; and again, v. 31. He speaks as one amazed at his own boldness. Note, The access we have to the throne of grace, and the freedom of speech allowed us, are just matter of humble wonder, 2 Sam. vii. 18.

(2) An awful dread of God's displeasure. But he with whom we have to do is God and not man; and, however he may seem, is not really angry with the prayers of the upright (Ps. lxxx. 4), for they are his delight (Prov. xv. 8), and he is pleased when he is wrestled with.

3. Here is great charity. (1) A charitable opinion of Sodom's character: as bad as it was, he thought there were several good people in it. It becomes us to hope the best of the worst places. Of the two it is better to err in that extreme. (2) A charitable desire of Sodom's welfare: he used all his interest at the throne of grace for mercy for them.

4. Here are great boldness and believing confidence. Suppose there be fifty, v. 24. He advanced upon God's concessions, again and again.

IV. The success of the prayer. God's general good-will appears in this, that he consented to spare the wicked for the sake of the righteous. See what great blessings good people are to any place. His particular favour to Abraham appeared in this, that he did not leave off granting till Abraham left off asking. Such is the power of prayer.

CHAP. XIX

The contents of this chapter is the history of Sodom's ruin, and Lot's rescue from that ruin. We read (ch. xviii) of God's coming to take a view of the present state of Sodom. Now here we have the result of that enquiry. I. It was found, upon trial, that Lot was very good (ver. 1–3), and it did not appear that there was any more of the same character. II. It was found that the Sodomites were very wicked and vile, ver. 4–11. III. Special care was therefore taken for the securing of Lot and his family, in a place of safety, ver. 12–23. IV. Mercy having rejoiced therein, justice shows itself in the ruin of Sodom and the death of Lot's wife (ver. 24–26), with a general repetition of the story, ver. 27–29. V. A foul sin that Lot was guilty of, in committing incest with his two daughters, ver. 30, &c.

Observe here, 1. There was but one good man in Sodom, and these heavenly messengers soon found him out. 2. Lot sufficiently distinguished himself from the rest of his neighbours, at this time, which plainly set a mark upon him. He that did not act like the rest must not fare like the rest. (1) Lot sat in the gate of Sodom at even. (2) He was hospitable, and very free and generous in his invitations and entertainments. He courted these strangers to his house, and to the best accommodations he had, and gave them all the evidences that he could of his sincerity. When the angels accepted his invitation, he treated them nobly. Note, Good people should be (with prudence) generous people.

Now it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the cry of Sodom was no louder than there was cause for.

I. That they were all wicked, v. 4. Wickedness had become universal, and they were unanimous in any vile design.

II. That they had arrived at the highest pitch of wickedness; they were sinners before the Lord exceedingly (ch. xiii. 13); for, 1. It was the most unnatural and abominable wickedness that they were now set upon, a sin that still bears their name, and is called Sodomy. Those that have become impudent in sin generally prove impenitent in sin; and it will be their ruin. Those have hard hearts indeed that sin with a high hand, Jer. vi. 15. 3. When Lot interposed, with all the mildness imaginable, to check the rage and fury of their lust, they were most insolently rude and abusive to him. Being greatly disturbed at their vile attempt, he unadvisedly and unjustifiably offered to prostitute his two daughters to them, v. 8. It is true, of two evils we must choose the less; but of two sins we must choose neither, nor ever do evil that good may come of it. They threaten him, and lay violent hands upon him.

III. That nothing less than the power of an angel could save a good man out of their wicked hands. 1. They rescue Lot, v. 10. The saints, at death, are pulled like Lot into a house of perfect safety, and the door shut for ever against those that pursue them. 2. They chastise the insolence of the Sodomites: They smote them with blindness, v. 11. Yet these Sodomites, after they were struck blind, continued seeking the door, to break it down, till they were tired. No judgments will, of themselves, change the corrupt natures and purposes of wicked men. If their minds had not been blinded as well as their bodies, they would have said, as the magicians, This is the finger of God, and would have submitted.

We have here the preparation for Lot's deliverance.

I. Notice is given him of the approach of Sodom's ruin: We will destroy this place, v. 13.

II. He is directed to give notice to his friends and relations, that they, if they would, might be saved with him (v. 12). Note, Those who through grace are themselves delivered out of a sinful state should do what they can for the deliverance of others, especially their relations. 2. The offer of great favour. They ask what relations he had there, that, whether righteous or unrighteous, they might be saved with him. Note, Bad people often fare the better in this world for the sake of their good relations. It is good being akin to a godly man.

III. He applies himself accordingly to his sons-in-law, v. 14. Observe, 1. The fair warning that Lot gave them: Up, get you out of this place. 2. The slight they put upon this warning: He seemed to them as one that mocked. They thought, perhaps, that the assault which the Sodomites had just now made upon his house had disturbed his head. Those who lived a merry life, and made a jest of everything, made a jest of this warning, and so they perished in the overthrow.

Here is, I. The rescue of Lot out of Sodom, Ezek. xiv. 14. Early in the morning his own guests, in kindness to him, turned him out of doors, and his family with him, v. 15. His daughters that were married perished with their unbelieving husbands; but those that continued with him were preserved with him.

1. With what a gracious violence Lot was brought out of Sodom, v. 16. It seems he did not make so much haste as the case required. It might have been fatal to him if the angels had not laid hold of his hand, and brought him forth, and saved him with fear, Jude 23. The salvation of the most righteous men must be attributed to God's mercy, not to their own merit. We are saved by grace.

2. With what a gracious vehemence he was urged to make the best of his way, when he was brought forth, v. 17. He must not hanker after Sodom: Look not behind thee. He must not loiter by the way: Stay not in all the plain. He must not take up short of the place of refuge appointed him: Escape to the mountain. Such as these are the commands given to those who through grace are delivered out of a sinful state. (1) Return not to sin and Satan, for that is looking back to Sodom. (2) Rest not in self and the world, for that is staying in the plain. And, (3) Reach towards Christ and heaven, for that is escaping to the mountain, short of which we must not take up.

II. The fixing of a place of refuge for him. The mountain was first appointed for him to flee to, but, 1. He begged for a city of refuge, one of the five that lay together, called Bela, ch. xiv. 2, 18–20. It was Lot's weakness to think a city of his own choosing safer than the mountain of God's appointing. Could not he that saved him from greater evils save him from the less? He insists much in his petition upon the smallness of the place: It is a little one, is it not? This gave a new name to the place; it was called Zoar, a little one. 2. God granted him his request, though there was much infirmity in it, v. 21, 22. See what favour God showed to a true saint, though weak. (1) Zoar was spared, to gratify him.

III. It is taken notice of that the sun had risen when Lot entered into Zoar; for when a good man comes into a place he brings light along with him, or should do.

Then, when Lot had got safely into Zoar, then this ruin came; for good men are taken away from the evil to come. Then, when the sun had risen bright and clear, promising a fair day, then this storm arose, to show that it was not from natural causes. It was a strange punishment, Job xxxi. 3. Never was the like before nor since. It was a judgment that laid all waste: It overthrew the cities, and destroyed all the inhabitants of them, the plain, and all that grew upon the ground, v. 25. It was an utter ruin, and irreparable. That fruitful valley remains to this day a great lake, or dead sea; it is called the Salt Sea, Num. xxxiv. 12. It is about thirty miles long and ten miles broad; it has no living creature in it; it is not moved by the wind; the smell of it is offensive; things do not easily sink in it. The Greeks call it Asphaltites, from a sort of pitch which it casts up. Jordan falls into it, and is lost there. It was a punishment that answered to their sin. Those that went after strange flesh were destroyed by strange fire, Jude 7. It is often referred to in the scripture, and made a pattern of the ruin of Israel (Deut. xxix. 23), of Babylon (Isa. xiii. 19), of Edom (Jer. xlix. 18), of Moab and Ammon (Zeph. ii. 9).

This also is written for our admonition. Our Saviour refers to it (Luke xvii. 32), Remember Lot's wife. As by the example of Sodom the wicked are warned to turn from their wickedness, so by the example of Lot's wife the righteous are warned not to turn from their righteousness. See Ezek. iii. 18, 20.

I. The sin of Lot's wife: She looked back from behind him. She disobeyed an express command. Probably she hankered after her house and goods in Sodom, and was loth to leave them. Christ intimates this to be her sin (Luke xvii. 31, 32); she too much regarded her stuff. Her looking back evinced an inclination to go back; and therefore our Saviour uses it as a warning against apostasy from our Christian profession. We have all renounced the world and the flesh, and have set our faces heavenward; we are in the plain, upon our probation; and it is at our peril if we return into the interests we profess to have abandoned.

II. The punishment of Lot's wife for this sin. Though she was a monument of distinguishing mercy in her deliverance out of Sodom, yet God did not connive at her disobedience. Since it is such a dangerous thing to look back, let us always press forward, Phil. iii. 13, 14.

I. Here is Abraham's pious regard to God in this event. He got up early to look towards Sodom; and, to intimate that his design herein was to see what became of his prayers. We must direct our prayer as a letter, and then look up for an answer, direct our prayer as an arrow, and then look up to see whether it reach the mark, Ps. v. 3.

II. Here is God's favourable regard to Abraham, v. 29. As before, when Abraham prayed for Ishmael, God heard him for Isaac, so now, when he prayed for Sodom, he heard him for Lot. He remembered Abraham, and, for his sake, sent Lot out of the overthrow. Note, God will certainly give an answer of peace to the prayer of faith, in his own way and time; though, for a while, it seem to be forgotten, yet, sooner or later, it will appear to be remembered.

Here is, I. The great trouble and distress that Lot was brought into after his deliverance, v. 30. 1. He was frightened out of Zoar, durst not dwell there; probably because he found it as wicked as Sodom, and therefore concluded it could not long survive it. Note, Settlements and shelters of our own choosing, and in which we do not follow God, commonly prove uneasy to us. 2. He was forced to betake himself to the mountain, and to take up with a cave for his habitation there. Observe, (1) He was now glad to go to the mountain, the place which God had appointed for his shelter. (2) He that, awhile ago, could not find room enough for himself and his stock in the whole land, but must jostle with Abraham, and get as far from him as he could, is now confined to a hole in a hill, where he has scarcely room to turn himself, and there he is solitary and trembling.

II. The great sin that Lot and his daughters were guilty of, when they were in this desolate place. It is a sad story.

1. His daughters laid a very wicked plot to bring him to sin; and theirs was, doubtless, the greater guilt. (1) Some think that their pretence was plausible. Their father had no sons, they had no husbands, nor knew they where to have any of the holy seed, whilst if they had children by others, their father's name would not be preserved in them. But, (2) Whatever their pretence was, it is certain that their project was very wicked and vile, and an impudent affront to the very light and law of nature.

2. Lot himself, by his own folly and unwariness, was wretchedly overcome, and suffered himself so far to be imposed upon by his own children as, two nights together, to be drunk, and to commit incest, v. 33, &c. Lord, what is man! What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves! (1) The peril of security. Lot, who kept himself sober and chaste in Sodom, was yet, in the mountain, where he was alone, and as he thought quite out of the way of temptation, shamefully overtaken. Let him therefore that thinks he stands, stands high and stands firm, take heed lest he fall. No mountain, on this side the holy hill above, can set us out of the reach of Satan's fiery darts. (2) The peril of drunkenness. It is not only a great sin itself, but it is the inlet of many sins; it may prove the inlet of the worst and most unnatural sins.

3. In the close we have an account of the birth of the two sons, or grandsons (call them which you will), of Lot, Moab and Ammon, the fathers of two nations, neighbours to Israel, and which we often read of in the Old Testament; both together are called the children of Lot, Ps. lxxxiii. 8.

Lastly, Observe, that, after this, we never read any more of Lot, but from the silence of the scripture concerning him henceforward we may learn that drunkenness, as it makes men forgetful, so it makes them forgotten.

CHAP. XX

We are here returning to the story of Abraham; yet that part of it which is here recorded is not to his honour. The fairest marbles have their flaws, and, while there are spots in the sun, we must not expect anything spotless under it. The scripture, it should be remarked, is impartial in relating the blemishes even of its most celebrated characters. We have here, I. Abraham's sin in denying his wife, and Abimelech's sin thereupon in taking her, ver. 1, 2. II. God's discourse with Abimelech in a dream, upon this occasion, wherein he shows him his error (ver. 3), accepts his plea (ver. 4–6), and directs him to make restitution, ver. 7. III. Abimelech's discourse with Abraham, wherein he chides him for the cheat he had put upon him (ver. 8–10), and Abraham excuses it as well as he can, ver. 11–13. IV The good issue of the story, in which Abimelech restores Abraham his wife (ver. 14–16), and Abraham, by prayer, prevails with God for the removal of the judgment Abimelech was under, ver. 17, 18.

Here is, 1. Abraham's removal from Mamre. We are not told upon what occasion he removed. His sin in denying his wife had here a two-fold aggravation:—(1) He had been guilty of this same sin before, and had been reproved for it. Note, It is possible that a good man may, not only fall into sin, but relapse into the same sin, through the surprise and strength of temptation and the infirmity of the flesh. (2) Sarah, as it should seem, was now with child of the promised seed; he ought therefore to have taken particular care of her now, as Judg. xiii. 4.

It appears by this that God revealed himself by dreams even to those who were out of the pale of the church and covenant.

I. God gives him notice of his danger (v. 3), his danger of sin, telling him that the woman is a man's wife, so that if he take her he will wrong her husband; his danger of death for this sin: Thou art a dead man. If thou art a bad man, certainly thou art a dead man.

II. He pleads ignorance that Abraham and Sarah had agreed to impose upon him, and not to let him know that they were any more than brother and sister, v. 6. His heart condemns him not, 1 John iii. 21. If our consciences witness to our integrity, and if, however we may have been cheated into a snare, we have not knowingly and wittingly sinned against God, it will be our rejoicing in the day of evil.

III. God gives a very full answer to what he had said.

He allows his plea, and admits that what he did he did in the integrity of his heart: Yea, I know it, v. 6. Note, It is matter of comfort to those that are honest that God knows their honesty, and will acknowledge it, though perhaps men that are prejudiced against them either cannot be convinced of it or will not own that they are.

He charges him to make restitution: Now therefore, now that thou art better informed, restore the man his wife, v. 7. Note, Ignorance will excuse no longer than it continues. If we have entered upon a wrong course through ignorance this will not excuse our knowingly persisting in it. Lev. v. 3–5.

Abimelech, being thus warned of God in a dream, takes the warning, and, as one truly afraid of sin and its consequences, he rises early to obey the directions given him.

I. He has a caution for his servants, v. 8.

II. He has a chiding for Abraham.

1. The serious reproof which Abimelech gave to Abraham, v. 9, 10. His reasoning with Abraham upon this occasion was very strong, and yet very mild. Nothing could be said better; he does not reproach him, not insult over him, does not say, "Is this your profession? I see, though you will not swear, you will lie. If these be prophets, I will beg to be freed from the sight of them:" but he fairly represents the injury Abraham had done him, and calmly signifies his resentment of it. (1) He calls that sin which he now found he had been in danger of, a great sin. (2) He looks upon it that both himself and his kingdom would have been exposed to the wrath of God if he had been guilty of this sin, though ignorantly. Note, The sins of kings often prove the plagues of kingdoms: rulers should therefore, for their people's sake, dread sin. (3) He charges Abraham with doing that which was not justifiable, in disowning his marriage. (4) He takes it as a very great injury to himself and his family that Abraham had thus exposed them to sin: "What have I offended thee? If I had been thy worst enemy, thou couldst not have done me a worse turn, nor taken a more effectual course to be revenged on me." (5) He challenges him to assign a cause for his suspecting them as a dangerous people. What reason hadst thou to think that if we had known her to be thy wife thou wouldst have been exposed to any danger by it?" Note, A suspicion of our goodness is justly reckoned a greater affront than a slight upon our greatness.

2. The poor excuse that Abraham made for himself. (1) He pleaded the bad opinion he had of the place, v. 11. "Surely the fear of God is not in this place, and then they will slay me." There are many places and persons that have more of the fear of God in them than we think they have: perhaps they are not called by our dividing name, they do not wear our badges, they do not tie themselves to that which we have an opinion of; and therefore we conclude they have not the fear of God in their hearts, which is very injurious both to Christ and Christians, and makes us obnoxious to God's judgment, Matt. vii. 1. Uncharitableness and censoriousness are sins that are the cause of many other sins. Men would not do ill if they did not first think ill.

(2) He excused it from the guilt of a downright lie by making it out that, in a sense, she was his sister, v. 12. But those to whom he said, She is my sister, understood that she was so his sister as not to be capable of being his wife; so that it was an equivocation, with an intent to deceive.

(3) He clears himself from the imputation of an affront designed against Abimelech by alleging that it had been his practice before, according to an agreement between him and his wife, when they first became sojourners (v. 13).

Here is, I. The kindness which Abimelech showed to Abraham. See how unjust Abraham's jealousies were. 1. He gives him his royal licence to dwell where he pleased in his country. 2. He gives him his royal gifts. These he gave when he restored Sarah, by way of satisfacton for the wrong he had offered to do, in taking her to his house. The law appointed that when restitution was made something should be added to it. Lev. vi. 5.

II. The kindness of a prophet which Abraham showed to Abimelech: he prayed for him, v. 17, 18. God healed Miriam, when Moses, whom she had most affronted, prayed for her (Num. xii. 13), and was reconciled to Job's friends when Job, whom they had grieved, prayed for them (Job xlii. 8–10). Note, The prayers of good men may be a kindness to great men, and ought to be valued.

CHAP. XXI

In this chapter we have, I. Isaac, the child of promise born into Abraham's family, ver. 1–8. II. Ishmael, the son of the bond-woman, cast out of it, ver. 9-21. III. Abraham's league with his neighbour Abimelech, ver. 22–32. IV. His devotion to his God, ver. 33.

Few under the Old Testament were brought into the world with such expectation as Isaac was, not for the sake of any great personal eminence at which he was to arrive, but because he was to be, in this very thing, a type of Christ, that seed which the holy God had so long promised and holy men so long expected.

I. The fulfilling of God's promise in the conception and birth of Isaac, v. 1, 2. 1. Isaac was born according to the promise. He was born at the set time of which God had spoken, v. 2. Note, God is always punctual to his time; though his promised mercies come not at the time we set, they will certainly come at the time he sets, and that is the best time. 2. It was not by the power of common providence, but by the power of a special promise, that Isaac was born. Note, True believers, by virtue of God's promises, are enabled to do that which is above the power of human nature, for by them they partake of a divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4.

II. Abraham's obedience to God's precept concerning Isaac.

1. He named him, as God commanded him, v. 3. Isaac, laughter. There was good reason for the name, for, (1) When Abraham received the promise of him he laughed for joy, ch. xvii. 17. (2) When Sarah received the promise she laughed with distrust and diffidence. (3) Isaac was himself, afterwards, laughed at by Ishmael (v. 9), and perhaps his name bade him expect it. (4) The promise which he was the heir of, was to be the joy of all the saints in all ages.

III. The impressions which this mercy made upon Sarah.

1. It filled her with joy (v. 6): "God has made me to laugh; he has given me both cause to rejoice and a heart to rejoice." Thus the mother of our Lord, Luke i. 46, 47. Whatever is the matter of our joy,

God must be acknowledged as the author of it, unless it be the laughter of the fool. It adds to the comfort of any mercy to have our friends rejoice with us in it: All that hear will laugh with me; for laughing is catching. See Luke i. 58.

2. It filled her with wonder, v. 7. "The thing was so highly improbable, so near to impossible, that if anyone but God had said it we could not have believed it." Note, God's favours to his covenant-people are such as surpass both their own and others' thoughts and expectations. Who would have said that God should send his Son to die for us, his Spirit to sanctify us, his angels to attend us? Who would have said that such great sins should be pardoned?

IV. A short account of Isaac's infancy: The child grew, v. 8. He grew so as not always to need milk, but was able to bear strong meat, and then he was weaned. See Heb. v. 13, 14. Abraham made a feast on the day that he was weaned because God's blessing upon the nursing of children, and the preservation of them through the perils of the infant age, are signal instances of the care and tenderness of the divine providence. See Ps. xxii. 9, 10; Hos. xi. 1.

The casting out of Ishmael is here considered of, and resolved on.

I. Ishmael himself gave the occasion by some affronts he gave to Isaac his little brother. Sarah herself was an eye-witness of the abuse. Ishmael is here called the son of the Egyptian, because, as some think, the 400 years' affliction of the seed of Abraham by the Egyptians began now, ch. xv. 13. Ishmael was fourteen years older than Isaac; and it argued a base disposition in Ishmael to be abusive to a child that was no way a match for him.

II. Sarah made the motion: Cast out this bondwoman, v. 10. This seems to be spoken in some heat, yet it is quoted (Gal. iv. 30) as if it had been spoken by a spirit of prophecy; and it is the sentence passed on all hypocrites and carnal people, though they have a place and a name in the visible church.

III. Abraham was averse to it: The thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight, v. 11. 1. It grieved him that Ishmael had given such a provocation. 2. It grieved him that Sarah insisted upon such a punishment. "Might it not suffice to correct him? would nothing less serve than to expel him?"

IV. God determined it, v. 12, 13. The covenant seed of Abraham must be a peculiar people, a people by themselves, from the very first, distinguished, not mingled with those that were out of covenant; for this reason Ishmael must be separated. The casting out of Ishmael should not be his ruin, v. 13. He shall be a nation, because he is thy seed. It is presumption to say that all those who are left out of the external dispensation of God's covenant, are therefore excluded from all his mercies. Though he was chased out of the church, he was not chased out of the world. I will make him a nation. Note, 1. Nations are of God's making: he founds them, he forms them, he fixes them. 2. Many are full of the blessings of God's providence that are strangers to the blessings of his covenant.

Here is, I. The casting out of the bondwoman and her son from the family of Abraham, v. 14. Abraham's obedience to the divine command in this matter was speedy—early in the morning. It was also submissive; it was contrary to his own inclination, to do it; yet as soon as he perceives that it is the mind of God he makes no objections, but silently does as he is bidden.

II. Their wandering in the wilderness, missing their way to the place Abraham designed them for a settlement.

1. They were reduced to great distress there. Their provisions were spent, and Ishmael was sick. Hagar is in tears, and sufficiently mortified. She despairs of relief, counts upon nothing but the death of the child (v. 15, 16).

2. In this distress, God heard the voice of the lad, v. 17. An angel was sent to comfort Hagar, and it was not the first time that she had met with God's comforts in a wilderness (ch. xvi. 13). (1) The angel assures her God has heard the voice of the lad where he is, though he is in a wilderness (for, wherever we are, there is a way open heaven-ward); therefore lift up the lad, and hold him in thy hand, v. 18. (2) He repeats the promise concerning her son, that he should be a great nation, as a reason why she should bestir herself to help him. (3) He directs her to a present supply (v. 19): and then she saw a well of water. Note, Many that have reason enough to be comforted go mourning from day to day. There is a well of water by them in the covenant of grace, but they are not aware of it till the same God that opened their eyes to see their wound opens them to see their remedy, John xvi. 6, 7. Now the apostle tells us that those things concerning Hagar and Ishmael are ἀλληγορούμενα (Gal. iv. 24), they are to be allegorized; this then will serve to illustrate the folly, [1] Of those who, like the unbelieving Jews, seek for righteousness by the law and the carnal ordinances of it, and not by the promise made in Christ. [2] Of those who seek for satisfaction and happiness in the world and the things of it. Those that forsake the comforts of the covenant and communion with God wander endlessly in pursuit of satisfaction, and, at length, sit down short of it.

III. The settlement of Ishmael, at last, in the wilderness of Paran (v. 20, 21), a wild place, fittest for a wild man; and such a one he was, ch. xvi. 12. Observe, 1. He had some tokens of God's presence: God was with the lad. 2. By trade he was an archer. 3. He matched among his mother's relations; she took him a wife out of Egypt: as great an archer as he was, he did not think he could take his aim well, in the business of marriage, if he proceeded without his mother's advice and consent.

We have here an account of the treaty between Abimelech and Abraham. His friendship is valued, is courted, though a stranger, though a tenant at will to the Canaanites and Perizzites.

I. The league is proposed by Abimelech, and Phichol his prime-minister of state and general of his army.

1. The inducement to it was God's favour to Abraham (v. 22): "God is with thee in all that thou doest, and we cannot but take notice of it." It is good being in favour with those that are in favour with God. We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. We do well for ourselves if we have fellowship with those that have fellowship with God, 1 John i. 3.

2. The tenor of it was, in general, that there should be a firm and constant friendship between the two families. He would have his son, and his son's son, and his land likewise, to have the benefit of it.

II. It is consented to by Abraham, with a particular clause inserted about a well. In Abraham's part of this transaction observe,

1. He was ready to enter into this league with Abimelech, finding him to be a man of honour and conscience, and that had the fear of God before his eyes.

2. He prudently settled the matter concerning a well, about which Abimelech's servants had quarrelled with him. Wells of water, it seems, were choice goods in that country. Abraham mildly told Abimelech of it, v. 25; and no more can be expected from an honest man than that he be ready to do right as soon as he knows that he has done wrong.

3. He made a very handsome present to Abimelech, v. 27. The interchanging of kind offices is the improving of love: that which is mine is my friend's.

4. He ratified the covenant by an oath, and registered it by giving a new name to the place (v. 31), Beer-sheba, the well of the oath.

Verses 33–34

He sojourned many days, as many as would consist with his character, as Abraham the Hebrew, or passenger. 2. There he made, not only a constant practice, but an open profession, of his religion: There he called on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God, probably in the grove he planted, which was his oratory or house of prayer. Christ prayed in a garden, on a mountain. In calling on the Lord, we must eye him as the everlasting God. The everlasting God, who was, before all worlds, and will be, when time and days shall be no more. See Isa. xl. 28.

CHAP. XXII

We have here the famous story of Abraham's offering up his son Isaac, that is, his offering to offer him. Here is, I. The strange command which God gave to Abraham, ver. 1, 2 II. Abraham's strange obedience to this command, ver. 3–10. III. The strange issue of this trial. 1. The sacrificing of Isaac was countermanded, ver. 11, 12. 2. Another sacrifice was provided, ver. 13, 14. 3. The covenant was renewed with Abraham hereupon, ver. 15–19. Lastly, an account of some of Abraham's relations, ver. 20, &c.

Verses 1–2

Here is the trial of Abraham's faith. It was made to appear that he loved God better than his father; now that he loved him better than his son.

I. Now, perhaps, he was beginning to think the storms had all blown over; but, after all, this encounter comes, which is sharper than any yet.

II. The author of the trial: God tempted him, not to draw him to sin but to discover his graces, how strong they were, that they might be found to praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. i. 7. Thus God tempted Job, that he might appear not only a good man, but a great man. God did tempt Abraham; he did lift up Abraham, so some read it; as a scholar that improves well is lifted up, when he is put into a higher form.

III. The trial itself. Probably he expected some renewed promise like those, ch. xv. 1, and xvii. 1. But, to his great amazement, that which God has to say to him is, in short, Abraham, Go kill thy son. Every word here is a sword in his bones: the trial is steeled with trying phrases.

1. The person to be offered. (1) "Take thy son, not thy bullocks and thy lambs." "No, I will take no bullock out of thy house" (Ps. l. 9). "I must have thy son." "Take Isaac, him, by name, thy laughter, that son indeed," ch. xvii. 19. That son whom thou lovest. In the Hebrew it is expressed more emphatically, and, I think, might very well be read thus: Take now that son of thine, that only one of thine, whom thou lovest, that Isaac.

2. The place: In the land of Moriah, three days' journey off; so that he might have time to consider it, that it might be a service the more reasonable and the more honourable.

3. The manner: Offer him for a burnt-offering. He must not only kill his son, but kill him as a sacrifice.

Verses 3–10

Abraham's obedience to this severe command. Being tried, he offered up Isaac, Heb. xi. 17.

I. The difficulties which he broke through in this act of obedience. 1. It seemed directly against an antecedent law of God, which forbids murder, under a severe penalty, ch. ix. 5, 6. 2. How would it consist with natural affection to his own son? 3. God gave him no reason for it. When Ishmael was to be cast out, a just cause was assigned, but here Isaac must die, and Abraham must kill him, and neither the one nor the other must know why or wherefore. If Isaac had been to die a martyr for the truth, or his life had been the ransom of some other life more precious, it would have been another matter. But the case is not so: he is a dutiful, obedient, hopeful son. "Lord, what profit is there in his blood?" 4. How would this consist with the promise? Was it not said that in Isaac shall thy seed be called? 5. How should he ever look Sarah in the face again? 6. What would the Egyptians say, and the Canaanites and the Perizzites who dwelt then in the land? It would be an eternal reproach to Abraham, and to his altars. "Welcome nature, if this be grace."

II. The several steps of obedience.

1. He rises early, v. 3, for the command was peremptory, and would not admit a debate. Note, those that do the will of God heartily will do it speedily.

2. He gets things ready for a sacrifice.

3. It is very probable that he said nothing about it to Sarah.

4. He carefully looked about him, to discover the place appointed for this sacrifice, when he said (v. 5), "We will go yonder, where you see the light, and worship."

5. He left his servants at some distance off (v. 5), lest they should interpose in his strange oblation. Thus, when Christ was entering upon his agony in the garden, he took only three of his disciples with him, and left the rest at the garden door.

6. He obliged Isaac to carry the wood while he himself carried the fatal knife and fire, v. 6.

7. Without any ruffle or disorder, he talks it over with Isaac, as if it had been but a common sacrifice, that he was going to offer, v. 7, 8.

(1) It was a very affecting question that Isaac asked him, as they were going together: My father, said Isaac; it was a melting word, which, one would think, would strike deeper into the breast of Abraham than his knife could into the breast of Isaac. Yet he keeps his temper, and keeps his countenance, to admiration; he calmly waits for his son's question, and this is it: Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb? [1] A trying question to Abraham. How could he endure to think that Isaac was himself the lamb? So it is, but Abraham, as yet, dares not tell him so. [2] It is a teaching question to us all, that, when we are going to worship God, we should seriously consider. Where is the heart? Is that ready to be offered up to God, to ascend to him as a burnt-offering?

(2) It was a very prudent answer which Abraham gave him: My son, God will provide himself a lamb. This was the language, either, [1] Of his obedience. Or, [2] Of his faith. A sacrifice was provided instead of Isaac. Thus, First, Christ, the great sacrifice of atonement, was of God's providing. Secondly, All our sacrifices of acknowledgment are of God's providing too. It is he that prepares the heart, Ps. x. 17. The broken and contrite spirit is a sacrifice of God (Ps. li. 17), of his providing.

8. He goes on with a holy wilfulness, after many a weary step, and with a heavy heart he arrives at length at the fatal place, builds the altar, the saddest that ever he built, lays the wood in order for Isaac's funeral pile, and now tells him the amazing news: "Isaac, thou art the lamb which God has provided." Isaac, for aught that appears, is as willing as Abraham; we do not find that he attempted to make his escape or made any resistance. Yet it is necessary that a sacrifice be bound. But with what heart could tender Abraham tie those guiltless hands, which perhaps had often been lifted up to ask his blessing, and stretched out to embrace him, and were now the more straitly bound with the cords of love and duty ! However, it must be done. Having bound him, he lays him upon the altar, and his hand upon the head of his sacrifice; and now, we may suppose, with floods of tears, he gives, and takes, the final farewell of a parting kiss. With a fixed heart, and an eye lifted up to heaven, he takes the knife, and stretches out his hand. Be astonished, O heavens ! at this; and wonder, O earth ! Here is an act of faith and obedience, which deserves to be a spectacle to God, angels, and men. Now this obedience of Abraham in offering up Isaac is a lively representation, (1) Of the love of God to us, in delivering up his only-begotten Son to suffer and die for us, as a sacrifice. It pleased the Lord himself to bruise him. See Isa. liii. 10; Zech. xiii. 7. (2) Of our duty to God, in return for that love. We must tread in the steps of this faith of Abraham. God, by his word, calls us to part with all for Christ.

Hitherto this story has been very melancholy, and seemed to hasten towards a most tragical period; but here the sky suddenly clears up, the sun breaks out, and a bright and pleasant scene opens. The same hand that had wounded and cast down here heals and lifts up.

I. Isaac is rescued, v. 11, 12. The command to offer him was intended only for trial, therefore the order is countermanded: Lay not thy hand upon the lad. The more imminent the danger is, the more wonderful and the more welcome is the deliverance.

II. Abraham is not only approved, but applauded. Now know I that thou fearest God. The best evidence of our fearing God is our being willing to serve and honour him with that which is dearest to us.

III. Another sacrifice is provided instead of Isaac, v. 13. God must be acknowledged with thankfulness for the deliverance of Isaac. Abraham's words must be made good: God will provide himself a lamb. Reference must be had to the promised Messiah, the blessed seed. (1) Christ was sacrificed in our stead, as this ram instead of Isaac, and his death was our discharge. (2) Though that blessed seed was lately promised, and now typified by Isaac, yet the offering of him up should be suspended: and in the mean time the sacrifice of beasts should be accepted, as this ram was, as a pledge of that expiation which should one day be made by that great sacrifice. And it is observable that the temple, the place of sacrifice, was afterwards built upon this Mount Moriah (2 Chron. iii. 1); and Mount Calvary, where Christ was crucified, was not far off.

IV. A new name is given to the place, and for the encouragement of all believers, cheerfully to trust in God: Jehovah-jireh, The Lord will provide (v. 14), probably alluding to what he had said (v. 8), God will provide himself a lamb.

Abraham's obedience was graciously accepted; but this was not all: here we have it recompensed. Observe, 1. God is pleased to make mention of Abraham's obedience as the consideration of the covenant; and he speaks of it with an encomium: Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, v. 16. 2. God now confirmed the promise with an oath. It was said and sealed before; but now it is sworn: By myself have I sworn; for he could swear by no greater, Heb. vi. 13. He did (to speak with reverence) even pawn his own life and being upon it (As I live), that by all those immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, he and his might have strong consolation. 3. The particular promise here renewed is that of a numerous offspring: Multiplying, I will multiply thee, v. 17. What a figure does the seed of Abraham make in history ! How numerous, how illustrious, were his known descendants, who, to this day, triumph in this, that they have Abraham to their father ! 4. The promise, doubtless, points at the Messiah, and the grace of the gospel. This is the oath sworn to our father Abraham, which Zacharias refers to, Luke i. 73, &c. And so here is a promise, (1) Of the great blessing of the Spirit: In blessing, I will bless thee, namely, with that best of blessings, the gift of the Holy Ghost. (2) Of the increase of the church, that believers, his spiritual seed, should be numerous as the stars of heaven. (3) Of spiritual victories. Probably Zacharias refers to this part of the oath (Luke i. 74), That we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear. But the crown of all is the last promise. (4) Of the incarnation of Christ: In thy seed, one particular person that shall descend from thee (for he speaks not of many, but of one, as the apostle observes, Gal. iii. 16), shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.

This is recorded here to show that though Abraham saw his own family highly dignified with peculiar privileges, yet he was glad to hear of the increase and prosperity of their families.

CHAP. XXIII

Here is, 1. Abraham a mourner for the death of Sarah, ver. 1, 2. II. Abraham a purchaser of a burying-place for Sarah. 1. The purchase humbly proposed by Abraham, ver. 3, 4. 2. Fairly treated of, and agreed to, with a great deal of mutual civility and respect, ver. 5–16. 3. The purchase-money paid, ver. 16. 4 The promises conveyed and secured to Abraham, ver. 17, 18, 20. 5. Sarah's funeral, ver. 19.

Verses 1–2

We have here, 1. Sarah's age, v. 1. 2. Her death, v. 2. She died in the land of Canaan, where she had been above sixty years a sojourner. 3. Abraham's mourning for her. Two words are used: he came both to mourn and to weep. Tears are a tribute due to our deceased friends. When the body is sown, it must be watered. But we must not sorrow as those that have no hope; for we have a good hope through grace both concerning them and concerning ourselves.

Here is, I. The humble request which Abraham made to his neighbours, the Hittites, for a burying-place among them, v. 3, 4. The convenient diversion which this affair gave, for the present, to Abraham's grief: He stood up from before his dead. There must be a time of standing up from before their dead, and ceasing to mourn. Weeping must not hinder sowing. The death of our relations should effectually remind us that we are not at home in this world. When they are gone, say, "We are going."

II. The generous offer which the children of Heth made to him, v. 5, 6. They compliment him, 1. With a title of respect: Thou art a prince of God among us. 2. With a tender of the best of their burying-places. Note, Even the light of nature teaches us to be civil and respectful towards all, though they be strangers and sojourners.

III. The particular proposal which Abraham made to them, v. 7–9. He returns them his thanks. Though a great man, an old man, and now a mourner, yet he stands up, and bows himself humbly before them, v. 7. Note, Religion teaches good manners; and those abuse it that place it in rudeness and clownishness.

IV. The present which Ephron made to Abraham of his field: The field give I thee, v. 10, 11. Abraham thought he must be entreated to sell it; but, upon the first mention of it, without entreaty, Ephron freely gives it. Some men have more generosity than they are thought to have.

V. Abraham's modest and sincere refusal of Ephron's kind offer, v. 12, 13. Abundance of thanks he returns him for it (v. 12), but resolves to give him money for the field, even the full value of it. Abraham was rich in silver and gold (ch. xiii. 2) and was able to pay for the field, and therefore would not take advantage of Ephron's generosity. Note, Honesty, as well as honour, forbids us to sponge upon our neighbours.

VI. The price of the land fixed by Ephron but not insisted on: The land is worth four hundred shekels of silver (about fifty pounds of our money), but what is that between me and thee? v. 14, 15. He would rather oblige his friend than have so much money in his pocket. When we are tempted to be high in demanding our rights, or hard in denying a kindness, we should answer the temptation with this question: "What is that between me and my friend?"

We have here the conclusion of the treaty between Abraham and Ephron about the burying-place. The bargain was publicly made before all the neighbours, in the presence and audience of the sons of Heth, v. 16, 17. Abraham, thereupon, takes possession, and buries Sarah in the cave which was in the purchased field. It is worth noting, (1) That a burying-place was the first spot of ground Abraham possessed in Canaan. Note, When we are entering into the world it is good to think of our going out of it; for, as soon as we are born, we begin to die. (2) That it was the only piece of land he ever possessed, though the country was all his own in reversion. Abraham sought a better country, that is, a heavenly. Abraham is content to be still flitting, while he lives, but secures a place where, when he dies, his flesh may rest in hope.

CHAP. XXIV

Marriages and funerals are the changes of families, and the common news among the inhabitants of the villages. In the foregoing chapter we had Abraham burying his wife, here we have him marrying his son. These stories concerning his family, with their minute circumstances, are largely related, while the histories of the kingdoms of the world then in being, with their revolutions, are buried in silence. Here is, I. Abraham's care about the marrying of his son, ver. 1–9. II. His servant's journey into Abraham's country, to seek a wife for his young master among his own relations, ver. 10–14. III. The kind providence which brought him acquainted with Rebekah, whose father was Isaac's cousin-german, ver. 15–28. IV. The treaty of marriage with her relations, ver. 29–49. V. Their consent obtained, ver. 50–60. VI. The happy meeting and marriage between Isaac and Rebekah, ver. 61, &c.

Three things we may observe here concerning Abraham:—

I. The care he took of a good son, to get him married, well married. Now Abraham's pious care concerning his son was, (1) That he should not marry a daughter of Canaan, but one of his kindred. He saw that the Canaanites were degenerating into great wickedness. (2) That yet he should not leave the land of Canaan, to go himself among his kindred, not even for the purpose of choosing a wife, lest he should be tempted to settle there.

II. The charge he gave to a good servant, probably Eliezer of Damascus, one of whose conduct, fidelity, and affection to him and his family, he had had long experience. He trusted him with his great affair, and not Isaac himself, because he would not have Isaac go at all into that country, but marry there by proxy; and no proxy so fit as this steward of his house. 1. The servant must be bound by an oath to do his utmost to get a wife for Isaac from among his relations, v. 2–4. 2. He must be clear of this oath if, when he had done his utmost, he could not prevail.

III. The confidence he put in a good God, who, he doubts not, will give his servant success in this undertaking, v. 7. He remembers also the promise God had made and confirmed to him that he would give Canaan to his seed, and thence infers that God would own him in his endeavours to match his son, not among those devoted nations, but to one that was fit to be the mother of such a seed. God's promises, and our own experiences, are sufficient to encourage our dependence upon God, and our expectations from him, in all the affairs of this life.

Abraham's servant is not named, yet much is here recorded to his honour.

I. How faithful Abraham's servant approved himself to his master. Having received his charge, he with all expedition set out on his journey, with an equipage suitable to the object of his negotiation (v. 10).

II. How devoutly he acknowledged God in this affair, like one of that happy household which Abraham had commanded to keep the way of the Lord, &c., ch. xviii. 19. He arrived early in the evening (after many days' journeying) at the place of his destination, and reposed himself by a well of water, to consider how he might manage his business for the best. And,

1. He acknowledges God by a particular prayer (v. 12–14), wherein, (1) He petitions for prosperity and good success in this affair: Send me good speed, this day. Those that would have good speed must pray for it. (2) He pleads God's covenant with his master Abraham: O God of my master Abraham, show kindness to him. He desires that his master's wife might be a humble and industrious woman, bred up to care and labour, and willing to put her hand to any work that was to be done; and that she might be of a courteous disposition, and charitable to strangers. When he came to seek a wife for his master, he did not go to the playhouse or the park, and pray that he might meet one there, but to the well of water, expecting to find one there well employed.

2. God owns him by a particular providence. The answer to this prayer was, (1) Speedy—before he had made an end of speaking (v. 15). (2) Satisfactory: the first that came to draw water was, and did, in everything, according to his own heart. [1] She was so well qualified that in all respects she answered the characters he wished for in the woman that was to be his master's wife, handsome and healthful, humble and industrious, very courteous and obliging to a stranger, and having all the marks of a good disposition. When she came to the well (v. 16), she went down and filled her pitcher, and came up to go home with it. She did not stand to gaze upon the strange man and his camels, but minded her business, and would not have been diverted from it but by an opportunity of doing good. [2] Providence so ordered it that she did that which exactly answered to his sign, and was wonderfully the counterpart of his proposal: she not only gave him drink, but, which was more than could have been expected, she offered her services to give his camels drink, which was the very sign he proposed. Rebekah hereby, quite beyond her expectation at this time, was brought into the line of Christ and the covenant. There may be a great deal of obliging kindness in that which costs but little: our Saviour has promised a reward for a cup of cold water, Matt. x. 42. [3] Upon enquiry he found, to his great satisfaction, that she was a near relation to his master, and that the family she was of was considerable, and able to give him entertainment, v. 23–25.

3. He acknowledges God in a particular thanksgiving. He first paid his respects to Rebekah, in gratitude for her civility (v. 22). Having done this, he turns his wonder (v. 21) into worshipping. He had prayed for good speed (v. 12), and now that he had sped well he gives thanks. What we win by prayer we must wear with praise. He thinks himself very happy, that he was led to the house of his master's brethren, those of them that had come out of Ur of the Chaldees. They were not idolators, but worshippers of the true God, and inclinable to the religion of Abraham's family.

We have here the making up of the marriage between Isaac and Rebekah.

I. The very kind reception given to Abraham's servant by Rebekah's relations. 1. The invitation was kind: Come in, thou blessed of the Lord, v. 31. Perhaps because they heard from Rebekah (v. 28) of the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. Note, Those that are blessed of God should be welcome to us. It is good owning those whom God owns. 2. The entertainment was kind, v. 32, 33. Particular care was taken of the camels; for a good man regardeth the life of his beast, Prov. xii. 10.

II. The full account which he gave them of his errand, and the court he made to them for their consent respecting Rebekah.

1. How intent he was upon his business; though he had come off a journey, and come to a good house, he would not eat, till he had told his errand, v. 33.

2. How ingenious he was in the management of it.

(1) He gives a short account of the state of his master's family, v. 34–36. Two things he suggests, to recommend his proposal:—[1] That his master Abraham, through the blessing of God, had a very good estate; and, [2] That he had settled it all upon Isaac, for whom he was now a suitor.

(2) He tells them the charge his master had given him, to fetch a wife for his son from among his kindred, with the reason of it, v. 37, 38. The highest degrees of divine affection must not divest us of natural affection.

(3) He relates to them the wonderful concurrence of providences, to countenance and further the proposal, plainly showing the finger of God in it.

(4) They freely and cheerfully close with the proposal upon a very good principle (v. 50): "The thing proceedeth from the Lord, Providence smiles upon it, and we have nothing to say against it."

(5) Abraham's servant makes a thankful acknowledgment of the good success he had met with, He worshipped the Lord, v. 52. God sent his angel before him, and so gave him success, v. 7, 40. But when he has the desired success, he worships God, not the angel.

Verses 54–61

Rebekah is here taking leave of her father's house. Rebekah's relations, from natural affection and according to the usual expression of kindness in that case, solicit her to stay some time among them, v. 55. They had consented to the marriage, and yet were loth to part with her. Rebekah herself determined the matter. Rebekah consented, not only to go, but to go immediately. Hereupon she is sent away with Abraham's servant; with suitable attendants; with hearty good wishes. Now that she was going to be a wife, they prayed that she might be a mother both of a numerous and of a victorious progeny.

Isaac and Rebekah are, at length, happily brought together.

I. Isaac was well employed when he met Rebekah: He went out to meditate, or pray, in the field, at the even-tide, v. 62, 63. He went to take the advantage of a silent evening and a solitary field for meditation and prayer, those divine exercises by which we converse with God and our own hearts. Note, 1. Holy souls love retirement. It will do us good to be often left alone, walking alone and sitting alone; and, if we have the art of improving solitude, we shall find we are never less alone than when alone. 2. Meditation and prayer ought to be both our business and our delight when we are alone. The exercises of devotion should be the refreshment and entertainment of the evening, to relieve us from the fatigue occasioned by the care and business of the day, and to prepare us for the repose and sleep of the night. Some think Isaac was now praying for good success in this affair that was depending, and now, when he sets himself, as it were, upon his watchtower, to see what God would answer him, as the prophet (Hab. ii. 1), he sees the camels coming.

II. Rebekah behaved herself very becomingly, when she met Isaac: understanding who he was, she alighted off her camel (v. 64), and took a veil, and covered herself (v. 65), in token of humility, modesty, and subjection.

III. They were brought together to their mutual comfort, v. 67. Observe here, 1. What an affectionate son he was to his mother: it was about three years since her death, and yet he was not, till now, comforted concerning it. 2. What an affectionate husband he was to his wife.

CHAP. XXV

The sacred historian, in this chapter, I. Takes his leave of Abraham, with an account, 1. Of his children by another wife, ver. 1–4. 2. Of his last will and testament, ver. 5, 6 3. Of his age, death, and burial, ver. 7–10. II. He takes his leave of Ishmael, with a short account. 1. Of his children, ver. 12–16. 2. Of his age and death, ver. 17, 18. III. He enters upon the history of Isaac. 1. His prosperity, ver. 11. 2. The conception and birth of his two sons, with the oracle of God concerning them, ver. 19–26. 3. Their different characters, ver. 27, 28. 4. Esau's selling his birthright to Jacob, ver. 29–34.

Abraham lived, after the marriage of Isaac, thirty-five years, and all that is recorded concerning him during that time lies here in a very few verses. We hear no more of God's extraordinary appearances to him or trials of him; for all the days, even of the best and greatest saints, are not eminent days, some slide on silently, and neither come nor go with observation; such were these last days of Abraham.

I. An account of his children by Keturah, another wife whom he married after the death of Sarah.

II. The disposition which Abraham made of his estate, v. 5, 6. After the birth of these sons, he set his house in order, with prudence and justice. 1. He made Isaac his heir, as he was bound to do, in justice to Sarah his first and principal wife, and to Rebekah who married Isaac upon the assurance of it, ch. xxiv. 36. God having already made him the heir of the promise, Abraham therefore made him heir of his estate. 2. He gave portions to the rest of his children, both to Ishmael, though at first he was sent empty away, and to his sons by Keturah. It was justice to provide for them; parents that do not imitate him in this are worse than infidels. It was prudence to settle them in places distant from Isaac, that they might not pretend to divide the inheritance with him, nor be in any way a care or expense to him. Observe, He did this while he yet lived, lest it should not be done, or not so well done, afterwards.

III. The age and death of Abraham, v. 7, 8. He lived 175 years, just 100 years after he came to Canaan; so long he was a sojourner in a strange country. 1. He gave up the ghost. His life was not extorted from him, but he cheerfully resigned it; into the hands of the Father of spirits he committed his spirit. 2. He died in a good old age, an old man; so God had promised him. His death was his discharge from the burdens of his age. It was also the crown of the glory of his old age. 3. He was full of years, or full of life. He did not live till the world was weary of him, but till he was weary of the world; he had had enough of it, and desired no more. A good man, though he should not die old, dies full of days, satisfied with living here, and longing to live in a better place. 4. He was gathered to his people. His body was gathered to the congregation of the dead, and his soul to the congregation of the blessed. Death gathers us to our people. Those that are our people while we live, whether the people of God or the children of this world, are the people to whom death will gather us.

IV. His burial, v. 9, 10. 1. Who buried him: His sons Isaac and Ishmael. It was the last office of respect they had to pay to their good father. Some distance there had formerly been between Isaac and Ishmael; but it seems either that Abraham had himself brought them together while he lived, or at least that his death reconciled them. 2. Where they buried him: in his own burying-place, which he had purchased, and in which he had buried Sarah.

Immediately after the account of Abraham's death, Moses begins the story of Isaac (v. 11), and tells us where he dwelt and how remarkably God blessed him. But he presently digresses from the story of Isaac, to give a short account of Ishmael, forasmuch as he also was a son of Abraham, and God had made some promises concerning him. 1. Concerning his children. He had twelve sons, twelve princes they are called (v. 16), heads of families, which in process of time became nations, distinct tribes, numerous and very considerable. They peopled Arabia. The names of his twelve sons are recorded. Midian and Kedar we often read of in scripture. And some very good expositors have taken notice of the signification of those three names which are put together (v. 14), as containing good advice to us all, Mishma, Dumah, and Massa, that is, hear, keep silence, and bear; we have them together in the same order, Jam. i. 19, Be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath. The posterity of Ishmael had not only tents in the fields, wherein they grew rich in times of peace; but they had towns and castles (v. 16), wherein they fortified themselves in time of war. 2. Concerning himself. Here is an account of his age: He lived 137 years (v. 17), which is recorded to show the efficacy of Abraham's prayer for him (ch. xvii. 18), O that Ishmael might live before thee! Here is also an account of his death; he too was gathered to his people; but it is not said that he was full of days, though he lived to so great an age. He died with his friends about him, which is comfortable.

We have here an account of the birth of Jacob and Esau, the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah: their entrance into the world was (which is not usual) one of the most considerable parts of their story. Isaac seems not to have been a man of action, nor much tried, but to have spent his days in quietness and silence. Now concerning Jacob and Esau we are here told,

I. That they were prayed for. Their parents, after they had been long childless, obtained them by prayer, v. 20, 21. Isaac was forty years old when he was married. He was sixty years old when his sons were born (v. 26), so that, after he was married, he had no child for twenty years. But, 1. He prayed. He prayed for his wife; some read it with his wife. Note, Husbands and wives should pray together. The Jews have a tradition that Isaac, at length, took his wife with him to Mount Moriah, where God had promised that he would multiply Abraham's seed (ch. xxii. 17), and there, in his prayer with her and for her, pleaded the promise made in that very place. 2. God heard his prayer, and was entreated of him.

II. That they were prophesied of before they were born, and great mysteries were wrapped up in the prophecies which went before of them, v. 22, 23. Now Rebekah being with child of these two sons, observe here,

1. How she was perplexed in her mind concerning her present case: The children struggled together within her. This struggle between Jacob and Esau in the womb represents the struggle that is maintained between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan. A holy war is better than the peace of the devil's palace.

2. What course she took for her relief: She went to enquire of the Lord. It is a great relief to the mind to spread our case before the Lord, and ask counsel at his mouth. Go into the sanctuary, Ps. lxxiii. 17.

3. The information given her, upon her enquiry, which expounded the mystery: Two nations are in thy womb, v. 23. She was now pregnant, not only with two children, but two nations, which should not only in their manners and dispositions greatly differ from each other, but in their interests clash and contend with each other; and the issue of the contest should be that the elder should serve the younger, which was fulfilled in the subjection of the Edomites, for many ages, to the house of David, till they revolted, 2 Chron. xxi. 8. In the struggle between grace and corruption in the soul, grace, the younger, shall certainly get the upper hand at last.

III. That when they were born there was a great difference between them.

1. There was a great difference in their bodies, v. 25. Esau, when he was born, was rough and hairy, as if he had been already a grown man, whence he had his name Esau, made, reared already. This was an indication of a very strong constitution, and gave cause to expect that he would be a very robust, daring, active man. But Jacob was smooth and tender as other children. It is God's usual way to choose the weak things of the world, and to pass by the mighty, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27.

2. There was a manifest contest in their births.

3. They were very unlike in the temper of their minds, and the way of living they chose, v. 27. (1) Esau was a man for this world. He was a man addicted to his sports, for he was a cunning hunter. He was a man of the field, like Nimrod and Ishmael. (2) Jacob was a man for the other world. He was not cut out for a statesman, nor did he affect to look great, but he was a plain man, dwelling in tents, an honest man that always meant well, and dealt fairly, that preferred the true delights of solitude and retirement to all the pretended pleasure of busy noisy sports: he dwelt in tents, [1] As a shepherd. He was attached to that safe and silent employment of keeping sheep, to which also he bred up his children, ch. xlvi. 34. Or, [2] As a student. He frequented the tents of Melchizedek, or Heber, as some understand it, to be taught by them divine things. And this was that son of Isaac on whom the covenant was entailed.

4. Their interest in the affections of their parents was likewise different. They had but these two children, and, it seems, one was the father's darling and the other the mother's, v. 28. (1) Isaac loved to have his son active. Esau knew how to please him, and showed a great respect for him, by treating him often with venison. (2) Rebekah was mindful of the oracle of God, which had given the preference to Jacob, and therefore she preferred him in her love.

We have here a bargain made between Jacob and Esau about the birthright, which was Esau's by providence but Jacob's by promise. It was a spiritual privilege, such a birthright as had then the blessing annexed to it, and the entail of the promise.

I. Jacob's pious desire of the birthright, which yet he sought to obtain by indirect courses. For this he is to be commended, that he coveted earnestly the best gifts; yet in this he cannot be justified, that he took advantage of his brother's necessity to make him a very hard bargain (v. 31): Sell me this day thy birthright. Note, Plain men that have their conversation in simplicity and godly sincerity, and without worldly wisdom, are often found wisest of all for their souls and eternity. Jacob's wisdom appeared in two things:—1. He chose the fittest time. 2. Having made the bargain, he made it sure, and got it confirmed by Esau's oath: Swear to me this day, v. 33.

II. Esau's profane contempt of the birthright, and the foolish sale he made of it. He is called profane Esau for it (Heb. xii. 16), because for one morsel of meat he sold his birthright, as dear a morsel as ever was eaten since the forbidden fruit; and he lived to regret it when it was too late. Note, There are those that are penny-wise and pound-foolish, cunning hunters that can out-wit others and draw them into their snares, and yet are themselves imposed upon by Satan's wiles and led captive by him at his will. Observe the instances of Esau's folly.

1. His appetite was very strong, v. 29, 30. Poor Jacob had got some bread and pottage (v. 34) for his dinner, when Esau came from hunting, hungry and weary. Give me (says he) some of that red, that red, as it is in the original. The gratifying of the sensual appetite is that which ruins thousands of precious souls: surely, if Esau was hungry and faint, he might have got a meal's meat cheaper than at the expense of his birthright.

2. His reasoning was very weak (v. 32): Behold, I am at the point to die; and, if he were, would nothing serve to keep him alive but this pottage? If the famine were now in the land (ch. xxvi. 1), as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, we cannot suppose Isaac so poor, or Rebekah so bad a housekeeper, but that he might have been supplied with food convenient, in other ways. Note, It is egregious folly to part with our interest in God, and Christ, and heaven, for the riches, honours, and pleasures, of this world, as bad a bargain as his that sold a birthright for a dish of broth.

3. Repentance was hidden from his eyes (v. 34): He did eat and drink, pleased his palate, and then carelessly rose up and went his way, without any show of regret. Thus Esau despised his birthright.

CHAP. XXVI

In this chapter we have, I. Isaac in adversity, by reason of a famine which, 1. Obliges him to change his quarters, ver. 1. But, 2. God visits him with direction and comfort, ver. 2–5. 3. He foolishly denies his wife, ver. 6–11. II. Isaac in prosperity, ver. 12–14. And, 1. The Philistines were envious, ver. 14–17. 2. He continued industrious, ver. 18 23. 3. God encouraged him, ver. 24, 25. 4. The Philistines, at length, made a covenant with him, ver. 26–33. 5. The disagreeable marriage of his son Esau, ver. 34, 35.

I. God tried Isaac by his providence. Now there is a famine in the land, v. 1. What shall he think of the promise when the promised land will not find him bread? Yes, Isaac will still cleave to the covenant. Note, The intrinsic worth of God's promises cannot be lessened in a believer's eye by any cross providences.

II. He directed him under this trial by his word. Isaac must go for supply. He set out for Egypt, whither his father went in the like strait, but he takes Gerar in his way. 1. God bade him stay where he was, and not go down into Egypt: Sojourn in this land, v. 2, 3. There was a famine in Jacob's days, and God bade him go down into Egypt (ch. xlvi. 3, 4), a famine in Isaac's days, and God made him not to go down, a famine in Abraham's days, and God left him to his liberty. This variety in the divine procedure some ground upon the different characters of these three patriarchs. Abraham was a man of very high attainments, and intimate communion with God; and to him all places and conditions were alike. Isaac was a very good man, but not cut out for hardship; therefore he is forbidden to go to Egypt. Jacob was inured to difficulties, strong and patient; and therefore he must go down into Egypt. Thus God proportions his people's trials to their strength. "Abraham obeyed my voice; do thou do so too, and the promise shall be sure to thee." Abraham's obedience is here celebrated, to his honour; for by it he obtained a good report both with God and men.

Isaac had now set up his staff in Gerar, the country in which he was born (v. 6), yet there he enters into temptation to deny his wife, and to give out that she was his sister.

I. How he sinned, v. 7. Because his wife was handsome, he fancied the Philistines would find some way or other to take him off, that some of them might marry her; and therefore she must pass for his sister.

II. How he was detected, and the cheat discovered, by the king himself. Abimelech (not the same that was in Abraham's days, ch. xx, for this was nearly 100 years after that, but this was the common name of the Philistine kings) saw Isaac more familiar with Rebekah than he knew he would be with his sister (v. 8): he saw him sporting with her, or laughing; it is the same word with that from which Isaac had his name. Nowhere may a man more allow himself to be innocently merry than with his own wife and children. Abimelech charged him with the fraud (v. 9), showed him what might have been the bad consequences of it (v. 10), and then, to convince him how groundless and unjust his jealousy of them was, took him and his family under his particular protection, forbidding any injury to be done to him or his wife upon pain of death, v. 11.

I. The tokens of God's good-will to Isaac. 1. His corn multiplied strangely, v. 12. He had no land of his own, but took land of the Philistines, and sowed it; and (be it observed for the encouragement of poor tenants, that occupy other people's lands, and are honest and industrious) God blessed him with a great increase. He reaped a hundred fold that same year when there was a famine in the land. 2. His cattle also increased, v. 14. And then, 3. He had great store of servants, whom he employed and maintained.

II. The tokens of the Philistines' ill-will to him. They envied him, v. 14. That is a bad principle indeed which makes men grieve at the good of others, as if it must needs be ill with me because it is well with my neighbour. Because they had not flocks of their own to water at the wells, they would not leave them for the use of others; so absurd a thing is malice. The king of Gerar began to look upon him with a jealous eye. Isaac's house was like a court and therefore he must go further off. A wise and a good man will rather retire into obscurity, like Isaac here into a valley, than sit high to be the butt of envy and ill-will.

III. His constancy and continuance in his business still.

1. He kept up his husbandry, and continued industrious to find wells of water, and he set himself to make the best of the country he had come into, which it is every man's prudence to do.

(1) He opened the wells that his father had digged (v. 18). Note, In our searches after truth, that fountain of living water, it is good to make use of the discoveries of former ages, which have been clouded by the corruptions of later times. Enquire for the old way, the wells which our fathers digged, which the adversaries of truth have stopped up.

(2) His servants dug new wells, v. 19. Note, Though we must use the light of former ages, it does not therefore follow that we must rest in it, and make no advances. We must still be building upon their foundation.

(3) In digging his wells he met with much opposition, v. 20, 21. Those that open the fountains of truth must expect contradiction. The first two wells which they dug were called Esek and Sitnah, contention and hatred.

(4) At length he removed to a quiet settlement. He preferred quietness to victory. Note, Those that follow peace, sooner or later, shall find peace. This well they called Rehoboth, enlargements, room enough: in the two former wells we may see what the earth is, straitness and strife. This well shows us what heaven is; it is enlargement and peace, room enough there, for there are many mansions.

2. He continued firm to his religion, and kept up his communion with God. He came weary and uneasy to Beer-sheba. Fear not, says God to him, I am with thee, and will bless thee. Those may remove with comfort that are sure of God's presence with them wherever they go. There he built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord, v. 25.

We have here the contests that had been between Isaac and the Philistines issuing in a happy peace and reconciliation.

I. Abimelech pays a friendly visit to Isaac, in token of the respect he had for him, v. 26.

II. Isaac prudently and cautiously questions his sincerity in this visit, v. 27.

III. Abimelech professes his sincerity, in this address to Isaac, and earnestly courts his friendship, v. 28, 29. Isaac complained they had hated him, and sent him away. No, said Abimelech, we sent thee away in peace. He acknowledges the tokens of God's favour to him, and makes this the ground of their desire, to be in league with him: The Lord is with thee, and thou art the blessed of the Lord.

IV. Isaac entertains him and his company, and enters into a league of friendship with him, v. 30, 31. Note, Religion teaches us to be neighbourly, and, as much as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men.

V. Providence smiled upon what Isaac did; for the same day that he made this covenant with Abimelech his servants brought him the tidings of a well of water they had found, v. 32, 33.

Verses 34–35

Here is, 1. Esau's foolish marriage—foolish, in marrying Canaanites, who were strangers to the blessing of Abraham, for which he is called profane; for hereby he intimated that he neither desired the blessing nor dreaded the curse of God. 2. The grief and trouble it created to his tender parents. It grieved them that he married the daughters of Hittites, who had no religion among them.

CHAP. XXVII

In this chapter we return to the typical story of the struggle between Esau and Jacob. Esau had profanely sold the birthright to Jacob. Thus this story is explained, Heb. xii. 16, 17, "Because he sold the birthright, when he would have inherited the blessing he was rejected." We have here, I. Isaac's purpose to entail the blessing upon Esau, ver. 1–5. II. Rebekah's plot to procure it for Jacob, ver. 6–17. III. Jacob's successful management of the plot, and his obtaining the blessing, ver. 18–29. IV. Esau's resentment of this, in which, 1. His great importunity with his father to obtain a blessing, ver. 30–40. 2. His great enmity to his brother for defrauding him of the first blessing, ver. 41, &c.

Here is, I. Isaac's design to make his will, and to declare Esau his heir.

II. The directions he gave to Esau, pursuant to this design. He calls him to him, v. 1. For Esau, though he had greatly grieved his parents by his marriage, yet they had not expelled him, but made the best of it. Parents that are justly offended at their children yet must not be implacable towards them.

1. He tells him upon what considerations he resolved to do this now (v. 2).

2. He bids him to get things ready for the solemnity of executing his last will and testament, by which he designed to make him his heir, v. 3, 4. Esau must go a hunting, and bring some venison, which his father will eat of, and then bless him. Prayer is the work of the soul, and not of the lips only; as the soul must be employed in blessing God (Ps. ciii. 1), so it must be in blessing ourselves and others: the blessing will not come to the heart if it do not come from the heart.

Rebekah is here contriving to procure for Jacob the blessing which was designed for Esau.

I. The end was good. God had said it should be so, that the elder should serve the younger; and therefore Rebekah resolves it shall be so. But,

II. The means were bad, and no way justifiable. If it was not wrong to Esau to deprive him of the blessing (he himself having forfeited it by selling the birthright), yet it was a wrong to Isaac, taking advantage of his infirmity, to impose upon him; it was a wrong to Jacob too, whom she taught to deceive. It would likewise expose him to endless scruples about the blessing, if he should obtain it thus fraudulently. If Rebekah had gone to Isaac, and put him in remembrance of that which God had said concerning their sons,—if she further had shown him how Esau had forfeited the blessing both by selling his birthright and by marrying strange wives, it is probable that Isaac would have been prevailed upon to confer the blessing upon Jacob.

Observe here, I. The art and assurance with which Jacob managed this intrigue. Who would have thought that his plain man could have played his part so well in a design of this nature? Note, Lying is soon learnt. I wonder how honest Jacob could so readily turn his tongue to say (v. 19), I am Esau thy firstborn. How could he say, I have done as thou badest me, when he had received no command from his father, but was doing as his mother bade him? How could he say, Eat of my venison, when he knew it came, not from the field, but from the fold? But especially I wonder how he could have the assurance to father it upon God, and to use his name in the cheat (v. 20):

The Lord thy God brought it to me. Is this Jacob? Is this Israel, indeed, without guile? It is certainly written, not for our imitation, but for our admonition.

II. The success of this management. Jacob with some difficulty gained his point, and obtained the blessing.

1. Isaac was at first dissatisfied, and would have discovered the fraud if he could have trusted his own ears; for the voice was Jacob's voice, v. 22. His voice is Jacob's voice, but his hands are Esau's. He speaks the language of a saint, but does the works of a sinner; but the judgment will be, as here, by the hands.

2. At length he yielded to the power of the cheat, because the hands were hairy (v. 23), not considering how easy it was to counterfeit that circumstance; and now Jacob carries it on dexterously. That which in some small degree extenuates the crime of Rebekah and Jacob is that the fraud was intended, not so much to hasten the fulfilling, as to prevent the thwarting, of the oracle of God: the blessing was just going to be put upon the wrong head, and they thought it was time to bestir themselves. Now let us see how Isaac gave Jacob his blessing, v. 26–9. (1) He embraces him, in token of a particular affection to him. (2) He praised him. He smelt the smell of his raiment, and said, See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed. (3) He rpayed for him, and therein prophesied concerning him. Three things Jacob is here blessed with:—[1] Plenty (v. 28). [2] Power (v. 29). [3] Prevalence with God, and a great interest in Heaven: "Cursed be every one that curseth thee and blessed be he that blesseth thee."

Here is, I. The covenant-blessing denied to Esau. He that made so light of the birthright would now have inherited the blessing. Observe, 1. How carefully he sought it. When he understood that Jacob had obtained it surreptitiously, he cried with a great and exceedingly bitter cry, v. 34. Those that will not so much as ask and seek now, will knock shortly, and cry, Lord, Lord. Slighters of Christ will then be humble suitors to him. 2. How he was rejected. Isaac, when first made sensible of the imposition that had been practised on him, trembled exceedingly, v. 33. But he soon recovers himself, and ratifies the blessing he had given to Jacob: I have blessed him, and he shall be blessed. Having found himself more than ordinarily filled with the Holy Ghost when he gave the blessing to Jacob, he perceived that God did, as it were, say Amen to it. Now, (1) Jacob was hereby confirmed in his possession of the blessing. (2) Isaac hereby acquiesced in the will of God, though it contradicted his own expectation and affection. (3) Esau hereby was cut off from the expectation of that special blessing which he thought to have preserved to himself when he sold his birthright. The Jews, like Esau, hunted after the law of righteousness (v. 31), yet missed of the blessing of righteousness, because they sought it by the works of the law (v. 32); while the Gentiles, who, like Jacob, sought it by faith in the oracle of God, obtained it by force, with that violence which the kingdom of heaven suffers. See Matt. xi. 12. Those who undervalue their spiritual birthright, and can afford to sell it for a morsel of meat, forfeit spiritual blessings. Those that will part with their wisdom and grace, with their faith and a good conscience, for the honours, wealth, or pleasures, of this world, however they may pretend a zeal for the blessing, have already judged themselves unworthy of it.

II. Here is a common blessing bestowed upon Esau.

1. This he desired: Bless me also, v. 34. Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?, v. 36. It is the folly of most men that they are willing to take up with any good (Ps. iv. 6), as Esau here, who desired but a second-rate blessing, a blessing separated from the birthright. As if he had said, "I will take up with any: though I have not the blessing of the church, yet let me have some blessing."

2. This he had; and let him make his best of it, v. 39, 40.

(1) It was promised him, [1] That he should have a competent livelihood—the fatness of the earth, and the dew of heaven. Note, Those that come short of the blessings of the covenant may yet have a very good share of outward blessings. [2] That by degrees he should recover his liberty. He shall serve, but he shall not starve; and, at length after much skirmishing, he shall break the yoke of bondage, and wear the marks of freedom. This was fulfilled (2 Kings viii. 20, 22) when the Edomites revolted.

(2) Yet it was far short of Jacob's blessing. For him God had reserved some better thing. In Jacob's blessing the dew of heaven is put first, as that which he most valued. In Esau's the fatness of the earth is put first, for it was this that he had the principal regard to. Jacob shall have dominion over his brethren: hence the Israelites often ruled over the Edomites. But the great difference is that there is nothing in Esau's blessing that points to Christ, nothing that brings him or his into the church and covenant of God, without which the fatness of the earth will stand him in little stead.

Here is, I. The malice Esau bore to Jacob upon account of the blessing which he had obtained, v. 41. Esau's hatred of Jacob was, 1. A causeless hatred. He hated him for no other reason but because his father blessed him and God loved him. 2. It was a cruel hatred. Nothing less would satisfy him than to slay his brother. 3. It was a politic hatred. He expected his father would soon die, and then titles must be tried and interests contested between the brothers, which would give him a fair opportunity for revenge.

II. The method Rebekah took to prevent the mischief.

1. She gave Jacob warning of his danger, and advised him to withdraw for a while, and shift for his own safety. Observe here, (1) What Rebekah feared—lest she should be deprived of them both in one day (v. 45). (2) What Rebekah hoped—that, if Jacob for a while kept out of sight, the affront which his brother resented so fiercely would by degrees go out of mind.

2. She impressed Isaac with an apprehension of the necessity of Jacob's going among her relations upon another account, which was to take a wife, v. 46.

CHAP. XXVIII

We have here, I. Jacob parting with his parents, to go to Padan-aram; the charge his father gave him (ver. 1, 2), the blessing he sent him away with (ver. 3, 4), his obedience to the orders given him (ver. 5, 10), and the influence this had upon Esau, ver. 6–9. II. Jacob meeting with God, and his communion with him by the way. And there, 1. His vision of the ladder, ver. 11, 12. 2. The gracious promises God made him, ver. 13–15. 3. The impression this made upon him, ver. 16–19. 4. The vow he made to God, upon this occasion, ver. 20, &c.

Verses 1–5

Jacob had no sooner obtained the blessing than immediately he was forced to flee from his country.

Now Jacob fled into Syria, Hos. xii. 12. He was blessed with plenty of corn and wine, and yet he went away poor, was blessed with government, and yet went out to service, a hard service. This was, 1. Perhaps to correct him for his dealing fraudulently with his father. The blessing shall be confirmed to him, and yet he shall smart for the indirect course he took to obtain it. However, 2. It was to teach us that those who inherit the blessing must expect persecution; those who have peace in Christ shall have tribulation in the world, John xvi. 33. Now Jacob is here dismissed by his father.

I. With a solemn charge: He blessed him, and charged him, v. 1, 2. Note, Those that have the blessing must keep the charge annexed to it, and not think to separate what God has joined. If Jacob be an heir of promise, he must not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan; those that profess religion should not marry those that are irreligious.

II. With a solemn blessing, v. 3, 4. He had before blessed him unwittingly; now he does it designedly, for the greater encouragement of Jacob in that melancholy condition to which he was now removing. This blessing is more express and full than the former; it is an entail of the blessing of Abraham. It is a gospel blessing, Gal. iii. 14. It is a blessing from God Almighty, by which name God appeared to the patriarchs, Exod. vi. 3.

1. The promise of heirs: God make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, v. 3. (1) And never was such a multitude of people so often gathered into one assembly as the tribes of Israel were in the wilderness, and afterwards. (2) Through his loins should descend from Abraham that person in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, for all things in heaven and earth are united in Christ (Eph. i. 10).

2. The promise of an inheritance for those heirs: That thou mayest inherit the land of thy sojournings, v. 4. Canaan was hereby entailed upon the seed of Jacob, exclusive of the seed of Esau. He is here told that he should inherit the land wherein he sojourned. Those have the best enjoyment of present things that sit most loose to them. This was the better country, which Jacob, with the other patriarchs, had in his eye, when he confessed himself "a stranger and pilgrim upon the earth," Heb. xi. 13.

Away he went to Padan-aram, v. 5.

Verses 6–9

This passage concerning Esau comes in in the midst of Jacob's story, either, 1. To show the influence of a good example. Esau, though the greater man, now begins to think Jacob the better man, and disdains not to take him for his pattern in this particular instance of marrying with a daughter of Abraham. Or, 2. To show the folly of an after-wit. Esau did well, but he did it when it was too late. He saw that the daughters of Canaan pleased not his father, and he might have seen that long ago if he had consulted his father's judgment as much as he did his palate. And how did he now mend the matter? Why, truly, so as to make bad worse. He married a daughter of Ishmael, the son of the bond-woman, who was cast out. He did it only to please his father, not to please God. He rested in a partial reformation.

Verses 10–15

We have here Jacob upon his journey towards Syria, in a very desolate condition. The first night, he had made a long day's journey from Beersheba to Bethel, and there he had,

I. A hard lodging (v. 11), the stones for his pillows, and the heavens for his canopy and curtains.

II. In his hard lodging he had a pleasant dream. Any Israelite indeed would be willing to take up with Jacob's pillow, provided he might but have Jacob's dream. Then, and there, he heard the words of God, and saw the visions of the Almighty. It was the best night's sleep he ever had in his life.

1. The encouraging vision Jacob saw, v. 12. He saw a ladder which reached from earth to heaven, the angels ascending and descending upon it, and God himself at the head of it. Now this represents:— (1) The providence of God, by which there is a constant correspondence kept up between heaven and earth. Providence does its work gradually, and by steps. The wisdom of God is at the upper end of the ladder, directing all the motions of second causes to the glory of the first Cause. This vision gave very seasonable comfort to Jacob, letting him know that he had both a good guide and a good guard, in his going out and coming in. (2) The mediation of Christ. He is this ladder, the foot on earth in his human nature, the top in heaven in his divine nature: or the former in his humiliation, the latter in his exaltation. If God dwell with us, and we with him, it is by Christ. We have no way of getting to heaven, but by this ladder: if we climb up any other way we are thieves and robbers. To this vision our Saviour alludes when he speaks of the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man (John i. 51).

2. The encouraging words Jacob heard.

(1) The former promises made to his father were repeated and ratified to him, v. 13, 14. In general, God intimated to him that he would be the same to him that he had been to Abraham and Isaac. [1] The land of Canaan is settled upon him. [2] It is promised him that his posterity should multiply exceedingly as the dust of the earth. [3] It is added that the Messiah should come from his loins, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed.

(2) Fresh promises were made him. [1] Jacob was apprehensive of danger from his brother Esau; but God promises to keep him. [2] He had now a long journey before him, had to travel alone, in an unknown road, to an unknown country; but, behold, I am with thee, says God. [3] He knew not, but God foresaw, what hardships he should meet with in his uncle's service, and therefore promises to preserve him in all places. [4] He was now going as an exile into a place far distant, but God promises him to bring him back again to this land. [5] He seemed to be forsaken of all his friends, but God here gives him this assurance, I will not leave thee. Note, Whom God loves he never leaves.

Behold his sleep was sweet to him. Here is much of Jacob's devotion on this occasion.

I. He expressed a great surprise at the tokens he had of God's special presence with him in that place: Surely the Lord is in this place and I knew it not, v. 16. Note, God can give undeniable demonstrations of his presence, satisfaction not communicable to others, but convincing to themselves. No place excludes divine visits (ch. xvi. 13, here also); wherever we are, in the city or in the desert, in the house or in the field, in the shop or in the street.

II. It struck an awe upon him (v. 17): He was afraid. He said, How dreadful is this place! What he saw there at this time was, as it were, the house of God, and the gate of heaven.

III. He took care to preserve the memorial of it two ways: 1. He set up the stone for a pillar (v. 18), because he had not time now to build an altar here, as Abraham did in the places where God appeared to him, ch. xii. 7. He therefore poured oil on the top of this stone, as an earnest of his building an altar when he should have conveniences for it, as afterwards he did, in gratitude to God for this vision, ch. xxxv. 7. 2. He gave a new name to the place, v. 19. It had been called Luz, an almond-tree; but he will have it henceforward called Beth-el, the house of God.

IV. He made a solemn vow upon this occasion, v. 20–22. When God ratifies his promises to us, it is proper for us to repeat our promises to him. Now in this vow observe, 1. Jacob's faith. God had said (v. 15), I am with thee, and will keep thee. Jacob takes hold of this, and infers, "I depend upon it." 2. Jacob's modesty and great moderation in his desires. He will cheerfully content himself with bread to eat, and raiment to put on. Nature is content with a little, and grace with less. 3. Jacob's piety, and his regard to God, which appear here, (1) In what he desired, that God would be with him and keep him. (2) In what he designed. His resolution is, [1] In general, to cleave to the Lord, as his God in covenant: Then shall the Lord be my God. [2] In particular, that he would perform some special acts of devotion, in token of his gratitude. First, "This pillar shall keep possession here till I come back in peace, and then an altar shall be erected here to the honour of God." Secondly, "The house of God shall not be unfurnished, nor his altar without a sacrifice: Of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee, to be spent either upon God's altars or upon his poor," both which are his receivers in the world.

CHAP. XXIX

This chapter gives us an account of God's providence concerning Jacob. I. How he was brought in safety to his journey's end, ver. 1–14. II. How he was comfortably disposed of in marriage, ver. 15–30. III. How his family was built up in the birth of four sons, ver. 31–35.

Verses 1–8

1. We are here told how cheerfully he proceeded in his journey after the sweet communion he had with God at Beth-el: Then Jacob lifted up his feet; so the margin reads it, v. 1. 2. How happily he arrived at his journey's end. Providence brought him to the very field, where his uncle's flocks were to be watered, and there he met with Rachel, who was to be his wife. (1) The divine Providence is to be acknowledged in all the little circumstances which concur to make a journey, or other undertaking, comfortable and successful. If we meet seasonably with those that can direct us we must not say that it was by chance, but that it was by Providence, and that God therein favoured us. (2) What is here said of the constant care of the shepherds concerning their sheep (v. 2, 3, 7, 8) may serve to illustrate the tender concern which our Lord Jesus, the great Shepherd of the sheep, has for his flock, the church; for he is the good Shepherd, that knows his sheep, and is known of them, John x. 14. (3) When all the shepherds came together with their flocks, then, like loving neighbours, at watering-time, they watered their flocks together. (4) It becomes us to speak civilly and respectfully to strangers. The law of kindness in the tongue has a commanding power, Prov. xxxi. 26.

Verses 9–14

Here we see, 1. Rachel's humility and industry: She kept her father's sheep (v. 9). 2. Jacob's tenderness and affection. When he understood that this was his kinswoman he was wonderfully anxious to serve her (v. 10). 3. It is groundless conceit which some of the Jewish writers have, that Jacob, when he kissed Rachel, wept because he had been set upon in his journey by Eliphaz the eldest son of Esau, at the command of his father, and robbed of all his money and jewels, which his mother had given him when she sent him away. It was plain that it was his passion for Rachel, and the surprise of this happy meeting, that drew these tears from his eyes. 4. Laban, though none of the best-humoured men, bade him welcome, was satisfied in the account he gave of himself, and of the reason of his coming in such poor circumstances.

Verses 15–30

Here is, I. The fair contract made between Laban and Jacob, during the month that Jacob spent there as a guest, v. 14. Now Jacob had a fair opportunity to make known to Laban the affection he had for his daughter Rachel; and, having no worldly goods in his hand with which to endow her, he promises him seven years' service, upon condition that, at the end of the seven years, he would bestow her upon him for his wife.

II. Jacob's honest performance of his part of the bargain, v. 20. Jacob honestly served out his seven years. They seemed to him but a few days, for the love he had to her, as if it were more his desire to earn her than to have her.

III. The base cheat which Laban put upon him when he was out of his time: he put Leah into his arms instead of Rachel, v. 23. This was Laban's sin; he wronged both Jacob and Rachel. It is easy to observe here how Jacob was paid in his own coin. He had cheated his own father when he pretended to be Esau, and now his father-in-law cheated him.

IV. The excuse and atonement Laban made for the cheat. 1. The excuse was frivolous: It must not be so done in our country, v. 26. There was no such custom of his country as he pretends; only he banters Jacob with it, and laughs at his mistake. 2. His compounding the matter did but make bad worse: We will give thee this also, v. 27. Hereby he drew Jacob into the sin, and snare, and disquiet, of multiplying wives, which remains a blot in his escutcheon. Honest Jacob did not design it. He could not refuse Rachel, for he had espoused her; still less could he refuse Leah, for he had married her. The polygamy of the patriarchs was, in some measure excusable in them, because though there was a reason against it as ancient as Adam's marriage (Mal. ii. 15), yet there was no express command against it; it was in them a sin of ignorance. It will by no means justify the like practice now, when God's will is plainly made known, that one man and one woman only must be joined together, 1 Cor. vii. 2. Dr. Lightfoot makes Leah and Rachel to be figures of the two churches, the Jews under the law and the Gentiles under the gospel: the younger the more beautiful, and more in the thoughts of Christ when he came in the form of a servant; but the other, like Leah, first embraced.

We have here the birth of four of Jacob's sons, all by Leah. Observe, 1. That Leah, who was less beloved, was blessed with children, when Rachel was denied that blessing, v. 31. 2. The names she gave her children were expressive of her respectful regards both to God and to her husband. She called her first-born Reuben (see a son), with this pleasant thought, Now will my husband love me; and her third son Levi (joined), with this expectation, Now will my husband be joined unto me, v. 34. She thankfully acknowledges the kind providence of God in it: The Lord hath looked upon my affliction, v. 32. "The Lord hath heard that I was hated, he has therefore given me this son." Her fourth she called Judah (praise), saying, Now will I praise the Lord, v. 35. And this was he of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came. He descended from him whose name was praise, for he is our praise. Is Christ formed in my heart? Now will I praise the Lord.

CHAP. XXX

In this chapter we have an account of the increase, I. Of Jacob's family. Eight children more we find registered in this chapter; II. Of Jacob's estate. He makes a new bargain with Laban, ver. 25–34. And in this six years' further service he did to Laban God wonderfully blessed him, so that his stock of cattle became very considerable, ver. 35–43.

Verses 1–13

We have here the bad consequences of that strange marriage which Jacob made with the two sisters. Here is,

I. An unhappy disagreement between him and Rachel (v. 1, 2), occasioned, not so much by her own barrenness as by her sister's fruitfulness.

1. Rachel frets. She envied her sister, v. 1. Envy is grieving at the good of another, than which no sin is more offensive to God, nor more injurious to our neighbour and ourselves.

2. Jacob chides, and most justly. He loved Rachel, and therefore reproved her for what she said amiss, v. 2. Note, Faithful reproofs are products and instances of true affection, Ps. cxli. 5; Prov. xxvii. 5, 6. He was angry, not at the person, but at the sin; he expressed himself so as to show his displeasure. It was a very grave and pious reply which Jacob gave to Rachel's peevish demand: Am I in God's stead? The Chaldee paraphrases it well, Dost thou ask sons of me? Oughtest thou not to ask them from before the Lord? The Arabic reads it, "Am I above God? Can I give thee that which God denies thee?"

II. An unhappy agreement between him and the two handmaids.

1. At the persuasion of Rachel, he took Bilhah her handmaid to wife, that, according to the usage of those times, his children by her might be adopted and owned as her mistress's children, v. 3, &c. She would rather have children by reputation than none at all, children that she might fancy to be her own, and call her own, though they were not so. She takes a pleasure in giving them names that carry in them nothing but marks of emulation with her sister, as if she had overcome her, (1) At law. She calls the first son of her handmaid Dan (judgment), saying, "God hath judged me" (v. 6), that is, "given sentence in my favour." (2) In battle. She calls the next Naphtali (wrestlings), saying, I have wrestled with my sister, and have prevailed (v. 8); as if all Jacob's sons must be born men of contention.

2. At the persuasion of Leah, he took Zilpah her handmaid to wife also, v. 9. Two sons Zilpah bore to Jacob, whom Leah looked upon herself as entitled to, in token of which she called one Gad (v. 11), promising herself a little troop of children. The other she called Asher (happy), thinking herself happy in him. There was much amiss in the contest and competition between these two sisters, yet God brought good out of this evil. Thus Jacob's family was replenished with twelve sons, heads of the thousands of Israel, from whom the celebrated twelve tribes descended and were named.

I. Reuben, a little lad, five or six years old, playing in the field, found mandrakes, dudaim. It is uncertain what they were, either fruits or flowers that were very pleasant to the smell. There are products of the earth in the exposed fields, as well as in the planted protected gardens, that are very valuable and useful. It is a laudable custom of the devout Jews, when they find pleasure, suppose in eating an apple, to lift up their hearts, and say, "Blessed be he that made this fruit pleasant!" Or, in smelling a flower, "Blessed be he that made this flower sweet." Some think these mandrakes were jessamine flowers. Whatever they were, Rachel could not see them in Leah's hands, where the child had placed them, but she must covet them. The learned bishop Patrick very well suggests here that the true reason of this contest between Jacob's wives for his company, and their giving him their maids to be his wives, was the earnest desire they had to fulfil the promise made to Abraham that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude. And he thinks it would have been below the dignity of this sacred history to take such particular notice of these things if there had not been some such great consideration in them. Leah was now blessed with two sons; the first she called Issachar (a hire), reckoning herself well repaid for her mandrakes. The other she called Zebulun (dwelling), owning God's bounty to her: God has endowed me with a good dowry, v. 20. She reckons a family of children not a bill of charges, but a good dowry, Ps. cxiii. 9. Mention is made (v. 21) of the birth of a daughter, Dinah, because of the following story concerning her, ch. xxxiv.

II. Rachel fruitful at last (v. 22). Rachel called her son Joseph, which in Hebrew is akin to two words of a contrary signification, Asaph (abstulit), He has taken away my reproach, and Jasaph (addidit), The Lord shall add to me another son.

I. Jacob's thoughts of home. He faithfully served his time out with Laban, even his second apprenticeship. He retained his affection for the land of Canaan, not only because it was the land of his nativity, and his father and mother were there, whom he longed to see, but because it was the land of promise.

II. Laban's desire of his stay, v. 27. In love to himself, not to Jacob or to his wives or children, Laban endeavours to persuade him to continue his chief shepherd. Churlish selfish men know how to give good words when it is to serve their own ends. Laban found that his stock had wonderfully increased with Jacob's good management, and he owns it, with very good expressions of respect both to God and Jacob: I have learned by experience that the Lord has blessed me for thy sake.

III. The new bargain they came upon. Laban's craft and covetousness took advantage of Jacob's plainness, honesty, and goodnature. Jacob accordingly makes a proposal.

1. He shows what reason he had to insist upon so much, considering, (1) That Laban was bound in gratitude to do well for him. Yet here observe how he speaks, like himself, very modestly. Humble saints take more pleasure in doing good than in hearing of it again. (2) That he himself was bound in duty to take care of his own family.

2. He is willing to refer himself to the providence of God, which, he knew, extends itself to the smallest things, even the colour of the cattle; and he will be content to have for his wages the sheep and goats of such and such a colour, speckled, spotted, and brown, which should hereafter be brought forth, v. 32, 33. Laban was willing to consent to this bargain because he thought if the few he had that were now speckled and spotted were separated from the rest, which by agreement was to be done immediately, the body of the flock which Jacob was to tend, being of one colour, either all black or all white, would produce few or none of mixed colours, and so he should have Jacob's service for nothing, or next to nothing.

Now Jacob's contrivances were, 1. To set peeled sticks before the cattle where they were watered, that, looking much at those unusual party-coloured sticks, by the power of imagination they might bring forth young ones in like manner party-coloured, v. 37–39. Probably this custom was commonly used by the shepherds of Canaan, who coveted to have their cattle of this motley colour. When he began to have a stock of ring-straked and brown, he contrived to set them first, and to put the faces of the rest towards them, with the same design as in the former contrivance. Thus Jacob increased exceedingly (v. 43), and grew very rich in a little time. Those who, while their beginning is small, are humble and honest, contented and industrious, are in a likely way to see their latter end greatly increasing. He that is faithful in a little shall be entrusted with more. He that is faithful in that which is another man's shall be entrusted with something of his own. Jacob, who had been a just servant, became a rich master.

CHAP. XXXI

Jacob was a man of great devotion and integrity, yet he had more trouble and vexation than any of the patriarchs. Here is, I. His resolution to return, ver. 1–16. II. His clandestine departure, ver. 17–21. III. Laban's pursuit of him in displeasure, ver. 22–25. IV. The hot words that passed between them. ver. 26–42. V. Their amicable agreement at last, ver. 43, &c.

Verses 1–16

Jacob is here taking up a resolution immediately to quit his uncle's service, to take what he had and go back to Canaan. This resolution he took.

I. Upon a just provocation; for Laban and his sons had become very ill-natured towards him.

1. Laban's sons showed their ill-will in what they said, v. 1.

2. Laban himself said little, but his countenance was not towards Jacob as it used to be; and Jacob could not but take notice of it, v. 2, 5. He was but a churl at the best, but now he was more churlish than formerly.

II. By divine direction and under the convoy of a promise: The Lord said unto Jacob, Return, and I will be with thee, v. 3. He came thither by orders from Heaven, and there he would stay till he was ordered back. It is our duty to set ourselves under God's guidance, both in our going out and in our coming in. Jacob was also encouraged by what is said in v. 13, I am the God of Beth-el. This was the place where the covenant was renewed with him. Now arise (v. 13) and return, (1) To thy devotions in Canaan, the solemnities of which had perhaps been much intermitted while he was with Laban. (2) To thy comforts in Canaan: Return to the land of thy kindred.

III. With the knowledge and consent of his wives. He sent for Rachel and Leah to him to the field (v. 4), that he might confer with them more privately. Husbands that love their wives will communicate their purposes and intentions to them. Where there is a mutual affection there will be a mutual confidence. He told them of the command God had given him, in a dream, to return to his own country (v. 13), that they might not suspect his resolution to arise from inconstancy, or any disaffection to their country or family, but might see it to proceed from a principle of obedience to his God.

His wives cheerfully consented to his resolution. They were willing to go along with their husband, and put themselves with him under the divine direction: Whatsoever God hath said unto thee do.

Here is, I. Jacob's flight from Laban. It was honestly done to take no more than his own with him, the cattle of his getting, v. 18. He took what Providence gave him, and was content with that. Yet Rachel was not so honest as her husband; she stole her father's images (v. 19) and carried them away with her. The Hebrew calls them teraphim. Some think they were only little representations of the ancestors of the family, in statues or pictures, which Rachel had a particular fondness for, and was desirous to have with her, now that she was going into another country. It should rather seem that they were images for a religious use, penates, household-gods, either worshipped or consulted as oracles; and we are willing to hope that she took them away out of a design hereby to convince her father of the folly of his regard to those as gods which could not secure themselves, Isa. xlvi. 1, 2.

II. Laban's pursuit of Jacob. Tidings were brought him, on the third day, that Jacob had fled; he immediately raises the whole clan. Seven days' journey he marched in pursuit of him, v. 23. But the truth is, bad men are more vehement in their anger than in their love. God interposed in the quarrel, rebuked Laban and sheltered Jacob, charging Laban not to speak unto him either good or bad (v. 24). The same Hebraism we have, ch. xxiv. 50. God comes to him, and with one word ties his hands, though he does not turn his heart. The safety of good men is very much owing to the hold God has of the consciences of bad men and the access he has to them.

We have here the reasoning, not to say the rallying, that took place between Laban and Jacob at their meeting, in that mountain which was afterwards called Gilead, v. 25.

I. The high charge which Laban exhibited against him. He accuses him,

1. As a renegade that had unjustly deserted his service. To represent Jacob as a criminal, he will have it thought that he intended kindness to his daughters (v. 27, 28). It is common for bad men, when they are disappointed in their malicious projects, to pretend that they designed nothing but what was kind and fair.

2. As a thief, v. 30. Wherefore hast thou stolen my gods? Foolish man! to call those his gods that could be stolen! Could he expect protection from those that could neither resist nor discover their invaders? Enemies may steal our goods, but not our God.

II. Jacob's apology for himself. 1. As to the charge of stealing away his own wives he clears himself by giving the true reason. He feared lest Laban would by force take away his daughters, and so oblige him, by the bond of his affection to his wives, to continue in his service. 2. As to the charge of stealing Laban's gods he pleads not guilty, v. 32. He not only did not take them himself (he was not so fond of them), but he did not know that they were taken.

III. The diligent search Laban made for his gods (v. 33–35). We do not find that he searched Jacob's flocks for stolen cattle; but he searched his furniture for stolen gods. Laban, after all his searches, missed of finding his gods, and was baffled in his enquiry with a sham; but our God will not only be found of those that seek him, but they shall find him their bountiful rewarder.

I. The power of provocation. Jacob's natural temper was mild and calm, yet Laban's unreasonable carriage towards him put him into a heat that transported him into some vehemence, v. 36, 37.

II. The comfort of a good conscience. Those that in any employment have dealt faithfully, if they cannot obtain the credit of it with men, yet shall have the comfort of it in their own bosoms.

III. The character of a good servant, and particularly of a faithful shepherd. 1. He was very careful, so that, through his oversight or neglect, the ewes did not cast their young. 2. He was very honest, and took none of that for his own eating which was not allowed him. 3. He was very laborious, v. 40. He stuck to his business, all weathers.

IV. The character of a hard master. Laban had been such an one to Jacob. Those are bad masters,

1. Who exact from their servants, that which is unjust, by obliging them to make good that which is not damaged by any default of theirs. This Laban did, v. 39. 2. Those also are bad masters who deny to their servants that which is just and equal. This Laban did, v. 41. It was unreasonable for him to make Jacob serve for his daughters, when he had in reversion so great an estate secure to him by the promise of God himself.

V. The care of providence for the protection of injured innocence, v. 42. God took cognizance of the wrong done to Jacob, and repaid him whom Laban would otherwise have sent empty away. Jacob speaks of God the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac; for Abraham was dead, and had gone to that world where perfect love casts out fear; but Isaac was yet alive, sanctifying the Lord in his heart, as his fear and his dread.

We have here the compromising of the matter between Laban and Jacob. Laban had nothing to say in reply to Jacob's remonstrance: he could neither justify himself nor condemn Jacob, but was convicted by his own conscience of the wrong he had done him.

I. He turns it off with a profession of kindness for Jacob's wives and children (v. 43): These daughters are my daughters. When he cannot excuse what he has done, he does, in effect, own what he should have done; he should have treated them as his own, but he had counted them as strangers, v. 15.

II. He proposes a covenant of friendship between them, to which Jacob readily agrees, without insisting upon Laban's submission, much less his restitution. Peace and love are such valuable jewels that we can scarcely buy them too dearly. Better sit down losers than go on in strife.

1. The substance of this covenant. Jacob left it wholly to Laban to settle it. (1) That Jacob should be a good husband to his wives. Jacob had never given him any cause to suspect that he would be any other than a kind husband; yet, as if he had, he was willing to come under this engagement. (2) That he should never be a bad neighbour to Laban, v. 52. It was agreed that Jacob should forgive and forget all the wrongs he had received.

2. The ceremony of this covenant. It was made and ratified with great solemnity, according to the usages of those times. (1) A pillar was erected (v. 45), and a heap of stones raised (v. 46), to perpetuate the memory of the thing. (2) A sacrifice was offered (v. 54), a sacrifice of peace-offerings. Our peace with God is that which puts true comfort into our peace with our friends. If parties contend, the reconciliation of both to him will facilitate their reconciliation one to another. (3) They did eat bread together (v. 46), jointly partaking of the feast upon the sacrifice, v. 54. Covenants of friendship were anciently ratified by the parties eating and drinking together. It was in the nature of a love-feast. (4) They solemnly appealed to God concerning their sincerity herein, [1] As a witness (v. 49): The Lord watch between me and thee. When we are out of one another's sight, let this be a restraint upon us, that wherever we are we are under God's eye. [2] As a Judge, v. 53. The God of Abraham (from whom Jacob descended), and the God of Nahor (from whom Laban descended), the God of their father (the common ancestor, from whom they both descended), judge betwixt us. God's relation to them is thus expressed to intimate that they worshipped one and the same God, upon which consideration there ought to be no enmity between them. (5) They gave a new name to the place, v. 47, 48. Laban called it in Syriac, and Jacob in Hebrew, the heap of witness; and (v. 49) it was called Mizpah, a watch-tower. These names are applicable to the seals of the gospel covenant, which are witnesses to us if we be faithful, but witnesses against us if we be false. The name Jacob gave this heap (Galeed) stuck by it, not the name Laban gave it. In all this rencounter, Laban was noisy and full of words, affecting to say much; Jacob was silent, and said little.

Lastly, After all this angry parley, they part friends, v. 55.

CHAP. XXXII

We have here Jacob still upon his journey towards Canaan. Never did so many memorable things occur in any march as in this of Jacob's little family. By the way he meets, I. With good tidings from his God, ver. 1, 2. II. With bad tidings from his brother, to whom he sent a message to notify his return, ver. 3–6. In his distress, 1. He divides his company, ver. 7, 8. 2. He makes his prayer to God, ver. 9–12. 3. He sends a present to his brother, ver. 13 23. 4. He wrestles with the angel, ver. 24–32.

Verses 1–2

1. Here is Jacob's convoy in his journey (v. 1): The angels of God met him, in a visible appearance, whether in a vision by day or in a dream by night, as when he saw them upon the ladder (ch. xxviii. 12), is uncertain. They had invisibly attended him all along, but now they appeared to him, because he had greater dangers before him than those he had hitherto encountered. God will have us, when we are in peace, to provide for trouble, and, when trouble comes, to live upon former observations and experiences; for we walk by faith, not by sight. God's people, at death, are returning to Canaan, to their Father's house; and then the angels of God will meet them. 2. The comfortable notice he took of this convoy, v. 2. This is God's host. To preserve the remembrance of this favour, Jacob gave a name to the place from it, Mahanaim, two hosts, one on either side, or one in the front and the other in the rear, to protect him from Laban behind and Esau before, that they might be a complete guard. Thus he is compassed with God's favour. Perhaps in allusion to this the church is called Mahanaim, two armies, Cant. vi. 13. Here were Jacob's family, which made one army, representing the church militant and itinerant on earth; and the angels, another army, representing the church triumphant and at rest in heaven.

Verses 3–8

He takes occasion to remind himself of the enemies he had, particularly Esau. It is probable that Rebekah had sent him word of Esau's settlement in Seir, and of the continuance of his enmity to him. What shall poor Jacob do? He longs to see his father, and yet he dreads to see his brother.

I. He sends a very kind and humble message to Esau. Acts of civility may help to slay enmities. 1. He calls Esau his lord, himself his servant, to intimate that he did not insist upon the prerogatives of the birthright and blessing he had obtained for himself. 2. He gives him a short account of himself, that he was not a fugitive and a vagabond, and that he was not a beggar, nor did he come home, as the prodigal son, destitute of necessaries and likely to be a charge to his relations. And, 3. He courts his favour: I have sent, that I might find grace in thy sight.

II. He receives a very formidable account of Esau's warlike preparations against him (v. 6), He comes to meet thee, and four hundred men with him. 1. He remembers the old quarrel, and will now be avenged on him for the birthright and blessing, and, if possible, defeat Jacob's expectations from both. Angry men have good memories. 2. He envies Jacob what little estate he had, and, though he himself was now possessed of a much better, yet nothing will serve him but to feed his eyes upon Jacob's ruin, and fill his fields with Jacob's spoils. 3. He concludes it easy to destroy him, now that he was upon the road, a poor weary traveller, unfixed, and (as he thinks) unguarded. 4. He resolves to do it suddenly, and before Jacob had come to his father, lest he should interpose and mediate between them. Out he marches, spurred on with rage; four hundred men he had with him, armed, and now breathing nothing but threatenings and slaughter. The tenth part of these were enough to cut off poor Jacob, and his guiltless helpless family, root and branch. Jacob, though a man of great faith, yet was now greatly afraid. Note, A lively apprehension of danger may very well consist with a humble confidence in God's power and promise. Christ himself, in his agony, was sorely amazed.

III. He puts himself into the best posture of defence that his present circumstances will admit. It was absurd to think of making resistance, all his contrivance is to make an escape, v. 7, 8. He divided his company, not as Abraham (ch. xiv. 15), for fight, but for flight.

Verses 9–12

Our rule is to call upon God in the time of trouble; we have here an example to this rule, and the success encourages us to follow this example. In his distress he sought the Lord, and he heard him. Times of fear should be times of prayer; whatever frightens us should drive us to our knees, to our God. Now it is worth while to enquire what there was extraordinary in this prayer, that it should gain the petitioner all this honour.

I. The request itself is one, and very express: Deliver me from the hand of my brother, v. 11.

II. The pleas are many, and very powerful; never was cause better ordered, Job xxiii. 4. He offers up his request with great faith, fervency, and humility.

1. He addresses himself to God as the God of his fathers, v. 9. Such was the humble self-denying sense he had of his own unworthiness that he did not call God his own God, but a God in covenant with his ancestors. God's covenant with our fathers may be a comfort to us when we are in distress.

2. He produces his warrant: Thou saidst unto me, Return unto thy country. We may be going whither God calls us, and yet may think our way hedged up with thorns. If God be our guide, he will be our guard.

3. He humbly acknowledges his own unworthiness to receive any favour from God (v. 10): I am not worthy; it is an unusual plea. Christ never commended any of his petitioners so much as him who said, Lord, I am not worthy (Matt. viii. 8), and her who said, Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table, Matt. xv. 27. Now observe, (1) How magnificently and honourably he speaks of the mercies of God to him. (2) How meanly and humbly he speaks of himself, disclaiming all thought of his own merit: "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies, much less am I worthy of so great a favour as this I am now suing for." I am less than all thy mercies; so the word is. Those are best prepared for the greatest mercies that see themselves unworthy of the least.

4. He thankfully owns God's goodness to him in his banishment, and how much it had outdone his expectations: "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, poor and desolate, like a forlorn and despised pilgrim"; "and now I have become two bands, now I am surrounded with a numerous and comfortable retinue of children and servants."

5. He urges the extremity of the peril he was in: Lord, deliver me from Esau, for I fear him, v. 11. The people of God have not been shy of telling God their fears. The fear that quickens prayer is itself pleadable.

6. He insists especially upon the promise God had made him (v. 9): Thou saidst, I will deal well with thee, and again, in the close (v. 12): Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good. The best we can say to God in prayer is what he has said to us.

Jacob, having piously made God his friend by a prayer, is here prudently endeavouring to make Esau his friend by a present. He had prayed to God to deliver him from the hand of Esau, nor did his prayer make him presume upon God's mercy, without the use of means. When we have prayed to God for any mercy, we must second our prayers with our endeavours. To pacify Esau,

I. Jacob sent him a very noble present of cattle, to the number of 580 in all, v. 13–15. It was a present that he thought would be acceptable to Esau, who had traded so much in hunting wild beasts that perhaps he was but ill furnished with tame cattle with which to stock his new conquests. Peace and love, though purchased dearly, will prove a good bargain to the purchaser. Jacob forgives and forgets.

II. He sent him a very humble message, which he ordered his servants to deliver in the best manner, v. 17, 18. They must call Esau their lord, and Jacob his servant; they must tell him the cattle they had was a small present which Jacob had sent him. They must especially take care to tell him that Jacob was coming after (v. 18–20), that he might not suspect he had fled through fear. If Jacob will seem not to be afraid of Esau, Esau, it may be hoped, will not be a terror to Jacob.

We have here the remarkable story of Jacob's wrestling with the angel and prevailing, which is referred to, Hos. xii. 4. Very early in the morning, a great while before day, Jacob had helped his wives and his children over the river, and he desired to be private, and was left alone, that he might again more fully spread his cares and fears before God in prayer. While Jacob was earnest in prayer, stirring up himself to take hold on God, an angel takes hold on him. Some think this was the angel of his presence (Isa. lxiii. 9), one of those that attend on the shechinah, or the divine Majesty. Others think it was Michael our prince, the eternal Word, the angel of the covenant. Observe,

I. How Jacob and this angel engaged, v. 24. Jacob was now full of care and fear about the interview he expected, next day, with his brother, and God himself seemed to oppose his entrance into the land of promise. We are told by the prophet (Hos. xii. 4) how Jacob wrestled: he wept, and made supplication; prayers and tears were his weapons.

II. What was the success of the engagement. 1. Jacob kept his ground; though the struggle continued long, the angel prevailed not against him (v. 25), that is, this discouragement did not shake his faith, nor silence his prayer. It was not in his own strength that he wrestled, nor by his own strength that he prevailed, but in and by strength derived from Heaven. Note, We cannot prevail with God but in his own strength. It is his Spirit that intercedes in us, and helps our infirmities, Rom. viii. 26. 2. The angel put out Jacob's thigh. Some think that Jacob felt little or no pain from this hurt; it is probable that he did not, for he did not so much as halt till the struggle was over (v. 31), and, if so, this was an evidence of a divine touch indeed, which wounded and healed at the same time. 3. The angel, by an admirable condescension, mildly requests Jacob to let him go (v. 26), as God said to Moses (Exod. xxxii. 10), Let me alone. Thus he would put an honour on Jacob's faith and prayer, and further try his constancy. 4. Jacob persists in his holy importunity:

I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. The credit of a conquest will do him no good without the comfort of a blessing. In begging this blessing he owns his inferiority, though he seemed to have the upper hand in the struggle. 5. The angel puts a perpetual mark of honour upon him, by changing his name (v. 27, 28): "Thou art a brave combatant" (says the angel), "a man of heroic resolution; what is thy name?" "Jacob," says he, a supplanter; so Jacob signifies: "Well," says the angel, "thou shalt be called Israel, a prince with God." Jacob is here knighted in the field, as it were, and has a title of honour which will remain, to his praise, to the end of time. Yet this was not all; having power with God, he shall have power with men too. 6. He dismisses him with a blessing, v. 29. Instead of telling him his name, he gave him his blessing, which was the thing he wrestled for. An interest in the angel's blessing is better than an acquaintance with his name. The tree of life is better than the tree of knowledge. 7. Jacob gives a new name to the place; he calls it Peniel, the face of God (v. 30). The name he gives to the place preserves and perpetuates, not the honour of his valour or victory, but only the honour of God's free grace. "In this place I saw God face to face, and my life was preserved"; not, "It was my praise that I came off a conqueror, but it was God's mercy that I escaped with my life." 8. The memorandum Jacob carried of this in his bones: He halted on his thigh (v. 31). The honour and comfort he obtained by this struggle were abundantly sufficient to countervail the damage, though he went limping to his grave. Notice is taken of the sun's rising upon him when he passed over Penuel; for it is sunrise with that soul that has communion with God. The inspired penman mentions a traditional custom which the seed of Jacob had, never to eat of that sinew, or muscle, in any beast, by which the hip-bone is fixed in its cup: thus they preserved the memorial of this story.

CHAP. XXXIII

We read, in the former chapter, how Jacob had power with God, and prevailed; here we find what power he had with men too, and how his brother Esau was mollified, and, on a sudden, reconciled to him. Here is, I. A very friendly meeting between Jacob and Esau, ver. 1–4. II. Their conference at their meeting, in which they vie with each other in civil and kind expressions. Their discourse is, 1. About Jacob's family, ver. 5–7. 2. About the present he had sent, ver. 8–11. 3. About the progress of their journey, ver. 12–15. III. Jacob's settlement in Canaan, his house, ground, and altar, ver. 16–20.

Here, I. Jacob discovered Esau's approach, v. 1. Some think that his lifting up his eyes denotes his cheerfulness and confidence, in opposition to a dejected countenance; having by prayer committed his case to God, he went on his way, and his countenance was no more sad, 1 Sam. i. 18.

II. He put his family into the best order he could to receive him. Observe what a different figure these two brothers made. Esau is attended with a guard of 400 men, and looks big; Jacob is followed by a cumbersome train of women and children that are his care, and he looks tender and solicitous for their safety; and yet Jacob had the birthright, and was to have the dominion, and was every way the better man. Jacob, at the head of his household, set a better example than Esau at the head of his regiment.

III. At their meeting, the expressions of kindness were interchanged in the best manner that could be between them.

1. Jacob bowed to Esau, v. 3. Though he feared Esau as an enemy, yet he did obeisance to him as an elder brother. Many preserve themselves by humbling themselves: the bullet flies over him that stoops.

2. Esau embraced Jacob (v. 4): He ran to meet him, not in passion, but in love; and, as one heartily reconciled to him. If there was not some wonderful change wrought upon the spirit of Esau at this time, I see not how wrestling Jacob could be said to obtain such power with men as to denominate him a prince. God has the hearts of all men in his hands, and can turn them when and how he pleases, by a secret, silent, but resistless power. He can, of a sudden, convert enemies into friends, as he did two Sauls, one by restraining grace (1 Sam. xxvi. 21, 25), the other by renewing grace, Acts ix. 21, 22.

They both wept. Jacob wept for joy, to be thus kindly received by his brother, and Esau perhaps wept for grief and shame.

We have here the discourse between the two brothers at their meeting. They converse,

I. About Jacob's retinue, v. 5–7. Eleven or twelve little ones, the eldest of them not fourteen years old, followed Jacob closely: Who are these? says Esau. Jacob returns a serious answer: They are the children which God hath graciously given thy servant. Jacob speaks of his children as God's gifts; they are a heritage of the Lord, Ps. cxxviii. 3; cxii. 9; cvii. 41.

II. About the present he had sent him.

1. Esau modestly refused it because he had enough, and did not need it, v. 9. It is a good thing for those that have much to know that they have enough, though they have not so much as some others have. Even Esau can say, I have enough.

2. Jacob affectionately urges him to accept it, and prevails, v. 10, 11. Jacob sent it, through fear (ch. xxxii. 20), but, the fear being over, he now importunes his acceptance of it for love, to show that he desires his brother's friendship, and did not merely dread his wrath. It is a very high compliment that he passes upon him: I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God. The meaning is that Jacob saw God's favour to him in Esau's: it was a token for good to him that God had accepted his prayers. The competency he had of this world's goods: God has dealt graciously with me. "And I have enough; I have all," so the word is. Esau's enough was much, but Jacob's enough was all. He has all in prospect; he will have all shortly, when he comes to heaven: upon this principle Jacob urged Esau, and he took his present.

III. About the progress of their journey. 1. Esau offers himself to be his guide and companion, in token of sincere reconciliation, v. 12. Esau has become fond of Jacob's company, courts him to Mount Seir: let us never despair of any, nor distrust God in whose hand all hearts are. Yet Jacob saw cause modestly to refuse this offer (v. 13, 14), wherein he shows a tender concern for his own family and flocks, like a good shepherd and a good father. He must consider the children, and the flocks with young, and not lead the one, nor drive the other, too fast. This prudence and tenderness of Jacob ought to be imitated by those that have the care and charge of young people in the things of God. They must not be over-driven, at first, by heavy tasks in religious services, but led, as they can bear, having their work made as easy to them as possible. Christ, the good Shepherd, does so, Isa. xl. 11. 2. Esau offers some of his men to be his guard and convoy, v. 15. (1) Jacob is humble, and needs it not for state. (2) Jacob is under the divine protection, and needs it not for safety.

Here, 1. Having in a friendly manner parted with Esau, who had gone to his own country (v. 16), he comes to a place where, it should seem, he rested for some time. The place was afterwards known by the name of Succoth, a city in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan (it signifies booths), that when his posterity afterwards dwelt in houses of stone, they might remember that the Syrian ready to perish was their father, who was glad of booths (Deut. xxvi. 5). 2. He comes to Shechem; we read it, to Shalem, a city of Shechem. After a perilous journey, in which he had met with many difficulties, he came safely, at last, into Canaan. Here, (1) He buys a field, v. 19. Though the land of Canaan was his by promise, yet, the time for taking possession not having yet come, he is content to pay for his own. (2) He builds an altar, v. 20. [1] In thankfulness to God. [2] That he might keep up the worship of God, in his family. Where we have a tent God must have an altar, where we have a house he must have a church in it. He dedicated this altar to the honour of El-elohe-Israel—God, the God of Israel. God had lately called him by the name of Israel, and now he calls God the God of Israel; though he is styled a prince with God, God shall still be a prince with him, his Lord and his God.

CHAP. XXXIV

At this chapter begins the story of Jacob's afflictions in his children, which are recorded to show, 1. The vanity of this world. That which is dearest to us may prove our great vexation. 2. The common griefs of good people. Jacob's sons, though they were his grief in some things, yet were all taken into covenant with God. In this chapter we have, I. Dinah debauched, ver. 1–5. II. A treaty of marriage between her and Shechem who had defiled her, ver. 6–19. III. The circumcision of the Shechemites pursuant to that treaty, ver. 20–24. IV. The perfidious and bloody revenge which Simeon and Levi took upon them, ver. 25–31.

Verses 1–5

Dinah, Jacob's only daughter, is reckoned now but fifteen or sixteen years of age when she here occasioned so much mischief. Observe, 1. Her vain curiosity. She went to see, yet that was not all, she went to be seen too; she went to see the daughters of the land, but, it may be, with some thoughts of the sons of the land too. I doubt she went to get an acquaintance with those Canaanites, and to learn their way. 2. The loss of her honour by this means (v. 2). Dinah went abroad to look about her; but, if she had looked about her as she ought, she would not have fallen into this snare. 3. The court Shechem made to her, after he had defiled her. 4. The tidings brought to poor Jacob, v. 5. The good man held his peace, as one astonished, that knows not what to say. He had left the management of his affairs very much (too much I doubt) to his sons, and he would do nothing without them. Note, Things never go well when the authority of a parent runs low in a family.

Verses 6–17

Jacob's sons, when they heard of the injury done to Dinah, showed a very great resentment of it, influenced perhaps rather by jealousy for the honour of their family than by a sense of virtue. Many are concerned at the shamefulness of sin that never lay to heart the sinfulness of it. It is here called folly in Israel (v. 7). Note, 1. Uncleanness is folly; for it sacrifices the favour of God, peace of conscience, and all the soul can pretend to that is sacred and honourable, to a base and brutish lust. 2. This folly is most shameful in Israel, in a family of Israel, where God is known and worshipped.

Hamor came to treat with Jacob himself, but he turns him over to his sons; and here we have a particular account of the treaty, in which the Canaanites were more honest than the Israelites.

I. Hamor and Shechem fairly propose this match, in order to a coalition in trade. Shechem is deeply in love with Dinah; he will have her upon any terms, v. 11, 12. His father not only consents, but solicits for him, and gravely insists upon the advantages that would follow from the union of the families, v. 9, 10.

II. Jacob's sons basely pretend to insist upon a coalition in religion, when really they designed nothing less. Jacob's sons meditate only revenge. The Shechemites must be circumcised; not to make them holy (they never intended that), but to make them sore, that they might become an easier prey to their sword. 1. The pretence was specious. 2. The intention was malicious, as appears by the sequel of the story; all they aimed at was to prepare them for the day of slaughter. Religion is never more injured, nor are God's sacraments more profaned, than when they are thus used for a cloak of maliciousness.

1. Hamor and Shechem gave consent themselves to be circumcised, v. 18, 19. To this perhaps they were moved by what they might have heard of the sacred and honourable intentions of this sign, in the family of Abraham, which, it is probable, they had some confused notions. Note, Many who know little of religion, yet know so much of it as makes them willing to join themselves with those that are religious. Jacob's sons were industrious thriving people, and promised themselves and their neighbours advantage by an alliance with them; it would improve ground and trade, and bring money into their country. Now, (1) It was bad enough to marry upon this principle. (2) It was worse to be circumcised upon this principle. There are many with whom gain is godliness, and who are more governed and influenced by their secular interest than by any principle of their religion.

Verses 25–31

Simeon and Levi, two of Jacob's sons, young men not much above twenty years old, cutting the throats of the Shechemites, and thereby breaking the heart of their good father.

I. The barbarous murder of the Shechemites.

1. Slaying the inhabitants of Shechem—all the males, Hamor and Shechem particularly, with whom they had been treating in a friendly manner but the other day, yet with a design upon their lives. Note, As nothing secures us better than true religion, so nothing exposes us more than religion only pretended to. But Simeon and Levi were most unrighteous. (1) It was true that Shechem had wrought folly against Israel, in defiling Dinah; but it ought to have been considered how far Dinah herself had been accessory to it. (2) It was true that Shechem had done ill; but he was endeavouring to atone for it, and was as honest and honourable, ex post facto—after the deed, as the case would admit. (3) It was true that Shechem had done ill; but what was that to all the Shechemites? Must the innocent fall with the guilty? (4) But that which above all aggravated the cruelty was the most perfidious treachery that was in it.

2. Seizing the prey of Shechem, and plundering the town. The Shechemites were willing to gratify the sons of Jacob by submitting to the penance of circumcision, upon this principle, Shall not their cattle and their substance be ours? (v. 23), and see what was the issue; instead of making themselves masters of the wealth of Jacob's family, Jacob's family become masters of their wealth.

II. Here is Jacob's resentment of this bloody deed of Simeon and Levi, v. 30. Two things he bitterly complains of:—1. The reproach they had brought upon him thereby: What will they say of us and our religion? 2. The ruin they had exposed him to. What could be expected, but that the Canaanites, who were numerous and formidable, would confederate against him, and he and his little family would become an easy prey to them? Note, When sin is in the house, there is reason to fear ruin at the door. One would think this should have made them to relent, but, instead of this, they justify themselves, and give him this insolent reply, Should he deal with our sister as with a harlot?

CHAP. XXXV

In this chapter we have three communions and three funerals. I. Three communions between God and Jacob. 1. God ordered Jacob to Beth-el, ver. 1–5. 2. Jacob built an altar at Beth-el, to the honour of God that had appeared to him, ver. 6, 7. 3. God appeared to him again, and confirmed the change of his name and the covenant with him (ver. 9–13), of which appearance Jacob made a grateful acknowledgment, ver. 14, 15. II. Three funerals. 1. Deborah's, ver. 8. 2. Rachel's, ver. 16–20. 3. Isaac's, ver. 27–29. Here is also Reuben's incest (ver. 22), and an account of Jacob's sons, ver. 23–26.

Verses 1–5

I. God reminds Jacob of his vow at Beth-el, and sends him thither to perform it, v. 1. Jacob had said in the day of his distress, If I come again in peace, this stone shall be God's house, ch. xxviii. 22. Seven or eight years it was now since he came to Canaan; he had purchased ground there, and had built an altar in remembrance of God's last appearance to him when he called him Israel (ch. xxxiii. 19, 20); but still Beth-el is forgotten. Note, 1. As many as God loves he will remind of neglected duties, one way or other, by conscience or by providences. 2. When we have vowed a vow to God, it is best not to defer the payment of it (Eccles. v. 4), yet better late than never. In Beth-el, the house of God, we should desire to dwell, Ps. xxvii. 4. That should be our home, not our inn. God reminds him not expressly of his vow, but of the occasion of it: When thou fleddest from the face of Esau.

II. Jacob commands his household to prepare for this solemnity; not only for the journey and remove, but for the religious services that were to be performed, v. 2, 3. Observe the commands he gives his household, like Abraham, ch. xviii. 19. 1. They must put away the strange gods. Strange gods in Jacob's family! Strange things indeed! Could such a family, that was taught the good knowledge of the Lord, admit them? In those families where there is a face of religion, and an altar to God, yet many times there is much amiss, and more strange gods than one would suspect. 2. They must be clean, and change their garments. Simeon and Levi had their hands full of blood, it concerned them particularly to wash, and to put off their garments that were so stained. These were but ceremonies, signifying the purification and change of the heart. What are clean clothes, and new clothes, without a clean heart, and a new heart? 3. They must go with him to Bethel, v. 3.

III. His family surrendered all they had that was idolatrous or superstitious, v. 4. Jacob took care to bury their images, that they might not afterwards find them and return to them.

IV. He removes without molestation from Shechem to Bethel, v. 5. The terror of God was upon the cities. Note, The way of duty is the way of safety. While there was sin in Jacob's house, he was afraid of his neighbours; but now that the strange gods were put away, and they were all going together to Bethel, his neighbours were afraid of him.

Jacob and his retinue having safely arrived at Bethel, we are here told what passed there.

I. There he built an altar (v. 7), and offered sacrifice upon it. With these sacrifices he joined praises for former mercies. And he called the place (that is, the altar) El-beth-el, the God of Bethel. Note, The comfort which the saints have in holy ordinances is not so much from Bethel, the house of God, as from El-beth-el, the God of the house. The ordinances are but empty things if we do not meet with God in them.

II. There he buried Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, v. 8. Rebekah probably was dead, but her old nurse (of whom mention is made ch. xxiv. 59) survived her. Honour was done to this nurse, at her death, by Jacob's family, though she was not related to them, and though she was aged. Family afflictions may come even when family reformation and religion are on foot.

III. There God appeared to him (v. 9), to own his altar, to answer to the name by which he had called him, The God of Bethel (v. 7), and to comfort him under his affliction, v. 8. He renewed and ratified the covenant with him, by the name El-Shaddai. I am God Almighty, God all-sufficient (v. 11), able to make good the promise in due time. Two things are promised, 1. That he should be the father of a great nation. 2. That he should be the master of a good land (v. 12). He shall not have children without an estate, which is often the case of the poor, nor an estate without children, which is often the grief of the rich; but both. These two promises had a spiritual signification, for, without doubt, Christ is the promised seed, and heaven is the promised land. He then went up from him, or from over him, in some visible display of glory, which had hovered over him while he talked with him, v. 13.

IV. There Jacob erected a memorial of this, v. 14. He set up a pillar. In token of his intending it for a sacred memorial of his communion with God, he poured oil and the other ingredients of a drink-offering upon it. His vow was, This stone shall be God's house, that is, shall be set up for his honour, as houses to the praise of their builders.

We have here the story of the death of Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob. 1. She fell in travail by the way, not able to reach to Bethlehem, the next town, though they were near it. Her travail was to the life of the child, but to her own death. Her dying is here called the departing of her soul. Note, The death of the body is but the departure of the soul to the world of spirits. Her dying lips called her newborn son Ben-oni, The son of my sorrow. But Jacob, because he would not renew the sorrowful remembrance of the mother's death every time he called his son by his name, changed his name, and called him Benjamin, The son of my right hand; that is, "very dear to me, set on my right hand for a blessing, the support of my age, like the staff in my right hand." Jacob buried her near the place where she died. If the soul be at rest after death, it matters little where the body lies. Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave, so that it was known, long after, to be Rachel's sepulchre (1 Sam. x. 2), and Providence so ordered it that this place afterwards fell in the lot of Benjamin.

Verses 21–29

Here is, 1. Jacob's removal, v. 21. Immediately after the story of Rachel's death he is here called Israel (v. 21, 22), and not often so afterwards: the Jews say, "The historian does him this honour here because he bore that affliction with such admirable patience and submission to Providence." 2. The sin of Reuben. A piece of abominable wickedness it was that he was guilty of (v. 22). Though perhaps Bilhah was the greater criminal, and it is probable was abandoned by Jacob for it, yet Reuben's crime was so provoking that, for it, he lost his birthright and blessing, ch. xlix. 4. This was Reuben's sin, but it was Jacob's affliction. 3. A complete list of the sons of Jacob, now that Benjamin the youngest was born. This is the first time we have the names of these heads of the twelve tribes together. 4. The visit which Jacob made to his father Isaac at Hebron. Probably he did this now upon the death of Rebekah, by which Isaac was left solitary. 5. The age and death of Isaac are here recorded. Isaac, a mild quiet man, lived the longest of all the patriarchs. Particular notice is taken of the amicable agreement of Esau and Jacob, in solemnizing their father's funeral (v. 29), to show how wonderfully God had changed Esau's mind since he vowed his brother's murder immediately after his father's death, ch. xxvii. 41.

CHAP. XXXVI

In this chapter we have an account of the posterity of Esau, who, from him, were called Edomites. I. Because he was the son of Isaac, for whose sake this honour is put upon him. 2. Because the Edomites were neighbours to Israel. 3. It is to show the performance of the promise to Abraham, that he should be "the father of many nations," and of that answer which Rebekah had from the oracle she consulted, "Two nations are in thy womb," and of the blessing of Isaac, "Thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth." We have here, I. Esau's wives, ver. 1–5. II. His remove to Mount Seir, ver. 6–8. III. The names of his sons, ver. 9–14. IV. The dukes who descended of his sons, ver. 15–19. V. The dukes of the Horites, ver. 20–30. VI. The kings and dukes of Edom, ver. 31–43. This chapter is abridged, 1 Chron. i. 35, &c.

Verses 1–8

1. Concerning Esau himself, v. 1. He is called Edom (and again, v. 8), that name by which was perpetuated the remembrance of the foolish bargain he made, when he sold his birthright for that red, that red pottage. 2. Concerning his wives, and the children they bore him in the land of Canaan. 3. Concerning his removal to Mount Seir, which was the country God had given him for a possession, when he reserved Canaan for the seed of Jacob. God owns it, long afterwards: I gave to Esau Mount Seir (Deut. ii. 5; Josh. xxiv. 4), which was the reason why the Edomites must not be disturbed in their possession. He wholly withdrew to Mount Seir, took with him what came to his share of his father's personal estate, and left Canaan to Jacob, not only because he had the promise of it, but because Esau perceived that if they should continue to thrive as they had begun there would not be room for both.

Verses 9–19

Observe here, 1. That only the names of Esau's sons and grandsons are recorded, only their names, not their history. Nor does the genealogy go any further than the third and fourth generation. It is only the pedigree of the Israelites, who were to be the heirs of Canaan, and of whom were to come the promised seed, and the holy seed, that is drawn out to any length, as far as there was occasion for it, even of all the tribes till Canaan was divided among them, and of the royal line till Christ came. 2. That these sons and grandsons of Esau are called dukes, or captains, that had soldiers under them; for Esau and his family lived by the sword, ch. xxvii. 40. Esau's sons were dukes when Jacob's sons were but plain shepherds, ch. xlvii. 3. This is not a reason why such titles should not be used among Christians; but it is a reason why men should not overvalue themselves, or others, for the sake of them. 3. Esau increases, and is enriched first. God's promise to Jacob began to work late, but the effect of it remained longer, and it had its complete accomplishment in the spiritual Israel.

Verses 20–30

In the midst of this genealogy of the Edomites here is inserted the genealogy of the Horites, those Canaanites, or Hittites (compare ch. xxvi. 34), that were the natives of Mount Seir. This comes in here, not only to give light to the story, but to be a standing reflection upon the Edomites for intermarrying with them. Esau having sold his birthright, and lost his blessing, and entered into alliance with the Hittites, his posterity and the sons of Seir are here reckoned together.

Verses 31–42

By degrees, it seems, the Edomites wormed out the Horites, obtained full possession of the country, and had a government of their own. 1. They were ruled by kings, and seem to have come to the throne by election, and not by lineal descent. These kings reigned in Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel. Esau's blood becomes royal long before any of Jacob's did. We may suppose it was a great trial to the faith of God's Israel to hear of the pomp and power of the kings of Edom, while they were bond-slaves in Egypt; but those that look for great things from God must be content to wait for them; God's time is the best time. 2. They were afterwards governed by dukes, again here named, who, I suppose, ruled all at the same time in several places in the country. We read of the dukes of Edom (Exod. xv. 15), yet, long afterwards, of their kings again. 3. Mount Seir is called the land of their possession, v. 43. While the Israelites dwelt in the house of bondage, and their Canaan was only the land of promise, the Edomites dwelt in their own habitations, and Seir was in their possession. Note, The children of this world have their all in hand, and nothing in hope (Luke xvi. 25); while the children of God have their all in hope, and next to nothing in hand. But, all things considered, it is better to have Canaan in promise than Mount Seir in possession.

CHAP. XXXVII

At this chapter begins the story of Joseph, who, in every subsequent chapter but one to the end of this book, makes the greatest figure. His story is so remarkably divided between his humiliation and his exaltation that we cannot avoid seeing something of Christ in it, who was first humbled and then exalted. It also shows the lot of Christians, who must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom. In this chapter we have, I. The malice his brethren bore against him. 1. Because he informed his father of their wickedness, ver. 1, 2. 2. Because his father loved him, ver. 3, 4. 3. Because he dreamed of his dominion over them, ver. 5–11. II. The mischiefs his brethren designed and did to him. 1. The kind visit he made them gave an opportunity, ver. 12–17. 2. They designed to slay him, but determined to starve him, ver. 18–24. 3. They changed their purpose, and sold him for a slave, ver. 25–28. 4. They made their father believe that he was torn in pieces, ver. 29–35. 5. He was sold into Egypt to Potiphar, ver. 36. And all this was working together for good.

Verses 1–4

The story of Jacob's family: These are the generations of Jacob. His is not a bare barren genealogy as that of Esau (ch. xxxvi. 1), but a memorable useful history. Here is, 1. Jacob a sojourner with his father Isaac, who was yet living, v. 1. 2. Joseph a shepherd, feeding the flock with his brethren, v. 2. Though he was his father's darling, yet he was not brought up in idleness or delicacy. Those that are trained up to do nothing are likely to be good for nothing. 3. Joseph, beloved by his father (v. 3), was the greatest comfort of his old age. Jacob proclaimed his affection to him by dressing him finer than the rest of his children: He made him a coat of divers colours. 4. Joseph hated by his brethren, (1) Because his father loved him; when parents make a difference, children soon take notice of it, and it often occasions feuds and quarrels in families. (2) Because he brought to his father their evil report. Jacob's sons did that, when they were from under his eye, which they durst not have done if they had been at home with him; but Joseph gave his father an account of their bad carriage.

Verses 5–11

Here, I. Joseph relates the prophetical dreams he had, v. 6, 7, 9, 10. His dreams were, 1. That his brethren's sheaves all bowed to his, intimating upon what occasion they should be brought to do homage to him, namely, in seeking to him for corn; their empty sheaves should bow to his full one. 2. That the sun, and moon, and eleven stars, did obeisance to him, v. 9. Joseph was more of a prophet than a politician, else he would have kept this to himself, when he could not but know that his brethren did already hate him and that this would but the more exasperate them.

II. His brethren take it very ill, and are more and more enraged against him (v. 8): Shalt thou indeed reign over us? How scornfully they resented it: "Shalt thou, who art but one, reign over us, who are many? Thou, who art the youngest, over us who are older?"

III. His father gives him a gentle rebuke for it, yet observes the saying, v. 10, 11. Probably he checked him for it. He insinuated that it was but an idle dream. Jacob, like Mary (Luke ii. 51), kept these things in his heart, and no doubt remembered them long afterwards, when the event answered to the prediction.

Here is, I. The kind visit which Joseph, in obedience to his father's command, made to his brethren, who were feeding the flock at Shechem, many miles off. See in Joseph an instance, 1. Of dutifulness to his father. Though he was his father's darling, yet he was willing to be his father's servant. How readily does he wait his father's orders! 2. Of kindness to his brethren. Though he knew they hated him and envied him, yet he made no objections against his father's commands. Joseph was sent by his father to Shechem, to see whether his brethren were well there, and whether the country had not risen upon them and destroyed them, in revenge of their barbarous murder of the Shechemites some years before.

II. The bloody and malicious plot of his brethren against him, who rendered good for evil: it was not in a heat, or upon a sudden provocation, that they thought to slay him, but from malice prepense, and in cold blood. The more there is of a project and contrivance in a sin the worse it is; it is bad to do evil, but worse to devise it. How scornfully they reproached him for his dreams (v. 19): This dreamer cometh; and (v. 20), We shall see what will become of his dreams. This shows what it was that fretted and enraged them. They could not endure to think of doing homage to him. How they agreed to cover the murder with a lie: We will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him.

III. Reuben's project to deliver him, v. 21, 22. Reuben, of all the brothers, had most reason to be jealous of Joseph, for he was the first-born, yet he proves his best friend. Reuben made a proposal which they thought would effectually answer their intention of destroying Joseph, and yet which he designed should answer his intention of rescuing Joseph out of their hands and restoring him to his father. But God overruled all to serve his own purpose of making Joseph an instrument to save much people alive.

Verses 23–30

We have here the execution of their plot against Joseph. 1. They stripped him, each striving to seize the envied coat of many colours, v. 23. Thus, in imagination, they degraded him from the birthright, of which perhaps this was the badge. Thus our Lord Jesus was stripped of his seamless coat, and thus his suffering saints have first been industriously divested of their privileges and honours, and then made the off-scouring of all things. 2. They went about to starve him, throwing him into a dry pit, to perish there with hunger. Where envy reigns pity is banished, and humanity itself is forgotten, Prov. xxvii. 4. Is this he to whom his brethren must do homage? Note, God's providences often seem to contradict his purposes, even when they are serving them. 3. They slighted him when he was in distress, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph; they sat down to eat bread, v. 25. They felt no remorse of conscience for the sin; if they had, it would have spoiled their appetite for their meat, and the relish of it. They were now pleased to think how they were freed from the fear of their brother's dominion over them. 4. They sold him. A caravan of merchants very opportunely passed by, and Judah made the motion that they should sell Joseph to them, to be carried far enough off into Egypt, where, in all probability, he would be lost, and never heard of more. (1) Judah proposed it in compassion to Joseph (v. 26): "What profit is it if we slay our brother? (2) They acquiesced in it, because they thought that if he were sold for a slave he would never be a lord. Reuben thought himself undone, because the child was sold: I, whither shall I go? v. 30. He being the eldest, his father would expect from him an account of Joseph; but, as it proved, they would all have been undone if he had not been sold.

I. Joseph would soon be missed, great enquiry would be made for him, and therefore his brethren have a further design, to make the world believe that Joseph was torn in pieces by a wild beast; and this they did, 1. To clear themselves, that they might not be suspected to have done him any mischief. Note, When the devil has taught men to commit one sin, he then teaches them to conceal it with another, theft and murder with lying and perjury; but he that covers his sin shall not prosper long. 2. To grieve their good father. It seems designed by them on purpose to be revenged upon him for his distinguishing love of Joseph. They sent him Joseph's coat of many colours with one colour more than it had had, a bloody colour, v. 32. They pretended they had found it in the fields, and Jacob himself must be scornfully asked, Is this thy son's coat? Now let those that know the heart of a parent suppose the agonies of poor Jacob. Sleeping or waking, he imagines he sees the wild beast setting upon Joseph. He fancies how the beast tore him limb from limb, and left no remains of him, but the coat of many colours. Now, (1) Endeavours were used to comfort him. His sons basely pretended to do it (v. 35); but miserable hypocritical comforters were they all. Had they really desired to comfort him, they might easily have done it, by telling him the truth, "Joseph is alive, he is indeed sold into Egypt, but it will be an easy thing to send thither and ransom him." But (2) It was all in vain: Jacob refused to be comforted, v. 35.

II. The Ishmaelites and Midianites having bought Joseph only to make their market of him, here we have him sold again to Potiphar, v. 36. How soon was the land of Egypt made a house of bondage to the seed of Jacob! Jacob little thought that ever his beloved Joseph would be thus bought and sold for a servant.

CHAP. XXXVIII

This chapter gives us an account of Judah and his family. If we were to form a character of him by this story, we should not say, "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise," ch. xlix. 8. We have, in this chapter, I. Judah's marriage and issue, and the untimely death of his two eldest sons, ver. 1–11. II. Judah's incest with his daughter-in-law Tamar, without his knowing it, ver. 12–23. III. His confusion, when it was discovered, ver. 24–26. IV. The birth of his twin sons, in whom his family was built up, ver. 27, &c.

Verses 1–11

Here is, 1. Judah's foolish friendship with a Canaanite-man. 2. His foolish marriage with a Canaanite-woman, a match made, not by his father, who, it should seem, was not consulted, but by his new friend Hirah, v. 2. 3. Three sons he had by her, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Judah married too young, and very rashly; he also married his sons too young, when they had neither wit nor grace to govern themselves, and the consequences were very bad. (1) His first-born, Er, was notoriously wicked; he was so in the sight of the Lord, that is, in defiance of God and his law. (2) The next son, Onan, was, according to the ancient usage, married to the widow, to preserve the name of his deceased brother that died childless. The custom of marrying the brother's widow was afterwards made one of the laws of Moses, Deut. xxv. 5. Onan, though he consented to marry the widow, yet, to the great abuse of his own body, of the wife that he had married, and of the memory of his brother that was gone, refused to raise up seed unto his brother. (3) Shelah, the third son, was reserved for the widow (v. 11), yet with a design that he should not marry so young. However, Tamar acquiesced for the present, and waited the issue.

Verses 12–23

It is a very ill-favoured story that is here told concerning Judah. He was unjust to his daughter-in-law, either through negligence or design, in not giving her his surviving son, and this exposed her to temptation.

I. Tamar wickedly prostituted herself as a harlot to Judah, that, if the son might not, the father might raise up seed to the deceased. Bishop Patrick thinks it probable that she hoped Shelah, who was by right her husband, might have come along with his father, and that he might have been allured to her embraces. 1. She took an opportunity for it, when Judah had a time of mirth and feasting with his sheep-shearers. 2. She exposed herself as a harlot in an open place, v. 14. It should seem, it was the custom of harlots, in those times, to cover their faces, that, though they were not ashamed, yet they might seem to be so. The sin of uncleanness did not then go so barefaced as it does now.

II. Judah was taken in the snare, and though it was ignorantly that he was guilty of incest with his daughter-in-law (not knowing who she was), yet he was wilfully guilty of fornication: whoever she was, he knew she was not his wife, and therefore not to be touched. Observe, 1. Judah's sin began in the eye (v. 15): He saw her. We have need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to turn them from beholding vanity, lest the eye infect the heart. 2. It added to the scandal that the hire of a harlot (than which nothing is more infamous) was demanded, offered, and accepted—a kid from the flock, a goodly price at which her chastity and honour were valued! Nay, had the consideration been thousands of rams, and ten thousand rivers of oil, it had not been a valuable consideration. The favour of God, the purity of the soul, the peace of conscience, and the hope of heaven, are too precious to be exposed to sale at any such rates. 3. It turned to the reproach of Judah that he left his jewels in pawn for a kid.

III. He lost his jewels by the bargain; he sent the kid, according to his promise, to redeem his pawn, but the supposed harlot could not be found. Judah sits down content to lose his signet and his bracelets, and forbids any further enquiry, lest we be shamed,

23. He expresses no concern about the sin, to get that pardoned, only about the shame, to prevent that.

Verses 24–30

I. Judah's rigour against Tamar, when he heard she was an adulteress. She was, in the eye of the law, Shelah's wife, and therefore her being with child by another was looked upon as an injury and reproach to Judah's family: Bring her forth therefore, says Judah, the master of the family, and let her be burnt; not burnt to death, but burnt in the cheek or forehead, stigmatized for a harlot. Note, It is a common thing for men to be severe against those very sins in others in which yet they allow themselves; and so, in judging others, they condemn themselves, Rom. ii. 1; xiv. 22.

II. Judah's shame, when it was made to appear that he was the adulterer. She produced the ring and the bracelets in court, which justified the fathering of the child upon Judah, v. 25, 26. He owns that a perpetual mark of infamy should be fastened rather upon him, who had been so much accessory to it.

III. The building up of Judah's family in the birth of Pharez and Zarah, from whom descended the most considerable families of the illustrious tribe of Judah. The four eldest sons of Jacob fell under very foul guilt, Reuben and Judah under the guilt of incest, Simeon and Levi under that of murder; yet they were patriarchs, and from Levi descended the priests, from Judah the kings and Messiah. Thus they became examples of repentance, and monuments of pardoning mercy.

CHAP. XXXIX

At this chapter we return to the story of Joseph. We have him here, I. A servant, a slave in Potiphar's house (ver. 1), and yet there greatly honoured and favoured. 1. By the providence of God, which made him, in effect, a master, ver. 2–6. 2. By the grace of God, which made him more than a conqueror over a strong temptation to uncleanness, ver. 7–12. II. We have him here a sufferer, falsely accused (ver. 13–18), imprisoned (ver. 19, 20), and yet his imprisonment made both honourable and comfortable by the tokens of God's special presence with him, ver. 21–23.

Verses 1–6

I. Joseph was sold to an officer of Pharaoh, with whom he might get acquainted with public persons and public business, and so be fitted for the preferment for which he was designed. What God intends men for he will be sure, some way or other, to qualify them for.

II. Joseph blessed, wonderfully blessed, even in the house of his servitude.

1. God prospered him, v. 2, 3. Though, at first, we may suppose that his hand was put to the meanest services, even in those appeared his ingenuity and industry; a particular blessing of Heaven attended him, which, as he rose in his employment, became more and more discernible. Joseph's brethren had stripped him of his coat of many colours, but they could not strip him of his virtue and prudence. Joseph was separated from his brethren, but not from his God; banished from his father's house, but the Lord was with him, and this comforted him.

2. His master preferred him, and by degrees made him steward of his household, v. 4. It is the wisdom of those that are in any sort of authority to countenance and employ those with whom it appears that the presence of God is, Ps. ci. 6. Potiphar knew what he did when he put all into the hands of Joseph.

3. God favoured his master for his sake (v. 5): He blessed the Egyptian's house, though he was an Egyptian, a stranger to the true God, for Joseph's sake. Good men are the blessings of the places where they live.

Verses 7–12

I. A most shameful instance of impudence and immodesty in Joseph's mistress, the shame and scandal of her sex, perfectly lost to all virtue and honour.

1. Her sin began in the eye: She cast her eyes upon Joseph (v. 7), who was a goodly person, and well-favoured, v. 6. We have great need to make a covenant with our eyes (Job xxxi. 1), lest the eye infect the heart.

2. She was daring and shameless in the sin.

3. She was urgent and violent in the temptation. She spoke to him day by day, v. 10. Now this was, (1) Great wickedness in her, and (2) A great temptation to Joseph.

II. Here is a most illustrious instance of virtue and resolved chastity in Joseph, who, by the grace of God, was enabled to resist and overcome this temptation; and, all things considered, his escape was as great an instance of the divine power as the deliverance of the three children out of the fiery furnace.

1. The temptation he was assaulted with was very strong. The tempter was his mistress, a person of quality, whom it was his place to obey and his interest to oblige, whose favour would contribute more than anything to his preferment. On the other hand, it was at his utmost peril if he slighted her, and made her his enemy. Opportunity favoured the temptation. The tempter was in the house with him; his business led him to be, without any suspicion, where she was.

2. His resistance of the temptation was very brave, and the victory truly honourable.

(1) He would not wrong his master. He would not offend his God. This is the chief argument with which he strengthens his aversion to the sin. How can I do this? not only, How shall I? or, How dare I? but, How can I? Id possumus, quod jure possumus—We can do that which we can do lawfully. Three arguments Joseph urges upon himself. First, He considers who he was that was tempted. "I; others may perhaps take their liberty, but I cannot." Secondly, What the sin was to which he was tempted: This great wickedness. Others might look upon it as a small matter, a peccadillo, a trick of youth; but Joseph had another idea of it. Let sin appear sin (Rom. vii. 13), call it by its own name, and never go about to lessen it. Thirdly, Against whom he was tempted to sin—against God, against his nature and his dominion, against his love and his design. Those that love God do for this reason hate sin.

(2) By steadfastness of resolution. The grace of God enabled him to overcome the temptation by avoiding the tempter. He would not stay so much as to parley with the temptation, but flew out from it with the utmost abhorrence; he left his garment, as one escaping for his life. Note, It is better to lose a good coat than a good conscience.

Joseph's mistress, having tried in vain to make him a criminal, now endeavours to represent him as one; so to be revenged on him for his virtue. Chaste and holy love will continue, though slighted; but sinful love, like Amnon's to Tamar, is easily changed into sinful hatred. She accused him to his fellow servants (v. 13–15) and gave him a bad name among them. She accused him to his master, who had power in his hand to punish him. Observe, 1. What an improbable story she tells, but it was told to be revenged upon his virtue, a most malicious lie. And yet, 2. She manages it so as to incense her husband against him, reflecting upon him for bringing this Hebrew servant among them.

Verses 19–23

Here is, 1. Joseph wronged by his master. He believed the accusation, and there is no remedy, he is condemned to perpetual imprisonment, v. 19, 20. He should be shut up among the king's prisoners, the state-prisoners. Potiphar, it is likely, chose that prison because it was the worst. He was committed to the king's prison, that he might thence be preferred to the king's person. 2. Joseph was at a distance from all his friends, but the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, v. 21. No gates nor bars can shut out his gracious presence from his people; for he has promised that he will never leave them. Those that have a good conscience in a prison have a good God there. Joseph is not long a prisoner before he becomes a little ruler. God gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. Note, God can raise up friends for his people even where they little expect to find them. The keeper saw that God was with him and that every thing prospered under his hand; and therefore entrusted him with the management of the affairs of the prison, v. 22, 23.

CHAP. XL

In this chapter things are working, though slowly, towards Joseph's advancement. I. Two of Pharaoh's servants are committed to prison, and there to Joseph's care, and so become witnesses of his extraordinary conduct, ver. 1–4. II. They dreamed each of them a dream, which Joseph interpreted (ver. 5–19), and the event verified the interpretation (ver. 20–22), and so they became witnesses of his extraordinary skill. III. Joseph recommends his case to one of them, whose preferment he foresaw (ver. 14, 15), but in vain, ver. 23.

Verses 1–4

We should not have had this story of Pharaoh's butler and baker recorded in scripture if it had not been serviceable to Joseph's preferment. Observe, 1. Two of the great officers of Pharaoh's court, having offended the king, are committed to prison. Many conjectures there are concerning the offence of these servants of Pharaoh; some make it no less than an attempt to take away his life, others no more than the casual lighting of a fly into his cup and a little sand into his bread. 2. The captain of the guard himself, who was Potiphar, charged Joseph with them (v. 4), which intimates that he began now to be reconciled to him, and perhaps to be convinced of his innocence, though he durst not release him for fear of disobliging his wife.

Verses 5–19

I. The special providence of God, which filled the heads of these two prisoners with unusual dreams, such as made extraordinary impressions upon them, and carried with them evidences of a divine origin, both in one night.

II. The impression which was made upon these prisoners by their dreams (v. 6): They were sad.

III. Joseph's great tenderness and compassion towards them. He enquired with concern, Wherefore look you so sadly to-day? v. 7. Joseph was their keeper, and was now a prisoner with them, and had been a dreamer too. Communion in sufferings helps to work compassion towards those that do suffer. It is some relief to those that are in trouble to be taken notice of.

IV. The dreams themselves, and the interpretation of them. There is no interpreter here in the prison, v. 8. Joseph hereupon directed them which way to look: Do not interpretations belong to God? Joseph suggests, "If interpretations belong to God, he is a free agent, and may communicate the power to whom he pleases, and therefore tell me your dreams." Now, 1. The chief butler's dream was a happy presage of his enlargement, and re-advancement, within three days; and so Joseph explained it to him, v. 12, 13. 2. The chief baker's dream portended his ignominious death, v. 18, 19. The happy interpretation of the other's dream encouraged him to relate his. It was not Joseph's fault that he brought him no better tidings. Ministers are but interpreters, they cannot make the thing otherwise than it is.

V. The improvement Joseph made of this opportunity to get a friend at court, v. 14, 15. He modestly bespoke the favour of the chief butler, whose preferment he foretold: But think of me when it shall be well with thee. What a modest representation he makes of his own case, v. 15. He does not reflect upon his brethren that sold him. Nor does he reflect on the wrong done him in this imprisonment by his mistress that was his prosecutrix, and his master that was his judge; but mildly avers his own innocence. When we are called to vindicate ourselves we should carefully avoid, as much as may be, speaking ill of others. Let us be content to prove ourselves innocent, and not be fond of upbraiding others with their guilt.

The verifying of Joseph's interpretation of the dreams, on the very day prefixed. The chief butler and baker were both advanced, one to his office, the other to the gallows, and both at the three days' end.

Some observe the resemblance between Joseph and Christ in this story. Joseph's fellow-sufferers were like the two thieves that were crucified with Christ—the one saved, the other condemned. One of these, when Joseph said to him, Remember me when it shall be well with thee, forgot him; but one of those, when he said to Christ, Remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom, was not forgotten.

CHAP. XLI

Two things Providence is here bringing about:—I, The advancement of Joseph. II. The maintenance of Jacob and his family in a time of famine. 1. Pharaoh's dreams, ver. 1–8. 2. The recommendation of Joseph to him for an interpreter, ver. 9–13. 3. The interpretation of the dreams, and the prediction of seven years of plenty and seven years of famine in Egypt, with the prudent advice given to Pharaoh thereupon, ver. 14–36. 4. The preferment of Joseph to a place of the highest power and trust in Egypt, ver. 37–45. 5. The accomplishment of Joseph's prediction, and his fidelity to his trust, ver. 46, &c.

Verses 1–8

Observe, 1. The delay of Joseph's enlargement. It was not till the end of two full years (v. 1). There is a time set for the deliverance of God's people; that time will come, though it seem to tarry; and, when it comes, it will appear to have been the best time. 2. The means of Joseph's enlargement, which were Pharaoh's dreams, here related. If we were to look upon them as ordinary dreams, we might observe from them the follies and absurdities of a roving working fancy, tame cows as beasts of prey (nay, more ravenous than any, eating up those of their own kind), and ears of corn as devouring one another. Foolish dreams related can make no better than foolish talk. But these dreams which Pharaoh dreamed carried their own evidence with them that they were sent of God; and therefore, when he awoke, his spirit was troubled, v. 8. His magicians were puzzled, the rules of their art failed them. This was to make Joseph's performance by the Spirit of God the more admirable. Compare with this story, Dan. ii. 27; iv. 7; v. 8. Joseph's own dreams were the occasion of his troubles, and now Pharaoh's dreams were the occasion of his enlargement.

Verses 9–16

Here is, 1. The recommending of Joseph to Pharaoh for an interpreter. The chief butler did it more in compliment to Pharaoh, to oblige him, than in gratitude to Joseph, or in compassion for his case. The story he had to tell was, in short, That there was an obscure young man in the king's prison, who had very properly interpreted his dream, and the chief baker's (the event corresponding in each with the interpretation), and that he would recommend him to the king his master for an interpreter. Note, God's time for the enlargement of his people will appear at last to be the fittest time. If the chief butler had at first used his interest for Joseph's enlargement, and had obtained it, it is probable that upon his release he would have gone back to the land of the Hebrews again, which he spoke of so feelingly (ch. xl. 15), and then he would neither have been so blessed himself, nor such a blessing to his family, as afterwards he proved. But staying two years longer, and coming out now upon this occasion, at last, to interpret the king's dreams, way was made for his very great preferment. 2. The introducing of Joseph to Pharaoh. It is done with all possible expedition, and Joseph is brought in, perhaps almost as much surprised as Peter was, Acts xii. 9. Pharaoh immediately, without enquiring who or whence he was, tells him his business, that he expected he should interpret his dream, v. 15. To which Joseph makes him a very modest decent reply (v. 16), in which, (1) He gives honour to God. "It is not in me, God must give it." (2) He shows respect to Pharaoh, and hearty good will to him and his government, in supposing that the interpretation would be an answer of peace.

Verses 17–32

I. Pharaoh relates his dream. He dreamt that he stood upon the bank of the river Nile, and saw the kine, both the fat ones and the lean ones, come out of the river.

II. Joseph interprets his dream, and tells him that it signified seven years of plenty now immediately to ensue, which should be succeeded by as many years of famine. Observe, 1. The two dreams signified the same thing, but the repetition was to denote the certainty, the nearness, and the importance of the event, v. 32. 2. Yet the two dreams had a distinct reference to the two things wherein we most experience plenty and scarcity, namely, grass and corn. The plenty and scarcity of grass for the cattle were signified by the fat kine and the lean ones; the plenty and scarcity of herb for the service of man by the full ears and the thin ones. 3. See what changes the comforts of this life are subject to. After great plenty may come great scarcity. 4. See the goodness of God in sending the seven years of plenty before those of famine, that provision might be made accordingly. With what wonderful wisdom has Providence, that great housekeeper, ordered the affairs of this numerous family from the beginning hitherto! Great variety of seasons there have been, and the produce of the earth is sometimes more and sometimes less; yet, take one time with another, what was miraculous concerning the manna is ordinarily verified in the common course of Providence, He that gathers much has nothing over, and he that gathers little has no lack, Exod. xvi. 18. 5. See the perishing nature of our worldly enjoyments. The great increase of the years of plenty was quite lost and swallowed up in the years of famine; and the overplus of it, which seemed very much, yet did but just serve to keep men alive, v. 29–31. Observe, God revealed this beforehand to Pharaoh, who, as king of Egypt, was to be the father of his country, and to make prudent provision for them.

Verses 33–45

I. The good advice that Joseph gave to Pharaoh, which was, 1. That in the years of plenty he should lay up for the years of famine, buy up corn when it was cheap, that he might both enrich himself and supply the country when it would be dear and scarce. 2. Because that which is everybody's work commonly proves nobody's work, he advises Pharaoh to appoint officers who should make it their business, and to select some one person to preside in the affair, v. 33.

II. The great honour that Pharaoh did to Joseph. 1. He gave him an honourable testimony: He is a man in whom the Spirit of God is; and this puts a great excellency upon any man; such men ought to be valued, v. 38. He is a nonsuch for prudence: There is none so discreet and wise as thou art, v. 39. Now he is abundantly recompensed for the disgrace that had been done him. 2. He put him into an honourable office; not only employed him to buy up corn, but made him prime-minister of state, comptroller of the household. 3. He put upon him all the marks of honour imaginable, to recommend him to the esteem and respect of the people as the king's favourite, and one whom he delighted to honour. He gave him a new name, to show his authority over him, and yet such a name as bespoke the value he had for him. Zaphnath-paaneah—A revealer of secrets. He married him honourably to a prince's daughter. Where God had been liberal in giving wisdom and other merits, Pharaoh was not sparing in conferring honours.

Observe here, I. The building of Joseph's family in the birth of two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, v. 50–52. In the names he gave them, he owned the divine Providence giving this happy turn to his affairs. He was made fruitful in the land of his affliction. It had been the land of his affliction, and in some sense it was still so, for it was not Canaan, the land of promise. His distance from his father was still his affliction. The afflictions of the saints promote their fruitfulness. Ephraim signifies fruitfulness, and Manasseh forgetfulness, for these two often go together; when Jeshurun waxed fat, he forgot God his Maker.

II. The accomplishment of Joseph's predictions. Pharaoh had great confidence in the truth of them. The seven plenteous years came (v. 47), and, at length, they were ended, v. 53. Years of plenty will end, therefore, Whatever thy hand finds to do, do it; and gather in gathering time. The seven years of dearth began to come, v. 54. This famine, it seems, was not only in Egypt, but in other lands, in all lands, that is, all the neighbouring countries. It is here said that in the land of Egypt there was bread.

III. The performance of Joseph's trust. He was found faithful to it, as a steward ought to be. 1. He was diligent in laying up, while the plenty lasted, v. 48, 49. 2. He was prudent and careful in giving out, when the famine came, and kept the markets low by furnishing them at reasonable rates out of his stores. The people in distress cried to Pharaoh. He sent them to his treasurer, Go to Joseph. Joseph, no doubt, with wisdom and justice fixed the price of the corn he sold, so that the country might not be oppressed, nor advantage taken of their prevailing necessity. And let the price be determined by that golden rule of justice, to do as we would be done by.

CHAP. XLII

In this and the following chapters we have the fulfilling of the dreams which Joseph himself had dreamed, that his father's family should do homage to him. The story is very largely and particularly related of what passed between Joseph and his brethren, because it is very instructive, and it gave occasion for the removal of Jacob's family into Egypt, on which so many great events afterwards depended. We have, in this chapter, I. The humble application of Jacob's sons to Joseph to buy corn, ver. 1–6. II. The fright Joseph put them into, for their trial, ver. 7–20. III. The conviction they were now under of their sin concerning Joseph long before, ver. 21–24. IV. Their return to Canaan with corn, and the great distress their good father was in upon hearing the account of their expedition, ver. 25, &c.

Though Jacob's sons were all married they were still incorporated in one society, under the conduct and presidency of their father Jacob.

I. The orders he gave them to go and buy corn in Egypt, v. 1, 2. Observe, 1. The famine was grievous in the land of Canaan. It is observable that all the three patriarchs, to whom Canaan was the land of promise, met with famine in that land, which was not only to try their faith, whether they could trust God though he should starve them, but to teach them to seek the better country, that is, the heavenly, Heb. xi. 14–16. 2. Still, when there was famine in Canaan, there was corn in Egypt. Thus Providence orders it, that one place should be a succour and supply to another; for we are all brethren. 3. Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt. 4. He reproved his sons for delaying to provide corn for their families. Why do you look one upon another? 5. He quickened them to go to Egypt: Get you down thither.

II. Their obedience to these orders, v. 3. They went down to buy corn; they did not send their servants, but very prudently went themselves, to lay out their own money. Let none think themselves too great nor too good to take pains. Benjamin went not with them, for he was his father's darling. To Egypt they came, and, having a considerable cargo of corn to buy, they were brought before Joseph himself, they bowed down themselves before him, v. 6. Now their empty sheaves did obeisance to his full one.

We may well wonder that Joseph, during the twenty years that he had now been in Egypt, never made an excursion to Canaan, to visit his aged father, when he was in the borders of Egypt, that lay next to Canaan. It is a probable conjecture that his whole management of himself in this affair was by special direction from Heaven, that the purpose of God concerning Jacob and his family might be accomplished. When Joseph's brethren came, he knew them by many a satisfactory token, but they knew not him, little thinking to find him there, v. 8. Joseph had an eye to his dreams, in his carriage towards his brethren, and aimed at the bringing of his brethren to repentance for their former sins.

I. He showed himself very rigorous and harsh with them. He charged them with bad designs against the government (v. 9), treated them as dangerous persons, saying, You are spies. Now why was Joseph thus hard upon his brethren? We may be sure it was not from a spirit of revenge. It was to bring them to repentance. It was to get out of them an account of the state of their family, which he longed to know. Not seeing his brother Benjamin with them, perhaps he began to suspect that they had made away with him too, and therefore gives them occasion to speak of their father and brother.

II. They, hereupon, were very submissive. They spoke to him with all the respect imaginable: Nay, my lord (v. 10)—a great change since they said, Behold, this dreamer comes. They very modestly deny the charge: We are no spies. They tell him their business, that they came to buy food.

III. He clapped them all up in prison for three days, v. 17.

IV. He concluded with them, at last, that one of them should be left as a hostage, and the rest should go home and fetch Benjamin. It was a very encouraging word he said to them (v. 18): I fear God; as if he had said, "You may assure yourselves I will do you no wrong; I dare not, for I know that, high as I am, there is one higher than I." Note, With those that fear God we have reason to expect fair dealing. The fear of God will be a check upon those that are in power, to restrain them from abusing their power to oppression and tyranny. Those that have no one else to stand in awe of ought to stand in awe of their own consciences. See Neh. v. 15, So did not I, because of the fear of God.

I. The penitent reflection Joseph's brethren made upon the wrong they had formerly done to him, v. 21. They talked the matter over in the Hebrew tongue, not suspecting that Joseph, whom they took for a native of Egypt, understood them, much less that he was the person they spoke of.

They remembered with regret the barbarous cruelty wherewith they persecuted him. Now see here, 1. The office of conscience. As time will not wear out the guilt of sin, so it will not blot out the records of conscience. 2. The benefit of afflictions; they often prove the happy and effectual means of awakening conscience.

II. Joseph's tenderness towards them upon this occasion. This represents the tender mercies of our God towards repenting sinners. See Jer. xxxi. 20, Since I spoke against him I do earnestly remember him still. See Judg. x. 16.

III. The imprisonment of Simeon, v. 24. He chose him for the hostage probably because he remembered him to have been his most bitter enemy, or because he observed him now to be least humbled and concerned.

IV. The dismission of the rest of them. They came for corn, and corn they had; and not only so, but every man had his money restored in his sack's mouth.

1. It was really a merciful event; for I hope they had no wrong done to them when they had their money given them back, but a kindness; yet they were thus terrified by it. Guilty consciences are apt to take good providences in a bad sense. If they had been robbed of their money, they could not have been worse frightened than they were now when they found their money in their sacks.

2. They knew that the Egyptians abhorred a Hebrew (ch. xliii. 32), and therefore, since they could not expect to receive any kindness from them, they concluded that this was done with a design to pick a quarrel with them, because the lord of the land had charged them as spies. Their own consciences also were awake, and their sins set in order before them; and this put them into confusion. When men's spirits are sinking every thing helps to sink them.

Verses 29–38

1. The report which Jacob's sons made to their father of the great distress they had been in in Egypt; how they had been suspected, and threatened, and obliged to leave Simeon a prisoner there, till they should bring Benjamin with them thither. 2. The deep impression this made upon the good man. The very bundles of money which Joseph returned, in kindness to his father, frightened him (v. 35); for he concluded it was done with some mischievous design. (1) He has very melancholy apprehensions concerning the present state of his family. Jacob gives up Joseph for gone, and Simeon and Benjamin as being in danger; and he concludes, All these things are against me. It proved otherwise, that all these were for him, were working together for his good and the good of his family. Through our ignorance and mistake, and the weakness of our faith, we often apprehend that to be against us which is really for us. (2) He is at present resolved that Benjamin shall not go down. No, Jacob's present thoughts are, My son shall not go down with you. He plainly intimates a distrust of them, remembering that he never saw Joseph since he had been with them.

CHAP. XLIII

Here the story of Joseph's brethren is carried on, I. Their melancholy parting with their father Jacob in Canaan, ver. 1–14. II. Their pleasant meeting with Joseph in Egypt, ver. 15, &c.

Verses 1–10

1. Jacob urges his sons to go and buy more corn in Egypt, v. 1, 2. The famine continued; and the corn they had bought was all spent. 2. Judah urges him to consent that Benjamin should go down with them. Judah's conscience had lately smitten him for what he had done a great while ago against Joseph (ch. xlii. 21); and, as an evidence of the truth of his repentance he would make some amends for the irreparable injury he had done him by doubling his care concerning Benjamin.

Verses 11–14

I. Jacob's persuasibleness. He would be ruled by reason. "If it must be so now, take your brother. If no corn can be had but upon those terms, we may as well expose him to the perils of the journey as suffer ourselves and families, and Benjamin amongst the rest, to perish for want of bread." Constancy is a virtue, but obstinacy is not.

II. Jacob's prudence and justice, which appeared in three things:—1. He sent back the money which they had found in the sacks' mouths, with this discreet construction of it, Peradventure it was an oversight. Though we get it by oversight, if we keep it when the oversight is discovered, it is kept by deceit. 2. He sent double money, as much again as they took the time before, upon supposition that the price of corn might have risen, or to show a generous spirit, that they might be the more likely to find generous treatment with the man, the lord of the land. 3. He sent a present of such things as the land afforded, and as were scarce in Egypt—balm and honey, &c. (v. 11), the commodities that Canaan exported, ch. xxxvii. 25. Honey and spice will never make up the want of bread-corn. The famine was sore in Canaan, and yet they had balm and myrrh, &c. We may live well enough upon plain food without dainties; but we cannot live upon dainties without plain food. Let us thank God that that which is most needful and useful is generally most cheap and common.

III. Jacob's piety appearing in his prayer: God Almighty give you mercy before the man! v. 14. Jacob had formerly turned an angry brother into a kind one with a present and a prayer; and here he betakes himself to the same tried method, and it sped well.

Jacob's sons, having got leave to take Benjamin with them, went down the second time into Egypt to buy corn. If we should ever know what a famine of the word means, let us not think it much to travel as far for spiritual food as they did for corporal food. Now here we have an account of what passed between them and Joseph's steward. They were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house, v. 18. Now they thought they should be reckoned with about the money in the sacks' mouths, and should be charged as cheats. They therefore laid the case before the steward, and, as a substantial proof of their honesty, before they were charged with taking back their money they produced it. The steward encouraged them (v. 23): Peace be to you, fear not. He directs them to look at the divine Providence in the return of their money: Your God, and the God of your father, has given you treasure in your sacks. Hereby he silences their further enquiry about it. "Ask not how it came thither; Providence brought it to you, and let that satisfy you." It appears by what he said that, by his good master's instructions, he was brought to the knowledge of the true God, the God of the Hebrews.

I. The great respect that Joseph's brethren paid to him. When they brought him the present, they bowed themselves before him (v. 26); and again, when they gave him an account of their father's health, they made obeisance, and called him, Thy servant our father, v. 28. Thus were Joseph's dreams fulfilled more and more.

II. The great kindness that Joseph showed to them, while they little thought it was a brotherly kindness. Here is,

1. His kind enquiry concerning Jacob: Is he yet alive?

2. The kind notice he took of Benjamin, his own brother. (1) He put up a prayer for him: God be gracious unto thee, my son, v. 29. (2) He shed some tears for him, v. 30. Tears of tenderness and affection are no disparagement at all, even to great and wise men.

3. When his weeping had subsided so that he could refrain himself, he sat down to dinner with them, treated them nobly, and yet contrived every thing to amuse them.

He ordered three tables to be spread, one for his brethren, another for the Egyptians that dined with him (for so different were their customs that they did not care to eat together), another for himself, who durst not own himself a Hebrew, and yet would not sit with the Egyptians.

He placed his brethren according to their seniority (v. 33).

He gave them a very plentiful entertainment, sent messes to them from his own table, v. 34. This was the more generous in him, and the more obliging to them, because of the present scarcity of provisions. Their cares and fears were now over, and they ate their bread with joy, concluding they were now upon good terms with the man, the lord of the land. Joseph gave them to understand that Benjamin was his favourite; for his mess was five times as much as any of theirs.

CHAP. XLIV

Joseph, having entertained his brethren, dismissed them; but here we have them brought back in a greater fright than any they had been in yet. Observe, I. What method he took both to humble them further and also to try their affection to his brother Benjamin, by which he would be able to judge of the sincerity of their repentance for what they had done against himself, of which he was desirous to be satisfied before he manifested his reconciliation to them. This he contrived to do by bringing Benjamin into distress, ver. 1–17. II. The good success of the experiment; he found them all heartily concerned, and Judah particularly, both for the safety of Benjamin and for the comfort of their aged father, ver. 18, &c.

Verses 1–17

Joseph heaps further kindnesses upon his brethren, fills their sacks, returns their money, and sends them away full of gladness; but he also exercises them with further trials. Joseph ordered his steward to put a fine silver cup which he had (and which, it is likely, was used at his table when they dined with him) into Benjamin's sack's mouth, that it might seem as if he had stolen it from the table, and put it there himself, after his corn was delivered to him.

I. How the pretended criminals were pursued and arrested, on suspicion of having stolen a silver cup. The steward charged them with ingratitude.

II. How they pleaded for themselves. They solemnly protested their innocence, and offered to submit to the severest punishment if they should be found guilty, v. 9, 10.

III. How the theft was fastened upon Benjamin. In his sack the cup was found. They dare not arraign Joseph's justice, nor so much as suggest that perhaps he that had put their money in their sacks' mouths had put the cup there; but they throw themselves upon Joseph's mercy.

IV. Here is their humble submission, v. 16. 1. They acknowledge the righteousness of God: God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants, perhaps referring to the injury they had formerly done to Joseph, for which they thought God was now reckoning with them. 2. They surrender themselves prisoners to Joseph: We are my lord's servants. Now Joseph's dreams were accomplished to the utmost.

V. Joseph, with an air of justice, gives sentence that Benjamin only should be kept in bondage, and the rest should be dismissed; for why should any suffer but the guilty? It is plain he intended hereby to try the affection of his brethren to Benjamin and to their father. If they had gone away contentedly, and left Benjamin in bonds, no doubt Joseph would soon have released and promoted him, and sent notice to Jacob, and would have left the rest of his brethren justly to suffer for their hard-heartedness; but they proved to be better affected to Benjamin than he feared. Those that had sold Joseph would not now abandon Benjamin. The worst may mend in time.

We have here a most ingenious and pathetic speech which Judah made to Joseph on Benjamin's behalf, to obtain his discharge. Perhaps Judah was a better friend to Benjamin than the rest were, or the rest chose him for their spokesman, because he had a greater command of language than any of them.

I. A great deal of unaffected art, and unstudied unforced rhetoric, there is in this speech. 1. He addresses himself to Joseph with a great deal of respect and deference. 2. He represented Benjamin as one well worthy of his compassionate consideration (v. 20); he was a little one, compared with the rest of them; the youngest, brought up tenderly with his father. It made the case the more pitiable that he alone was left of his mother, and his brother was dead, namely, Joseph. 3. He urged it very closely that Joseph had himself constrained them to bring Benjamin with them. Was he not brought to Egypt, in obedience, purely in obedience, to the command of Joseph? and would he not show him some mercy? 4. The great argument he insisted upon was the insupportable grief it would be to his aged father if Benjamin should be left behind in servitude: "If he should leave his father, his father would die; much more if now he be left behind, never more to return to him." This therefore Judah presses with a great deal of earnestness: "His life is bound up in the lad's life" (v. 30). 5. Judah, in honour to the justice of Joseph's sentence, and to show his sincerity in this plea, offers himself to become a bondsman instead of Benjamin, v. 33. Neither Jacob nor Benjamin needed an intercessor with Joseph; for he himself loved them.

II. Upon the whole matter let us take notice, 1. How prudently Judah suppressed all mention of the crime that was charged upon Benjamin. 2. What good reason dying Jacob had to say, Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise (ch. xlix. 8), for he excelled them all in boldness, wisdom, eloquence, and especially tenderness for their father and family. 3. Judah's faithful adherence to Benjamin, now in his distress, was recompensed long after by the constant adherence of the tribe of Benjamin to the tribe of Judah, when all the other ten tribes deserted it. 4. How fitly does the apostle, when he is discoursing of the mediation of Christ, observe, that our Lord sprang out of Judah (Heb. vii. 14); for, like his father Judah, he not only made intercession for the transgressors, but he became a surety for them.

CHAP. XLV

It is a pity that this chapter and the foregoing should be parted, and read asunder. There we had Judah's intercession for Benjamin. Joseph let him go on without interruption, heard all he had to say, and then answered it all in one word, "I am Joseph." Now he found his brethren humbled for their sins, mindful of himself (for Judah had mentioned him twice in his speech), respectful to their father, and very tender to their brother Benjamin. It was to Joseph's brethren as clear shining after rain, nay, it was to them as life from the dead. Here is, I. Joseph's discovery of himself to his brethren, ver. 1–15. II. The orders Pharaoh, hereupon, gave to fetch Jacob and his family down to Egypt, and Joseph's despatch of his brethren, accordingly, back to his father with those orders, ver. 16–24. III. The joyful tidings of this brought to Jacob, ver. 25, &c.

Verses 1–15

Judah and his brethren were waiting for an answer.

I. Joseph ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 1. The private conversations of friends are the most free. Thus Christ graciously manifests himself and his loving-kindness to his people, out of the sight and hearing of the world.

II. Tears were the preface or introduction to his discourse, v. 2. These were tears of tenderness and strong affection.

III. He very abruptly tells them who he was: I am Joseph. They knew him only by his Egyptian name, Zaphnath-paaneah, his Hebrew name being lost and forgotten in Egypt; but now he teaches them to call him by that. Thus when Christ would convince Paul he said, I am Jesus; and when he would comfort his disciples he said, It is I, be not afraid. Thus when Christ manifests himself to his people he encourages them to draw near to him with a true heart.

IV. He endeavours to assuage their grief for the injuries they had done him, by showing them that God had brought much good out of it (v. 5): Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves. Sinners must grieve for their sins; but true penitents should be greatly affected when they see God thus bringing good out of evil. Now he tells them how long the famine was likely to last—five years; yet (v. 6) what a capacity he was in of being kind to his relations and friends. God sent me before you, v. 5, 7. 1. God's Israel is the particular care of God's providence. 2. Providence looks a great way forward, and has a long reach. The psalmist praises God for this (Ps. cv. 17): He sent a man before them, even Joseph. God sees his work from the beginning to the end, but we do not, Eccl. iii. 11. 3. God often works by contraries. Those that put Christ to death were many of them saved by his death. 4. God must have all the glory. It was not you that sent me hither, but God, v. 8. They must not be proud of it, because it was God's doing, and not theirs.

V. He promises to take care of his father and all the family during the rest of the years of famine. 1. His brethren must hasten to Canaan, and must inform Jacob that his son Joseph was lord of all Egypt (v. 9). If any thing would make him young again, this would. 2. He is very earnest that his father and all his family should come to him to Egypt: Come down unto me, tarry not, v. 9. He allots his dwelling in Goshen. He promises to provide for him: I will nourish thee, v. 11. Our Lord Jesus being, like Joseph, exalted to the highest honours and powers of the upper world, it is his will that all that are his should be with him where he is, John xvii. 24.

VI. Endearments were interchanged between him and his brethren. He began with the youngest, his own brother Benjamin, who was but about a year old when Joseph was separated from his brethren. After he had embraced Benjamin, he, in like manner, caressed them all (v. 15); and then his brethren talked with him.

I. The kindness of Pharaoh to Joseph, and to his relations for his sake: he bade his brethren welcome (v. 16), though it was a time of scarcity, and they were likely to be a charge to him. He engaged Joseph to send for his father down to Egypt, and promised to furnish them with all conveniences both for his removal thither and his settlement there. If the good of all the land of Egypt would suffice him, he was welcome to it all, so that they need not regard their stuff, v. 20. What they had in Canaan he reckoned but stuff, in comparison with what he had for them in Egypt.

II. The kindness of Joseph to his father and brethren. Pharaoh was respectful to Joseph, in gratitude, because he had been an instrument of much good to him. Joseph likewise was respectful to his father and brethren. He gave them waggons and provisions for the way, both going and coming. To his brethren he gave two suits apiece of good clothes, to Benjamin five suits, and money besides in his pocket, v. 22. To his father he sent a very handsome present of the varieties of Egypt, v. 23. He dismissed them with a seasonable caution: See that you fall not out by the way, v. 24. Now Joseph, having forgiven them all, lays this obligation upon them, not to upbraid one another. This charge our Lord Jesus has given to us, that we love one another. For, 1. We are brethren, we have all one Father. 2. We are his brethren, and we shame our relation to him who is our peace, if we fall out. 3. We are guilty, verily guilty, and, instead of quarrelling with one another, have a great deal of reason to fall out with ourselves.

Verses 25–28

We have here the good news brought to Jacob. The relation of it, at first, sunk his spirits. To hear that Joseph is alive is too good news to be true; he faints, for he believes it not. Note, We faint, because we do not believe. Jacob had easily believed his son formerly when they told him, Joseph is dead; but he can hardly believe them now that they tell him, Joseph is alive. Weak and tender spirits are influenced more by fear than hope. But at length Jacob is convinced of the truth of the story, especially when he sees the waggons which were sent to carry him (for seeing is believing). He says nothing of Joseph's glory, of which they told him; it was enough to him that Joseph was alive.

CHAP. XLVI

Jacob is here removing to Egypt in his old age, forced thither by a famine, and invited thither by a son. Here, I. God sends him thither, ver. 1–4. II. All his family goes with him, ver. 5–27. III. Joseph bids him welcome, ver. 28–34.

Jacob has here a very great concern before him.

I. How he acknowledged God in this way. He came to Beersheba, from Hebron, where he now dwelt; and there he offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac, v. 1. Abraham called on God there (ch. xxi. 33), so did Isaac (ch. xxvi. 25). In his devotion, 1. He had an eye to God as the God of his father Isaac, that is, a God in covenant with him. 2. He offered sacrifices, (1) By way of thanksgiving for the late blessed change of the face of his family, for the good news he had received concerning Joseph, and for the hopes he had of seeing him. (2) By way of petition for the presence of God with him in his intended journey. (3) By way of consultation. The heathen consulted their oracles by sacrifice. Jacob would not go till he had asked God's leave.

II. How God directed his paths: In the visions of the night God spoke unto him, v. 2. If we speak to him as we ought, he will not fail to speak to us. What has God to say to him?

1. He renews the covenant with him: I am God, the God of thy father (v. 3).

2. He encourages him to make this removal of his family: Fear not to go down into Egypt. We must always rejoice with trembling. Jacob had many careful thoughts about this journey, which God took notice of. (1) He was old. It was a long journey. (2) He feared lest his sons should be tainted with the idolatry of Egypt, and forget the God of their fathers, or enamoured with the pleasures of Egypt, and forget the land of promise.

3. He promises him comfort in the removal. (1) That he should multiply in Egypt. (2) That he should have God's presence with him: I will go down with thee into Egypt. (3) That neither he nor his should be lost in Egypt. Though Jacob died in Egypt, yet this promise was fulfilled, [1] In the bringing up of his body to be buried in Canaan. [2] In the bringing up of his seed to be settled in Canaan. Whatever low or darksome valley we are called into at any time, we may be confident, if God go down with us into it, that he will surely bring us up again. If he go with us down to death, he will surely bring us up again to glory. (4) That living and dying, his beloved Joseph should be a comfort to him: Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.

Verses 5–27

Old Jacob is here flitting. Little did he think of ever leaving Canaan; he expected, no doubt, to die in his nest, and to leave his seed in actual possession of the promised land: but Providence orders it otherwise. It is good to be ready, not only for the grave, but for whatever may happen betwixt us and the grave. We have here a particular account of the names of Jacob's family, his sons' sons, most of whom are afterwards mentioned as heads of houses in the several tribes. When Jacob himself removed to a land of plenty, he would not leave any of his children behind him to starve in a barren land. It was now 215 years since God had promised Abraham to make him a great nation (ch. xii. 2); and yet that branch of his seed on which the promise was entailed had increased only to seventy. When God pleases, a little one shall become a thousand, Isa. lx. 22.

Verses 28–34

I. The joyful meeting between Jacob and his son Joseph, in which observe,

1. Jacob's prudence in sending Judah before him to Joseph, to give him notice of his arrival in Goshen.

2. Joseph's filial respect to him. He went in his chariot to meet him, and, in the interview, showed, (1) How much he honoured him. (2) How much he loved him. Time did not wear out the sense of his obligations, but his tears which he shed abundantly upon his father's neck, for joy to see him, were real indications of the sincere and strong affection he had for him.

3. Jacob's great satisfaction in this meeting.

II. Joseph's prudent care concerning his brethren's settlement. Time was when they were contriving to get rid of him; now he is contriving to settle them to their satisfaction and advantage: this is rendering good for evil. Now, 1. He would have them to live in the land of Goshen, which lay nearest to Canaan, and which perhaps was more thinly peopled by the Egyptians, and well furnished with pastures for cattle. He desired they might live separately, that they might be in the less danger both of being infected by the vices of the Egyptians and of being insulted by the malice of the Egyptians. 2. He would have them to continue shepherds, and not to be ashamed to own that as their occupation before Pharaoh. It is better to be the credit of a mean post than the shame of a high one.

CHAP. XLVII

In this chapter we have instances, I. Of Joseph's presenting his brethren first and then his father to Pharaoh (ver. 1–10), settling them in Goshen (ver. 11, 12), and paying his respects to his father when he sent for him, ver. 27–31. II. Of Joseph's justice between prince and people in a very critical affair, selling Pharaoh's corn to his subjects with reasonable profits to Pharaoh, ver. 13, &c. Thus he approved himself wise and good, both in his private and in his public capacity.

Verses 1–12

I. The respect which Joseph, as a subject, showed to his prince. Though he had had particular orders from him to send for his father down to Egypt, yet he would not suffer him to settle till he had given notice of it to Pharaoh, v. 1.

II. The respect which Joseph, as a brother, showed to his brethren.

1. Though he was a great man, and they were comparatively mean and despicable, especially in Egypt, yet he owned them. Every branch of the tree is not a top branch; but, because it is a lower branch, is it therefore not of the tree? Our Lord Jesus, like Joseph here, is not ashamed to call us brethren.

2. They being strangers and no courtiers, he introduced some of them to Pharaoh. Being presented to Pharaoh, according to the instructions which Joseph had given them, they tell him, (1) What was their business—that they were shepherds, v. 3. Note, All that have a place in the world should have an employment in it according to their capacity. Magistrates should enquire into the occupation of their subjects, as those that have the care of the public welfare; for idle people are as drones in the hive, unprofitable burdens of the commonwealth. (2) What was their business in Egypt—to sojourn there for a time, while the famine so prevailed in Canaan.

3. He obtained for them a grant of a settlement in the land of Goshen, v. 5, 6. This was an instance of Pharaoh's gratitude to Joseph. He offered them preferment as shepherds over his cattle.

III. The respect Joseph, as a son, showed to his father.

1. He presented him to Pharaoh, v. 7. And here, (1) Pharaoh asks Jacob a common question: How old art thou? v. 8. A question usually put to old men, for it is natural to us to admire old age and to reverence it (Lev. xix. 32).

(2) Jacob gives Pharaoh an uncommon answer, v. 9. He speaks as becomes a patriarch, with an air of seriousness, for the instruction of Pharaoh. Observe here, [1] He calls his life a pilgrimage, looking upon himself as a stranger in this world, and a traveller towards another world: this earth his inn, not his home. [2] He reckons his life by days. [3] The character he gives of them is, First, That they were few. Secondly, That they were evil. Jacob's life, particularly, had been made up of evil days; and the pleasantest days of his life were yet before him. Thirdly, That they were short of the days of his fathers, not so many, not so pleasant, as their days.

(3) Jacob both addresses himself to Pharaoh and takes leave of him with a blessing (v. 7): Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and again, v. 10, he prayed for him, as one having the authority of a prophet and a patriarch.

Verses 13–26

Joseph now returns to the management of that great trust which Pharaoh had lodged in his hand. It would have been pleasing enough to him to have gone and lived with his father and brethren in Goshen;

but his employment would not permit it. In Joseph's transactions with the Egyptians observe,

I. The great extremity that Egypt, and the parts adjacent, were reduced to by the famine. 1. See here what a dependence we have upon God's providence. If its usual favours are suspended but for a while, we die, we perish, we all perish. All our wealth would not keep us from starving if the rain of heaven were but withheld for two or three years. See how much we lie at God's mercy, and let us keep ourselves always in his love. 2. See how much we smart by our own improvidence. If all the Egyptians had done for themselves in the seven years of plenty as Joseph did for Pharaoh, they had not been now in these straits.

II. The price they had come up to, for their supply, in this exigency. 1. They parted with all their money which they had hoarded up, v. 14. Silver and gold would not feed them; they must have corn. 2. When the money failed, they parted with all their cattle, those for labour, as the horses and asses, and those for food, as the flocks and the herds, v. 17. Pharaoh saw in reality what he had before seen in vision, nothing but lean kine. 3. When they had sold their stocks off their land, it was easy to persuade themselves to sell their land too; for what good would that do them, when they had neither corn to sow it nor cattle to eat of it? They therefore sold that next, for a further supply of corn. 4. When their land was sold, so that they had nothing to live on, they must of course sell themselves, that they might live purely upon their labour. Note, Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, even liberty and property (those darling twins), will he give for his life; for life is sweet.

III. The method which Joseph took to accommodate the matter between prince and people. 1. For their lands, he needed not come to any bargain with them while the years of famine lasted; but when these were over he came to an agreement, which it seems both sides were pleased with, that the people should occupy and enjoy the lands, as he thought fit to assign them, and should have seed to sow them with out of the king's stores, for their own proper use and behoof, yielding and paying only a fifth part of the yearly profits as a chief rent to the crown. This became a standing law, v. 26. It is observable how faithful Joseph was to him that appointed him. He did not put the money into his own pocket, nor entail the lands upon his own family; but converted both entirely to Pharaoh's use. 2. For their persons, he removed them to cities, v. 21. He transplanted them. How hard soever this seems to have been upon them, they themselves were at this time sensible of it as a very great kindness, and were thankful they were not worse used: Thou hast saved our lives, v. 25.

IV. The reservation he made in favour of the priests. They were maintained on free cost, so that they needed not to sell their lands, v. 22.

Verses 27–31

1. The comfort Jacob lived in (v. 27, 28); while the Egyptians were impoverished in their own land, Jacob was replenished in a strange land. 2. The care Jacob died in. At last the time drew nigh that Israel must die, v. 29. Now Jacob's care was about his burial, (1) He would be buried in Canaan, because it was the land of promise, and because it was a type of heaven, that better country which he that said these things declared plainly that he was in expectation of, Heb. xi. 14. He aimed at a good land, which would be his rest and bliss on the other side death. (2) He would have Joseph sworn to bring him thither to be buried (v. 29, 31). (3) When this was done Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head, yielding himself, as it were, to the stroke of death.

CHAP. XLVIII

The time drawing nigh that Israel must die, he takes leave of his grand-children by Joseph. God's gifts and graces shine forth much more in some saints than in others upon their death-beds. In this chapter, I. Joseph, hearing of his father's sickness, goes to visit him, and takes his two sons with him, ver. 1, 2. II. Jacob solemnly adopts his two sons, and takes them for his own, ver. 3–7. III. He blesses them, ver. 8–16. IV. He explains and justifies the crossing of his hands in blessing them, ver. 17–20. V. He leaves a particular legacy to Joseph, ver. 21, 22.

Verses 1–7

I. Joseph goes to see his aged father, v. 1. Visiting the sick, to whom we lie under obligations, or may have opportunity of doing good, either for body or soul, is our duty. Joseph took his own sons with him, that they might receive their dying grandfather's blessing. Manasseh and Ephraim would never forget what passed at this time.

II. Jacob, upon notice of his son's visit, prepared himself as well as he could to entertain him, v. 2. Note, It is very good for sick and aged people to be as lively and cheerful as they can, that they may not faint in the day of adversity. Strengthen thyself, as Jacob here, and God will strengthen thee.

III. In recompense to Joseph for all his attentions to him, he adopted his two sons. In this charter of adoption there is, 1. A particular recital of God's promise to him, to which this had reference: "God blessed me (v. 3), and let that blessing be entailed upon them." 2. An express reception of Joseph's sons into his family: "Thy sons are mine (v. 5), not only my grandchildren, but as my own children." He explains this at v. 16, Let my name be named upon them, and the name of my fathers. Thus the aged dying patriarch teaches these young persons not to look upon Egypt as their home, nor to incorporate themselves with the Egyptians, but to take their lot with the people of God, as Moses afterwards in the like temptation, Heb. xi. 24–26. Those are worthy of double honour who, through God's grace, break through the temptations of worldly wealth and preferment, to embrace religion in disgrace and poverty. Mention is made of the death and burial of Rachel, Joseph's mother, and Jacob's best beloved wife (v. 7), referring to that story, ch. xxxv. 19. Those that were to us as our own souls are dead and buried; and shall we think it much to follow them in the same path?

Here is, I. The blessing with which Jacob blessed the two sons of Joseph, which is the more remarkable because the apostle makes such particular mention of it (Heb. xi. 21).

1. Jacob was blind with age, v. 10. Jacob, like his father before him, when he was old, was dim-sighted. Note, (1) Those that have the honour of age must therewith be content to take the burden of it. (2) The eye of faith may be very clear even when the eye of the body is very much clouded.

2. Jacob was very fond of Joseph's sons. With what satisfaction does Jacob say here (v. 11), I had not thought to see thy face (having many years given him up for lost), and, lo, God has shown me also thy seed!

3. Before he entails his blessing, he recounts his experiences of God's goodness to him. (1) He had fed him all his life long unto this day, v. 15. Note, As long as we have lived in this world we have had continual experience of God's goodness to us, in providing for the support of our natural life. He that has fed us all our life long surely will not fail us at last. (2) He had by this angel redeemed him from all evil, v. 16.

4. When he confers the blessing and name of Abraham and Isaac upon them he recommends the pattern and example of Abraham and Isaac to them, v. 15. He calls God the God before whom his fathers Abraham and Isaac walked, that is, in whom they believed, whom they observed and obeyed.

5. In blessing them, he crossed hands. Joseph placed them so that Jacob's right hand should be put on the head of Manasseh the elder, v. 12, 13. But Jacob would put it on the head of Ephraim the younger, v. 14. But Jacob gave him to understand that he knew what he did, and that he did it not by mistake, nor in a humour, nor from a partial affection to one more than the other, but from a spirit of prophecy, and in compliance with the divine counsels. Manasseh should be great, but truly Ephraim should be greater. Joshua was of that tribe, so was Jeroboam. The tribe of Manasseh was divided, one half on one side Jordan, the other half on the other side, which made it the less powerful and considerable. In the foresight of this, Jacob crossed hands. Note, Grace observes not the order of nature, nor does God prefer those whom we think fittest to be preferred, but as it pleases him. It is observable how often God, by the distinguishing favours of his covenant, advanced the younger above the elder, Abel above Cain, Shem above Japheth, Abraham above Nahor and Haran, Isaac above Ishmael, Jacob above Esau; Judah and Joseph were preferred before Reuben, Moses before Aaron, David and Solomon before their elder brethren. See 1 Sam. xvi. 7.

II. The particular tokens of his favour to Joseph. He left with him the promise of their return out of Egypt, as a sacred trust: I die, but God shall be with you, and bring you again, v. 21. These words of Jacob furnish us with comfort in reference to the death of our friends. He will bring us to the land of our fathers, the heavenly Canaan, whither our godly fathers have gone before us. If God be with us while we stay behind in this world, and will receive us shortly to be with those that have gone before to a better world, we ought not to sorrow as those that have no hope.

CHAP. XLIX

This chapter is a prophecy. Jacob is here upon his death-bed, making his will. The twelve sons of Jacob were, in their day, men of renown, but the twelve tribes of Israel, which descended and were denominated from them, were much more renowned. In the prospect of this their dying father says something remarkable of each son, or of the tribe that bore his name. Here is, I. The preface, ver. 1, 2. II. The prediction concerning each tribe, ver. 3–28. III. The charge repeated concerning his burial, ver. 29–32. IV. His death, ver. 33.

I. The preface to the prophecy, in which, 1. The congregation is called together. It was a comfort to Jacob, now that he was dying, to see all his children about him. His calling upon them once and again to gather together intimated a precept to them to unite in love and all make one people. 2. A general idea is given of the intended discourse (v. 1): That I may tell you that which shall befall you (not your persons, but your posterity) in the latter days. 3. Attention is demanded (v. 2): "Hearken to Israel your father; let Israel, that has prevailed with God, prevail with you."

II. The prophecy concerning Reuben. He begins with him (v. 3, 4), for he was the first-born; but by committing uncleanness with his father's wife he forfeited the prerogatives of the birthright. He shall have all the privileges of a son, but not of a first-born. No judge, prophet, nor prince, is found of that tribe, nor any person of renown except Dathan and Abiram, who were noted for their impious rebellion against Moses. Reuben himself seems to have lost all that influence upon his brethren to which his birthright entitled him; for when he spoke unto them they would not hear, ch. xlii. 22. The character fastened upon Reuben, for which he is laid under this mark of infamy, is that he was unstable as water. 1. His virtue was unstable; he had not the government of himself and his own appetites. Men do not thrive because they do not fix. 2. His honour consequently was unstable; it departed from him, and became as water spilt upon the ground. Note, Those that throw away their virtue must not expect to save their reputation.

Verses 5–7

Observe, 1. The character of Simeon and Levi: they were brethren in disposition; but, unlike their father, they were passionate and revengeful, fierce and uncontrollable; their swords, which should have been only weapons of defence, were (as the margin reads it, v. 5) weapons of violence. It is not in the power of parents, no, not by education, to form the dispositions of their children; Jacob bred his sons to every thing that was mild and quiet, and yet they proved to be thus furious. 2. A proof of this is the murder of the Shechemites, which Jacob deeply resented at the time (ch. xxxiv. 30) and still continued to resent. Simeon and Levi would not be advised by their aged and experienced father; no, they would be governed by their own passion rather than by his prudence. 3. Jacob's protestation against this barbarous act of theirs: O my soul, come not thou into their secret. Hereby he professes not only his abhorrence of such practices in general, but his innocence particularly in that matter. 4. His abhorrence of those brutish lusts that led them to this wickedness: Cursed be their anger. He does not curse their persons, but their lusts. We ought carefully to distinguish between the sinner and the sin, so as not to love the sin for the sake of the person, nor to hate the person for the sake of the sin. 5. A token of displeasure which he foretells their posterity should lie under for this: I will divide them. The Levites were scattered throughout all the tribes, and Simeon's lot lay not together. This curse was afterwards turned into a blessing to the Levites; but the Simeonites, for Zimri's sin (Num. xxv. 14), had it bound on.

Verses 8–12

Glorious things are here said of Judah. Judah's name signifies praise, in allusion to which he says, Thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, v. 8. It is prophesied that, 1. The tribe of Judah should be victorious and successful in war. 2. It should be superior to the rest of the tribes; not only in itself more numerous and illustrious, but having a dominion over them: Judah was the lawgiver, Ps. lx. 7. That tribe led the van through the wilderness, and in the conquest of Canaan, Judges i. 2. 3. It should be a strong and courageous tribe, and so qualified for command and conquest: Judah is a lion's whelp, v. 9. The lion is the king of beasts; when he seizes his prey none can resist him. By this is foretold that the tribe of Judah should become very formidable, and should not only obtain great victories, but should peaceably and quietly enjoy what was obtained by those victories —that they should make war, not for the sake of war, but for the sake of peace. Judah is compared, not to a lion rampant, always tearing, always raging, always ranging; but to a lion couchant, enjoying the satisfaction of his power and success, without creating vexation to others: this is to be truly great. 4. It should be the royal tribe, and the tribe from which Messiah the Prince should come: The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till Shiloh come, v. 10. Jacob here foresees and foretells, (1) That the sceptre should come into the tribe of Judah, which was fulfilled in David, on whose family the crown was entailed. (2) That Shiloh should be of this tribe—his seed, that promised seed, in whom the earth should be blessed: that peaceable and prosperous one, or the Saviour, so others translate it, he shall come of Judah. (3) That after the coming of the sceptre into the tribe of Judah it should continue in that tribe. Till the captivity, all along from David's time, the sceptre was in Judah, and subsequently the governors of Judea were of that tribe, or of the Levites that adhered to it (which was equivalent), till Judea became a province of the Roman Empire, just at the time of our Saviour's birth, and was at that time taxed as one of the provinces, Luke ii. 1. And at the time of his death the Jews expressly owned, We have no king but Caesar. Hence it is undeniably inferred against the Jews that our Lord Jesus is he that should come. 5. It should be a very fruitful tribe, especially that it should abound with milk for babes, and wine to make glad the heart of strong men (v. 11). Much of what is here said concerning Judah is to be applied to our Lord Jesus. In him there is plenty of all that which is nourishing and refreshing to the soul, and which maintains and cheers the divine life in it; in him we may have wine and milk, the riches of Judah's tribe, without money and without price, Isa. lv. 1.

Jacob's prophecy concerning six of his sons.

I. Concerning Zebulun (v. 13), that his posterity should have their lot upon the seacoast, and should be merchants, and mariners, and traders at sea. This was fulfilled when, two or three hundred years after, the land of Canaan was divided by lot, and the border of Zebulun went up towards the sea, Josh. xix. 11.

II. Concerning Issachar, v. 14, 15. That the men of that tribe should be strong and industrious, fit for labour and inclined to labour, particularly the toil of husbandry, like the ass, that patiently carried his burden, and, by using himself to it, makes it the easier. Issachar submitted to two burdens, tillage and tribute. It was a tribe that took pains, and, thriving thereby, was called upon for rents and taxes.

III. Concerning Dan, v. 16, 17. What is said concerning Dan has reference either, To that tribe in general, that though Dan was one of the sons of the concubines yet he should by art, and policy, and surprise, gain advantages against his enemies, like a serpent suddenly biting the heel of the traveller. Dan shall be incorporated by as good a charter as any of the other tribes. Some, like Dan, may excel in the subtlety of the serpent, as others, like Judah, in the courage of the lion; and both may do good service to the cause of God against the Canaanites.

Thus was Jacob going on with his discourse; but now he relieves himself with those words which come in as a parenthesis (v. 18), I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord!

IV. Concerning Gad, v. 19. He alludes to his name, which signifies a troop, foresees the character of that tribe, that it should be a warlike tribe, and so we find (1 Chron. xii. 8); the Gadites were men of war fit for the battle. He foresees that the situation of that tribe on the other side Jordan would expose it to the incursions of its neighbours, the Moabites and Ammonites; and he foretells that the troops of their enemies should, in many skirmishes, overcome them; yet he assures them that they should overcome at the last, which was fulfilled when, in Saul's time and David's, the Moabites and Ammonites were wholly subdued: see 1 Chron. v. 18, &c. Note, Vincimur in praelio, sed non in bello—We are foiled in a battle, but not in a campaign. Grace in the soul is often foiled in its conflicts, but the cause is God's and grace will in the issue come off conqueror, yea more than conqueror, Rom. viii. 37.

V. Concerning Asher (v. 20), that it should be a very rich tribe, replenished not only with bread for necessity, but with fatness, with dainties, and these exported out of Asher to other tribes, perhaps to other lands.

VI. Concerning Naphtali (v. 21), a tribe that carries struggles in its name; it signifies wrestling, and the blessing entailed upon it signifies prevailing; it is a hind let loose. This tribe was, 1. As the loving hind, friendly and obliging. 2. As the loosened hind, zealous for their liberty. 3. As the swift hind (Ps. xviii. 33), quick in despatch of business. Note, Among God's Israel there is to be found a great variety of dispositions, contrary to each other, yet all contributing to the beauty and strength of the body, Judah like a lion, Issachar like an ass, Dan like a serpent, Naphtali like a hind.

He closes with the blessings of his best beloved sons, Joseph and Benjamin; with these he will breathe his last.

I. The blessing of Joseph, which is very large and full. He is compared (v. 22) to a fruitful bough, or young tree; for God had made him fruitful in the land of his affliction; he owned it, ch. xli. 52. His two sons were as branches of a vine, or other spreading plants, running over the wall.

1. The providences of God concerning Joseph, v. 23, 24. Here observe (1) Joseph's straits and troubles, v. 23. Though he now lived at ease and in honour, Jacob reminds him of the difficulties he had formerly waded through. He had had many enemies, here called archers, being skilful to do mischief. His brethren, in his father's house, thought they had been the death of him. His mistress in the house of Potiphar impudently assaulted his chastity and shot arrows against which there is little fence but the hold God has in the consciences of the worst of men. Doubtless he had enemies in the court of Pharaoh, that envied his preferment, and sought to undermine him. (2) Joseph's strength and support under all these troubles (v. 24): His bow abode in strength, that is, his faith did not fail. The arms of his hands were made strong, that is, his other graces did their part, his wisdom, courage, and patience, which are better than weapons of war. (3) The spring and fountain of this strength it was by the hands of the mighty God. All our strength for the resisting of temptations, and the bearing of afflictions, comes from God: his grace is sufficient, and his strength is perfected in our weakness. (4) The state of honour and usefulness to which he was subsequently advanced. Herein Joseph was a type, [1] Of Christ. [2] Of the church in general.

2. The promises of God to Joseph. Our experiences of God's power and goodness in strengthening us hitherto are our encouragements still to hope for help from him. We may build much upon our Eben-ezers. Observe the blessings conferred on Joseph. Blessings of heaven above (rain in its season, and fair weather in its season, and the benign influences of the heavenly bodies); blessings of the deep that lieth under this earth, which, compared with the upper world, is but a great deep, with subterraneous mines and springs. Eminent and transcendent blessings, which prevail above the blessings of my progenitors, v. 26. Durable and extensive blessings: Unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills, including all the productions of the most fruitful hills, and lasting as long as they last, Isa. liv. 10.

II. The blessing of Benjamin (v. 27): He shall raven as a wolf; it is plain by this that Jacob was guided in what he said by a spirit of prophecy, and not by natural affection; else he would have spoken with more tenderness of his beloved son Benjamin, concerning whom he only foresees and foretells this, that his posterity should be a warlike tribe, strong and daring, and that they should enrich themselves with the spoils of their enemies—that they should be active and busy in the world, and a tribe as much feared by their neighbours as any other. Blessed Paul was of this tribe (Rom. xi 1; Phil. iii. 5); and he did in the morning of his day, devour the prey as a persecutor, but, in the evening, divided the spoil as a preacher.

I. The summing up of the blessings of Jacob's sons, v. 28. Though Reuben, Simeon, and Levi were put under the marks of their father's displeasure, yet he is said to bless them every one according to his blessing; for none of them were rejected as Esau was.

II. The solemn charge Jacob gave them concerning his burial, which is a repetition of what he had before given to Joseph. See how he speaks of death: I am to be gathered unto my people, v. 29. Though it separates us from our children and our people in this world, it gathers us to our fathers and to our people in the other world.

III. The death of Jacob, v. 33: as one cheerfully composing himself to rest, now that he was weary. I will lay me down, and sleep. He freely resigned his spirit into the hand of God, the Father of spirits: He yielded up the ghost. His separated soul went to the assembly of the souls of the faithful, which, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity: he was gathered to his people.

CHAP. L

Here is, I The preparation for Jacob's funeral, ver. 1–6. II. The funeral itself, ver. 7–14. III. The settling of a good understanding between Joseph and his brethren after the death of Jacob, ver. 15–21. IV. The age and death of Joseph, ver. 22–26. Thus the book of Genesis, which began with the origin of light and life, ends with nothing but death and darkness; so sad a change has sin made.

Verses 1–6

Joseph is here paying his last respects to his deceased father. 1. With tears and kisses, and all the tender expressions of a filial affection, he takes leave of the deserted body, v. 1. The departed soul is out of the reach of our tears and kisses, but it is proper to show our respect to the poor body, of which we look for a glorious and joyful resurrection. 2. He ordered the body to be embalmed (v. 2), not only because he died in Egypt, and that was the manner of the Egyptians, but because he was to be carried to Canaan. 3. He observed the ceremony of solemn mourning for him, v. 3. Even the Egyptians, many of them out of the great respect they had for Joseph, put themselves into mourning for his father. 4. He asked and obtained leave of Pharaoh to go to Canaan, thither to attend the funeral of his father, v. 4–6. He promised to return: I will come again. When we return to our own houses from burying the bodies of our relations, we say, "We have left them behind"; but, if their souls have gone to our heavenly Father's house, we may say with more reason, "They have left us behind."

Verses 7–14

We have here an account of Jacob's funeral. He dies in honour, and is followed to the grave by all his children. 1. It was a stately funeral. He was attended to the grave, not only by his own family, but by the courtiers, and all the great men of the kingdom, who, in token of their gratitude to Joseph, showed this respect to his father for his sake, and did him honour at his death. Good old Jacob had conducted himself so well among them as to gain universal esteem. Note, Professors of religion should endeavour, by wisdom and love, to remove the prejudices which many may have conceived against them because they do not know them. 2. It was a sorrowful funeral (v. 10, 11). The solemn mourning for Jacob gave a name to the place, Abel-Mizraim, the mourning of the Egyptians, which served for a testimony against the next generation of the Egyptians, who oppressed the posterity of this Jacob to whom their ancestors showed such respect.

We have here the settling of a good correspondence between Joseph and his brethren, now that their father was dead. When Providence has removed the parents by death, the best methods ought to be taken for the preserving of acquaintance and love, that unity may continue even when that centre of unity is taken away.

I. Joseph's brethren humbly make their court to him for his favour. 1. While their father lived, they thought themselves safe under his shadow; but now that he was dead they feared the worst from Joseph. A guilty conscience exposes men to continual frights. Those that would be fearless must keep themselves guiltless. 2. They humbled themselves before him, confessed their fault, and begged his pardon. Forgive the trespass. We are thy servants. 3. They pleaded their relation to Jacob and to Jacob's God. (1) To Jacob, urging that he directed them to make this submission. Thy father did command. (2) To Jacob's God. They plead (v. 17), We are the servants of the God of thy father; not only children of the same Jacob, but worshippers of the same Jehovah.

II. Joseph, with a great deal of compassion, confirms his reconciliation and affection to them; his compassion appears, v. 17. He wept when they spoke to him. These were tears of sorrow for their suspicion of him, and tears of tenderness upon their submission. In his reply, 1. He directs them to look up to God in their repentance (v. 19): Am I in the place of God? "Make your peace with God, and then you will find it an easy matter to make your peace with me." 2. He extenuates their fault, from the consideration of the great good which God wonderfully brought out of it, which, though it should not make them the less sorry for their sin, yet might make him the more willing to forgive it (v. 20). God often brings good out of evil, and promotes the designs of his providence even by the sins of men; not that he is the author of sin, far be it from us to think so; but his infinite wisdom so overrules events, that, in the issue, that ends in his praise which in its own nature had a direct tendency to his dishonour; as the putting of Christ to death, Acts ii. 23. 3. He assures them of the continuance of his kindness to them: Fear not; I will nourish you, v. 21.

I. The prolonging of Joseph's life in Egypt: he lived to be a hundred and ten years old, v. 22.

II. The building up of Joseph's family: he lived to see his great-grand-children by both his sons (v. 23), and probably he saw his two sons solemnly owned as heads of distinct tribes, equal to any of his brethren.

III. The last will and testament of Joseph published in the presence of his brethren, when he saw his death approaching. To those of them who yet survived, and to the sons of those who were gone, who stood up in their fathers' stead, he said this. 1. He comforted them with the assurance of their return to Canaan in due time: I die, but God will surely visit you, v. 24. He bids them be confident: God will bring you out of this land, and therefore, (1) They must not look upon it as their rest for ever; they must set their hearts upon the land of promise, and call that their home. (2) They must not fear sinking, and being ruined there. "God will bring you in triumph out of this land at last." 2. For a confession of his own faith, and a confirmation of theirs, he charges them to keep him unburied till they should be settled in the land of promise, v. 25. He makes them promise him with an oath that they would bury him in Canaan.

IV. The death of Joseph, and the reservation of his body for a burial in Canaan, v. 26. He was put in a coffin in Egypt, but not buried till his children had received their inheritance in Canaan, Josh. xxiv. 32.

THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

EXODUS

Moses, having, in the first book of his history, preserved and transmitted the records of the church, while it existed in private families, comes, in this second book, to give us an account of its growth into a great nation. The beginning of the former book shows us how God formed the world for himself; the beginning of this shows us how he formed Israel for himself, and both to show forth his praise, Isa. xliii. 21. There we have the creation of the world in history, here the redemption of the world in type. The Greek translators called this book Exodus (which signifies a departure or going out) because it begins with the story of the going out of the children of Israel from Egypt. The forming of Israel into a people was a new creation. This book gives us, I. The accomplishment of the promises made before to Abraham (ch. i.–xix.), and then, II. The establishment of the ordinances which were afterwards observed by Israel, ch. xx.–xl. Moses, in this book, begins, like Caesar, to write his own Commentaries. But henceforward the penman is himself the hero, and gives us the history of those things of which he was himself an eye- and ear-witness, et quorum pars magna fuit—and in which he bore a conspicuous part. There are more types of Christ in this book than perhaps in any other book of the Old Testament; for Moses wrote of him, John v. 46. The way of man's reconciliation to God, and coming into covenant and communion with him by a Mediator, is here variously represented; and it is of great use to us for the illustration of the New Testament, now that we have that to assist us in the explication of the Old.

CHAP. I

We have here, I. God's kindness to Israel, in multiplying them exceedingly, ver. 1–7. II. The Egyptians' wickedness to them, 1. Oppressing and enslaving them, ver. 8–14. 2. Murdering their children, ver. 15–22. Thus whom the court of heaven blessed the country of Egypt cursed, and for that reason.

Verses 1–7

1. A recital of the names of the twelve patriarchs, as they are called, Acts vii. 8. 2. The account which was kept of the number of Jacob's family, when they went down into Egypt. Notice is here taken of this that their increase in Egypt might appear the more wonderful. 3. The death of Joseph, v. 6. All that generation by degrees wore off. Perhaps all Jacob's sons died much about the same time; for there was not more than seven years' difference in age between the eldest and the youngest of them, except Benjamin. 4. The strange increase of Israel in Egypt, v. 7. Here are four words used to express it: They were fruitful, and increased abundantly. They multiplied and waxed exceedingly mighty. This wonderful increase was the fulfilment of the promise long before made unto the fathers.

Verses 8–14

The land of Egypt here, at length, becomes to Israel a house of bondage, though hitherto it had been a happy shelter and settlement for them.

I. The obligations they lay under to Israel upon Joseph's account were forgotten: There arose a new king, after several successions in Joseph's time, who knew not Joseph, v. 8. If we work for men only, our works, at furthest, will die with us; if for God, they will follow us, Rev. xiv. 13.

II. Reasons of state were suggested for their dealing hardly with Israel, v. 9, 10. 1. They are represented as more and mightier than the Egyptians; certainly they were not so, but the king of Egypt, when he resolved to oppress them, would have them thought so, and looked on as a formidable body. 2. Hence it is inferred that if care were not taken to keep them under they would become dangerous to the government. Observe, The thing they feared was lest they should get them up out of the land, probably having heard them speak of the promise made to their fathers that they should settle in Canaan. 3. It is therefore proposed that a course be taken to prevent their increase: Come on, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply.

III. The method they took to suppress them, and check their growth, v. 11, 13, 14. 1. They took care to keep them poor, by charging them with heavy taxes. 2. By this means they took an effectual course to make them slaves. The Israelites, it should seem, were much more industrious laborious people than the Egyptians, and therefore Pharaoh took care to find them work, both in building and in husbandry, and this was exacted from them with the utmost rigour and severity. They had taskmasters set over them, directed to afflict them with their burdens. They made them serve with rigour, so that their lives became bitter to them, intending hereby, (1) To break their spirits. (2) To ruin their health and shorten their days, and so diminish their numbers. (3) To discourage them from marrying, since their children would be born to slavery. And it is to be feared that the oppression they were under brought over many of them to join with the Egyptians in their idolatrous worship. However, they were kept a distinct body, unmingled with the Egyptians, and by their other customs separated from them, which was the Lord's doing, and marvellous.

IV. The wonderful increase of the Israelites: The more they afflicted them the more they multiplied, sorely to the grief and vexation of the Egyptians. The blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church.

The Egyptians' indignation at Israel's increase, notwithstanding the many hardships they put upon them, drove them at length to the most barbarous and inhuman methods of suppressing them, by the murder of their children. Pharaoh and Herod sufficiently proved themselves agents for that great red dragon, who stood to devour the man-child as soon as it was born, Rev. xii. 3, 4. Pilate delivered Christ to be crucified, after he had confessed that he found no fault in him. It is well for us that, though man can kill the body, this is all he can do.

I. The midwives were commanded to murder them. Observe, 1. The orders given them, v. 15, 16. It added much to the barbarity of the intended executions that the midwives were appointed to be the executioners. Pharaoh's project was secretly to engage the midwives to stifle the men-children as soon as they were born, and then to lay it upon the difficulty of the birth, or some mischance common in that case, Job iii. 11. 2. Their pious disobedience to this impious command, v. 17. They feared God, regarded his law, and dreaded his wrath more than Pharaoh's, and therefore saved the men-children alive. 3. Their justifying themselves in this disobedience, when they were charged with it as a crime, v. 18. They gave a reason for it, that they came too late to do it, for generally the children were born before they came, v. 19. Some of the ancient Jews expound it thus, Ere the midwife comes to them they pray to their Father in heaven, and he answereth them, and they do bring forth. 4. The recompence God gave them for their tenderness towards his people: He dealt well with them, v. 20. In particular, he made them houses (v. 21), built them up into families, blessed their children, and prospered them in all they did.

II. When this project did not take effect, Pharaoh gave public orders to all his people to drown all the male children of the Hebrews, v. 22.

CHAP. II

This chapter begins the story of Moses, that man of renown, famed for his intimate acquaintance with Heaven and his eminent usefulness on earth, and the most remarkable type of Christ, as a prophet, saviour, lawgiver, and mediator, in all the Old Testament. In this chapter we have, I. The perils of his birth and infancy, ver. 1–4. II. His preservation through those perils, and the preferment of his childhood and youth, ver. 5–10. III. The pious choice of his riper years, which was to own the people of God. 1. He offered them his service at present, if they would accept it, ver. 11–14. 2. He retired, that he might reserve himself for further service hereafter, ver. 15–22. IV. The dawning of the day of Israel's deliverance, ver. 23, &c.

Moses was a Levite, both by father and mother. Jacob left Levi under marks of disgrace (Gen. xlix. 5); and yet, soon after, Moses appears a descendant from him, that he might typify Christ, who came in the likeness of sinful flesh and was made a curse for us. This tribe began to be distinguished from the rest by the birth of Moses, as afterwards it became remarkable in many other instances.

I. How he was hidden. The parents of Moses had Miriam and Aaron, both older than he, born to them before this edict came out. Probably the mother of Moses was full of anxiety in the expectation of his birth, now that this edict was in force. Yet this child proves the glory of his father's house. Just at the time when Pharaoh's cruelty rose to this height the deliverer was born. Note, When men are projecting the church's ruin God is preparing for its salvation. 1. His parents observed him to be a goodly child, more than ordinarily beautiful; he was fair to God, Acts vii. 20. 2. Therefore they were the more solicitous for his preservation, because they looked upon this as an indication of some kind purpose of God concerning him, and a happy omen of something great. Three months they hid him in some private apartment of their own house. Herein Moses was a type of Christ, who, in his infancy, was forced to abscond, and in Egypt too (Matt. ii. 13), and was wonderfully preserved, when many innocents were butchered. Duty is ours, events are God's. Faith in God will set us above the ensnaring fear of man.

II. How he was exposed. At three months' end they put him in an ark of bulrushes by the river's brink (v. 3), and set his little sister at some distance to watch what would become of him, and into whose hands he would fall, v. 4. God put it into their hearts to do this, to bring about his own purpose, that Moses might by this means be brought into the hands of Pharaoh's daughter. Moses seemed quite abandoned by his friends; his own mother durst not own him: but now the Lord took him up and protected him, Ps. xxvii. 10.

Here is, I. Moses saved from perishing. He lay in a bulrush-basket by the river's side. Had he been left to lie there, he must have perished in a little time with hunger, if he had not been sooner washed into the river or devoured by a crocodile. Had he fallen into any other hands than those he did fall into, either they would not, or durst not, have done otherwise than have thrown him straightway into the river; but Providence brings no less a person thither than Pharaoh's daughter, just at that juncture, guides her to the place where this poor forlorn infant lay, and inclines her heart to pity it, which she dares do when none else durst. Never did poor child cry so seasonably, so happily, as this did. God often raises up friends for his people even among their enemies. Pharaoh cruelly seeks Israel's destruction, but his own daughter charitably compassionates a Hebrew child, and not only so, but, beyond her intention, preserves Israel's deliverer.

II. Moses well provided with a good nurse, no less than his own dear mother, v. 7–9. Pharaoh's daughter thinks it convenient that he should have a Hebrew nurse, and the sister of Moses, with art and good management, introduces the mother into the place of a nurse, to the great advantage of the child; for mothers are the best nurses.

III. Moses preferred to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter (v. 10). The tradition of the Jews is that Pharaoh's daughter had no child of her own, and that she was the only child of her father, so that when he was adopted for her son he stood fair for the crown. Those whom God designs for great services he finds out ways to qualify and prepare beforehand. Moses, by having his education in a court, is the fitter to be a prince and king in Jeshurun; by having his education in a learned court (for such the Egyptian then was) is the fitter to be an historian; and by having his education in the court of Egypt is the fitter to be employed, in the name of God, as an ambassador to that court.

IV. Moses named. Pharaoh's daughter called him Moses, Drawn out of the water, so it signifies in the Egyptian language. The calling of the Jewish lawgiver by an Egyptian name is a happy omen to the Gentile world, and gives hopes of that day when it shall be said, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. xix. 25. And his tuition at court was an earnest of the performance of that promise, Isa. xlix. 23. Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and queens thy nursing mothers.

Moses had now passed the first forty years of his life in the court of Pharaoh, preparing himself for business; and now it was time for him to enter upon action, and,

I. He boldly owns and espouses the cause of God's people: When Moses was grown he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens, v. 11. The best exposition of these words we have from an inspired pen, Heb. xi. 24–26, where we are told that by this he expressed, 1. His holy contempt of the honours and pleasures of the Egyptian court; he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. 2. His tender concern for his poor brethren in bondage, with whom (though he might easily have avoided it) he chose to suffer affliction.

II. He gives a specimen of the great things he was afterwards to do for God and his Israel in two little instances, related particularly by Stephen (Acts vii. 23, &c.).

1. Moses killed the Egyptian who smote the Hebrew (v. 11, 12); probably it was one of the Egyptian taskmasters, whom he found abusing his Hebrew slave. The Jews' tradition is that he did not slay him with any weapon, but, as Peter slew Ananias and Sapphira, with the word of his mouth.

2. Moses was afterwards to be employed in governing Israel, and, as a specimen of this, we have him here trying to end a controversy between two Hebrews.

(1) The unhappy quarrel which Moses observed between two Hebrews, v. 13. When God raises up instruments of salvation for the church they will find enough to do, not only with oppressing Egyptians to restrain them, but with quarrelsome Israelites, to reconcile them.

(2) The way he took of dealing with them; he marked him that caused the division, that did the wrong, and mildly reasoned with him: Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? Moses endeavoured to make them friends, a good office. The reproof Moses gave on this occasion may still be of use, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow?

(3) The ill success of his attempt (v. 14): He said, Who made thee a prince? A man needs no great authority for the giving of a friendly reproof, it is an act of kindness; yet this man needs will interpret it an act of dominion, and represents his reprover as imperious and assuming. Thus when people dislike good discourse, or a seasonable admonition, they will call it preaching, as if a man could not speak a word for God and against sin but he took too much upon him. He upbraids him with what he had done in killing the Egyptian: Intendest thou to kill me? If the Hebrews had taken the hint, and come in to Moses as their head and captain, it is probable that they would have been delivered now; but, despising their deliverer, their deliverance was justly deferred, and their bondage prolonged forty years, as afterwards their despising Canaan kept them out of it forty years more. We must take heed of being prejudiced against the ways and people of God by the follies and peevishness of some particular persons that profess religion. Christ himself was set at nought by the builders, and is still rejected by those he would save.

(4) The flight of Moses to Midian, in consequence. God ordered it for wise and holy ends. Things were not yet ripe for Israel's deliverance. Moses is to be further fitted for the service, and therefore is directed to withdraw for the present. God guided Moses to Midian because the Midianites were of the seed of Abraham. And through this country he was afterwards to lead Israel. Hither he came, and sat down by a well, tired and thoughtful, at a loss, and waiting to see which way Providence would direct him. It was a great change with him, since he was but the other day at ease in Pharaoh's court: thus God tried his faith.

Moses here gains a settlement in Midian, just as his father Jacob had gained one in Syria, Gen. xxix. 2, &c. Events that seem inconsiderable, and purely accidental, afterwards appear to have been designed by the wisdom of God for very good purposes. A casual transient occurrence has sometimes occasioned the greatest and happiest turns of a man's life.

I. Concerning the seven daughters of Reuel the priest or prince of Midian. 1. They were humble, and very industrious, they drew water for their father's flock, v. 16. Idleness can be no one's honour. 2. They were modest, and would not ask this strange Egyptian to come home with them till their father sent for him. Modesty is the ornament of woman.

II. Concerning Moses. He was taken for an Egyptian (v. 19). 1. How ready he was to help Reuel's daughters to water their flocks. Those that have had a liberal education yet should not be strangers to servile work, because they know not what necessity Providence may put them in of working for themselves, or what opportunity Providence may give them of being serviceable to others. He loved to be doing good. Wherever the Providence of God casts us we should desire and endeavour to be useful; and, when we cannot do the good we would, we must be ready to do the good we can. 2. How well he was paid for his serviceableness. When the young women acquainted their father, he sent to invite him to his house, and made much of him, v. 20. Moses soon recommended himself to the esteem and good affection of this prince of Midian, who took him into his house, and, in process of time, married one of his daughters to him (v. 21), by whom he had a son, whom he called Gershom, a stranger there (v. 22). Now this settlement of Moses in Midian was designed by Providence, (1) To shelter him for the present. (2) It was also designed to prepare him for the great services he was further designed for. His manner of life in Midian would be of use of him, [1] To inure him to hardship and poverty. [2] To inure him to contemplation and devotion. Egypt accomplished him as a scholar, a gentleman, a statesman, a soldier, but yet he lacked one thing, in which the court of Egypt could not befriend him. He must know what it was to live a life of communion with God; and in this he would be greatly furthered by the solitude and retirement of a shepherd's life in Midian. By the former he was prepared to rule in Jeshurun, but by the latter he was prepared to converse with God in Mount Horeb, near which mount he had spent much of his time.

Here is, 1. The continuance of the Israelites' bondage in Egypt, v. 23. Probably the murdering of their infants did not continue. The Egyptians now were content with their increase, finding that Egypt was enriched by their labour; so that they might have them for slaves, they cared not how many they were. When one Pharaoh died, another rose up in his place that was governed by the same maxims, and was as cruel to Israel as his predecessors. 2. The preface to their deliverance at last. (1) They cried, v. 23. Now, at last, they began to think of God under their troubles, and to return to him from the idols they had served, Ezek. xx. 8. But before God unbound them he put it into their hearts to cry unto him, as it is explained, Num. xx. 16. (2) God heard, v. 24, 25. [1] God heard their groaning. He knows the burdens they groan under and the blessings they groan after. [2] God remembered his covenant. (3) God looked upon the children of Israel. Moses looked upon them and pitied them (v. 11); but now God looked upon them and helped them. (4) God had a respect unto them, a favourable respect to them as his own.

CHAP. III

I. The discovery God was pleased to make of his glory to Moses at the bush, to which Moses was forbidden to approach too near, ver 1–5. II. A general declaration of God's grace and good will to his people, who were beloved for their fathers' sakes, ver. 6. III. A particular notification of God's purpose concerning the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt. 1. He assures Moses it should now be done, ver. 7–9. 2. He gives him a commission to act in it as his ambassador both to Pharaoh (ver. 10) and to Israel, ver. 16. 3. He answers the objection Moses made of his own unworthiness, ver. 11, 12. 4. He gives him full instructions what to say both to Pharaoh and to Israel, ver. 13–18. 5. He tells him beforehand what the issue would be, ver. 19, &c.

Verses 1–6

The years of the life of Moses are remarkably divided into three forties: the first forty he spent as a prince in Pharaoh's court, the second a shepherd in Midian, the third a king in Jeshurun. He had now finished his second forty, when he received his commission to bring Israel out of Egypt. Note, Sometimes it is long before God calls his servants out to that work which of old he designed them for, and has been graciously preparing them for.

I. How this appearance of God to him found him employed. He was keeping the flock (tending sheep) near Mount Horeb, v. 1. This was a poor employment for a man of his parts and education. It was the lot of Moses, who foresaw nothing to the contrary but that he should die, as he had lived a great while, a poor despicable shepherd. When we are alone, the Father is with us. Moses saw more of God in a desert than ever he had seen in Pharaoh's court.

II. What the appearance was. To his great surprise he saw a bush burning, when he perceived no fire either from earth or heaven to kindle it, and, which was more strange, it did not consume, v. 2. It was an extraordinary manifestation of the divine presence and glory. 1. He saw a flame of fire. When Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was promised to Abraham, he saw a burning lamp, which signified the light of joy which that deliverance should cause (Gen. xv. 17); but now it shines brighter, as a flame of fire. 2. This fire was not in a tall and stately cedar, but in a bush, a thorny bush, so the word signifies. 3. The bush burned, and yet was not consumed.

III. The curiosity Moses had to enquire into this extraordinary sight: I will turn aside and see, v. 3.

IV. The invitation he had to draw near, yet with a caution not to come too near, nor rashly.

1. God gave him a gracious call, to which he returned a ready answer, v. 4. When he turned aside, God called to him. Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. God called him by name, Moses, Moses. The word of the Lord always went along with the glory of the Lord, for every divine vision was designed for divine revelation, Job iv. 16, &c.; xxxiii. 14–16. Divine calls are effectual when we return an obedient answer to them, as Moses here, "Here am I, what saith my Lord unto his servant?"

2. God gave him a needful caution. He must draw near, but not too near. His conscience must be satisfied, but not his curiosity. He must express his reverence, and his readiness to obey: Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, as a servant. Putting off the shoe was then what putting off the hat is now, a token of respect and submission.

V. The solemn declaration God made of his name, by which he would be known to Moses: I am the God of thy father, v. 6. Abraham was dead, and yet God is the God of Abraham; therefore Abraham's soul lives, to which God stands in relation; and, to make his soul completely happy, his body must live again in due time. By these words it appears that God remembered his covenant, ch. ii. 24.

VI. The solemn impression this made upon Moses: He hid his face, as one both ashamed and afraid to look upon God. He was not afraid of a burning bush till he perceived that God was in it.

Now, after forty years of Israel's bondage and Moses's banishment, when we may suppose both he and they began to despair, at length the time has come, even the year of the redeemed.

Here is, I. The notice God takes of the afflictions of Israel (v. 7, 9): Seeing I have seen, not only, I have surely seen, but I have strictly observed and considered the matter. Three things God took cognizance of:—1. Their sorrows, v. 7. It is likely they were not permitted to make a remonstrance of their grievances to Pharaoh. But God observed their tears. 2. Their cry: I have heard their cry (v. 7), it has come unto me, v. 9. 3. The tyranny of their persecutors: I have seen the oppression, v. 9.

II. The promise God makes of their speedy deliverance and enlargement: I have come down to deliver them, v. 8. When God does something very extraordinary he is said to come down to do it, as Isa. lxiv. 1. This deliverance was typical of our redemption by Christ, in which the eternal Word did indeed come down from heaven to deliver us. He promises also their happy settlement in the land of Canaan, that they should exchange bondage for liberty, poverty for plenty, labour for rest.

III. The commission he gives to Moses in order hereunto, v. 10. He is not only sent as a prophet to Israel, but he is sent as an ambassador to Pharaoh, to treat with him; and he is sent as a prince to Israel, to conduct and command them. The same hand that now fetched a shepherd out of a desert, to be the planter of a Jewish church, afterwards fetched fishermen from their ships, to be the planters of the Christian church.

God, having spoken to Moses, allows him also a liberty of speech.

I. He objects his own insufficiency for the service he was called to (v. 11): Who am I? He thinks himself unworthy of the honour. He thinks he wants courage. He thinks he wants skill, and therefore cannot bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt; they are unarmed, undisciplined, quite dispirited. 1. Moses was incomparably the fittest of any man living for this work, eminent for learning, wisdom, experience, valour, faith, holiness; and yet he says, Who am I? Note, The more fit any person is for service commonly the less opinion he has of himself: see Judges ix. 8, &c. 2. The difficulties of the work were indeed very great. Yet Moses is the man that does it at last; for God gives grace to the lowly.

II. God answers this objection, v. 12. 1. He promises him his presence: Certainly I will be with thee, and that is enough. 2. He assures him of success, and that the Israelites should serve God upon this mountain.

III. He begs instructions for the executing of his commission, and desires to know by what name God would at this time make himself known, v. 13.

1. He supposes the children of Israel would ask him, What is his name? This they would ask either, (1) To perplex Moses. Or (2) For their own information.

2. He desires instructions what answer to give them: "What shall I say to them? What name shall I vouch to them for the proof of my authority?"

IV. Two names God would now be known by:—

1. A name that denotes what he is in himself (v. 14): I am that I am. This explains his name Jehovah, and signifies, (1) That he is self-existent; he has his being of himself, and has no dependence upon any other. Being self-existent, he cannot but be self-sufficient, and therefore all-sufficient, and the inexhaustible fountain of being and bliss. (2) That he is eternal and unchangeable. (3) That we cannot by searching find him out. Let Israel know this, I AM hath sent me unto you.

2. A name that denotes what he is to his people. The Lord God of your fathers hath sent me unto you (v. 15): Thus God had made himself known to him (v. 6), and thus he must make him known to them, (1) That he might revive among them the religion of their fathers. (2) That he might raise their expectations of the speedy performance of the promises made unto their fathers. God will have this to be his name for ever, and it has been, is, and will be, his name, by which his worshippers know him, and distinguish him from all false gods; see 1 Kings xviii. 36.

Moses is here more particularly instructed in his work, and informed beforehand of his success. 1. He must deal with the elders of Israel, and raise their expectations of a speedy removal to Canaan, v. 16, 17. His success with the elders of Israel would be good; so he is told (v. 18): They shall hearken to thy voice, and not thrust thee away as they did forty years ago.

2. He must deal with the king of Egypt (v. 18), he and the elders of Israel, and in this they must not begin with a demand, but with a humble petition. We beseech thee, let us go. Moreover, they must only beg leave of Pharaoh to go as far as Mount Sinai to worship God. If he would not give them leave to go and sacrifice at Sinai, justly did they go without leave to settle in Canaan. As to his success with Pharaoh, Moses is here told, (1) That petitions would not prevail with him: I am sure he will not let you go, v. 19. (2) That plagues should compel him to it: I will smite Egypt, and then he will let you go, v. 20. (3) That his people should furnish them at their departure with abundance of plate and jewels, to their great enriching: I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, v. 21, 22.

CHAP. IV

This chapter, I. Continues and concludes God's discourse with Moses at the bush concerning this great affair of bringing Israel out of Egypt. 1. Moses objects the people's unbelief (ver. 1), and God answers that objection by giving him a power to work miracles, (1) To turn his rod into a serpent, and then into a rod again, ver. 2–5. (2) To make his hand leprous, and then whole again, ver 6–8. (3) To turn the water into blood, ver. 9. 2. Moses objects his own slowness of speech (ver. 10), and begs to be excused (ver. 13); but God answers this objection, (1) By promising him his presence, ver. 11, 12. (2) By joining Aaron in commission with him, ver. 14–16. (3) By putting an honour upon the very staff in his hand, ver. 17. II. It begins Moses's execution of his commission. 1. He obtains leave of his father-in-law to return into Egypt, ver. 18. 2. He receives further instructions and encouragements from God, ver. 19, 21–23. 3. He hastens his departure, and takes his family with him, ver. 20. 4 He meets with some difficulty in the way about the circumcising of his son, ver. 24–26. 5. He has the satisfaction of meeting his brother Aaron, ver. 27, 28. 6. He produces his commission before the elders of Israel, to their great joy, ver. 29–31. And thus the wheels were set a-going towards that great deliverance.

Verses 1–9

I. Moses objects that in all probability the people would not hearken to his voice (v. 1), that is, they would not take his bare word, unless he showed them some sign. If there should be some gainsayers among them who would question his commission, how should he deal with them?

II. God empowers him to work miracles, directs him to three particularly, two of which were now immediately wrought for his own satisfaction.

1. The rod in his hand is made the subject of a miracle, a double miracle: it is but thrown out of his hand and it becomes a serpent; he resumes it and it becomes a rod again, v. 2–4. Here was an honour put upon Moses, that this change was wrought upon his throwing it down and taking it up, without any spell, or charm, or incantation: his being empowered thus to act under God, out of the common course of nature and providence, was a demonstration of his authority, under God, to settle a new dispensation of the kingdom of grace. There was a significance in the miracle itself. Pharaoh had turned the rod of government into the serpent of oppression, from which Moses had himself fled into Midian; but by the agency of Moses the scene was altered again.

2. His hand itself is next made the subject of a miracle. He puts it once into his bosom, and takes it out leprous; he puts it again into the same place, and takes it out well, v. 6, 7. This signified, (1) That Moses, by the power of God, should bring sore diseases upon Egypt, and that, at his prayer, they should be removed. (2) That whereas the Israelites in Egypt had become leprous, polluted by sin, by being taken into the bosom of Moses they should be cleansed and cured. (3) That Moses was not to work miracles by his own power.

3. He is directed, when he shall come to Egypt, to turn some of the water of the river into blood, v. 9.

Verses 10–17

Moses still continues backward to the service for which God had designed him; now we can no longer impute it to his humility and modesty, but must own that there was too much of cowardice, slothfulness, and unbelief in it.

I. How Moses endeavours to excuse himself.

1. He pleads that he was no good spokesman: O my lord! I am not eloquent, v. 10. God is pleased sometimes to make choice of those as his messengers who have fewest of the advantages of art or nature. Christ's disciples were no orators, till the Spirit made them such.

2. When this plea was overruled, and all his excuses were answered, he begged that God would send somebody else on this errand and leave him to keep sheep in Midian (v. 13).

II. How God condescends to answer all his excuses. Though the anger of the Lord was kindled against him (v. 14), yet he continued to reason with him, till he had overcome him.

1. To balance the weakness of Moses, he here reminds him of his own power, v. 11. Who has made man's mouth? Have not I the Lord? Moses knew that God made man, but he must be reminded now that God made man's mouth, and of His power in general over the other faculties. The perfections of our faculties are his work, he makes the seeing; he formed the eye (Ps. xciv. 9); he opens the understanding, the eye of the mind, Luke xxiv. 45.

2. To encourage him in this great undertaking, he repeats the promise of his presence, not only in general, I will be with thee (ch. iii. 12), but in particular, "I will be with thy mouth, so that the imperfection in thy speech shall be no prejudice to thy message." If others spoke more gracefully, none spoke more powerfully.

3. He joins Aaron in commission with him. He promises that Aaron shall meet him opportunely, and that he will be glad to see him, they having not seen one another (it is likely) for many years, v. 14. He directs him to make use of Aaron as his spokesman, v. 16, that their natural affection one to another might strengthen their union in the joint execution of their commission. Christ sent his disciples two and two, and some of the couples were brothers. The tongue of Aaron, with the head and heart of Moses, would make one completely fit for this embassy. God promises, I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth. Even Aaron, that could speak well, yet could not speak to purpose unless God was with his mouth.

4. He bids him take the rod with him in his hand (v. 17). The rod he carried as a shepherd must be his staff of authority, and must be to him instead both of sword and sceptre.

I. Moses obtains leave of his father-in-law to return into Egypt, v. 18.

II. He receives from God further encouragements and directions in his work. And, 1. He assures Moses that the coasts were clear. Whatever new enemies he might make by his undertaking, his old enemies were all dead, all that sought his life, v. 19. 2. He orders him to do the miracles, not only before the elders of Israel, but before Pharaoh, v. 21. 3. That Pharaoh's obstinacy might be no surprise nor discouragement to him, God tells him before that he would harden his heart. 4. Words are put into his mouth with which to address Pharaoh, v. 22, 23. (1) He must deliver his message in the name of the great Jehovah: Thus saith the Lord; this is the first time that preface is used by any man which afterwards is used so frequently by all the prophets. (2) He must let Pharaoh know Israel's relation to God, and God's concern for Israel. (3) He must demand a discharge for them: "Let my son go: not only my servant whom thou hast no right to detain, but my son whose liberty and honour I am very jealous for." (4) He must threaten Pharaoh with the death of the first-born of Egypt, in case of a refusal: I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn.

III. Moses addresses himself to this expedition.

Verses 24–31

Moses is here going to Egypt, and we are told,

I. How God met him in anger, v. 24–26. This is a very difficult passage.

1. The sin of Moses, which was neglecting to circumcise his son. This was probably the effect of his being unequally yoked with a Midianite, who was too indulgent of her child.

2. God's displeasure against him. Omissions are sins. God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the sins of his own people. If they neglect their duty, let them expect to hear of it by their consciences, and perhaps to feel from it by cross providences.

3. The speedy performance of the duty for the neglect of which God had now a controversy with him. His son must be circumcised; Moses is unable to circumcise him; therefore, in this case of necessity, Zipporah does it.

4. The release of Moses thereupon: So he let him go; and all was well: only Zipporah cannot forget the fright she was in, and, upon this occasion (it is probable), he sent them back to his father-in-law.

II. How Aaron met him in love, v. 27, 28. God sent Aaron to meet him, and directed him where to find him, in the wilderness, that lay towards Midian. He met him in the mount of God, the place where God had met with him. They embraced one another as a pledge of their hearty concurrence in the work to which they were jointly called. Moses informed his brother of the commission he had received, v. 28.

III. How the elders of Israel met him in faith and obedience. When Moses and Aaron first opened their commission in Egypt they met with a better reception than they promised themselves, v. 29–31. The people believed, as God had foretold (ch. iii. 18). They bowed their heads and worshipped.

CHAP. V

Moses and Aaron are here dealing with Pharaoh, to get leave of him to go and worship in the wilderness. I. They demand leave in the name of God (ver. 1), and he answers their demand with a defiance of God, ver. 2. II. They beg leave in the name of Israel (ver. 3), and he answers their request with further orders to oppress Israel, ver. 4–9. These cruel orders were, 1. Executed by the task-masters, ver. 10–14. 2. Complained of to Pharaoh, but in vain, ver. 15–19. 3. Complained of by the people to Moses (ver. 20, 21), and by him to God, ver. 22, 23.

Moses and Aaron are now to deal with Pharaoh.

I. Their demand is piously bold: Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, v. 1. Moses, in treating with the elders of Israel, is directed to call God the God of their fathers; but, in treating with Pharaoh, they call him the God of Israel, and it is the first time we find him called so in scripture: he is called the God of Israel, the person (Gen. xxxiii. 20); but here it is Israel, the people. They are just beginning to be formed into a people when God is called their God. In this great name they deliver their message: Let my people go.

II. Pharaoh's answer is impiously bold: Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? v. 2. He will not treat about it, nor so much as bear the mention of it. How scornfully he speaks of the God of Israel: "Who is Jehovah? I neither know him nor care for him, neither value him nor fear him." Ignorance and contempt of God are at the bottom of all the wickedness that is in the world. How proudly he speaks of himself: "That I should obey his voice. Shall I, that rule the Israel of God, obey the God of Israel?" Here is the core of the controversy: God must rule, but man will not be ruled.

Verses 3–9

Finding that Pharaoh had no veneration at all for God, Moses and Aaron next try whether he had any compassion for Israel.

I. Their request is very humble and modest, v. 3. They make no complaint of the rigour they were ruled with. What they ask is very reasonable, only for a short vacation, while they went three days' journey into the desert, "We will sacrifice unto the Lord our God, as other people do to theirs."

II. Pharaoh's denial of their request is very barbarous and unreasonable, v. 4–9.

1. That the people were idle, and that therefore they talked of going to sacrifice. The cities they built for Pharaoh were witnesses that they were not idle. The malice of Satan has often represented the service and worship of God as fit employment for those only that have nothing else to do.

2. His resolutions hereupon were most barbarous. (1) Moses and Aaron themselves must get to their burdens (v. 4); they must share in the common slavery of their nation. (2) The usual tale of bricks must be exacted, without the usual allowance of straw to mix with the clay, or to burn the bricks with.

Pharaoh's orders are here put in execution; straw is denied, and yet the work not diminished. 1. The Egyptian task-masters were very severe. These task-masters insisted upon the daily tasks, as when there was straw, v. 13. 2. The people hereby were dispersed throughout all the land of Egypt, to gather stubble, v. 12. 3. The Israelite-officers were used with particular harshness, v. 14. What a miserable thing slavery is, and what reason we have to be thankful to God that we are a free people, and not oppressed. Liberty and property are valuable jewels in the eyes of those whose services and possessions lie at the mercy of an arbitrary power. What strange steps God sometimes takes in delivering his people. The lowest ebbs go before the highest tides; and very cloudy mornings commonly introduce the fairest days, Deut. xxxii. 36.

Verses 15–23

It was a great strait that the head-workmen were in.

I. How justly they complained to Pharaoh: They came and cried unto Pharaoh, v. 15. Thy servants are beaten and yet the fault is in thy own people, the task-masters, who deny us what is necessary for carrying on our work. But what did they get by this complaint? It did but make bad worse. Pharaoh taunted them (v. 17); when they were almost killed with working, he told them they were idle. It is well for us that men are not to be our judges, but a God who knows what the principles are on which we act.

II. How unjustly they complained of Moses and Aaron: The Lord look upon you, and judge, v. 21. This was not fair. Moses and Aaron had given sufficient evidence of their hearty good will to the liberties of Israel; and yet, because things succeed not immediately they are reproached as accessories to their slavery. Now what did Moses do in this strait? 1. He returned to the Lord (v. 22), to acquaint him with it. When we find ourselves, at any time, perplexed and embarrassed in the way of our duty, we ought to have recourse to God by faithful and fervent prayer. If we retreat, let us retreat to him, and no further. 2. Now he asks, (1) Wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people? (2) Why is it thou hast sent me? Thus, [1] He complains of his ill success: "Pharaoh has done evil to this people, and not one step seems to be taken towards their deliverance." Or, [2] He enquires what was further to be done: Why hast thou sent me? that is, "What other method shall I take in pursuance of my commission?"

CHAP. VI

Witness this chapter, in which, I. God satisfies Moses himself in an answer to his complaints in the close of the foregoing chapter, ver. 1. II. He gives him fuller instructions than had yet been given him what to say to the children of Israel, for their satisfaction (ver. 2–8), but to little purpose, ver. 9. III. He sends him again to Pharaoh, ver. 10, 11. But Moses objects against that (ver. 12), upon which a very strict charge is given to him and his brother to execute their commission with vigour, ver. 13. IV. Here is an abstract of the genealogy of the tribes of Reuben and Simeon, to introduce that of Levi, that the pedigree of Moses and Aaron might be cleared (ver. 14–25), and then the chapter concludes with a repetition of so much of the preceding story as was necessary to make way for the following chapter.

Verses 1–9

Here, I. God silences Moses's complaints with the assurance of success in his negotiation, repeating the promise made him in ch. iii. 20, After that, he will let you go. Then the Lord said unto Moses, for the quieting of his mind, "Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh" (v. 1). See Ps. xii. 5, Now will I arise. Note, Man's extremity is God's opportunity of helping and saving. God takes the work into his own hands. With a strong hand, that is, being forced to it by a strong hand, he shall let them go.

II. He gives him further instructions, that both he and the people of Israel might be encouraged to hope for a glorious issue of this affair. Take comfort,

1. From God's name, Jehovah, v. 2, 3. God would now be known by his name Jehovah, that is, (1) A God performing what he had promised. (2) A God perfecting what he had begun. In the history of the creation, God is never called Jehovah till the heavens and the earth were finished, Gen. ii. 4. When the salvation of the saints is completed in eternal life, then he will be known by his name Jehovah (Rev. xxii. 13); in the meantime they shall find him, for their strength and support, El-shaddai, a God all-sufficient, a God that is enough.

2. From his covenant: I have established my covenant, v. 4. We may venture our all upon this bottom.

3. From his compassions (v. 5): I have heard the groaning of the children of Israel.

4. From his present resolutions, v. 6–8. I will bring you out. I will rid you. I will redeem you. I will bring you into the land of Canaan, and I will give it to you.

5. From his gracious intentions in all these: (1) He intended their happiness: I will take you to me for a people. (2) He intended his own glory: You shall know that I am the Lord. But regardless of God's promises (v. 9): They hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit. By indulging ourselves in discontent and fretfulness, we deprive ourselves of the comfort we might have both from God's word and from his providence, and must thank ourselves if we go comfortless.

I. God sends Moses the second time to Pharaoh (v. 11) upon the same errand as before, to command him, at his peril, that he let the children of Israel go.

II. Moses makes objections. He pleads, 1. The unlikelihood of Pharaoh's hearing: "Behold the children of Israel have not hearkened unto me; they give no heed, no credit, to what I have said; how then can I expect that Pharaoh should hear me?" If God's professing people hear not his messengers, how can it be thought that his professed enemy should? 2. He pleads the unreadiness and infirmity of his own speaking: I am of uncircumcised lips. To this objection God had given a sufficient answer for the sufficiency of grace can supply the defects of nature at any time.

III. God again joins Aaron in commission with Moses, and puts an end to the dispute by interposing his own authority, and giving them both a solemn charge. Moses himself has need to be charged, and so has Timothy, 1 Tim. vi. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 1.

Verses 14–30

I. We have here a genealogy, not an endless one, such as the apostle condemns (1 Tim. i. 4), for it ends in those two great patriots Moses and Aaron, and comes in here to show that they were Israelites, bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh whom they were sent to deliver. The heads of the houses of three of the tribes are here named, agreeing with the accounts we had, Gen. xlvi. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, are thus dignified here by themselves because they were left under marks of infamy by their dying father, and therefore Moses would put this particular honour upon them, to magnify God's mercy in their repentance and remission. The two former seem rather to be mentioned only for the sake of a third, which was Levi, from whom Moses and Aaron descended, and all the priests of the Jewish church. Observe here, 1. That Kohath, from whom Moses and Aaron, and all the priests, derived their pedigree, was a younger son of Levi, v. 16. 2. That Aaron married Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab, one of the chief of the fathers of the tribe of Judah; for the tribes of Levi and Judah often intermarried, v. 23.

II. In the close of the chapter Moses returns to his narrative, from which he had broken off somewhat abruptly (v. 13), and repeats, 1. The charge God had given him to deliver his message to Pharaoh (v. 29): Speak all that I say unto thee, as a faithful ambassador. 2. His objection against it, v. 30. Note, Those that have at any time spoken unadvisedly with their lips ought often to reflect upon it with regret, as Moses seems to do here.

CHAP. VII

In this chapter, I. The dispute between God and Moses finishes, and Moses applies himself to his commission, in obedience to God's command, ver. 1–7. II. The dispute between Moses and Pharaoh begins, and a famous trial of skill it was. Moses, in God's name, demands Israel's release; Pharaoh denies it. The contest is between the power of the great God and the power of a proud prince. 1. Moses confirms the demand he had made to Pharaoh, by a miracle, turning his rod into a serpent; but Pharaoh hardens his heart against this conviction, ver. 8–13. 2. He chastises his disobedience by a plague, the first of the ten, turning the waters into blood; but Pharaoh hardens his heart against this correction, ver. 14, &c.

Verses 1–7

Here, I. God encourages Moses to go to Pharaoh. 1. He clothes him with great power and authority (v. 1): I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; that is, my representative in this affair, as magistrates are called gods, because they are God's vicegerents. He was authorized to speak and act in God's name and stead. Moses was a god, but he was only a made god, not essentially one by nature; he was no god but by commission. He was a god, but he was a god only to Pharaoh; the living and true God is a God to all the world. 2. He again nominates him an assistant, his brother Aaron, a notable spokesman: "He shall be thy prophet. Thou shalt, as a god, inflict and remove the plagues, and Aaron, as a prophet, shall denounce them, and threaten Pharaoh with them."

3. He tells him that Pharaoh would not hearken to him, and yet the work should be done at last. The Egyptians, who would not know the Lord, should be made to know him.

II. Moses and Aaron apply themselves to their work without further objection: They did as the Lord commanded them, v. 6. Their obedience was celebrated by the Psalmist (Ps. cv. 28), They rebelled not against his word, namely, Moses and Aaron, whom he mentions, v. 26. Thus Jonah, though at first he was very averse, at length went to Nineveh.

Verses 8–13

The first time that Moses made his application to Pharaoh, he produced his instructions only; now he is directed to produce his credentials, and does accordingly. 1. Pharaoh will say, Show a miracle; not with any desire to be convinced, but with the hope that none will be wrought. 2. Orders are therefore given to turn the rod into a serpent, according to the instructions, ch. iv. 3. Aaron cast his rod to the ground, and instantly it became a serpent, v. 10. This was proper, not only to affect Pharaoh with wonder, but to strike a terror upon him. 3. This miracle, though too plain to be denied, is enervated, and the conviction of it taken off, by the magicians' imitation of it, v. 11, 12. Moses had been originally instructed in the learning of the Egyptians, and was suspected to have improved himself in magical arts in his long retirement; the magicians are therefore sent for, to vie with him. Their rods became serpents, some think, by the power of God, for the hardening of Pharaoh's heart; others think, by the power of evil angels. Note, God suffers the lying spirit to do strange things, that the faith of some may be tried and manifested (Deut. xiii. 3; 1 Cor. xi. 19). In this contest, Moses plainly gains the victory. The serpent which Aaron's rod was turned into swallowed up the others, which was sufficient to have convinced Pharaoh on which side the right lay. But Pharaoh was not wrought upon by this. The magicians having produced serpents, he had this to say, that the case between them and Moses was disputable.

Here is the first of the ten plagues, the turning of the water into blood, which was, 1. A dreadful plague, and very grievous. Fish was food (Num. xi. 5), but the changing of the waters was the death of the fish; it was a pestilence in that element (v. 21): The fish died. He slew their fish; and when another destruction of Egypt, long afterwards, is threatened, the disappointment of those that make sluices and ponds for fish is particularly noticed, Isa. xix. 10. It was a righteous plague, and justly inflicted upon the Egyptians. For, (1) Nilus, the river of Egypt, was their idol; they and their land derived so much benefit from it that they served and worshipped it more than the Creator. God punished them, and turned that into blood which they had turned into a god. Note, That creature which we idolize God justly removes from us, or embitters to us. He makes that a scourge to us which we make a competitor with him. Egypt had a great dependence upon their river (Zech. xiv. 18), so that in smiting the river they were warned of the destruction of all the productions of their country, till it came at last to their first-born; and this red river proved a direful omen of the ruin of Pharaoh and all his forces in the Red Sea. One of the first miracles Moses wrought was turning water into blood, but one of the first miracles our Lord Jesus wrought was turning water into wine; for the law was given by Moses, and it was a dispensation of death and terror; but grace and truth, which, like wine, make glad the heart, came by Jesus Christ.

I. Moses is directed to give Pharaoh warning of this plague. "Pharaoh's heart is hardened (v. 14), therefore go and try what this will do to soften it," v. 15. Moses is directed to meet him by the river's brink, whither God foresaw he would come in the morning to pay his morning devotions to the river. There Moses must be ready to give him a new summons to surrender, and, in case of a refusal, to tell him of the judgment that was coming upon that very river on the banks of which they were now standing. Notice is thus given him of it beforehand, that they might have no colour to say it was a chance, or to attribute it to any other cause, but that it might appear to be done by the power of the God of the Hebrews. That God warns before he wounds; for he is long-suffering, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

II. Aaron (who carried the mace) is directed to summon the plague by smiting the river with his rod, v. 19, 20. See here the almighty power of God. Every creature is that to us which he makes it to be, water or blood. See the mutability of all things under the sun, and what changes we may meet with in them. A river, at the best, is transient; but divine justice can quickly make it malignant. See what mischievous work sin makes. If the things that have been our comforts prove our crosses, we must thank ourselves: it is sin that turns our waters into blood.

III. Pharaoh endeavours to confront the miracle, because he resolves not to humble himself under the plague. He sends for the magicians, and, by God's permission, they ape the miracle with their enchantments (v. 22), and this serves Pharaoh for an excuse not to set his heart to this also (v. 23), and a pitiful excuse it was. Could they have turned the river of blood into water again, this would have been something to the purpose; then they would have proved their power, and Pharaoh would have been obliged to them as his benefactors.

IV. The Egyptians, in the meantime, are seeking for relief against the plague, digging round about the river for water to drink, v. 24. Probably they found some, with much ado, God remembering mercy in the midst of wrath; for he is full of compassion, and would not let the subjects smart too much for the obstinacy of their prince.

V. The plague continued seven days (v. 25), and, in all that time, Pharaoh's proud heart would not let him so much as desire Moses to intercede for the removal of it.

CHAP. VIII

Three more of the plagues of Egypt are related in this chapter, I. That of the frogs, which is, 1. Threatened, ver. 1–4. 2. Inflicted, ver. 5, 6. 3. Mimicked by the magicians, ver. 7. 4. Removed, at the humble request of Pharaoh (ver. 8–14), who yet hardens his heart, and, notwithstanding his promise while the plague was upon him (ver. 8), refuses to let Israel go, ver. 15. II. The plague of lice (ver. 16, 17), by which, 1. The magicians were baffled (ver. 18, 19), and yet, 2. Pharaoh was hardened, ver. 19. III. That of flies. 1. Pharaoh is warned of it before (ver. 20, 21), and told that the land of Goshen should be exempt from this plague, ver. 22, 23. 2. The plague is brought, ver. 24. 3. Pharaoh treats with Moses about the release of Israel, and humbles himself, ver. 25–29. 4. The plague is thereupon removed (ver. 31), and Pharaoh's heart hardened, ver. 32.

Verses 1–15

Pharaoh is here first threatened and then plagued with frogs, as afterwards, in this chapter, with lice and flies, little despicable inconsiderable animals, and yet by their vast numbers rendered sore plagues to the Egyptians. Some have thought that the power of God is shown as much in the making of an ant as in the making of an elephant; so is his providence in serving his own purposes by the least creatures as effectually as by the strongest, that he might humble Pharaoh's pride, and chastise his insolence. What a mortification must it needs be to this haughty monarch to see himself brought to his knees, and forced to submit by such despicable means! As to the plague of frogs we may observe,

I. How it was threatened. Moses is here directed to give notice to Pharaoh of another judgment coming upon him, in case he continue obstinate. Note, God does not punish men for sin unless they persist in it. The plague threatened, in case of refusal, was formidably extensive.

II. How it was inflicted. Pharaoh not being at all nclined to yield to the summons, Aaron is ordered to give the signal of battle. Shoals of frogs invade the land, and the Egyptians cannot check their progress. Compare this with that prophecy of an army of locusts and caterpillars, Joel ii. 2, &c.; and see Isa. xxxiv. 16, 17.

III. How the magicians were permitted to imitate it, v. 7. They also brought up frogs, but could not remove those that God sent. The magicians intended to deceive, but God intended by them to destroy those that would be deceived.

IV. How Pharaoh relented under this plague: it was the first time he did so, v. 8. He begs of Moses to intercede for the removal of the frogs, and promises fair that he will let the people go.

V. How Moses fixes the time with Pharaoh, and then prevails with God by prayer for the removal of the frogs. Pharaoh sets the time for to-morrow, v. 10. In answer to the prayer of Moses, the frogs that came up one day perished the next, or the next but one.

VI. What was the issue of this plague (v. 15): When Pharaoh saw there was a respite, without considering either what he had lately felt or what he had reason to fear, he hardened his heart. Note, 1. Till the heart is renewed by the grace of God, the impressions made by the force of affliction do not abide; the convictions wear off, and the promises that were extorted are forgotten. 2. God's patience is shamefully abused by impenitent sinners. He graciously allows them a truce, in order to the making of their peace. They take that opportunity to rally again the baffled forces of an obstinate infidelity. See Eccles. viii. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 34, &c.

Here is a short account of the plague of lice.

I. How this plague of lice was inflicted on the Egyptians, v. 16, 17. The frogs were produced out of the waters, but these lice out of the dust of the earth. The second woe was past, but behold the third woe came very quickly.

II. How the magicians were baffled by it, v. 18. They attempted to imitate it, but they could not. This forced them to confess themselves overpowered: This is the finger of God (v. 19). Sooner or later God will extort, even from his enemies, an acknowledgment of his own sovereignty and overruling power. It is certain they must all (as we say) knock under at last, as Julian the apostate did, when his dying lips confessed, Thou hast overcome me, O thou Galilean! God will not only be too hard for all opposers, but will force them to own it.

III. How Pharaoh, notwithstanding this, was made more and more obstinate (v. 19). Note, Those that are not made better by God's word and providences are commonly made worse by them.

Verses 20–32

Here is the story of the plague of flies.

I. How it was threatened, like that of frogs, before it was inflicted. Moses is directed (v. 20) to rise early in the morning, to meet Pharaoh when he came forth to the water. Moses must stand before Pharaoh, proud as he was, and tell him that which was in the highest degree humbling, must challenge him (if he refused to release his captives) to engage with an army of flies, which would obey God's orders if Pharaoh would not.

II. How the Egyptians and the Hebrews were to be remarkably distinguished in this plague, v. 22, 23. Pharaoh must be made to know that God is the Lord in the midst of the earth; and by this it will be known beyond dispute. Observe how it is repeated: I will put a division between my people and thy people, v. 23. Note, The Lord knows those that are his, and will make it appear, perhaps in this world, certainly in the other, that he has set them apart for himself. A day will come when you shall return and discern between the righteous and the wicked (Mal. iii. 18), the sheep and the goats (Matt. xxv. 32; Ezek. xxxiv. 17), though now intermixed.

III. How it was inflicted, the day after it was threatened: There came a grievous swarm of flies (v. 24).

IV. How Pharaoh, upon this attack, entered into a treaty with Moses and Aaron about a surrender of his captives: but observe with what reluctance he yields.

1. He is content they should sacrifice to their God, provided they would do it in the land of Egypt, v. 25. But Moses will not accept his concession; he cannot do it, v. 26. He insists: We will go three days' journey into the wilderness, v. 27. Those that would offer an acceptable sacrifice to God must retire from the distractions of the world. Israel cannot keep the feast of the Lord either among the brick-kilns or among the flesh-pots of Egypt. Though they were in the utmost degree of slavery to Pharaoh, yet, in the worship of God, they must observe his commands and not Pharaoh's.

2. When this proposal is rejected, he consents for them to go into the wilderness, provided they do not go very far away. We observe here a struggle between Pharaoh's convictions and his corruptions; his convictions said, "Let them go"; his corruptions said, "Yet not very far away": but he sided with his corruptions against his convictions, and this was his ruin. This proposal Moses so far accepted as that he promised the removal of this plague upon it, v. 29.

The issue of all was that God graciously removed the plague (v. 30, 31), but Pharaoh perfidiously returned to his hardness, and would not let the people go, v. 32. His pride would not let him part with such a flower of his crown as his dominion over Israel was, nor his covetousness with such a branch of his revenue as their labours were.

CHAP. IX

In this chapter we have an account of three more of the plagues of Egypt. I. Murrain among the cattle, which was fatal to them, ver. 1–7. II. Boils upon man and beast, ver. 8–12. III. Hail, with thunder and lightning. 1. Warning is given of this plague, ver. 13–21. 2. It is inflicted, to their great terror, ver. 22–26. 3. Pharaoh, in a fright, renews his treaty with Moses, but instantly breaks his word, ver. 27, &c.

Verses 1–7

Here is, I. Warning given or another plague, namely, the murrain of beasts. 1. Let my people go, v. 1. They are my people, therefore let them go. 2. He describes the plague that should come, if he refused, v. 2, 3. The hand of the Lord is upon the cattle, many of which should die by a sort of pestilence. To-morrow it shall be done. We know not what any day will bring forth, and therefore we cannot say what we will do to-morrow, but it is not so with God.

II. The plague itself inflicted. The cattle died, v. 6. The Egyptians afterwards, and (some think) now, worshipped their cattle; it was among them that the Israelites learned to make a god of a calf: in this therefore the plague here spoken of meets with them.

III. The distinction put between the cattle of the Egyptians and the Israelites' cattle, according to the word of God: Not one of the cattle of the Israelites died, v. 6, 7.

Verses 8–12

Concerning the plague of boils and blains.

I. When they were not wrought upon by the death of their cattle, God sent a plague that seized their own bodies, and touched them to the quick. If less judgments do not do their work, God will send greater.

II. The signal by which this plague was summoned. Sometimes God shows men their sin in their punishment; they had oppressed Israel in the furnaces, and now the ashes of the furnace are made as much a terror to them as ever their task-masters had been to the Israelites.

III. The plague itself was very grievous—these eruptions were inflammations, like Job's. This is afterwards called the botch of Egypt (Deut. xxviii. 27).

IV. The magicians themselves were struck with these boils, v. 11. Thus they were punished for helping to harden Pharaoh's heart. God will severely reckon with those that strengthen the hands of the wicked in their wickedness.

V. Pharaoh continued obstinate, for now the Lord hardened his heart, v. 12. Before, he had hardened his own heart, and resisted the grace of God; and now God justly gave him up to his own heart's lusts.

Here is, I. A general declaration of the wrath of God against Pharaoh for his obstinacy. Though God has hardened his heart (v. 12), yet Moses must repeat his applications to him. God would likewise show forth a pattern of long-suffering, and how he waits to be gracious to a rebellious and gainsaying people. Six times the demand had been made in vain, yet Moses must make it the seventh time: Let my people go, v. 13. A most dreadful message Moses is here ordered to deliver to him, whether he will hear or whether he will forbear. "I will send my plagues upon thy heart, not only temporal plagues upon thy body, but spiritual plagues upon thy soul." He must tell him that he is to remain in history a standing monument of the justice and power of God's wrath (v. 14): "For this cause have I raised thee up to the throne at this time, and made thee to stand the shock of the plagues hitherto, to show in thee my power." Every thing concurred to signalise this, that God's name (that is, his incontestable sovereignty, his irresistible power, and his inflexible justice) might be declared throughout all the earth, not only to all places, but through all ages while the earth remains. Pharaoh was a great king; God's people were poor shepherds at the best, and now poor slaves; and yet Pharaoh shall be ruined if he exalt himself against them, for it is considered as exalting himself against God.

II. A particular prediction of the plague of hail (v. 18), and a gracious advice to Pharaoh and his people to send for their servants and cattle out of the field, that they might be sheltered from the hail, v. 19. See here what care God took, not only to distinguish between Egyptians and Israelites, but between some Egyptians and others. Some believed the things that were spoken, and they feared, and housed their servants and cattle (v. 20), like Noah (Heb. xi. 7), and it was their wisdom. Even among the servants of Pharaoh there were some that trembled at God's word.

The threatened plague of hail is here summoned:

I. What desolations it made upon the earth. It killed both men and cattle, and battered down, not only the herbs, but the trees, v. 25. The corn that was above ground was destroyed, and that only preserved which as yet had not come up, v. 31, 32. Notice is here taken (v. 26) of the land of Goshen's being preserved from receiving any damage by this plague.

II. What a consternation it put Pharaoh in. He humbled himself to Moses in the language of a penitent, v. 27, 28. He condemns himself and his land: "I and my people are wicked, and deserve what is brought upon us." He begs the prayers of Moses: "Entreat the Lord for me, that this direful plague may be removed." And, lastly, he promises to yield up his prisoners: I will let you go. Moses, hereupon, becomes an intercessor for him with God. Though he had all the reason in the world to think that he would immediately repent of his repentance, and told him so (v. 30), yet he promises to be his friend in the court of heaven. Note, Even those whom we have little hopes of, yet we should continue to pray for, and to admonish, 1 Sam. xii. 23. The place Moses chose for his intercession. Peace with God makes men thunderproof, for thunder is the voice of their Father. The success of it. 1. He prevailed with God, v. 33. But, 2. He could not prevail with Pharaoh: He sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, v. 34, 35. Note, Little credit is to be given to confessions upon the rack.

CHAP. X

The eighth and ninth of the plagues of Egypt, that of locusts and that of darkness, are recorded in this chapter. I. Concerning the plague of locusts, 1. God instructs Moses in the meaning of these amazing dispensations of his providence, ver. 1, 2. 2. He threatens the locusts, ver. 3–6. 3. Pharaoh, at the persuasion of his servants, is willing to treat again with Moses (ver. 7–9), but they cannot agree, ver. 10, 11. 4. The locusts come, ver. 12–15. 5. Pharaoh cries Peccavi—I have offended (ver. 16, 17), whereupon Moses prays for the removal of the plague, and it is done, but Pharaoh's heart is still hardened, ver. 18–20. II. Concerning the plague of darkness, 1. It is inflicted, ver. 21–23. 2. Pharaoh again treats with Moses about a surrender, but the treaty breaks off in a heat, ver. 24, &c.

Verses 1–11

I. Moses is instructed. These plagues are standing monuments of the greatness of God, the happiness of the church, and the sinfulness of sin, and standing monitors to the children of men in all ages not to provoke the Lord to jealousy nor to strive with their Maker.

II. Pharaoh is reproved (v. 3): Thus saith the Lord God of the poor, despised, persecuted Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Those that will not humble themselves God will humble.

III. The plague of locusts is threatened, v. 4–6. The hail had broken down the fruits of the earth, but these locusts should come and devour them. Moses, when he had delivered his message, not expecting any better answer than he had formerly, turned himself and went out from Pharaoh, v. 6. Thus Christ appointed his disciples to depart from those who would not receive them, and to shake off the dust of their feet for a testimony against them.

IV. Pharaoh's attendants, his ministers of state, or privy-counsellors, interpose, to persuade him to come to some terms with Moses, v. 7. The Israelites had become a burdensome stone to the Egyptians, and now, at length, the princes of Egypt were willing to be rid of them, Zech. xii. 3.

V. A new treaty is, hereupon, set on foot between Pharaoh, and Moses, in which Pharaoh consents for the Israelites to go into the wilderness to do sacrifice; but the matter in dispute was who should go, v. 8. 1. Moses insists that they should take their whole families, and all their effects, along with them, v. 9. 2. Pharaoh will by no means grant this: he will allow the men to go, pretending that this was all they desired, though this matter was never yet mentioned in any of the former treaties; but, for the little ones, he resolves to keep them as hostages, to oblige them to return, v. 10, 11. 3. The treaty, hereupon, breaks off abruptly.

I. The invasion of the land by the locusts—God's great army, Joel ii. 11. The locusts obey the summons, and fly upon the wings of the wind, the east wind, and caterpillars without number, as we are told, Ps. cv. 34, 35. A formidable army of horse and foot might more easily have been resisted than this host of insects.

II. The desolations they made in it (v. 15): They covered the face of the earth, and ate up the fruit of it. Herbs grow for the service of man; yet, when God pleases, those contemptible insects shall not only be fellow-consumers with him, but shall plunder him, and eat the bread out of his mouth.

III. Pharaoh's admission, hereupon, v. 16, 17. 1. Pharaoh confesses his fault: I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you. He now sees his own folly in the slights and affronts he had put on God and his ambassadors, and seems, at least, to repent of it. 2. He begs pardon, not of God, as penitents ought, but of Moses. 3. He entreats Moses and Aaron to pray for him. Pharaoh desires their prayers that this death only might be taken away, not this sin: he deprecates the plague of locusts, not the plague of a hard heart, which yet was much the more dangerous.

IV. The removal of the judgment, upon the prayer of Moses, v. 18, 19. This was, 1. As great an instance of the power of God as the judgment itself. An east wind brought the locusts, and now a west wind carried them off. Note, Whatever point of the compass the wind is in, it is fulfilling God's word, and turns about by his counsel. 2. It was a proof of the authority of Moses, and a ratification of his commission. 3. It was also as strong an argument for their repentance as the judgment itself; for by this it appeared that God is ready to forgive, and swift to show mercy.

V. Pharaoh's return to his impious resolution again not to let the people go (v. 20).

Verses 21–29

Here is, I. The plague of darkness. Observe particularly concerning this plague, 1. That it was a total darkness. They saw not one another. Hell is utter darkness. The light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee, Rev. xviii. 23. 2. That it was darkness which might be felt (v. 21). 3. No doubt it astonished and terrified them. The tradition of the Jews is that in this darkness they were terrified by the apparitions of evil spirits, or rather by dreadful sounds and murmurs which they made, or (which is no less frightful) by the horrors of their own consciences. 4. It continued three days, six nights (says bishop Hall) in one. Spiritual darkness is spiritual bondage; while Satan blinds men's eyes that they see not, he binds their hands and feet that they work not for God, nor move towards heaven. They sit in darkness. Never was mind so blinded as Pharaoh's, never was air so darkened as Egypt's. The Egyptians by their cruelty would have extinguished the lamp of Israel, and quenched their coal; justly therefore does God put out their lights.

II. Here is the impression made upon Pharaoh by this plague. 1. It awakened him so far that he renewed the treaty with Moses and Aaron, and now, at length, consented that they should take their little ones with them, only he would have their cattle left in pawn, v. 24. Moses resolves not to abate in his terms: Our cattle shall go with us, v. 26. Moses gives a very good reason why they must take their cattle with them; they must go to do sacrifice, and therefore they must take wherewithal. 2. Yet it exasperated him so far that, when he might not make his own terms, he broke off the conference abruptly. Moses is dismissed in anger, forbidden the court upon pain of death. Moses takes him at his word (v. 29): I will see thy face no more. So that, after this interview, Moses came no more, till he was sent for.

CHAP. XI

We have in this chapter, I. The instructions God had given to Moses, which he was now to pursue (ver. 1, 2), together with the interest Israel and Moses had in the esteem of the Egyptians, ver. 3. II. The last message Moses delivered to Pharaoh, concerning the death of the first-born, ver. 4–8. I I. A repetition of the prediction of Pharaoh's hardening his heart (ver. 9), and the event answering to it, ver. 10.

Verses 1–3

Here is, I. The high favour Moses and Israel were in with God. Moses longed to see an end of this dreadful work, to see Egypt no more plagued and Israel no more oppressed. The Israelites were favourites of Heaven. This was the last day of their servitude; they were about to go away, and their masters, who had abused them in their work, would now have defrauded them of their wages, and have sent them away empty. Though the patient Israelites were content to lose their wages, yet God would not let them go without them.

II. The high favour Moses and Israel were in with the Egyptians, v. 3. 1. Even the people that had been hated and despised now came to be respected. 2. The man Moses was very great. How could it be otherwise when they saw what power he was clothed with, and what wonders were wrought by his hand? Thus the apostles, though otherwise despicable men, came to be magnified, Acts v. 13. Those that honour God he will honour. Though Pharaoh hated Moses, there were those of Pharaoh's servants that respected him. Thus in Caesar's household, even Nero's, there were some that had an esteem for blessed Paul, Phil. i. 13.

Verses 4–10

Warning is here given to Pharaoh of the last and conquering plague which was now to be inflicted. This was the death of all the first-born in Egypt at once, which had been first threatened (ch. iv. 23, I will slay thy son, thy first-born), but is last executed. If the death of their cattle had humbled and reformed them, their children would have been spared. The extent of this plague is described, v. 5. The prince that was to succeed in the throne was not too high to be reached by it, nor were the slaves at the mill too low to be taken notice of. When Moses had thus delivered his message, it is said, He went out from Pharaoh in a great anger, though he was the meekest of all the men of the earth. Probably he expected that the very threatening of the death of the first-born would have induced Pharaoh to comply. But it had not that effect; his proud heart would not yield, no, not to save all the first-born of his kingdom. Moses, hereupon, was provoked to a holy indignation, being grieved (as our Saviour afterwards) for the hardness of his heart, Mark iii. 5. Note, It is a great vexation to the spirits of good ministers to see people deaf to all the fair warnings given them, and running headlong upon ruin, notwithstanding all the kind methods taken to prevent it. Thus Ezekiel went in the bitterness of his spirit (Ezek. iii. 14), because God had told him that the house of Israel would not hearken to him, v. 7. To be angry at nothing but sin is the way not to sin in anger.

Gentiles, that the stranger, if circumcised, stands upon the same level with the home-born Israelite. It was their dedication to God, not their descent from Abraham, that entitled them to their privileges.

II. In one house shall it be eaten (v. 46), that they might rejoice together, and edify one another in the eating of it.

The chapter concludes with a repetition of the whole matter, that the children of Israel did as they were bidden, and God did for them as he promised (v. 50, 51).

CHAP. XIII

In this chapter we have, I. The commands God gave to Israel, 1. To sanctify all their firstborn to him, ver. 1, 2. 2. To be sure to remember their deliverance out of Egypt (ver. 3, 4), and, in remembrance of it, to keep the feast of unleavened bread, ver. 5–7. 3. To transmit the knowledge of it with all possible care to their children, ver. 8–10. 4. To set apart unto God the firstlings of their cattle (ver. 11–13). II. The care God took of Israel, when he had brought them out of Egypt. 1. Choosing their way for them, ver. 17, 18. 2. Guiding them in the way, ver. 20–22. And III. Their care of Joseph's bones, ver. 19.

Care is here taken to perpetuate the remembrance,

I. Of the preservation of Israel's firstborn. God here lays claim in particular to the firstborn of the Israelites, by right of protection: Sanctify to me all the firstborn. God, who is the first and best, should have the first and best, and to him we should resign that which is most dear to us, and most valuable. The firstborn were the joy and hope of their families. Therefore they shall be mine, says God. It is the church of the firstborn that is sanctified to God, Heb. xii. 23. Christ is the firstborn among many brethren (Rom. viii. 29), and, by virtue of their union with him, all that are born again, and born from above, are accounted as firstborn. There is an excellency of dignity and power belonging to them; and, if children, then heirs.

II. The remembrance of their coming out of Egypt must also be perpetuated: "Remember this day (v. 3). Remember it by a good token, as the most remarkable day of your lives, the birthday of your nation, or the day of its coming of age, to be no longer under the rod." Thus the day of Christ's resurrection is to be remembered, for in it we were raised up with Christ out of death's house of bondage.

1. They must be sure to keep the feast of unleavened bread, v. 5–7. It was not enough that they remembered it, but they must celebrate the memorial of it in that way which God had appointed. Observe, How strict the prohibition of leaven is (v. 7); not only no leaven must be eaten, but none must be seen, no, not in all their quarters. Accordingly, the Jews' usage was, before the feast of the passover, to cast all the leavened bread out of their houses: they burnt it, or buried it, or broke it small and scattered it in the wind; they searched diligently with lighted candles in all the corners of their houses, lest any leaven should remain.

2. They must instruct their children in the meaning of it, and relate to them the story of their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 8. When they were celebrating the ordinance, they must explain it.

1. Further directions concerning the dedicating of their firstborn to God. 1. The firstlings of their cattle were to be dedicated to God, as part of their possessions. 2. The firstborn of their children were to be redeemed, and by no means sacrificed, as the Gentiles sacrificed their children to Moloch. The price of the redemption of the firstborn was fixed by the law (Num. xviii. 16) at five shekels.

II. Further directions concerning the catechising of their children, and all those of the rising generation, from time to time, in this matter. Note, 1. Children should be directed and encouraged to ask their parents questions concerning the things of God. 2. We should all be able to show cause for what we do in religion. As sacraments are sanctified by the word, so they must be explained and understood by it. God's service is reasonable, and it is then acceptable when we perform it intelligently, knowing what we do and why we do it. Mercies to our fathers are mercies to us; we reap the benefit of them. Much more reason have we to say that in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ we were redeemed.

Here is, I. The choice God made of their way, v. 17, 18. He was their guide. Moses gave them direction, but as he received it from the Lord. There were two ways from Egypt to Canaan. One was a short cut from the north of Egypt to the south of Canaan, perhaps about four or five days' journey; the other was much further about, through the wilderness, and that was the way in which God chose to lead his people Israel, v. 18. 1. There were many reasons why God led them through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea. The Egyptians were to be drowned in the Red Sea. The Israelites were to be humbled and proved in the wilderness, Deut. viii. 2. Matters must be settled between them and their God, laws must be given, ordinances instituted, covenants sealed, and the original contract ratified. God's way is the right way, though it seem about. If we think he leads not his people the nearest way, yet we may be sure he leads them the best way, and so it will appear when we come to our journey's end. 2. There was one reason why God did not lead them the nearest way, because they were not as yet fit for war, much less for war with the Philistines, v. 17. Their spirits were broken with slavery; it was not easy for them to turn their hands of a sudden from the trowel to the sword. The Philistines were formidable enemies, too fierce to be encountered by raw recruits. God is said to bring Israel out of Egypt as the eagle brings up her young ones (Deut. xxxii. 11), teaching them by degrees to fly. Orders being thus given which way they should go, we are told, (1) That they went up themselves, not as a confused rout, but in good order, rank and file: they went up harnessed, v. 18. (2) That they took the bones of Joseph along with them (v. 19). Joseph had particularly appointed that his bones should be carried up when God should visit them (Gen. l. 25, 26). They might think, "Joseph's bones must rest at last, and then we shall."

II. Here is the guidance they were blessed with in the way: The Lord went before them, the shechinah (or appearance of the divine Majesty, which was typical of Christ) or a previous manifestation of the eternal Word, which, in the fulness of time, was to be made flesh, and dwell among us. Christ was with the church in the wilderness, 1 Cor. x. 9. Note, Those whom God brings into a wilderness he will not leave nor lose there, but will take care to lead them through it. Those who made the glory of God their end, and the word of God their rule, the Spirit of God the guide of their affections, and the providence of God the guide of their affairs, may be confident that the Lord goes before them, as truly as he went before Israel in the wilderness, though not so sensibly; we must live by faith. 1. They all saw an appearance from heaven of a pillar, which in the bright day appeared cloudy, and in the dark night appeared fiery. God gave them this ocular demonstration of his presence, in compassion to the infirmity of their faith. 2. They had sensible effects of God's going before them in this pillar. For, (1) It led the way in that wilderness, in which there was no road, no track, of which they had no maps, through which they had no guides. When they marched, this pillar went before them, at the rate that they could follow. (2) It sheltered them by day from the heat. (3) It gave them light by night and at all times made the wilderness they were in less frightful.

III. These were constant standing miracles (v. 22): He took not away the pillar of cloud. It never left them, till it brought them to the borders of Canaan. It was a cloud which the wind could not scatter. There was something spiritual in this pillar of cloud and fire. Some make this cloud a type of Christ. The cloud of his human nature was a veil to the light and fire of his divine nature. Christ is our way, the light of our way and the guide of it.

CHAP. XIV

The departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt (which was indeed the birth of the Jewish church) is made yet more memorable. Witness the records of this chapter, the contents whereof, together with a key to it, we have, Heb. xi. 29. Here is, I. The extreme danger that Israel was in at the Red Sea. 1. Notice was given of it to Moses, ver. 1–4. 2. The cause of it was Pharaoh's pursuit of them, ver. 5–9. 3. Israel was in consternation, ver. 10–12. 4. Moses endeavours to encourage them, ver. 13, 14. II. The wonderful deliverance that God wrought. 1. Moses is instructed concerning it, ver. 15–18. 2. Lines that could not be forced are set between the camp of Israel and Pharaoh's camp, ver. 19, 20. 3. By the divine power the Red Sea is divided (ver. 21), and is made, (1) A lane to the Israelites, who marched safely through it, ver. 22, 29. But (2) To the Egyptians it was made, [1] An ambush into which they were drawn, ver. 23–25. And, [2] A grave in which they were all buried, ver. 26–28. III. The impressions this made upon the Israelites, ver. 30, 31.

Verses 1–9

I. Instructions given to Moses concerning Israel's motions and encampments. That there might be no scruple nor dissatisfaction about it, Moses is told before, 1. Whither they must go, v. 1, 2. They had got to the edge of the wilderness (ch. xiii. 20), and a stage or two more would have brought them to Horeb, the place appointed for their serving God; but, instead of going forward, they are ordered to turn short off, on the right hand from Canaan, and to march towards the Red Sea. 2. Moses shall know, (1) That Pharaoh has a design to ruin Israel, v. 3. (2) That therefore God has a design to ruin Pharaoh, and he takes this way to effect it, v. 4.

II. Pharaoh's pursuit of Israel, in which, while he gratifies his own malice and revenge, he is furthering the accomplishment of God's counsels concerning him. It was told him that the people fled, v. 5. Now, hereupon,

1. He reflects upon it with regret that he had connived at their departure. He and his servants were now angry with themselves for it: Why have we done thus? (1) It vexed them that Israel had their liberty, that they had lost the profit of their labours, and the pleasure of chastising them. Note, The liberty of God's people is a heavy grievance to their enemies, Esther v. 12, 13; Acts v. 17, 23. (2) It aggravated the vexation that they themselves had consented to it. Thus God makes men's envy and rage against his people a torment to themselves, Ps. cxii. 10.

2. He resolves, if possible, either to reduce them or to be revenged on them; in order to this, he levies an army, musters all his force of chariots and horsemen, v. 17, 18, and thus he doubts not but he shall re-enslave them, v. 6, 7. It is said (v. 8), The children of Israel went out with a great deal of courage. But the Egyptians (v. 9) pursued after them. Note, Those that in good earnest set their faces heaven-ward, and will live godly in Christ Jesus, must expect to be set upon by Satan's temptations and terrors. He will not tamely part with any out of his service, nor go out without raging, Mark ix. 26.

We have here, I. The fright that the children of Israel were in when they perceived that Pharaoh pursued them, v. 10. They knew very well the strength and rage of the enemy, and their own weakness. On the one hand was Pi-hahiroth, a range of craggy rocks impassable; on the other hand were Migdol and Baalzephon; before them was the sea; behind them were the Egyptians: so that there was no way open for them but upwards, and thence their deliverance came. 1. Some of them cried out unto the Lord; their fear set them praying, and that was a good effect of it. God brings us into straits that he may bring us to our knees. 2. Others of them cried out against Moses; their fear set them murmuring, v. 11, 12. How inexcusable was their distrust! They here express, (1) A sordid contempt of liberty, preferring servitude before it, only because it was attended with some difficulties. A generous spirit would have said, "Better live God's freemen in the open air of a wilderness than the Egyptians' bondmen in the smoke of the brick-kilns." (2) Base ingratitude to Moses, who had been the faithful instrument of their deliverance. They had as soon forgotten the miracles of mercy as the Egyptians had forgotten the miracles of wrath; and they, as well as the Egyptians, hardened their hearts, at last, to their own ruin; as Egypt after ten plagues, so Israel after ten provocations, of which this was the first (Num. xiv. 22), were sentenced to die in the wilderness.

II. The seasonable encouragement that Moses gave them in this distress, v. 12, 14. He answered not these fools according to their folly. Instead of chiding them, he comforts them, and with an admirable presence and composure of mind stills their murmuring, with the assurance of a speedy and complete deliverance: Fear you not. Note, It is our duty and interest, when we cannot get out of our troubles, yet to get above our fears, so that they may only serve to quicken our prayers and endeavours, but may not prevail to silence our faith and hope. He directs them to leave it to God, in a silent expectation of the event: "Stand still, and think not to save yourselves either by fighting or flying; wait God's orders. God is now about to work for you.

I. Direction given to Israel's leader.

1. What he must do himself. He must, for the present, leave off praying, and apply himself to his business (v. 15): Wherefore cryest thou unto me? But is God displeased with Moses for praying? No, he asks this question, Wherefore cryest thou unto me? (1) To satisfy his faith. "Wherefore shouldst thou press thy petition any further, when it is already granted? I have accepted thy prayer." (2) To quicken his diligence. Moses had something else to do besides praying; he was to command the hosts of Israel, and it was now requisite that he should be at his post.

2. What he must order Israel to do. Speak to them, that they go forward. Moses had bidden them stand still, and expect orders from God; and now orders are given. They thought they must have been directed either to the right hand or to the left. "No," says God, "speak to them to go forward, directly to the sea-side"; as if there had lain a fleet of transport-ships ready for them to embark in.

3. What he might expect God to do. Let the children of Israel go as far as they can upon dry ground, and then God will divide the sea, and open a passage for them through it, v. 16–18.

II. A guard set upon Israel's camp where it now lay most exposed, which was in the rear, v. 19, 20. The angel of God, whose ministry was made use of in the pillar of cloud and fire, went from before the camp of Israel, where they did not now need a guide (there was no danger of missing their way through the sea, nor needed they any other word of command than to go forward), and it came behind them, where now they needed a guard and so was a wall of partition between them.

We have here the history of that work of wonder which is so often mentioned both in the Old and New Testament, the dividing of the Red Sea before the children of Israel. It was the terror of the Canaanites (Josh. ii. 9, 10), the praise and triumph of the Israelites, Ps. cxiv. 3; cvi. 9; cxxxvi. 13, 14. It was a type of baptism, 1 Cor. x. 1, 2. Israel's passage through it was typical of the conversion of souls (Isa. xi. 15).

I. An instance of God's almighty power in the kingdom of nature, in dividing the sea. It was a bay, or gulf, or arm of the sea, two or three leagues over, which was divided, v. 21. The natural sign was a strong east wind, signifying that it was done by the power of God, whom the winds and the seas obey.

II. An instance of his wonderful favour to his Israel. They went through the sea to the opposite shore. They walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea, v. 29. The waters were a wall to them on their right hand and on their left. Moses and Aaron, it is probable, ventured first into this untrodden path, and then all Israel after them; and this march through the paths of the great waters would make their march afterwards, through the wilderness, less formidable. Those who had followed God through the sea needed not to fear following him whithersoever he led them.

This was done, and recorded, in order to encourage God's people in all ages to trust in him in the greatest straits. We find the saints, long afterwards, making themselves sharers in the triumphs of this march (Ps. lxvi. 6).

III. An instance of his just and righteous wrath upon his and his people's enemies, the Egyptians. Observe here, 1. How they were infatuated. They were more advantageously provided with chariots and horses, while the Israelites were on foot. 2. How they were troubled and perplexed, v. 24, 25. But, in the morning watch, the Lord looked upon the host of the Egyptians, and troubled them. (1) They had hectored and boasted as if the day were their own; but now they were troubled and dismayed, struck with a panic-fear. (2) They had driven furiously; but now they drove heavily, and found themselves plunged and embarrassed at every step. As soon as ever the children of Israel had got safely to the shore, the waters returned to their place, and overwhelmed all the host of the Egyptians, v. 27, 28. Pharaoh and his servants, who had hardened one another in sin, now fell together, and not one escaped. An ancient tradition says that Pharaoh's magicians, Jannes and Jambres, perished with the rest. God reckoned with Pharaoh for all his proud and insolent conduct towards Moses his ambassador. Come and see the desolations he made, and write it, not in water, but with an iron pen in the rock for ever. This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, Ezek. xxxi. 18.

IV. Here is the notice which the Israelites took of this wonderful work which God wrought for them. Now they were ashamed of their distrusts and murmurings; they would never again quarrel with Moses, nor talk of returning to Egypt. They were now baptized unto Moses in the sea, 1 Cor. x. 2. Being brought thus triumphantly out of Egypt, they did not doubt that they should be in Canaan shortly, having such a God to trust to, and such a mediator between them and him. O that there had been such a heart in them as now there seemed to be! How well were it for us if we were always in as good a frame as we are in sometimes!

CHAP. XV

In this chapter, I. Israel looks back upon Egypt with a song of praise for their deliverance. Here is, 1. The song itself, ver. 1–19. 2. The solemn singing of it, ver. 20, 21. II. Israel marches forward in the wilderness (ver. 22), and there, 1. Their discontent at the waters of Marah (ver. 23, 24), and the relief granted them, ver. 25, 26. 2. Their satisfaction in the waters of Elim, ver. 27.

Verses 1–21

Having read how that complete victory of Israel over the Egyptians was obtained, here we are told how it was celebrated. Moses, no doubt by divine inspiration, indited this song, and delivered it to the children of Israel, to be sung before they stirred from the place where they saw the Egyptians dead upon the shore. Observe, They expressed their joy in God, and thankfulness to him, by singing. It was a song of faith.

I. The song itself;

1. We may observe respecting this song, that it is, (1) An ancient song, the most ancient that we know of. (2) A most admirable composition, the style lofty and magnificent, the images lively and proper, and the whole very moving. (3) It is a holy song, consecrated to the honour of God, and intended to exalt his name and celebrate his praise, and his only.

2. What Moses chiefly aims at in this song.

(1) He gives glory to God, and triumphs in him; this is first in his intention (v. 1): I will sing unto the Lord. Israel rejoiced in God, [1] As their own God, and therefore their strength, song, and salvation, v. 2. [2] As their father's God. This they take notice of, because, being conscious in themselves of their own unworthiness and provocations, they had reason to think that what God had now done for them was for their father's sake, Deut. iv. 37. [3] As a God of infinite power (v. 3). [4] As a God of matchless and incomparable perfection, v. 11. This is expressed, First, more generally: Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods! Egypt was notorious for the multitude of its gods, but the God of the Hebrews was too hard for them and baffled them all, Deut. xxxii. 23–39. More particularly, [i] He is glorious in holiness; his holiness is his glory. God is rich in mercy —this is his treasure, glorious in holiness—this is his honour. [ii] He is fearful in praises. That which is the matter of our praise, though it is joyful to the servants of God, is dreadful and very terrible to his enemies, Ps. lxvi. 1–3. 3. He is doing wonders, wondrous to all, being above the power and out of the common course of nature. They were wonders of power and wonders of grace; in both God was to be humbly adored.

(2) He describes the deliverance they were now triumphing in, because the song was intended, not only to express and excite their thankfulness for the present, but to preserve and perpetuate the remembrance of this work of wonder to after-ages. Two things were to be taken notice of:—

[1] The destruction of the enemy; the waters were divided, v. 8. The floods stood upright as a heap. Pharaoh and all his hosts were buried in the waters. The proud waters went over the proud sinners. Their sin had made them hard like a stone, and now they justly sink like a stone.

[2] The protection and guidance of Israel (v. 13): Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people, led them forth out of the bondage of Egypt, led them forth out of the perils of the Red Sea, v. 19.

(3) He sets himself to improve this wonderful appearance of God for them. God having preserved them, they resolve to spare no cost nor pains for the erecting of a tabernacle to his honour, and there they will exalt him. So confident is this Psalmist of the happy issue of the salvation which was so gloriously begun that he looks upon it as in effect finished already: "Thou hast guided them to thy holy habitation, v. 13. Two ways this great deliverance was encouraging:—First, It was such an instance of God's power as would terrify their enemies, and quite dishearten them, v. 14–16. It had this effect: the Edomites were afraid of them (Deut. ii. 4), so were the Moabites (Num. xxii. 3), and the Canaanites, Josh. ii. 9, 10; v. 1. Secondly, It was such a beginning of God's favour to them as gave them an earnest of the perfection of his kindness. Thou shalt bring them in, v. 17. If he thus bring them out of Egypt, notwithstanding their unworthiness, and the difficulties that lay in the way of their escape, doubtless he will bring them into Canaan. Lastly, The great ground of the encouragement which they draw from this work of wonder is, The Lord shall reign for ever and ever, v. 18. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all God's faithful subjects that he will reign eternally, and there shall be no end of his dominion.

II. The solemn singing of this song, v. 20, 21. Moses led the psalm, and gave it out for the men, and then Miriam for the women. Famous victories were wont to be applauded by the daughters of Israel (1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7); so was this.

Verses 22-27

It should seem, it was with some difficulty that Moses prevailed with Israel to leave that triumphant shore on which they sang the foregoing song. Now here we are told,

I. That in the wilderness of Shur they had no water, v. 22.

II. That at Marah they had water, but it was bitter, so that though they had been three days without water they could not drink it. Now in this distress, 1. The people fretted and quarrelled with Moses, as if he had done ill by them. What shall we drink? is all their clamour, v. 24. 2. Moses prayed: He cried unto the Lord, v. 25. God is the guide of the church's guides; and to him, as the Chief Shepherd, the under-shepherds must upon all occasions apply. 3. God directed Moses to a tree, which he cast into the waters, in consequence of which, all of a sudden, they were made sweet. Some think this wood had a peculiar virtue in it for this purpose, because it is said, God showed him the tree. God is to be acknowledged, not only in the creating of things useful for man, but in discovering their usefulness. Some make this tree typical of the cross of Christ, which sweetens the bitter waters of affliction to all the faithful, and enables them to rejoice in tribulation. There he made a statute and an ordinance, and settled matters with them. There he proved them, that is, there he put them upon the trial, admitted them as probationers for his favour. In short, he tells them, v. 26, (1) What he expected from them, and that was, in one word, obedience. They must not think, now that they were delivered from their bondage in Egypt, that they were their own masters; they must look upon themselves as God's servants, because he had loosed their bonds, Ps. cxvi. 16; Luke i. 74, 75. (2) What they might then expect from him: I will put none of these diseases upon thee, that is, "I will not bring upon thee any of the plagues of Egypt." Let not the Israelites think God would connive at their sins and let them do as they would. No, God is no respecter of persons; a rebellious Israelite shall fare no better than a rebellious Egyptian; and so they found, to their cost, before they got to Canaan.

III. That at Elim they had good water, and enough of it, v. 27. Here were twelve wells for their supply, one for every tribe, that they might not strive for water, as their fathers had sometimes done; and, for their pleasure, there were seventy palm-trees.

CHAP. XVI

This chapter gives us an account of the victualling of the camp of Israel. I. Their complaint for want of bread, ver. 1–3. II. The notice God gave them beforehand of the provision he intended to make for them, ver. 4–12. III. The sending of the manna, ver. 13–15. IV. The laws and orders concerning the manna.

Verses 1–12

The host of Israel, it seems, took along with them out of Egypt a month's provisions, which, by the fifteenth day of the second month, was all spent.

I. Their discontent and murmuring upon that occasion, v. 2, 3. 1. They count upon being killed in the wilderness—nothing less, at the first appearance of disaster. It argues great distrust of God to talk of nothing but being speedily killed. 2. They invidiously charge Moses with a design to starve them when he brought them out of Egypt. 3. They so far undervalue their deliverance that they wish they had died in Egypt. They would rather die by the fleshpots of Egypt, where they found themselves with provision, than live under the guidance of the heavenly pillar in a wilderness and be provided for by the hand of God! We cannot suppose that they had any great plenty in Egypt, how largely soever they now talk of the flesh-pots; nor could they fear dying for want in the wilderness, while they had their flocks and herds with them. But discontent magnifies what is past, and vilifies what is present, without regard to truth or reason.

II. The care God graciously took for their supply.

1. How God makes known to Moses his kind intentions, that he might not be uneasy at their murmurings, nor be tempted to wish he had let them alone in Egypt. (1) He takes notice of the people's complaints. (2) He promises them a speedy, sufficient, and constant supply, v. 4. See what God designed in making this provision for them: That I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law or no. [1] Thus he tried whether they would trust him, and walk in the law of faith or no, whether they could rest satisfied with the bread of the day in its day, and depend upon God for fresh supplies tomorrow. [2] Thus he tried whether they would serve him, and be always faithful.

2. How Moses made known these intentions to Israel, as God ordered him. Here Aaron was his prophet, as he had been to Pharaoh. Moses directed Aaron what to speak to the congregation of Israel (v. 9). Note, God condescends to give even murmurers a fair hearing. (1) He convinces them of the evil of their murmurings. They thought they reflected only upon Moses and Aaron, but here they are told that God was struck at through their sides. Note, When we murmur against those who are instruments of any uneasiness to us, whether justly or unjustly, we should do well to consider how much we reflect upon God by it; men are but God's hand. (2) He assures them of the supply of their wants, that since they had harped upon the flesh-pots so much they should for once have flesh in abundance that evening, and bread the next morning, and so on every day thenceforward, v. 8, 12. Many there are of whom we say that they are better fed than taught; but the Israelites were thus fed, that they might be taught. [1] By this you shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt, v. 6. That they were brought out of Egypt was plain enough; but so strangely sottish and short-sighted were they that they said it was Moses that brought them out, v. 3. [2] By this you shall know that I am the Lord your God, v. 12. When God plagued the Egyptians, it was to make them know that he was the Lord; when he provided for the Israelites, it was to make them know that he was their God.

3. How God himself manifested his glory, to still the murmurings of the people, and to put a reputation upon Moses and Aaron, v. 10. While Aaron was speaking, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud.

Verses 13–21

Now they begin to be provided for by the immediate hand of God.

I. He makes them a feast, at night, of delicate fowl. Quails, or pheasants, or some wild fowl, came up, and covered the camp, so tame that they might take up as many of them as they pleased.

II. Next morning he rained manna upon them, which was to be continued to them for their daily bread. 1. That which was provided for them was manna, itself of such a consistency as to serve for nourishing strengthening food, without anything else. They called it manna, manhu, "What is this?" 2. They were to gather it every morning (v. 21), the portion of a day in his day, v. 4. To this daily raining and gathering of manna our Saviour seems to allude when he teaches us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. We are hereby taught, (1) Prudence and diligence in providing food convenient for ourselves and our household. What God graciously gives we must industriously gather. (2) Contentment and satisfaction with a sufficiency. They must gather, every man according to his eating; enough is as good as a feast, and more than enough is as bad as a surfeit. (3) Dependence upon Providence: Let no man leave till morning (v. 19), but let them learn to go to bed and sleep quietly, though they have not a bit of bread in their tent, nor in all their camp, trusting that God, with the following day, will bring them their daily bread." See here the folly of hoarding. The manna that was laid up by some putrefied, and bred worms, and became good for nothing. 3. Let us set ourselves to think, (1) Of that great power of God which fed Israel in the wilderness, and made miracles their daily bread. Never was there such a market of provisions as this, where so many hundred thousand men were daily furnished, without money and without price. Never was there such an open house kept as God kept in the wilderness for forty years together, nor such free and plentiful entertainment given. (2) Of that constant providence of God. The same wisdom, power, and goodness that now brought food daily out of the clouds, are employed in the constant course of nature, bringing food yearly out of the earth, and giving us all things richly to enjoy.

Verses 22–31

We have here the setting apart of one day in seven for holy work, and, in order to that, for holy rest, was a divine appointment ever since God created man upon the earth, and the most ancient of positive laws. The double provision which God made for the Israelites, and which they were to make for themselves, on the sixth day: God gave them on the sixth day the bread of two days, v. 29. Appointing them to rest on the seventh day, he took care that they should be no losers by it; and none ever will be losers by serving God. On that day they were to fetch in enough for two days, and to prepare it, v. 23. The law was very strict, that they must bake and seeth, the day before, and not on the sabbath day. This does not now make it unlawful for us to dress meat on the Lord's day, but directs us to contrive our family affairs so that they may hinder us as little as possible in the work of the sabbath. That which they kept for their food on the sabbath day did not putrefy, v. 24. Some, it seems, went out on the seventh day, expecting to find manna (v. 27); but they found none, for those that will find must seek in the appointed time. God, upon this occasion, said to Moses, How long refuse you to keep my commandments? v. 28. Why did he say this to Moses? He was not disobedient. No, but he was the ruler of a disobedient people, and God charges it upon him that he might the more warmly charge it upon them, and might take care that their disobedience should not be through any neglect or default of his.

Verses 32–36

God having provided manna to be his people's food in the wilderness, we are here told, 1. How the memory of it was preserved. An omer of this manna was laid up in a golden pot, as we are told (Heb. ix. 4), and kept before the testimony, or the ark, when it was afterwards made, v. 32–34. Note, Eaten bread must not be forgotten. God's miracles and mercies are to be had in everlasting remembrance, for our encouragement to trust in him at all times. 2. How the mercy of it was continued as long as they had occasion for it. The manna never ceased till they came to the borders of Canaan, where there was bread enough and to spare, v. 35. The manna is called spiritual meat (1 Cor. x. 3), because it was typical of spiritual blessings in heavenly things. Christ himself is the true manna, the bread of life, of which this was a figure, John vi. 49–51. The word of God is the manna by which our souls are nourished, Matt. iv. 4. The comforts of the Spirit are hidden manna, Rev. ii. 17. These come from heaven, as the manna did, and are the support and comfort of the divine life in the soul, while we are in the wilderness of this world. It is to be gathered; Christ in the word is to be applied to the soul, and the means of grace are to be used. We must every one of us gather for ourselves, and gather in the morning of our days, the morning of our opportunities, which if we let slip, it may be too late to gather. The manna they gathered must not be hoarded up, but eaten; those that have received Christ must by faith live upon him, and not receive his grace in vain. But those that did eat manna hungered again, died at last, and with many of them God was not well pleased; whereas those that feed on Christ by faith shall never hunger, and shall die no more, and with them God will be for ever well pleased. The Lord evermore give us this bread!

CHAP. XVII

I. The watering of the host of Israel. 1. In the wilderness they wanted water, ver. 1, 2. In their want they chided Moses, ver. 2, 3. 3. Moses cried to God, ver. 4. 4. God ordered him to smite the rock, and fetch water out of that; Moses did so, ver. 5, 6 5. The place named from it, ver. 7. II. The defeating of the host of Amalek. 1 The victory obtained by the prayer of Moses, ver. 8–12. 2. By the sword of Joshua, ver. 13. A record kept of it, ver 14, 16. And these things which happened to them are written for our instruction in our spiritual journey and warfare.

Verses 1–7

I. The strait that the children of Israel were in for want of water.

II. Their discontent and distrust in this strait. It is said (v. 3), They thirsted there for water. This intimates that their passion sharpened their appetites and they were violent and impatient in their desire. See what was the language of this inordinate desire. 1. They challenged Moses to supply them (v. 2): Give us water, that we may drink, demanding it as a debt. 2. They quarrelled with him for bringing them out of Egypt, as if, instead of delivering them, he designed to murder them. To such a degree their malice against Moses rose that they were almost ready to stone him, v. 4. 3. They began to question whether God were with them or not: They tempted the Lord, saying, "Is the Lord among us or not?" v. 7. They question his essential presence—whether there was a God or not; his common providence—whether that God governed the world; and his special promise—whether he would be as good as his word to them. This is called their tempting God. They do, in effect, suppose that Moses was an impostor, that long series of miracles which had rescued them, served them, and fed them, a chain of cheats, and the promise of Canaan a banter upon them; it was all so, if the Lord was not among them.

III. The course that Moses took, 1. He reproved the murmurers (v. 2): Why chide you with me? Observe how mildly he answered them. He showed them whom their murmurings reflected upon, and that the reproaches they cast on him fell on God himself: You tempt the Lord; that is, "By distrusting his power, you try his patience, and so provoke his wrath." 2. He made his complaint to God (v. 4): Moses cried unto the Lord. When men unjustly censure us and quarrel with us, it will be a great relief to us to go to God, and by prayer lay the case before him and leave it with him: if men will not hear us, God will. Moses begs of God to direct him what he should do, for he was utterly at a loss.

IV. God's gracious appearance for their relief, v. 5, 6. He orders Moses to go on before the people. He must take his rod with him, not to summon some plague to chastise them, but to fetch water for their supply. O the wonderful patience and forbearance of God. If God had only shown Moses a fountain of water in the wilderness, as he did Hagar, that would have been a great favour; but that he might show his power as well as his pity, and make it a miracle of mercy, he gave them water out of a rock. He directed Moses whither to go, and appointed him to take some of the elders to be witnesses of what was done, that they might themselves be satisfied of the certainty of God's presence with them. He promised to meet him there in the cloud of glory, and ordered him to smite the rock; Moses obeyed, and immediately water came out of the rock in great abundance. It is called a fountain of waters, Ps. cxiv. 8. This fair water, that came out of the rock, is called honey and oil (Deut. xxxii. 13), because the people's thirst made it doubly pleasant; coming when they were in extreme want, it was like honey and oil to them. God can open fountains for our supply where we least expect them, waters in the wilderness (Isa. xliii. 20), because he makes a way in the wilderness, v. 19. Those who, in this wilderness, keep to God's way, may trust him to provide for them. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to rivers of living water, John vii. 38, 39; iv. 14. These flow from Christ, who is the rock smitten by the law of Moses, for he was made under the law. Nothing will supply the needs, and satisfy the desires, of a soul, but water out of this rock, this fountain opened. The pleasures of sense are puddle-water; spiritual delights are rock water, so pure, so clear, so refreshing—rivers of pleasure.

V. A new name was, upon this occasion, given to the place, preserving the remembrance of the sin of their murmuring—Massah, temptation, because they tempted God; Meribah, strife, because they chid with Moses, v. 7.

Verses 8–16

Amalek was the first of the nations that Israel fought with, Num. xxiv. 20.

I. Amalek's attempt: They came out, and fought with Israel, v. 8. The Amalekites were the posterity of Esau, who hated Jacob because of the birthright and blessing, and this was an effort of the hereditary enmity. Consider this, 1. As Israel's affliction. 2. As Amalek's sin; so it is reckoned, Deut. xxv. 17, 18. They basely fell upon their rear, and smote those that were faint and feeble and could neither make resistance nor escape. In vain did they attack a camp guarded and victualled by miracles: verily they knew not what they did.

II. Israel's defence against the aggressors.

1. The post assigned to Joshua, of whom this is the first mention: he is nominated commander-in-chief in this expedition, that he might be trained up to the services he was designed for after the death of Moses.

2. The post assumed by Moses: I will stand on the top of the hill with the rod of God in my hand, v. 9. Joshua fights, Moses prays, and held up the rod of God in his hand. This rod Moses held up to Israel, to animate them; the rod was held up as the banner to encourage the soldiers. Moses also held up this rod to God, by way of appeal to him. Moses was not only a standard-bearer, but an intercessor, pleading with God for success and victory. It is here the praying legion that proves the thundering legion. (1) How Moses was tired (v. 12): His hands were heavy. We do not find that Joshua's hands were heavy in fighting, but Moses's hands were heavy in praying. The more spiritual any service is the more apt we are to fail and flag in it. (2) What influence the rod of Moses had upon the battle (v. 11): When Moses held up his hand in prayer (so the Chaldee explains it) Israel prevailed, but, when he let down his hand from prayer, Amalek prevailed. (3) The care that was taken for the support of Moses. When he could not stand any longer he sat down upon a stone (v. 12); when he could not hold up his hands, he would have them held up. Moses, the man of God, is glad of the assistance of Aaron his brother, and Hur, who, some think, was his brother-in-law, the husband of Miriam. Moses's hands, thus stayed, were steady till the going down of the sun. No doubt it was a great encouragement to the people to see Joshua before them in the field of battle and Moses above them upon the top of the hill: Christ is both to us—our Joshua, the captain of our salvation who fights our battles, and our Moses, who, in the upper world, ever lives making intercession, that our faith fail not.

III. The defeat of Amalek. Victory had hovered awhile between the camps, but Israel carried the day, v. 13. Though Joshua fought with great disadvantages —his soldiers undisciplined, ill-armed, long inured to servitude, and apt to murmur; yet by them God wrought a great salvation.

IV. The trophies of this victory set up. 1. Moses took care that God should have the glory of it (v. 15); instead of setting up a triumphal arch to the honour of Joshua, he builds an altar to the honour of God, and that which is most carefully recorded is the inscription upon the altar, Jehovah-nissi—The Lord is my banner, which probably refers to the lifting up of the rod of God as a banner in this action. The presence and power of Jehovah were the banner under which they enlisted, by which they were animated and kept together, and therefore which they erected in the day of their triumph. 2. God took care that posterity should have the comfort and benefit of it: "Write this for a memorial, and then rehearse it in the ears of Joshua, let him be entrusted with this memorial, to transmit it to the generations to come." Moses must now begin to keep a diary or journal of occurrences; it is the first mention of writing that we find in scripture, and perhaps the command was not given till after the writing of the law upon the tables of stone: "Write it in perpetuam rei memoriam—that the event may be had in perpetual remembrance"; that which is written remains. (1) "Write what has been done. Let ages to come know that God fights for his people, and he that touches them touches the apple of his eye." (2) Write what shall be done. [1] That in process of time Amalek shall be totally ruined and rooted out (v. 14). Israel will at last undoubtedly triumph in the fall of Amalek. This sentence was executed in part by Saul (1 Sam. xv.), and completely by David (ch. xxx.; 2 Sam. i. 1; viii. 12); after his time we never read so much as of the name of Amalek. [2] That in the meantime God would have a continual controversy with him (v. 16). This was written for direction to Israel never to make any league with the Amalekites.

CHAP. XVIII

This chapter is concerning Moses himself, and the affairs of his own family. I. Jethro his father-in-law brings to him his wife and children, ver. 1–6. II. Moses entertains his father-in-law with great respect (ver. 7), with good discourse (ver. 8–11), with a sacrifice and a feast, ver. 12. III. Jethro advises him (ver. 13–23), and Moses, after some time, takes his counsel (ver. 24–26), and so they part, ver. 27.

Jethro comes,

I. To congratulate the happiness of Israel, and particularly the honour of Moses his son-in-law; Jethro could not but hear what all the country rang of, the glorious appearances of God for his people Israel (v. 1); and he comes to enquire, and to rejoice with them, as one that had a true respect both for them and for their God. Though he, as a Midianite, was not to share with them in the promised land, yet he shared with them in the joy of their deliverance.

II. To bring Moses's wife and children to him. It seems he had sent them back home to his father-in-law. Jethro, we may suppose, was glad of his daughter's company, and fond of her children, yet he would not keep her from her husband, nor them from their father, v. 5, 6. Moses must have his family with him, that while he ruled the church of God he might set a good example of prudence in family-government, 1 Tim. iii. 5. Moses had now a great deal both of honour and care put upon him, and it was fit that his wife should be with him to share with him in both. Notice is taken of the significant names of his two sons. 1. The eldest was called Gershom (v. 3), a stranger. 2. The other he called Eliezer (v. 4), My God a help, as we translate it; it looks back to his deliverance from Pharaoh. I would rather translate it so as to look forward, which the original will bear, The Lord is my help, and will deliver me from the sword of Pharaoh.

Verses 7–12

I. The kind greeting that took place between Moses and his father-in-law, v. 7. Those that stand high in the favour of God are not thereby discharged from the duty they owe to men. Moses went out to meet Jethro, did homage to him, and kissed him. Religion does not destroy good manners. They asked each other of their welfare.

II. The narrative that Moses gave his father-in-law of the great things God had done for Israel, v. 8.

III. The impressions this narrative made upon Jethro. 1. He congratulated God's Israel: Jethro rejoiced, v. 9. He not only rejoiced in the honour done to his son-in-law, but in all the goodness done to Israel, v. 9. Note, Public blessings are the joy of public spirits. While the Israelites were themselves murmuring, notwithstanding all God's goodness to them, here was a Midianite rejoicing. 2. He gave the glory to Israel's God (v. 10). 3. His faith was hereby confirmed, and he took this occasion to make a solemn profession of it: Now know I that Jehovah is greater than all gods, v. 11. Observe, (1) The matter of his faith: that the God of Israel is greater than all pretenders, all false and counterfeit deities. (2) The confirmation and improvement of his faith: Now know I; he knew it before, but now he knew it better; his faith grew up to a full assurance, upon this fresh evidence. (3) The ground and reason upon which he built it: For wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them. The magicians were baffled, the idols shaken, Pharaoh humbled, his powers broken, and, in spite of all their confederacies, God's Israel was rescued out of their hands.

IV. The expressions of their joy and thankfulness. They had communion with each other both in a feast and in a sacrifice, v. 12. Jethro was cheerfully admitted, though a Midianite, into fellowship with Moses and the elders of Israel, forasmuch as he also was a son of Abraham, though of a younger house. 1. They joined in a sacrifice of thanksgiving: Jethro took burnt offerings for God, and probably offered them himself, for he was a priest in Midian, and a worshipper of the true God. 2. They joined in a feast of rejoicing, a feast upon the sacrifice.

I. The great zeal and industry of Moses as a magistrate.

1. Having been employed to redeem Israel out of the house of bondage, herein he is a further type of Christ, that he is employed as a lawgiver and a judge among them. (1) He was to answer enquiries, and to explain the laws of God that were already given them, concerning the sabbath, the manna, &c., beside the laws of nature, relating both to piety and equity, v. 15. Moses made them know the statutes of God and his laws, v. 16. His business was, not to make laws, but to make known God's laws; his place was but that of a servant. (2) He was to decide controversies, judging between a man and his fellow, v. 16. And, if the people were as quarrelsome one with another as they were with God, no doubt he had a great many causes brought before him.

2. Such was the business Moses was called to, and it appears that he did it, (1) With great consideration. (2) With great condescension to the people, who stood by him, v. 14. (3) With great constancy and closeness of application.

II. The great prudence and consideration of Jethro as a friend.

1. He disliked the method that Moses took, and was so free with him as to tell him so, v. 14, 17, 18. He thought it was too much business for Moses to undertake alone. There may be overdoing even in well-doing.

2. He advised him to such a model of government as would better answer the intention, which was, (1) That he should reserve to himself all applications to God (v. 19): Be thou for them to God-ward; that was an honour in which it was not fit any other should share with him, Num. xii. 6–8. Also whatever concerned the whole congregation in general must pass through his hand, v. 20. But, (2) That he should appoint judges in the several tribes and families, who should try causes between man and man, and determine them, which would be done with less noise, and more despatch, than in the general assembly wherein Moses himself presided. Yet, (3) An appeal might lie, if there were just cause for it, from these inferior courts to Moses himself. Every great matter they shall bring unto thee, v. 22.

3. He adds two qualifications to his counsel: (1) That great care should be taken in the choice of the persons who should be admitted into this trust (v. 21); they must be able men, &c. It was requisite that they should be men of the very best character, [1] For judgment and resolution—able men. Clear heads and stout hearts make good judges. [2] For piety and religion—such as fear God. Conscientious men, that dare not do a base thing, though they could do it ever so secretly and securely. [3] For integrity and honesty—men of truth. [4] For noble and generous contempt of worldly wealth—hating covetousness. (2) That he should attend God's direction in the case (v. 23): If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so.

Now Moses did not despise this advice but he hearkened to the voice of his father-in-law, v. 24.

III. Jethro's return to his own land, v. 27. It is supposed that the Kenites (mentioned 1 Sam. xv. 6) were the posterity of Jethro (compare Judges i. 16), and they are there taken under special protection, for the kindness their ancestor here showed to Israel.

CHAP. XIX

This chapter introduces the solemnity of the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai. We have here, I. The circumstances of time and place, ver. 1, 2. II. The covenant between God and Israel settled in general. The gracious proposal God made to them (ver. 3–6), and their consent to the proposal, ver. 7, 8. III. Notice given three days before of God's design to give the law out of a thick cloud, ver. 9. Orders given to prepare the people to receive the law (ver. 10–13), and care taken to execute those orders, ver. 14, 15. IV. A terrible appearance of God's glory upon Mount Sinai, ver. 16–20. V. Silence proclaimed.

Verses 1–8

Here is, I. The date of that great charter by which Israel was incorporated. 1. The time when it bears date (v. 1)—in the third month after they came out of Egypt. 2. The place whence it bears date—from Mount Sinai, the highest in all that range of mountains. Thus God put contempt upon cities, and palaces, and magnificent structures, setting up his pavilion on the top of a high mountain, in a waste and barren desert, there to carry on this treaty. It is called Sinai, from the multitude of thorny bushes that overspread it.

II. The charter itself. Moses was called up to the mountain and was employed as the messenger of the covenant: Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel, v. 3. Now observe, 1. That the maker, and first mover, of the covenant, is God himself. In all our dealings with God, free grace anticipates us with the blessings of goodness, and all our comfort is owing, not to our knowing God, but rather to our being known of him, Gal. iv. 9. 2. That the matter of the covenant is kind and gracious, and such as gives them the greatest privileges and advantages imaginable. (1) He reminds them of what he had done for them, v. 4. I bore you on eagles' wings, a high expression of the wonderful tenderness God had shown for them. It is explained, Deut. xxxii. 11, 12. It denotes great speed. God not only came upon the wing for their deliverance, but he hastened them out, as it were, upon the wing. He did it with the strength as well as with the swiftness of an eagle. Egypt, that iron furnace, was the nest in which these young ones were hatched, where they were first formed as the embryo of a nation; when, by the increase of their numbers, they grew to some maturity, they were carried out of that nest. Other birds carry their young in their talons, but the eagle (they say) upon her wings, so that even those archers who shoot flying cannot hurt the young ones, unless they first shoot through the old one. I brought you unto myself. They were brought not only into a state of liberty and honour, but into covenant and communion with God. This, this was the glory of their deliverance, as it is of ours by Christ, that he died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. This God aims at in all the gracious methods of his providence and grace, to bring us back to himself, from whom we have revolted, and to bring us home to himself, in whom alone we can be happy. Some have well observed that the Old Testament church is said to be borne upon eagles' wings, but the New Testament church is said to be gathered by the Lord Jesus, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings (Matt. xxiii. 37), denoting the grace and compassion of that dispensation, and the admirable condescension and humiliation of the redeemer. (2) He tells them plainly (v. 5), that they should obey his voice in deed and keep his covenant. Being thus saved by him, that which he insisted upon was that they should be ruled by him. (3) He assures them of the honour he would put upon them, and the kindness he would show them, in case they did thus keep his covenant (v. 5, 6): Then you shall be a peculiar treasure to me. [1] God here asserts his sovereignty over, and propriety in, the whole visible creation: All the earth is mine. [2] He appropriates Israel to himself, as a people dear unto him. You shall be a peculiar treasure. By giving them divine revelation, instituted ordinances, and promises inclusive of eternal life, by sending his prophets among them, and pouring out his Spirit upon them, he distinguished them from, and dignified them above, all people.

III. Israel's acceptance of this charter, and consent to the conditions of it. 1. Moses faithfully delivered God's message to them (v. 7): He laid before their faces all those words. His laying it to their faces denotes his laying it to their consciences. 2. They readily agreed to the covenant proposed. All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. 3. Moses, as a mediator, returned the words of the people to God, v. 8. Thus Christ, the Mediator between us and God, as a prophet reveals God's will to us, and then as a priest offers up to God our spiritual sacrifices. Thus he is that blessed days-man who lays his hand upon us both.

Verses 9–15

Here, I. God intimates to Moses his purpose of coming down upon Mount Sinai, in some visible appearance of his glory, in a thick cloud (v. 9). God would come down in the sight of all the people (v. 11); though they should see no manner of similitude, yet they should see so much as would convince them that God was among them of a truth. Thus the correspondence was to be first settled by a sensible appearance of the divine glory, which was afterwards to be carried on more silently by the ministry of Moses. In like manner, the Holy Ghost descended visibly upon Christ at his baptism, and all that were present heard God speak to him (Matt. iii. 17), that afterwards, without the repetition of such visible tokens, they might believe him. So likewise the Spirit descended in cloven tongues upon the apostles (Acts ii. 3), that they might be believed.

II. He orders Moses to make preparation for this great solemnity, giving him two days' time for it.

1. He must sanctify the people (v. 10). "Sanctify them," that is, "Call them off from their worldly business, and call them to religious exercises, meditation and prayer, that they may receive the law from God's mouth with reverence and devotion. Let them be ready," v. 11. Wandering thoughts must be gathered in, impure affections abandoned, disquieting passions suppressed, nay, and all cares about secular business, for the present, dismissed and laid by, that our hearts may be engaged to approach unto God. In token of their cleansing they must wash their clothes (v. 10), and they did so (v. 14); not that God regards our clothes; but while they were washing their clothes he would have them think of washing their souls by repentance. It becomes us to appear in clean clothes when we wait upon great men; so clean hearts are required in our attendance on the great God, who sees them as plainly as men see our clothes.

2. He must set bounds about the mountain, v. 12, 13. Probably he drew a line, or ditch, round at the foot of the hill, which none were to pass upon pain of death. This was to intimate, That humble awful reverence which ought to possess the minds of all those that worship God.

3. He must order the people to attend upon the summons that should be given (v. 13): "When the trumpet soundeth long then let them take their places at the foot of the mount, and so sit down at God's feet." No one man's voice could have reached so many, but the voice of God did.

Verses 16–25

Now, at length, comes that memorable day. Never was there such a sermon preached, before nor since, as this which was here preached to the church in the wilderness. For,

I. The preacher was God himself (v. 18): The Lord descended in fire and (v. 20), The Lord came down upon Mount Sinai. The shechinah, or glory of the Lord, appeared in the sight of all the people.

II. The pulpit (or throne rather) was mount Sinai, hung with a thick cloud (v. 16), covered with smoke (v. 18), and made to quake greatly.

III. The congregation was called together by the sound of a trumpet, exceedingly loud (v. 16), and waxing louder and louder, v. 19.

IV. Moses brought the hearers to the place of meeting, v. 17. He that had led them out of the bondage of Egypt now led them to receive the law from God's mouth. Moses, at the head of an assembly worshipping God, was as truly great as Moses at the head of an army in the field.

V. The introductions to the service were thunders and lightnings, v. 16. Thunder and lightning have natural causes, but the scripture directs us in a particular manner to take notice of the power of God, and his terror, in them.

VI. Moses is God's minister, who is spoken to, to command silence, and keep the congregatoin in order: Moses spoke, v. 19. God stilled his fear by his distinguishing favour to him, in calling him up to the top of the mount (v. 20), by which also he tried his faith and courage. Neither the priests nor the people should offer to force the lines that were set, to come up unto the Lord, but Moses and Aaron only, the men whom God delighted to honour. Observe, what it was that God forbade them—breaking through to gaze; enough was provided to awaken their consciences, but they were not allowed to gratify their vain curiosity. They might see, but not gaze. It is at our peril if we break the bounds that God has set us, and intrude upon that which he has not allowed us.

CHAP. XX

All things being prepared for the solemn promulgation of the divine law, we have, in this chapter, I. The ten commandments, as God himself spoke them upon Mount Sinai (ver. 1–17). II. The impressions made upon the people thereby, ver. 18–21. III. Some particular instructions which God gave privately to Moses, to be by him communicated to the people, relating to his worship, ver. 22, &c.

Here is, I. The preface of the law-writer, Moses: God spoke all these words, v. 1. The law of the ten commandments is, 1. A law of God's making. 2. It is a law of his own speaking. God has many ways of speaking to the children of men (Job xxxiii. 14); he never spoke, at any time, upon any occasion, as he spoke the ten commandments. This law God had given to man before (it was written in his heart by nature); but sin had so defaced that writing that it was necessary, in this manner, to revive the knowledge of it.

II. The preface of the Law-maker: I am the Lord thy God, v. 2. Herein, 1. God asserts his own authority to enact this law in general. 2. He proposes himself as the sole object of that religious worship which is enjoined in the first four of the commandments. They are here bound to obedience by a threefold cord. (1) Because God is the Lord. He that gives being may give law; and therefore he is able to bear us out in our obedience, to reward it, and to punish our disobedience. (2) He was their God, a God in covenant with them, their God by their own consent. Though that covenant of peculiarity is now no more, yet there is another, by virtue of which all that are baptized are taken into relation to him as their God, and are therefore unjust, unfaithful, and very ungrateful, if they obey him not. (3) He had brought them out of the land of Egypt. By redeeming them, he acquired a further right to rule them; they owed their service to him to whom they owed their freedom. And thus Christ, having rescued us out of the bondage of sin, is entitled to the best service we can do him, Luke i. 74.

III. The law itself. The first four of the ten commandments, which concern our duty to God (commonly called the first table), we have in these verses. It was fit that those should be put first, because man had a Maker to love before he had a neighbour to love; and justice and charity are acceptable acts of obedience to God only when they flow from the principles of piety. It cannot be expected that he should be true to his brother who is false to his God.

1. The first commandment concerns the object of our worship, Jehovah, and him only (v. 3): Thou shalt have no other gods before me. The Egyptians, and other neighbouring nations, had many gods, the creatures of their own fancy, strange gods, new gods. The sin against this commandment which we are most in danger of is giving the glory and honour to any creature which are due to God only. Pride makes a god of self, coveteousness makes a god of money, sensuality makes a god of the belly, whatever is esteemed or loved, feared or served, delighted in or depended on, more than God, that (whatever it is) we do in effect make a god of. In the last words, before me, it is intimated, (1) That we cannot have any other God but he will certainly know it. (2) That it is a sin that dares him to his face, which he cannot, which he will not, overlook.

2. The second commandment concerns the ordinances of worship, or the way in which God will be worshipped.

(1) The prohibition: we are here forbidden to worship even the true God by images, v. 4, 5. The Jews (at least after the captivity) thought themselves forbidden by this commandment to make any image or picture whatsoever. Hence the very images which the Roman armies had in their ensigns are called an abomination to them (Matt. xxiv. 15), especially when they were set up in the holy place. It is called the changing of the truth of God into a lie (Rom. i. 25), for an image is a teacher of lies; it insinuates to us that God has a body, whereas he is an infinite spirit, Hab. ii. 18. It also forbids us to make images of God in our fancies, as if he were a man as we are. Our religious worship must be governed by the power of faith, not by the power of imagination.

(2) The reasons to enforce this prohibition (v. 5, 6), which are, [1] God's jealousy in the matters of his worship: "I the Lord Jehovah, and thy God, am a jealous God, especially in things of this nature." [2] The punishment of idolaters. God looks upon them as haters of him. He will visit it upon the children. Nor is it an unrighteous thing with God (if the parents died in their iniquity, and the children tread in their steps, and keep up false worships, because they received them by tradition from their fathers), when the measure is full, and God comes by his judgments to reckon with them. Though he bear long with an idolatrous people, he will not bear always, but by the fourth generation, at furthest, he will begin to visit. [3] The favour God would show to his faithful worshippers: Keeping mercy for thousands of persons, thousands of generations of those that love me, and keep my commandments. As the first commandment requires the inward worship of love, desire, joy, hope, and admiration, so the second requires the outward worship of prayer and praise, and solemn attendance on God's word. Those that truly love God will make it their constant care to keep his commandments, particularly those that relate to his worship. Those that love God, and keep those commandments, shall receive grace to keep his other commandments. Gospel worship will have a good influence upon all manner of gospel obedience. This mercy shall extend to thousands, much further than the wrath threatened to those that hate him.

3. The third commandment concerns the manner of our worship.

(1) A strict prohibition: Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. We take God's name in vain, [1] By hypocrisy, making a profession of God's name, but not living up to that profession. Those that name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity, name it in vain. [2] By covenant-breaking; if we make promises to God, binding our souls with those bonds to that which is good, and yet perform not to the Lord our vows, we take his name in vain (Matt. v. 23). [3] By rash swearing, mentioning the name of God as a by-word, to no purpose at all, or to no good purpose. [4] By false swearing. One part of the religious regard the Jews were taught to pay to their God was to swear by his name, Deut. x. 20. But they affronted him, instead of doing him honour, if they called him to be witness to a lie.

(2) A severe penalty: The Lord will not hold him guiltless; magistrates, who punish other offences, may not think themselves concerned to take notice of this, because it does not immediately offer injury either to private property or the public peace. The sinner may perhaps hold himself guiltless. God will not hold him guiltless, and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

4. The fourth commandment concerns the time of worship. God is to be served and honoured daily, but one day in seven is to be particularly dedicated to his honour and spent in his service.

(1) The command itself (v. 8): Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy; and (v. 10), In it thou shalt do no manner of work. We read of God's blessing and sanctifying a seventh day from the beginning (Gen. ii. 3), so that this was not the enacting of a new law, but the reviving of an old law. [1] They are told what is the day they must religiously observe—a seventh, after six days' labour; whether this was the seventh by computation from the first seventh, or from the day of their coming out of Egypt, or both, is not certain. [2] How it must be observed. First, As a day of rest; they were to do no manner of work on this day in their callings or worldly business. Secondly, As a holy day, set apart to the honour of the holy God, and to be spent in holy exercises. God, by blessing it, had made it holy; they, by solemnly blessing him, must keep it holy. [3] Who must observe it: Thou, and thy son, and thy daughter; the wife is not mentioned, because she is supposed to be one with the husband and present with him. God takes notice of what we do, particularly what we do on sabbath days, though we should be where we are strangers. [4] A particular memorandum put upon this duty: Remember it. It is intimated that the sabbath was instituted and observed before; but in their bondage in Egypt they had let fall the observance of it. Some think it denotes the preparation we are to make for the sabbath; we must think of it before it comes, that, when it does come, we may keep it holy.

(2) The reasons of this command. [1] We have time enough for ourselves on the other six days: Six days must thou labour and time enough to tire ourselves. On the seventh day let us serve God. On the seventh it will be a kindness to us to be obliged to rest. [2] This is God's day: it is the sabbath of the Lord thy God, not only instituted by him, but consecrated to him. [3] It is designed for a memorial of the creation of the world, and therefore to be observed to the glory of the Creator. By the sanctification of the sabbath, the Jews declared that they worshipped the God that made the world, and so distinguished themselves from all other nations, who worshipped gods which they themselves made. [4] God has given us an example of rest, after six days' work: he rested the seventh day. [5] He has himself blessed the sabbath day and sanctified it. He has put blessings into it, which he has encouraged us to expect from him in the religious observance of that day. It is the day which the Lord hath made, let us not do what we can to unmake it.

We have here the laws of the second table, as they are commonly called, the last six of the ten commandments, comprehending our duty to ourselves and to one another, and constituting a comment upon the second great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

I. The fifth commandment concerns the duties we owe to our relations; those of children to their parents are alone specified: Honour thy father and thy mother, which includes, 1. A decent respect to their persons, an inward esteem of them outwardly expressed upon all occasions in our conduct. 2. Obedience to their lawful commands; so it is expounded (Eph. vi. 1–3): "Children, obey your parents," from a principle of love. Though you have said, "We will not," yet afterwards repent and obey, Matt. xxi. 29. 3. Submission to their rebukes, instructions, and corrections; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, out of conscience towards God. Endeavouring, in every thing, to be the comfort of their parents, and to make their old age easy to them, maintaining them if they stand in need of support, which our Saviour makes to be particularly intended in this commandment, Matt. xv. 4–6. The reason annexed to this commandment is a promise: That thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. He here, in the beginning of the second table, mentions his bringing them into Canaan. A long life in that good land is promised particularly to obedient children.

II. The sixth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's life (v. 13): "Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not do any thing hurtful or injurious to the health, ease, and life, of thy own body, or any other person's unjustly." It does not forbid killing in lawful war, or in our own necessary defence, but it forbids all malice and hatred to the person of any (for he that hateth his brother is a murderer), and all personal revenge arising therefrom; also all rash anger upon sudden provocations, and hurt said or done, or aimed to be done, in passion: of this our Saviour expounds this commandment, Matt. v. 22.

III. The seventh commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's chastity: Thou shalt not commit adultery, v. 14. This is put before the sixth by our Saviour (Mark x. 19): Do not commit adultery, do not kill; for our chastity should be as dear to us as our lives, and we should be as much afraid of that which defiles the body as of that which destroys it.

IV. The eighth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's wealth, estate, and goods: Thou shalt not steal, v. 15. This command forbids us to rob ourselves of what we have by sinful spending, or of the use and comfort of it by sinful sparing, and to rob others by removing the ancient landmarks, invading our neighbour's rights, taking his goods from his person, or house, or field, forcibly or clandestinely, over-reaching in bargains, not restoring what is borrowed or found, withholding just debts, rents, or wages, and (which is worst of all) to rob the public in the coin or revenue, or that which is dedicated to the service of religion.

V. The ninth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's good name: Thou shalt not bear false witness, v. 16. This forbids, 1. Speaking falsely in any matter, lying, equivocating, and any way devising and designing to deceive our neighbour. 2. Speaking unjustly against our neighbour, to the prejudice of his reputation. 3. Bearing false witness against him, laying to his charge things that he knows not, slandering, backbiting, tale-bearing, aggravating what is done amiss and making it worse than it is, and any way endeavouring to raise our own reputation upon the ruin of our neighbour's.

VI. The tenth commandment strikes at the root: Thou shalt not covet, v. 17. The foregoing commands implicitly forbid all desire of doing that which will be an injury to our neighbour; this forbids all inordinate desire of having that which will be a gratification to ourselves. St. Paul, when the grace of God caused the scales to fall from his eyes, perceived that this law, Thou shalt not covet, forbade all those irregular appetites and desires which are the beginnings of all the sin that is committed by us.

I. The extraordinary terror with which the law was given. It was designed to give a sensible discovery of the glorious majesty of God, to prepare the soul for the comforts of the gospel. Thus was the law given by Moses in such a way as might humble men, that the grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ might be the more welcome.

II. The impression which this made upon the people: 1. They removed, and stood afar off, v. 18. 2. They entreated that the word should not be so spoken to them any more (Heb. xii. 19), but begged that God would speak to them by Moses, v. 19. Hereby also they teach us to acquiesce in that method which Infinite Wisdom takes, of speaking to us by men like ourselves.

III. The encouragement Moses gave them, by explaining the design of God in his terror (v. 20): Fear not, that is, "Think not that the thunder and fire are designed to consume you." They were intended, 1. To prove them, to try how they would like dealing with God immediately, without a mediator. 2. To keep them to their duty, and prevent their sinning against God. He encourages them, saying, Fear not, and yet tells them that God thus spoke to them, that his fear might be before their face. We must not fear with amazement, but we must always have in our minds a reverence of God's majesty, a dread of his displeasure, and an obedient regard to his sovereign authority over us: this fear will quicken us to our duty and make us circumspect in our walking.

IV. The progress of their communion with God by the mediation of Moses, v. 21. While the people continued to stand afar off, Moses drew near unto the thick darkness; he was made to draw near. Some of the rabbis suppose God sent an angel to take him by the hand, and lead him up.

Moses having gone into the thick darkness, where God was, God there spoke in his hearing only, privately and without terror, all that follows hence to the end of ch. xxiii., which is mostly an exposition of the ten commandments; and he was to transmit it by word of mouth first, and afterwards in writing, to the people. The laws in these verses related to God's worship.

I. They are here forbidden to make images for worship (v. 22, 23).

1. This repetition of the second commandment comes in here as pointing to that which might properly be inferred from God's speaking to them as he had done. He had given them sufficient demonstration of his presence among them; they needed not to make images of him, as if he were absent.

2. Though they pretended to worship them but as representations of God, yet really they made them rivals with God, which he would not endure.

II. They are here directed in making altars for worship.

1. To make their altars very plain, either of earth or of unhewn stone, v. 24, 25. That they might not be tempted to think of a graven image, they must not so much as hew into shape the stones that they made their altars of, but pile them up as they were, in the rough. Plainness should be accepted as the best ornament of the external services of religion, and gospel-worship should not be performed with external pomp and gaiety. The beauty of holiness needs no paint.

2. To make their altars very low (v. 26), so that they might not go up by steps to them. That the higher the altar was, and the nearer heaven, the more acceptable the sacrifice was, was a foolish fancy of the heathen, who therefore chose high places; in opposition to this, and to show that it is the elevation of the heart, not of the sacrifice, that God looks at, they were here ordered to make their altars low.

III. They are here assured of God's gracious acceptance of their devotions, wherever they were paid according to his will (v. 24). Under the gospel, when men are encouraged to pray everywhere, this promise revives in its full extent, that, wherever God's people meet in his name to worship him, he will be in the midst of them. There he will come unto them, and will bless them, and more than this we need not desire for the beautifying of our solemn assemblies.

CHAP. XXI

The laws recorded in this chapter relate to the fifth and sixth commandments; and though they are not accommodated to our constitution, nor are the penalties annexed binding on us, yet they are of great use for the explanation of the moral law, and the rules of natural justice. Here are several enlargements, I. Upon the fifth commandment, which concerns particular relations. 1. The duty of masters. 2. The punishment of disobedient children. II. Upon the sixth commandment, which forbids all violence offered to the person of a man. 1. Concerning murder, ver. 12–14. 2. Man-stealing, ver. 16. 3. Assault and battery, ver. 18, 19. 4. Correcting a servant, ver. 20, 21. 5. Hurting a woman with child, ver. 22, 23. 6. The law of retaliation, ver. 24, 25. 7. Maiming a servant, ver. 26, 27. 8. An ox goring, ver. 28–32. 9. Damage by opening a pit, ver. 33, 34. 10. Cattle fighting, ver. 35, 36.

Verses 1–11

The first verse is the general title of the laws contained in this and the two following chapters, most of them relating to matters between man and man. These laws are called judgments, because they are framed in infinite wisdom and equity, and because their magistrates were to give judgment according to them. God delivered them privately to Moses, and he was to communicate them to the people. He begins with the laws concerning servants, commanding mercy and moderation towards them.

I. A law concerning men-servants, sold, either by themselves or their parents, through poverty, or by the judges, for their crimes; even those of the latter sort (if Hebrews) were to continue in slavery but seven years at the most. At the seven years' end the servant should either go out free (v. 2, 3), or his servitude should thenceforward be his choice, v. 5, 6.

1. By this law God taught, (1) The Hebrew servants generosity, and a noble love of liberty, for they were the Lord's freemen. Thus Christians, being bought with a price, and called unto liberty, must not be the servants of men, nor of the lusts of men, 1 Cor. vii. 23. He likewise taught, (2) The Hebrew masters not to trample upon their poor servants.

2. This law will be further useful to us to illustrate the right God has to the children of believing parents, as such, and the place they have in his church.

II. Concerning maid-servants, whom their parents, through extreme poverty, had sold, when they were very young, to such as they hoped would marry them when they grew up; if they did not, yet they must not sell them to strangers, but rather study how to make them amends for the disappointment; if they did, they must maintain them handsomely, v. 7–11.

Verses 12–21

I. A law concerning murder. He had lately said, Thou shalt not kill; 1. For the punishing of wilful murder (v. 12): Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. 2. For the relief of such as killed by accident, when a man, without intent of hurt to any, happens to kill another. In this case God provided cities of refuge for the protection of those whose infelicity it was, but not their fault, to occasion the death of another, v. 13. With us, who know no avengers of blood but the magistrates, the law itself is a sufficient sanctuary.

II. Concerning rebellious children. It is here made a capital crime, to be punished with death, for children either, 1. To strike their parents (v. 15). Or, 2. To curse their parents (v. 17). The undutiful behaviour of children towards their parents is a very great provocation to God our common Father; and, if men do not punish it, he will.

III. Here is a law against man-stealing (v. 16): He that steals a man (that is, a person, man, woman, or child), with design to sell him to the Gentiles (for no Israelite would buy him), was adjudged to death by this statute.

IV. Care is here taken that satisfaction be made for hurt done to a person, though death do not ensue, v. 18, 19. He that did the hurt must be accountable for damages, and pay, not only for the cure, but for the loss of time.

V. Direction is given what should be done if a servant died by his master's correction. If he died under his hand, he should be punished for his cruelty, at the discretion of the judges, upon consideration of circumstances, v. 20.

Verses 22–36

I. The particular care which the law took of women with child, that no hurt should be done them which might occasion their miscarrying. On this occasion comes in that general law of retaliation which our Saviour refers to, Matt. v. 38, An eye for an eye. Now, 1. The execution of this law is not hereby put into the hands of private persons. The tradition of the elders seems to have put this corrupt gloss upon it, in opposition to which our Saviour commands us to forgive injuries, and not to meditate revenge, Matt. v. 39. 2. God often executes it in the course of his providence, making the punishment, in many cases, to answer to the sin, as Judges i. 7; Isa. xxxiii. 1; Hab. ii. 13; Matt. xxvi. 52. 3. Magistrates ought to have an eye to this rule in punishing offenders, and doing right to those that are injured. Consideration must be had of the nature, quality, and degree of the wrong done, that reparation may be made to the party injured, and others deterred from doing the like.

II. The care God took of servants. If their masters maimed them, though it was only striking out a tooth, that should be their discharge, v. 26, 27.

III. Does God take care for oxen? Yes, it appears by the following laws in this chapter that he does, for our sakes, 1 Cor. ix. 9, 10. The Israelites are here directed what to do,

1. In case of hurt done by oxen, or any other brute-creature. (1) As an instance of God's care of the life of man. If an ox killed any man, woman, or child, the ox was to be stoned (v. 28). Thus God would keep up in the minds of his people a rooted abhorrence of the sin of murder and every thing that was barbarous. (2) To make men careful that none of their cattle might do hurt, but that, by all means possible, mischief might be prevented.

2. In case of hurt done to oxen, or other cattle. (1) If they fall into a pit, and perish there, he that opened the pit must make good the loss, v. 33, 34. Mischief done in malice is the great transgression; but mischief done through negligence is not without fault. (2) If cattle fight, and one kill another, the owners shall equally share in the loss, v. 35. In the wilderness where they lay closely encamped, and had their flocks and herds among them, such mischiefs as these last mentioned were likely enough to occur.

CHAP. XXII

The laws of this chapter relate, I. To the eighth commandment, concerning theft (ver. 1–4), trespass by cattle (ver. 5), damage by fire (ver. 6), trusts (ver. 7–13), borrowing cattle (ver. 14, 15), or money, ver. 25–27. II. To the seventh commandment. Against fornication (ver. 16, 17), bestiality, ver. 19. III. To the first table, forbidding witchcraft (ver. 18), idolatry, ver. 20. Commanding to offer the firstfruits, ver. 29, 30. IV. To the poor, ver. 21–24. V. To the civil government, ver. 28. VI. To the peculiarity of the Jewish nation, ver. 31.

Here are the laws,

I. Concerning theft, which are these:—1. If a man steal any cattle (in which the wealth of those times chiefly consisted), and they be found in his custody, he must restore double, v. 4. 2. If he had killed or sold the sheep or ox he had stolen, and thereby persisted in his crime, he must restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep (v. 1) 3. If he was not able to make restitution, he must be sold for a slave, v. 3. 4. If a thief broke a house in the night, and was killed in the doing of it, his blood was upon his own head.

II. Concerning trespass, v. 5. He that wilfully put his cattle into his neighbour's field must make restitution of the best of his own.

III. Concerning damage done by fire, v. 6. He that designed only the burning of thorns might become accessory to the burning of corn, and should not be held guiltless. Men must suffer for their carelessness, as well as for their malice.

Verses 7–15

I. Concerning trusts, v. 7–13. If a man deliver goods, and if a special confidence be reposed in the person they are lodged with, in case these goods be stolen or lost, perish or be damaged, if it appear that it was not by any fault of the trustee, the owner must stand to the loss, otherwise he that has been false to his trust must be compelled to make satisfaction. This teaches us, 1. It is unjust and base, and that which all the world cries shame on, to betray a trust. 2. That there is such a general failing of truth and justice upon earth as gives too much occasion to suspect men's honesty whenever it is their interest to be dishonest. The religion of an oath is very ancient, and a plain indication of the universal belief of a God, and a providence, and a judgment to come.

II. Concerning loans, v. 14, 15. If a man (suppose) lent his team to his neighbour, if the owner was with it, or was to receive profit for the loan of it, whatever harm befell the cattle the owner must stand to the loss of: but if the owner was so kind to the borrower as to lend it to him gratis, then, if any harm happened, the borrower must make it good.

Verses 16–24

I. A law that he who debauched a young woman should be obliged to marry her, v. 16, 17. This law puts an honour upon marriage and shows likewise how improper a thing it is that children should marry without their parents' consent.

II. A law which makes witchcraft a capital crime, v. 18.

III. Unnatural abominations are here made capital; such beasts in the shape of men as are guilty of them are unfit to live (v. 19): Whosoever lies with a beast shall die.

IV. Idolatry is also made capital, v. 20.

V. A caution against oppression. Because those who were empowered to punish other crimes were themselves most in danger of this, God takes the punishing of it into his own hands.

1. Strangers must not be abused (v. 21), not wronged in judgment by the magistrates, not imposed upon in contracts, nor must any advantage be taken of their ignorance or necessity; no, nor must they be taunted, trampled upon, treated with contempt, or upbraided with being strangers. Note, (1) Humanity is one of the laws of religion. Those that are strangers to us are known to God, and he preserves them, Ps. cxlvi. 9. (2) Those that profess religion should study to oblige strangers, that they may thereby recommend religion.

2. Widows and fatherless must not be abused (v. 22): You shall not afflict them, that is, You shall comfort and assist them. Their condition must be considered, who have lost those that should deal for them, and protect them. It is a great comfort to those who are injured and oppressed by men that they have a God to go to who will do more than give them the hearing.

Verses 25–31

Here is, I. A law against extortion in lending. This law, in the strictness of it, seems to have been peculiar to the Jewish state; but, in the equity of it, it obliges us to show mercy to those of whom we might take advantage, and to be content to share, in loss as well as profit. It seems as lawful to receive interest for my money, which another takes pains with and improves, but runs the hazard of, in trade, as it is to receive rent for my land, which another takes pains with and improves, but runs the hazard of, in husbandry. They must not take a poor man's bed-clothes in pawn; but, if they did, must restore them by bed-time, v. 26, 27.

II. A law against the contempt of authority (v. 28): Thou shalt not revile the gods, that is, the judges and magistrates, for their executing these laws; they must do their duty, whoever suffer by it.

III. A law concerning the offering of their first-fruits to God, v. 29, 30. It was appointed before (ch. xiii.), and it is here repeated: The firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me; and much more reason have we to give ourselves, and all we have, to God, who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all. The first ripe of their corn they must not delay to offer. Let not young people delay to offer to God the first-fruits of their time and strength.

IV. A distinction put between the Jews and all other people: You shall be holy men unto me; and one mark of that honourable distinction is appointed in their diet, which was, that they should not eat any flesh that was torn of beasts (v. 31), not only because it was unwholesome, but because it was paltry to eat the leavings of the beasts of prey.

CHAP. XXIII

This chapter continues and concludes the acts that passed in the first session (if I may so call it) upon Mount Sinai. Here are, I. Some laws relating especially to the ninth commandment, against bearing false witness (ver. 1), and giving false judgment, ver. 2, 3, 6–8. Also a law of doing good to our enemies (ver. 4, 5), and not oppressing strangers, ver. 9. II. Some laws peculiar to the Jew. The sabbatical year (ver. 10, 11), the three annual feasts (ver. 14–17), with some laws pertaining thereto. III. Gracious promises of the completing of the mercy God had begun for them, upon condition of their obedience. That God would conduct them through the wilderness (ver. 20–24), that he would prosper all they had (ver. 25, 26), that he would put them in possession of Canaan, ver. 27–31. But they must not mingle themselves with the nations, ver. 32, 33.

Verses 1–9

I. Cautions concerning judicial proceedings.

1. The witnesses are here cautioned that they neither occasion an innocent man to be indicted, by raising a false report of him, nor assist in the prosecution of an innocent man, by putting their hand in swearing as witnesses against him, v. 1. Bearing false witness has in it all the guilt of lying, perjury, malice, theft, murder. There is scarcely any one act of wickedness that a man can possibly be guilty of which has in it a greater complication of villainies than this has. Yet the former part of this caution is to be extended to common conversation; so that slandering and backbiting are a species of falsewitness-bearing. A man's reputation lies as much at the mercy of every company as his estate or life does at the mercy of a judge or jury; so that he who raises, or spreads, a false report against his neighbour, sins as much against the laws of truth, justice, and charity, as a false witness does.

2. The judges are here cautioned not to pervert judgment. (1) They might not be overruled, either by might or multitude, to go against their consciences in giving judgment, v. 2. The junior upon the bench voted first, that he might not be swayed nor overruled by the authority of the senior. We must enquire what we ought to do, not what the majority do; because we must be judged by our Master, not by our fellow-servants, and it is too great a compliment to be willing to go to hell for company. (2) They must not pervert judgment, no, not in favour of a poor man, v. 3. Let them not therefore fare the worse for being poor. They must dread the thoughts of assisting or abetting a bad cause (v. 7). Judges themselves are accountable to the great judge. They must not oppress a stranger, v. 9. Though aliens might not inherit lands among them, yet they must have justice done them, must peaceably enjoy their own, and be redressed if they were wronged, though they were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel.

II. Commands concerning neighbourly kindnesses. We must be ready to do all good offices, as there is occasion, for anybody, yea even for those that have done us ill offices, v. 4, 5. The command of loving our enemies, is not only a new, but an old commandment, Prov. xxv. 21, 22. Infer hence, 1. If we must do this kindness for an enemy, much more for a friend. 2. If it be wrong not to prevent our enemy's loss and damage, how much worse is it to occasion harm and loss to him, or anything he has. 3. If we must bring back our neighbours' cattle when they go astray, much more must we endeavour, by prudent admonitions and instructions, to bring back our neighbours themselves, when they go astray in any sinful path, see Jam. v. 19, 20. And, if we must endeavour to help up a fallen ass, much more should we endeavour to help up a sinking spirit, saying to those that are of a fearful heart, Be strong.

Here is, I. The institution of the sabbatical year, v. 10, 11. Every seventh year the land was to rest; they must not plough nor sow it at the beginning of the year, and then they could not expect any great harvest at the end of the year. Now this was designed, 1. To show what a plentiful land that was into which God was bringing them. 2. To remind them of their dependence upon God their great landlord, and their obligation to use the fruit of their land as he should direct. Afterwards we find that their disobedience to this command was a forfeiture of the promises, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. 3. To teach them a confidence in the divine Providence.

II. The repetition of the law of the fourth commandment concerning the weekly sabbath, v. 12. Some have endeavoured to take away the observance of the sabbath, by pretending that every day must be a sabbath day.

III. All manner of respect to the gods of the heathen is here strictly forbidden, v. 13. A general caution is prefixed to this, which has reference to all these precepts: In all things that I have said unto you, be circumspect.

IV. Their solemn religious attendance on God in the place which he should choose is here strictly required, v. 14–17. Thrice a year all their males must come together in a holy convocation. They must come together before the Lord (v. 17) to pay their homage to him. They must not appear before God empty, v. 15. Some free-will offering or other they must bring, and, as they were not allowed to come empty-handed, so we must not come to worship God empty-hearted; our souls must be filled with grace, with pious and devout affections, holy desires towards him, and dedications of ourselves to him. The passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, in spring, summer, and autumn, were the three times appointed for their attendance.

V. Some particular directions are here given about the three feasts, though not so fully as afterwards. 1. As to the passover, it was not to be offered with leavened bread, nor was the fat of it to remain until the morning, lest it should become offensive, v. 18. 2. At the feast of pentecost, when they were to begin their harvest, they must bring the first of their first-fruits to God, by the pious presenting of which the whole harvest was sanctified, v. 19. 3. At the feast of ingathering, as it is called (v. 16), they must give God thanks for the harvest-mercies they had received, and must depend upon him for the next harvest, and must not think to receive benefit by that superstitious usage of some of the Gentiles, who, it is said, at the end of their harvest, seethed a kid in its dam's milk, and sprinkled that milk-potage, in a magical way, upon their gardens and fields, to make them more fruitful next year.

Three gracious promises are here made to Israel, to engage them to their duty and encourage them in it.

I. It is here promised that they should be guided and kept in their way through the wilderness to the land of promise: Behold, I send an angel before thee (v. 20), my angel (v. 23), a created angel, say some, a minister of God's providence, employed in conducting and protecting the camp of Israel. Others suppose it to be the Son of God, the angel of the covenant; and we may as well suppose him God's messenger, and the church's Redeemer, before his incarnation, as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. It is promised that this blessed angel should keep them in the way. It is also promised that he should bring them into the place which God had not only designed but prepared for them: and thus Christ has prepared a place for his followers.

II. It is promised that they should have a comfortable settlement in the land of Canaan. Observe, 1. How reasonable the conditions of this promise are—only that they should serve their own God, who was indeed the only true God. 2. How rich the particulars of this promise are. (1) The comfort of their food. He shall bless thy bread and thy water. (2) The continuance of their health: "I will take sickness away, either prevent it or remove it." (3) The increase of their wealth. Their cattle should not be barren. (4) The prolonging of their lives to old age: "The number of thy days I will fulfil, and they shall not be cut off in the midst by untimely deaths." Thus hath godliness the promise of the life that now is.

III. It is promised that they should conquer and subdue their enemies, the present occupants of the land of Canaan, who must be driven out to make room for them. Hosts of hornets made way for the hosts of Israel; such mean creatures can God make use of for the chastising of his people's enemies, as in the plagues of Egypt. When God pleases, hornets can drive out Canaanites, as well as lions could, Josh. xxiv. 12. The precept annexed to this promise is that they should not make any friendship, nor have any familiarity, with idolaters, v. 32, 33. Idolaters must not so much as sojourn in their land, unless they renounced their idolatry. Note, Those that would be kept from bad courses must keep from bad company.

CHAP. XXIV

I. Moses comes down to the people, acquaints them with the laws he had received, and takes their consent to those laws (ver. 3), writes the laws, and reads them to the people, who repeat their consent (ver. 4–7), and then by sacrifice, and the sprinkling of blood, ratifies the covenant between them and God, ver. 5, 6, 8. II. He returns to God again, to receive further directions. When he was dismissed from his former attendance, he was ordered to attend again, ver. 1, 2. He did so with seventy of the elders, to whom God made a discovery of his glory, ver. 9–11. Moses is ordered up into the mount (ver. 12, 13); the rest are ordered down to the people, ver. 14. The cloud of glory is seen by all the people on the top of mount Sinai (ver. 15–17), and Moses is there with God forty days and forty nights, ver. 18.

Verses 1–8

Moses is directed to bring Aaron and his sons, and the seventy elders of Israel, that they might be witnesses of the glory of God, and that their testimony might confirm the people's faith. They must all be very reverent: Worship you afar off, v. 1.

In the following verses, we have the solemn covenant made between God and Israel, and the exchanging of the ratifications.

I. Moses told the people the words of the Lord, v. 3. He laid before them all the precepts, general and particular, in the foregoing chapters; and fairly put it to them whether they were willing to submit to these laws or no.

II. The people unanimously consented to the terms proposed, without reservation or exception: All the words which the Lord hath said will we do.

This is the tenor of the covenant. That, if they would observe the foregoing precepts, God would perform the foregoing promises. "Obey, and be happy."

1. How it was engrossed in the book of the covenant: Moses wrote the words of the Lord (v. 4)

2. How it was sealed by the blood of the covenant, that Israel might receive strong consolations from the ratifying of God's promises to them, and might lie under strong obligations from the ratifying of their promises to God. The covenant must be made by sacrifice (Ps. l. 5), because, since man has sinned, and forfeited his Creator's favour, there can be no fellowship by covenant till there be first friendship and atonement by sacrifice.

(1) In preparation therefore [1] Moses builds an altar, to the honour of God, which was principally intended in all the altars that were built, and which was the first thing to be looked at in the covenant they were now to seal. [2] He erects twelve pillars, according to the number of the tribes. These were to represent the people, the other party to the covenant; and we may suppose that they were set up against the altar, and that Moses, as mediator, passed to and fro between them. Probably each tribe set up and knew its own pillar, and their elders stood by it. [3] He appointed sacrifices to be offered upon the altar (v. 5), burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, which yet were designed to be expiatory.

(2) Preparation being thus made, the ratifications were very solemnly exchanged. [1] The blood of the sacrifice which the people offered was (part of it) sprinkled upon the altar (v. 6), which signifies the people's dedicating themselves, their lives, and beings, to God, and to his honour. [2] The blood of the sacrifice which God had owned and accepted was (the remainder of it) sprinkled either upon the people themselves (v. 8) or upon the pillars that represented them, which signified God's graciously conferring his favour upon them. Thus our Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant (of whom Moses was a type), having offered up himself a sacrifice upon the cross, that his blood might be indeed the blood of the covenant, sprinkles it upon the altar in his intercession (Heb. ix. 12), and sprinkles it upon his church by his word and ordinances and the influences and operations of the Spirit of promise, by whom we are sealed. He himself seemed to allude to this solemnity when, in the institution of the Lord's supper, he said, This cup is the New Testament (or covenant) in my blood. Compare with this, Heb. ix. 19, 20.

Verses 9–11

God here gives to their representatives some special tokens of his favour to them, and admits them nearer to him than they could have expected. Observe, 1. They saw the God of Israel (v. 10), that is, they had some glimpse of his glory, in light and fire, though they saw no manner of similitude, and his being no man hath seen nor can see, 1 Tim. vi. 16. They saw the place where the God of Israel stood (so the LXX.), something that came near a similitude, but was not; whatever they saw, it was certainly something of which no image or picture could be made, and yet enough to satisfy them that God was with them of a truth. Nothing is described but that which was under his feet; for our conceptions of God are all below him, and fall infinitely short of being adequate. At the bottom of the brightness, and as the footstool or pedestal of it, they saw a most rich and splendid pavement, as it had been of sapphires, azure or sky-coloured. 2. Upon the nobles (or elders) of Israel, he laid not his hand, v. 11. Though they were men, the dazzling splendour of his glory was so moderated that they were able to bear it. 3. They saw God, and did eat and drink. They had not only their lives preserved, but their vigour, courage, and comfort; it cast no damp upon their joy, but rather increased and elevated it.

Verses 12–18

The public ceremony of sealing the covenant being over, Moses is called up to receive further instructions.

I. He is called up into the mount, and there he remains six days at some distance. "Come up, and I will give thee a law, that thou mayest teach them." Having received these orders, 1. He appointed Aaron and Hur to be as lords-justices in his absence, to keep the peace and good order in the congregation, v. 14. 2. He took Joshua up with him into the mount, v. 13. Joshua was his minister, and it would be a satisfaction to him to have him with him as a companion, during the six days that he tarried in the mount, before God called to him. Joshua was to be his successor, and therefore thus he was honoured before the people, above the rest of the elders, that they might afterwards the more readily take him for their governor; and thus he was prepared for service, by being trained up in communion with God. 3. A cloud covered the mount six days, a visible token of God's special presence there. During these six days Moses stayed waiting upon the mountain for a call into the presence-chamber, v. 15, 16.

II. He is called up into a cloud on the seventh day, probably on the sabbath day, v. 16. Now, 1. The thick cloud opened in the sight of all Israel, and the glory of the Lord broke forth like devouring fire, v. 17. 2. The entrance of Moses into the cloud was very wonderful: Moses went into the midst of the cloud, v. 18, sure that he who called him would protect him. 3. His continuance in the cloud was no less wonderful; he was there forty days and forty nights. When Moses was called into the midst of the cloud he left Joshua without, who continued to eat and drink daily while he waited for Moses's return, but thenceforward Moses fasted.

CHAP. XXV

At this chapter begins an account of the orders and instructions God gave to Moses upon the mount for the erecting and furnishing of a tabernacle to the honour of God. We have here, I. Orders given for a collection to be made among the people for this purpose, ver. 1–9. II. Particular instructions, 1. Concerning the ark of the covenant, ver. 10–22. 2. The table of showbread, ver. 23–30. 3. The golden candlestick, ver. 31, &c.

Verses 1–9

We may suppose that when Moses went into the midst of the cloud, and abode there so long, he saw and heard very glorious things relating to the upper world, but there were things which it was not lawful nor possible to utter.

In these verses God tells Moses his intention in general, that the children of Israel should build him a sanctuary, for he designed to dwell among them (v. 8). God had chosen the people of Israel. As their King, he had already given them laws for the government of themselves, and their dealings one with another, with some general rules for religious worship.

I. He orders a royal palace to be set up among them for himself, here called a sanctuary, or holy place, or habitation, of which it is said (Jer. xvii. 12), A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary. This sanctuary is to be considered,

1. As ceremonial, consonant to the other institutions of that dispensation, which consisted in carnal ordinances (Heb. ix. 10); hence it is called a worldly sanctuary, Heb. ix. 1. (1) There he manifested his presence among them, a sign or token of his presence, that, while they had that in the midst of them, they might never again ask, Is the Lord among us or not? And, because in the wilderness they dwelt in tents, even this royal palace was ordered to be a tabernacle too, that it might move with them. (2) There he ordered his subjects to attend him with their homage and tribute. Thither they must bring their sacrifices, and there all Israel must meet, to pay their joint respects to the God of Israel.

2. As typical; the holy places made with hands were the figures of the true, Heb. ix. 24. The body of Christ, in and by which he made atonement, was the greater and more perfect tabernacle, Heb. ix. 11. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, as in a tabernacle.

II. When Moses was to erect this palace, it was requisite that he should first be instructed where he must have the materials, and where he must have the model.

1. The people must furnish him with the materials, not by a tax imposed upon them, but by a voluntary contribution.

(1) Speak unto the children of Israel that they bring me an offering. Since we live upon him, we must live to him.

(2) This offering must be given willingly, and with the heart. We should ask, not only, "What must we do?" but, "What may we do for God?"

(3) The particulars are here mentioned which they must offer (v. 3–7), all of them things that there would be occasion for in the tabernacle. Some observe that here was gold, silver, and brass, provided, but no iron; that is the military metal, and this was to be a house of peace.

2. God himself would furnish him with the model: According to all that I show thee, v. 9.

The first thing which is here ordered to be made is the ark with its appurtenances, the furniture of the most holy place, and the special token of God's presence, for which the tabernacle was erected to be the receptacle.

I. The ark itself was a chest, or coffer, in which the two tables of the law were to be honourably deposited, and carefully kept. If the Jewish cubit was, as some learned men compute, three inches longer than our half-yard (twenty-one inches in all), this chest or cabinet was about fifty-two inches long, thirty-one broad, and thirty-one deep. It was overlaid within and without with thin plates of gold. It had a crown, or cornice, of gold, round it, with rings and staves to carry it with; and in it he must put the testimony, v. 10–16. The tables of the law are called the testimony because God did in them testify his will. The gospel of Christ is also called a testimony or witness, Matt. xxiv. 14. It is observable, 1. That the tables of the law were carefully preserved in the ark for the purpose, to teach us to make much of the word of God, and to hide it in our hearts, in our innermost thoughts, as the ark was placed in the holy of holies. 2. That this ark was the chief token of God's presence, which teaches us that the first and great evidence and assurance of God's favour is the putting of his law in the heart. God dwells where that rules, Heb. viii. 10. 3. That provision was made for the carrying of this ark about with them in all their removals, which intimates to us that, wherever we go, we should take our religion along with us, always bearing about with us the love of the Lord Jesus, and his law.

II. The mercy-seat was the covering of the ark or chest, made of solid gold, exactly to fit the dimensions of the ark, v. 17, 21.

III. The cherubim of gold were fixed to the mercy-seat, and of a piece with it, and spread their wings over it, v. 18. It is supposed that these cherubim were designed to represent the holy angels, who always attended the shechinah, or divine Majesty, not by any effigies of an angel, but some emblem of the angelical nature, probably some one of those four faces spoken of, Ezek. i. 10. Whatever the faces were, they looked one towards another, and both downward towards the ark, while their wings were stretched out so as to touch one another. The apostle calls them cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy-seat, Heb. ix. 5. God is said to dwell between the cherubim, on the mercy-seat (Ps. lxxx. 1), and thence he here promises, for the future, to meet with Moses, and to commune with him, v. 22. In allusion to this mercy-seat, we are said to come boldly to the throne of grace (Heb. iv. 16); for we are not under the law, which is covered, but under grace, which is displayed; its wings are stretched out, and we are invited to come under the shadow of them, Ruth ii. 12.

Verses 23–30

Here is, 1. A table ordered to be made of wood overlaid with gold, which was to stand, not in the holy of holies (nothing was in that but the ark with its appurtenances), but in the outer part of the tabernacle, called the sanctuary, or holy place, Heb. ix. 2, 23, &c. There must also be the usual furniture of the sideboard, dishes and spoons, &c., and all of gold, v. 29. 2. This table was to be always spread, and furnished with the show-bread (v. 30) or bread of faces, twelve loaves, one for each tribe, set in two rows, six in a row; see the law concerning them, Lev. xxiv. 6, &c. In the royal palace it was fit that there should be a royal table. Some make the twelve loaves to represent the twelve tribes. As the ark signified God's being present with them, so the twelve loaves signified their being presented to God. This bread was designed to be, (1) A thankful acknowledgment of God's goodness to them, in giving them their daily bread, manna in the wilderness, where he prepared a table for them, and, in Canaan, the corn of the land. Christ has taught us to pray every day for the bread of the day. (2) A token of their communion with God. This bread on God's table being made of the same corn with the bread on their own tables, God and Israel did, as it were, eat together, as a pledge of friendship and fellowship; he supped with them, and they with him. (3) A type of the spiritual provision which is made in the church, by the gospel of Christ, for all that are made priests to our God. In our Father's house there is bread enough and to spare, a loaf for every tribe.

Verses 31–40

I. The next thing ordered to be made for the furnishing of God's palace was a rich stately candlestick, all of pure gold. The particular directions here given concerning it show, 1. That it was a great ornament; it had many branches drawn from the main shaft, which had not only their bowls (to put the oil and the kindled wick in) for necessity, but knops and flowers for ornament. 2. That it was very convenient, and admirably contrived both to scatter the light and to keep the tabernacle clean from smoke and snuffs. 3. That it was very significant. The tabernacle had no windows by which to let in the light of the day, all its light was candle-light. Yet God left not himself without witness, nor them without instruction; the commandment was a lamp, and the law a light, and the prophets were branches from that lamp, which gave light in their several ages to the Old Testament church. The church is still dark, as the tabernacle was, in comparison with what it will be in heaven; but the word of God is the candlestick, a light shining in a dark place (2 Pet. i. 19), and a dark place indeed the world would be without it. The Spirit of God, in his various gifts and graces, is compared to the seven lamps which burn before the throne, Rev. iv. 5. The churches are golden candlesticks, the lights of the world, holding forth the word of life as the candlestick does the light, Phil. ii. 15, 16. Ministers are to light the lamps, and snuff them (v. 37), by opening the scriptures.

II. There is in the midst of these instructions an express caution given to Moses, to take heed of varying from his model: Make them after the pattern shown thee, v. 40.

CHAP. XXVI

Moses here receives instructions, I. Concerning the inner curtains of the tent or tabernacle, and the coupling of those curtains, ver. 1–6. II. Concerning the outer curtains which were of goats' hair, to strengthen the former, ver. 7–13. III. Concerning the case or cover which was to secure it from the weather, ver. 14. IV. Concerning the boards which were to be reared up to support the curtains, with their bars and sockets, ver. 15–30. V. The partition between the holy place and the most holy, ver. 31–35. VI. The veil for the door, ver. 36, 37.

Verses 1–6

I. The house must be a tabernacle or tent. God manifested his presence among them thus in a tabernacle, 1. In compliance with their present condition in the wilderness, that they might have him with them wherever they went. 2. That it might represent the state of God's church in this world, it is a tabernacle-state, Ps. xv. 1. We have here no continuing city; being strangers in this world, and travellers towards a better, we shall never be fixed till we come to heaven.

II. The curtains of the tabernacle must correspond to a divine pattern. 1. They were to be very rich, the best of the kind, fine twined linen; and colours very pleasing, blue, and purple, and scarlet. 2. They were to be embroidered with cherubim (v. 1), to intimate that the angels of God pitch their tents round about the church, Ps. xxxiv. 7. 3. There were to be two hangings, five breadths in each, sewed together, and the two hangings coupled together with golden clasps, or tacks, so that it might be all one tabernacle, v. 6. Thus the churches of Christ and the saints, though they are many, are yet one, being fitly joined together in holy love, and by the unity of the Spirit, so growing into one holy temple in the Lord, Eph. ii. 21, 22; iv. 16.

Moses is here ordered to make a double covering for the tabernacle, that it might not rain in. 1. There was to be a covering of hair camlet curtains, which were somewhat larger every way than the inner curtains, because they were to enclose them, and probably were stretched out at some little distance from them, v. 7, &c. These were coupled together with brass clasps. 2. Over this there was to be another covering, and that a double one (v. 14), one of rams' skins dyed red, probably dressed with the wool on; another of badgers' skins, so we translate it, but it should rather seem to have been some strong sort of leather (but very fine), for we read of the best sort of shoes being made of it, Ezek. xvi. 10. Now observe here that the outside of the tabernacle was coarse and rough, the beauty of it was in the inner curtains. Those in whom God dwells must labour to be better than they seem to be. Let our adorning be that of the hidden man of the heart, which God values, 1 Pet. iii. 4.

Verses 15–30

Very particular directions are here given about the boards of the tabernacle, which were to bear up the curtains, as the stakes of a tent which had need to be strong, Isa. liv. 2. These boards had tenons which fell into the mortises that were made for them in silver bases. God took care to have every thing strong, as well as fine, in his tabernacle. The boards were coupled together with gold rings at top and bottom (v. 24), and kept firm with bars that ran through golden staples in every board (v. 26), and the boards and bars were all richly gilded, v. 29.

Verses 31–37

Two veils are here ordered to be made, 1. One for a partition between the holy place and the most holy, which not only forbade any to enter, but forbade them so much as to look into the holiest of all, v. 31, 33. Under that dispensation, divine grace was veiled, but now we behold it with open face, 2 Cor. iii. 18. The apostle tells us (Heb. ix. 8, 9) what was the meaning of this veil; it intimated that the ceremonial law could not make the comers thereunto perfect, nor would the observance of it bring men to heaven; the way into the holiest of all was not made manifest while the first tabernacle was standing; life and immortality lay concealed till they were brought to light by the gospel, which was therefore signified by the rending of this veil at the death of Christ, Matt. xxvii. 51. We have now boldness to enter into the holiest, in all acts of devotion, by the blood of Jesus, yet such as obliges us to a holy reverence and a humble sense of our distance. 2. Another veil was for the outer door of the tabernacle, v. 36, 37. Through this first veil the priests went in every day to minister in the holy place, but not the people, Heb. ix. 6. This veil, which was all the defence the tabernacle had against thieves and robbers, might easily be broken through, for it could be neither locked nor barred, and the abundance of wealth in the tabernacle, one would think, might be a temptation; but by leaving it thus exposed, (1) The priests and Levites would be so much the more obliged to keep a strict watch upon it, and, (2) God would show his care of his church on earth, though it is weak and defenceless, and continually exposed. A curtain shall be (if God please to make it so) as strong a defence to his house as gates of brass and bars of iron.

CHAP. XXVII

In this chapter directions are given, I. Concerning the brazen altar for burnt-offerings, ver. 1–8. II. Concerning the court of the tabernacle, with the hangings of it, ver. 9–19. III. Concerning oil for the lamp, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–8

As God intended in the tabernacle to manifest his presence among his people, so there they were to pay their devotions to him, not in the tabernacle itself (into that only the priests entered as God's domestic servants), but in the court before the tabernacle. There an altar was ordered to be set up, to which they must bring their sacrifices. Moses is here directed about, 1. The dimensions of it; it was square, v. 1. 2. The horns of it (v. 2), which were for ornament and for use; the sacrifices were bound with cords to the horns of the altar, and to them malefactors fled for refuge. 3. The materials; it was of wood overlaid with brass, v. 1, 2. 4. The appurtenances of it (v. 3), which were all of brass. 5. The grate, which was let into the hollow of the altar, about the middle of it, in which the fire was kept, and the sacrifice burnt. 6. The staves with which it must be carried, v. 6, 7. And, lastly, he is referred to the pattern shown him, v. 8.

Now this brazen altar was a type of Christ dying to make atonement for our sins. To the horns of this altar poor sinners fly for refuge when justice pursues them, and they are safe in virtue of the sacrifice there offered.

Verses 9–19

Before the tabernacle there was to be a court or yard, enclosed with hangings of the finest linen that was used for tents. This court, according to the common computation of cubits, was fifty yards long, and twenty-five broad. Pillars were set up at convenient distances, in sockets of brass, the pillars filleted with silver, and silver tenter-hooks in them, on which the linen hangings were fastened: the hanging which served for the gate was finer than the rest, v. 16. Thanks be to God, now, under the gospel, the enclosure is taken down. God's will is that men pray everywhere; and there is room for all that in every place call on the name of Jesus Christ.

Verses 20–21

Here is an order given for the keeping of the lamps constantly burning in it; in every candlestick there should be a burning and shining light; candlesticks without candles are as wells without water or as clouds without rain. Now, 1. The people were to provide the oil. 2. The priests were to light the lamps, and to tend them; thus it is the work of ministers, by the preaching and expounding of the scriptures (which are as a lamp), to enlighten the church, God's tabernacle upon earth.

CHAP. XXVIII

In this and the following chapter care is taken about the priests that were to minister in this holy place. In this chapter, I. God pitches upon the persons who should be his servants, ver. 1. II. He appoints their livery; answerable to the glory of the house which was now to be erected, ver. 2–5. 1. He appoints the garments of his head-servants, the high priest. (1) An ephod and girdle, ver. 6–14. (2) A breast-plate of judgment (ver. 15–29), in which must be put the urim and thummim, ver. 30. (3) The robe of the ephod, ver. 31–35. (4) The mitre, ver. 36–39. 2. The garments of the inferior priests, ver. 40–43. And these also were shadows of good things to come.

Verses 1–5

I. The priests nominated: Aaron and his sons, v. 1. Moses, who had hitherto officiated, and is therefore reckoned among the priests of the Lord (Ps. xcix. 6), had enough to do as their prophet to consult the oracle for them, and as their prince to judge among them; but was well pleased to see his brother Aaron invested in this office. Aaron, who had humbly served as a prophet to his younger brother Moses, and did not decline the office (ch. vii. 1), is now advanced to be a priest, a high priest, to God. Because it was requisite that those who ministered at the altar should give themselves wholly to the service, and because that which is everybody's work will soon come to be nobody's work, God here chose from among them one to be a family of priests, the father and his four sons; and from Aaron's loins descended all the priests of the Jewish church, of whom we read so often, both in the Old Testament and in the New.

II. The priests' garments appointed, for glory and beauty, v. 2. The garments appointed were, 1. Four which both the high priest and the inferior priests wore, namely, the linen breeches, the linen coat, the linen girdle which fastened it to them, and the bonnet or turban; that which the high priest wore is called a mitre. 2. Four more, which were peculiar to the high priest, namely, the ephod, with the curious girdle of it, the breast-plate of judgment, the long robe with the bells and pomegranates at the bottom of it, and the golden plate on his forehead. Our adorning, now under the gospel, is not to be of gold, and pearl, and costly array, but the garments of salvation, and the robe of righteousness, Isa. lxi. 10; Ps. cxxxii. 9, 16.

Verses 6–14

Directions are here given concerning the ephod, which was the outmost garment of the high priest. Linen ephods were worn by the inferior priests, 1 Sam. xxii. 18. Samuel wore one when he was a child (1 Sam ii. 18), and David when he danced before the ark (2 Sam. vi. 14); but this which the high priest only wore was called a golden ephod, because there was a great deal of gold woven into it. It was a short coat without sleeves, buttoned closely to him, with a curious girdle of the same stuff (v. 6–8); the shoulder-pieces were buttoned together with two precious stones set in gold, one on each shoulder, on which were engraven the names of the children of Israel, v. 9–12.

Verses 15–30

The most considerable of the ornaments of the high priest was this breast-plate, a rich piece of cloth, curiously wrought with gold and purple, &c., two spans long and a span broad, so that, being doubled, it was a span square, v. 16. This was fastened to the ephod with wreathen chains of gold (v. 13, 14, 22, &c.) both at top and bottom, so that the breast-plate might not be loosed from the ephod, v. 28. The ephod was the garment of service; the breast-plate of judgment was an emblem of honour: these two must by no means be separated. In this breast-plate,

I. The tribes of Israel were recommended to God's favour in twelve precious stones, v. 17–21, 29. Aaron was to bear their names for a memorial before the Lord continually, being ordained for men, to represent them in things pertaining to God, herein typifying our great high priest, who always appears in the presence of God for us. 1. Though the people were forbidden to come near, yet by the high priest, who had their names on his breast-plate, they entered into the holiest; so believers, even while they are here on this earth, not only enter into the holiest, but by faith are made to sit with Christ in heavenly places, Eph. ii. 6. 2. The name of each tribe was engraven in a precious stone, to signify how precious, in God's sight, believers are and how honourable, Isa. xliii. 4. They shall be his in the day he makes up his jewels, Mal. iii. 1. 3. The high priest had the names of the tribes both on his shoulders and on his breast, intimating both the power and the love with which our Lord Jesus intercedes for those that are his. He not only bears them up in his arms with an almighty strength, but he bears them upon his heart, as the expression here is (v. 29), carries them in his bosom (Isa. xl. 11), with the most tender affection.

II. The urim and thummim, by which the will of God was made known in doubtful cases, were put in this breast-plate, which is therefore called the breast-plate of judgment, v. 30. Urim and thummim signify light and integrity: I think the words may be read thus, And thou shalt give, or add, or deliver, to the breastplate of judgment, the illuminations and perfections, and they shall be upon the heart of Aaron; that is, "He shall be endued with a power of knowing and making known the mind of God in all difficult doubtful cases, relating either to the civil or ecclesiastical state of the nation." Their government was a theocracy: God was their King, the high priest was, under God, their ruler, the urim and thummim were his cabinet-council; probably Moses wrote upon the breast-plate, or wove into it, these words, urim and thummim, to signify that the high priest, having on him this breast-plate, and asking counsel of God in any emergency relating to the public, should be directed to take those measures, and give that advice, which God would own. The answer was given either by a voice from heaven or rather by an impulse upon the mind of the high priest, which last is perhaps intimated in that expression, He shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart. This oracle was of great use to Israel; Joshua consulted it (Num. xxvii. 21), and, it is likely, the judges after him. It was lost in the captivity, and never regained after. But it was a shadow of good things to come, and the substance is Christ. He is our oracle, by him God in these last days makes known himself and his mind to us, Heb. i. 2; John i. 18. Divine revelation centres in him, and comes to us through him.

1. Direction given concerning the robe of the ephod, v. 31–35. This was next under the ephod, and reached down to the knees, and was without sleeves. The hole on the top, through which the head was put, was carefully bound about, that it might not tear in the putting on. Round the skirts of the robe were hung golden bells, and the representations of pomegranates made of yarn of divers colours. The pomegranates added to the beauty of the robe, and the sound of the bells gave notice to the people in the outer court when he went into the holy place to burn incense, that they might then apply themselves to the devotions at the same time. Some make the bells of the holy robe to typify the sound of the gospel of Christ in the world, giving notice of his entrance within the veil for us. The adding of the pomegranates, which are a fragrant fruit, denotes the sweet savour of the gospel. 2. Concerning the golden plate fixed upon Aaron's forehead, on which must be engraven, Holiness to the Lord (v. 36, 37), Aaron must hereby be reminded that God is holy, and that his priests must be holy. Aaron must have this upon his forehead, that he may bear the iniquity of the holy things (v. 38), and that they may be accepted before the Lord. Herein he was a type of Christ, the great Mediator between God and man, through whom it is that we have to do with God. (1) Through him what is amiss in our services is pardoned. In many things we come short of our duty, so that we cannot but be conscious to ourselves of much iniquity cleaving even to our holy things. But Christ, our high priest, bears this iniquity, bears it for us so as to bear it from us, and through him it is forgiven to us and not laid to our charge. (2) Through him what is good is accepted; our persons, our performances, are pleasing to God upon the account of Christ's intercession, and not otherwise, 1 Pet. ii. 5. Having such a high priest, we come boldly to the throne of grace, Heb. iv. 14–16. 3. The rest of the garments are but named (v. 39). The embroidered coat of fine linen was the innermost of the priestly garments; it reached to the feet, and the sleeves to the wrists, and was bound to the body with a girdle or sash of needle-work. The mitre, or diadem, was of linen, such as kings anciently wore in the east, typifying the kingly office of Christ.

We have here, 1. Particular orders about the vestments of the inferior priests. They were to have coats, and girdles, and bonnets, of the same materials with those of the high priest; but there was a difference in shape between their bonnets and his mitre. Theirs, as his, were to be for glory and beauty (v. 40), yet all this glory was nothing compared with the glory of grace, this beauty nothing to the beauty of holiness, of which these holy garments were typical. 2. A general rule concerning the garments both of the high priest and of the inferior priests, that they were to be put upon them, at first, when they were consecrated, and then they were to wear them in all their ministrations, but not at other times (v. 43). To us these garments typify, (1) The righteousness of Christ; if we appear not before God in this, we shall bear iniquity and die. (2) The armour of God prescribed, Eph. vi. 13.

CHAP. XXIX

Particular orders are given in this chapter, I. Concerning the consecration of the priests, and the sanctification of the altar, ver. 1–37. II. Concerning the daily sacrifice, ver. 38–41, to which gracious promises are annexed that God would own and bless them in all their services, ver. 42, &c.

Verses 1–37

I. The law concerning the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priests' office.

1. The ceremonies wherewith it was to be done were very fully and particularly appointed, because nothing of this kind had been done before. Now,

(1) The work to be done was the consecrating of the persons whom God had chosen to be priests, by which they devoted and gave up themselves to the service of God and God declared his acceptance of them; and the people were made to know that they glorified not themselves to be made priests, but were called of God, Heb. v. 4, 5. Note, All that are to be employed for God are to be sanctified to him. The person must first be accepted, and then the performance.

(2) The person to do it was Moses, by God's appointment. By God's special appointment he now did the priest's work, and therefore that which was the priest's part of the sacrifice was here ordered to be his, v. 26.

(3) The place was at the door of the tabernacle of meeting, v. 4. They were consecrated at the door, for they were to be door-keepers.

(4) It was done with many ceremonies.

[1] They were to be washed (v. 4), signifying that those must be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord, Isa. lii. 11. Those that would perfect holiness must cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, 2 Cor. vii. 1; Isa. i. 16–18.

[2] They were to be clothed with the holy garments (v. 5, 6, 8, 9), to signify that it was not sufficient for them to put away the pollutions of sin, but they must put on the graces of the Spirit, be clothed with righteousness, Ps. cxxxii. 9.

[3] The high priest was to be anointed with the holy anointing oil (v. 7), that the church might be filled and delighted with the sweet savour of his administrations and in token of the pouring out of the Spirit upon him, to qualify him for his work.

[4] Sacrifices were to be offered for them. The covenant of priesthood, as all other covenants, must be made by sacrifice.

First, There must be a sin-offering, to make atonement for them, v. 10–14. It was used as other sin-offerings were; only, whereas the flesh of other sin-offerings was eaten by the priests (Lev. x. 18), in token of the priest's taking away the sin of the people, this was appointed to be all burnt without the camp (v. 14), to signify the imperfection of the legal dispensation.

Secondly, There must be a burnt-offering, a ram wholly burnt, to the honour of God, in token of the dedication of themselves wholly to God and to his service, as living sacrifices, kindled with the fire and ascending in the flame of holy love, v. 15–18.

Thirdly, There must be a peace-offering; it is called the ram of consecration, because there was more in this peculiar to the occasion than in the other two. In the burnt-offering God had the glory of their priesthood, in this they had the comfort of it; and, in token of a mutual covenant between God and them, [i] The blood of the sacrifice was divided between God and them (v. 20, 21); part of the blood was sprinkled upon the altar round about, and part put upon them, upon their bodies (v. 20), and upon their garments, v. 21. The blood of Christ, and the graces of the Spirit, which constitute and complete the beauty of holiness, recommend us to God; we read of robes made white with the blood of the lamb. [ii] The flesh of the sacrifice, with the meat-offering annexed to it, was likewise divided between God and them, that (to speak with reverence) God and they might feast together, in token of friendship and fellowship. Their eating of the things wherewith the atonement was made signified their receiving the atonement, as the expression is (Rom. v. 11), their thankful acceptance of the benefit of it, and their joyful communion with God thereupon, which was the true intent and meaning of a feast upon a sacrifice.

2. The time that was to be spent in this consecration: Seven days shalt thou consecrate them, v. 35. Though all the ceremonies were performed on the first day, yet, (1) They were not to look upon their consecration as completed till the seven days' end, which put a distance between this and their former state, and obliged them to enter upon their work with a pause, giving them time to consider the weight and seriousness of it. (2) Every day of the seven, in this first consecration, a bullock was to be offered for a sin-offering (v. 36), which was to intimate to them, [1] That though atonement was made, and they had the comfort of it, yet they must still keep up a penitent sense of sin and often repeat the confession of it. [2] That those sacrifices which were thus offered day by day to make atonement could not make the comers thereunto perfect, for then they would have ceased to be offered, as the apostle argues, Heb. x. 1, 2. They must therefore expect the bringing in of a better hope.

3. This consecration of the priests was a shadow of good things to come. (1) Our Lord Jesus is the great high-priest of our profession, clothed with the holy garments, even with glory and beauty, sanctified by his own blood, not that of bullocks and rams (Heb. ix. 12), made perfect, or consecrated, through sufferings, Heb. ii. 10. (2) All believers are spiritual priests, to offer spiritual sacrifices (1 Pet. ii. 5), washed in the blood of Christ. It is through Christ, the great sacrifice, that they are dedicated to this service.

II. The consecration of the altar, which seems to have been coincident with that of the priests, and the sin-offerings which were offered every day for seven days together had reference to the altar as well as the priests, v. 36, 37. The altar was also sanctified, not only set apart itself to a sacred use, but made so holy as to sanctify the gifts that were offered upon it, Matt. xxiii. 19. Christ is our altar; for our sakes he sanctified himself, that we and our performances might be sanctified and recommended to God, John xvii. 19.

I. The daily service appointed. A lamb was to be offered upon the altar every morning, and a lamb every evening, each with a meat-offering, both made by fire, as a continual burnt-offering throughout their generations, v. 38–41. Now, 1. This typified the continual intercession which Christ ever lives to make, in virtue of his satisfaction, for the continual sanctification of his church: though he offered himself once for all, yet that one offering thus becomes a continual offering. 2. This teaches us to offer up to God the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise every day, morning and evening, in humble acknowledgment of our dependence upon him and our obligations to him. Prayer-time must be kept up as duly as meat-time.

II. Great and precious promises made of God's favour to Israel, and the tokens of his special presence with them. It is constancy in religion that brings in the comfort of it. If we do our part, God will do his, and will mark and fit that for himself which is in sincerity given up to him.

CHAP. XXX

Moses is, in this chapter, further instructed, I. Concerning the altar of incense, ver. 1–10. II. Concerning the ransom-money which the Israelites were to pay, when they were numbered, ver. 11–16. III. Concerning the laver of brass, which was set for the priests to wash in, ver. 17–21. IV. Concerning the making up of the anointing oil, and the use of it, ver. 22–33. V. Concerning the incense and perfume which were to be burned on the golden altar, ver. 34, &c.

I. The orders given concerning the altar of incense are, 1. That it was to be made of wood, and covered with gold, with horns at the corners, a golden cornice round it, with rings and staves of gold, for the convenience of carrying it, v. 1–5. The measure of the altar of incense in Ezekiel's temple is double to what it is here (Ezek. xli. 22), and it is there called an altar of wood, and there is no mention of gold, to signify that the incense in gospel times should be spiritual, the worship plain, and the service of God enlarged. 2. That it was to be placed before the mercy-seat, which was within the veil, v. 6. For though he that ministered at the altar could not see the mercy-seat, the veil interposing, yet he must look towards it, and direct his incense that way, to teach us that though we cannot with our bodily eyes see the throne of grace, yet we must in prayer by faith set ourselves before it, direct our prayer, and look up. 3. That Aaron was to burn sweet incense upon this altar, every morning and every evening, intended, not only to take away the ill smell of the flesh that was burnt daily on the brazen altar, but to show the acceptableness of his people's services. As by the offerings on the brazen altar satisfaction was made for what had been done displeasing to God, so, by the offering on this, what they did well was, as it were, recommended to the divine acceptance; for our two great concerns with God are to be acquitted from guilt and accepted as righteous in his sight.

II. This incense-altar typified, 1. The mediation of Christ. The brazen altar in the court was a type of Christ dying on earth; the golden altar in the sanctuary was a type of Christ interceding in heaven. This altar was before the mercy-seat, for Christ always appears in the presence of God for us: he is our advocate with the father (1 John ii. 1), and his intercession is unto God of a sweet-smelling savour. This altar had a crown fixed to it; for Christ intercedes as a king. 2. The devotions of the saints. When the priest was burning incense the people were praying (Luke i. 10), to signify that prayer is the true incense. The lamps were dressed or lighted at the same time that the incense was burnt, to teach us that the reading of the scriptures (which are our light and lamp) is a part of our daily work, and should ordinarily accompany our prayers and praises. When we speak to God we must hear what God says to us, and thus the communion is complete. And, if the heart and life be not holy, even incense is an abomination (Isa. i. 13), and he that offers it is as if he blessed an idol, Isa. lxvi. 3.

Verses 11–16

Moses is here ordered to levy money upon the people by way of poll, so much a head, for the service of the tabernacle. This he must do when he numbered the people. Some think that it refers only to the first numbering of them. Others think that it was afterwards repeated upon any emergency and always when the people were numbered. But many of the Jewish writers are of opinion that it was to be an annual tribute. This was that tribute-money which Christ paid, for fear of offending his adversaries (Matt. xvii. 27). Now, 1. The tribute to be paid was half a shekel. The rich were not to give more, nor the poor less (v. 15), to intimate that the souls of the rich and poor are alike precious, and that God is no respecter of persons, Acts x. 34. In other offerings men were to give according to their ability; but this, which was the ransom of the soul, must be alike for all. 2. This tribute was to be paid as a ransom of the soul, that there might be no plague among them. 3. This money that was raised was to be employed in the service of the tabernacle (v. 16); with it they bought sacrifices, flour, incense, wine, oil, fuel, salt, priests' garments. Note, Those that have the benefit of God's tabernacle among them must be willing to defray the expenses of it.

Verses 17–21

Orders are here given, 1. For the making of a laver, or font, of brass, a large vessel, that would contain a good quantity of water, which was to be set near the door of the tabernacle, v. 18. 2. For the using of this laver. Aaron and his sons must wash their hands and feet at this laver every time they went in to minister, every morning, at least, v. 19–21. This was designed, (1) To teach them purity in all their ministrations. He only shall stand in God's holy place that has clean hands and a pure heart, Ps. xxiv. 3, 4. And, (2) It was to teach us, who are daily to attend upon God, daily to renew our repentance for sin. Cleanse your hands and purify your hearts, and then draw nigh to God, Jam. iv. 8.

Verses 22–38

Directions are here given for the composition of the holy anointing oil and the incense that were to be used in the service of the tabernacle. 1. The holy anointing oil is here ordered to be made up; the ingredients, and their quantities, are prescribed, v. 23–25. It was to be compounded secundum artem—after the art of the apothecary (v. 25); the spices were to be infused in the oil, and then strained out, leaving an admirable sweet smell in the oil. With this oil God's tent and all the furniture of it were to be anointed; it was to be used also in the consecration of the priests, v. 26–30. Solomon was anointed with it (1 Kings i. 39), and some other of the kings; and all the high priests. Christ's name is said to be as ointment poured forth (Cant. i. 3), and the good name of Christians better than precious ointment, Eccles. vii. 1. 2. The incense which was burned upon the golden altar was prepared of sweet spices likewise, though not so rare and rich as those of which the anointing oil was compounded, v. 34, 35. 3. Concerning both these preparations the same law is here given (v. 32, 33, 37, 38), that the like should not be made for any common use.

CHAP. XXXI

God is here drawing towards a conclusion of what he had to say to Moses upon the mount, where he had now been with him forty days and forty nights, and yet no more is recorded of what was said to him in all that time than what we have read in the six chapters foregoing. In this, I. He appoints what workmen should be employed in the building and furnishing of the tabernacle, ver. 1–11. II. He repeats the law of the sabbath, and the religious observance of it, ver. 12–17. III. He delivers to him the two tables of the testimony at parting, ver. 18.

Verses 1–11

A great deal of fine work God had ordered to be done about the tabernacle; the materials the people were to provide, but who must put them into form? Moses himself was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians, but he knew not how to engrave or embroider. We may suppose that there were some very ingenious men among the Israelites; but, having lived all their days in bondage in Egypt, we cannot think they were any of them instructed in these curious arts. They knew how to make brick and work in clay, but to work in gold and in cutting diamonds was what they had never been brought up to. They had no goldsmiths or jewellers but what must be made out of masons and bricklayers? Who was sufficient for these things? But God takes care of this matter also.

I. He nominates the persons that were to be employed. 1. Bezaleel was to be the architect, or master workman, v. 2. He was of the tribe of Judah, a tribe that God delighted to honour; the grandson of Hur, probably that Hur who had helped to hold up Moses's hands (ch. xvii.). 2. Aholiab, of the tribe of Dan, is appointed next to Bezaleel, and partner with him, v. 6. Aholiab was of the tribe of Dan, which was one of the less honourable tribes, that the tribes of Judah and Levi might not be lifted up, as if they were to engross all the preferments. Hiram, who was the head workman in the building of Solomon's temple, was also of the tribe of Dan, 2 Chron. ii. 14. 3. There were others that were employed by and under these in the several operations about the tabernacle, v. 6.

II. He qualifies these persons for the service (v. 3): I have filled him with the Spirit of God; and (v. 6) in the hearts of all that are wise-hearted I have put wisdom. Note, 1. Skill in common arts and employments is the gift of God; from him are derived both the faculty and the improvement of the faculty. He teaches the husbandman discretion (Isa. xxviii. 26), and the tradesmen too; and he must have the praise of it. 2. God dispenses his gifts variously, one gift to one, another to another, and all for the good of the whole body, both of mankind and of the church. Moses was fittest of all to govern Israel, but Bezaleel was fitter than he to build the tabernacle. 3. Those whom God calls to any service he will either find, or make, fit for it. The work that was to be done here was to make the tabernacle and the utensils of it, which are here particularly reckoned up, v. 7, &c. And for this the persons employed were enabled to work in gold, and silver, and brass. When Christ sent his apostles to rear the gospel tabernacle, he poured out his Spirit upon them, to enable them to speak with tongues the wonderful works of God; not to work upon metal, but to work upon men; so much more excellent were the gifts, as the tabernacle to be pitched was a greater and more perfect tabernacle, as the apostle calls it, Heb. ix. 11.

I. A strict command for the sanctification of the sabbath day, v. 13–17. The law of the sabbath had been given them before any other law, by way of preparation (ch. xvi. 23); it had been inserted in the body of the moral law, in the fourth commandment; it had been annexed to the judicial law (ch. xxiii. 12); and here it is added to the first part of the ceremonial law, because the observance of the sabbath is indeed the hem and hedge of the whole law; where no conscience is made of that, farewell both godliness and honesty; for, in the moral law, it stands in the midst between the two tables. Verily, or nevertheless, my sabbaths you shall keep. Though they must hasten the work, yet they must not make more haste than good speed; they must not break the law of the sabbath in their haste: even tabernacle-work must give way to the sabbath-rest.

1. The nature, meaning, and intention, of the sabbath, by the declaration of which God puts an honour upon it, and teaches us to value it. Divers things are here said of the sabbath. (1) It is a sign between me and you (v. 13), and again (v. 17). The institution of the sabbath was a sign that he had distinguished them from all other people. God, by sanctifying this day among them, let them know that he sanctified them, and set them apart for himself and his service. (2) It is holy unto you (v. 14), that is, "It is designed for your benefit as well as for God's honour"; the sabbath was made for man. (3) It is the sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord, v. 15. It is separated from common use, and designed for the honour and service of God. (4) It was to be observed throughout their generations, in every age, for a perpetual covenant, v. 16.

2. The law of the sabbath. They must keep it (v. 13, 14, 16), keep it as a treasure, as a trust.

3. The reason of the sabbath; for God's laws are not only backed with the highest authority, but supported with the best reason. God's own example is the great reason, v. 17.

4. The penalty to be inflicted for the breach of this law: "Every one that defileth the sabbath, by doing any work therein but works of piety and mercy, shall be cut off from among his people (v. 14); he shall surely be put to death, v. 15.

II. The delivering of the two tables of testimony to Moses. 1. The ten commandments which God had spoken upon Mount Sinai in the hearing of all the people were now written, in perpetuam rei memoriam—for a perpetual memorial, because that which is written remains. 2. They were written in tables of stone. The law was written in tables of stone, to denote the perpetual duration of it. 3. They were written with the finger of God, that is, by his will and power immediately. It is God only that can write his law in the heart; by his Spirit, which is the finger of God, he writes his will in the fleshy tables of the heart, 2 Cor. iii. 3. 4. They were written in two tables, being designed to direct us in our duty both towards God and towards man. 5. They are called tables of testimony, because this written law testified both the will of God concerning them and his good-will towards them, and would be a testimony against them if they were disobedient.

CHAP. XXXII

It is a very lamentable interruption which the story of this chapter gives to the record of the establishment of the church, and of religion among the Jews. Things went on admirably well towards that happy settlement: God had shown himself very favourable, and the people also had seemed to be pretty tractable. Moses had now almost completed his forty days upon the mount, and, we may suppose, was pleasing himself with the thoughts of the very joyful welcome he should have to the camp of Israel at his return, and the speedy setting up of the tabernacle among them. But, behold, the measures are broken, the sin of Israel turns away those good things from them, and puts a stop to the current of God's favours; the sin that did the mischief (would you think it?) was worshipping a golden calf. The marriage was ready to be solemnized between God and Israel, but Israel plays the harlot, and so the match is broken, and it will be no easy matter to piece it again. Here is, I. The sin of Israel, and of Aaron particularly, in making the golden calf for a god (ver. 1–4), and worshipping it, ver. 5, 6. II. The notice which God gave of this to Moses, who was now in the mount with him (ver. 7, 8), and the sentence of his wrath against them, ver. 9, 10. III. The intercession which Moses immediately made for them in the mount (ver. 11–13), and the prevalency of that intercession, ver. 14. IV. His coming down from the mount, when he became an eye-witness of their idolatry (ver. 15–19), in abhorrence of which, and as an expression of just indignation, he broke the tables (ver. 19), and burnt the golden calf, ver. 20. V. The examination of Aaron about it, ver. 21–24. VI. Execution done upon the ring-leaders in the idolatry, ver. 25–29. VII. The further intercession Moses made for them, to turn away the wrath of God from them (ver. 30–32), and a reprieve granted thereupon, reserving them for a further reckoning, ver. 33, &c.

Verses 1–6

While Moses was in the mount, receiving the law from God, the people had time to meditate upon what had been delivered, but there were those among them that were contriving how to break the laws they had already received. On the thirty-ninth day of the forty, the plot broke out of rebellion against the Lord.

I. A tumultuous address which the people made to Aaron, who was entrusted with the government in the absence of Moses: Up, make us gods, which shall go before us, v. 1.

1. See the ill effect of Moses's absence from them.

2. See the fury and violence of a multitude when they are influenced and corrupted by such as lie in wait to deceive.

(1) They were weary of waiting for the promised land. They are for hastening to the land flowing with milk and honey, and cannot stay to take their religion along with them. We must first wait for God's law before we catch at his promises.

(2) They were weary of waiting for the return of Moses. As for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of Egypt, we wot not what has become of him. Observe, [1] How slightly they speak of his person—this Moses. Thus ungrateful are they to Moses, who had shown such a tender concern for them, and thus do they walk contrary to God. If he tarried long, it was because God had a great deal to say to him, for their good; he resided upon the mount as their ambassador, and he would certainly return as soon as he had finished the business he went upon; and yet they make this the colour for their wicked proposal. Misinterpretations of our Redeemer's delays are the occasion of a great deal of wickedness. Our Lord Jesus has gone up into the mount of glory, where he is appearing in the presence of God for us, but out of our sight; the heavens must contain him, must conceal him, that we may live by faith. Weariness in waiting betrays us to a great many temptations. Israel here, if they could but have stayed one day longer, would have seen what had become of Moses.

(3) They were weary of waiting for a divine institution of religious worship among them. They were told that they must serve God in this mountain, but, because that was not appointed them so soon as they wished, they would set their own wits on work to devise signs of God's presence with them, and would glory in them, and have a worship of their own invention, probably such as they had seen among the Egyptians. To say, Moses is lost, make us a god, was the greatest absurdity imaginable. Make us gods, which shall go before us! Gods! How many would they have? Is not one sufficient? Make us gods! and what good would gods of their own making do them?

II. Here is the demand which Aaron makes of their jewels thereupon: Bring me your golden ear-rings, v. 2. We do not find that he said one word to discountenance their proposal, but seemed to approve the motion, and showed himself not unwilling to humour them in it. One would hope he designed, at first, only to make a jest of it, and, by setting up a ridiculous image among them, to expose the motion, and show them the folly of it. Some charitably suppose that when Aaron told them to break off their ear-rings, and bring them to him, he did it with design to crush the proposal, believing that though their coveteousness would have let them lavish gold out of the bag to make an idol of (Isa. xlvi. 6), yet their pride would not have suffered them to part with their golden ear-rings.

III. Here is the making of the golden calf, v. 3, 4. 1. The people brought in their ear-rings to Aaron, whose demand of them, instead of discouraging the motion, perhaps did rather gratify their superstition, and beget in them a fancy that the gold taken from their ears would be the most acceptable, and would make the most valuable god. 2. Aaron melted down their rings, and, having a mould prepared for the purpose, poured the melted gold into it, and then produced it in the shape of an ox or calf. Some think that Aaron chose this figure, for a sign or token of the divine presence, because he thought the head and horns of an ox a proper emblem of the divine power, and yet, being so plain and common a thing, he hoped the people would not be so sottish as to worship it. But it is probable that they had learnt of the Egyptians thus to represent the Deity, for it is said (Ezek. xx. 8), They did not forsake the idols of Egypt, and (ch. xxiii. 8), Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox (Ps. cvi. 20), and proclaimed their own folly, beyond that of other idolaters, who worshipped the host of heaven.

IV. Having made the calf in Horeb, they worshipped the graven image, Ps. cvi. 19. Aaron, seeing the people fond of their calf, was willing yet further to humour them, and he built an altar before it, and proclaimed a feast to the honour of it (v. 5), a feast of dedication. Yet he calls it a feast to Jehovah; for, brutish as they were, they did not imagine that this image was itself a god, but they made it for a representation of the true God, whom they intended to worship in and through this image. The people are forward enough to celebrate this feast (v. 6): They rose up early on the morrow, to show how well pleased they were with the solemnity, and, according to the ancient rites of worship, they offered sacrifice to this new-made diety, and then feasted upon the sacrifice; thus having, at the expense of their ear-rings, made their god, they endeavour, at the expense of their beasts, to make this god propitious. Now, 1. It was strange that any of the people, especially so great a number of them, should do such a thing. Had they not, but the other day, in this very place, heard the voice of the Lord God speaking to them out of the midst of the fire, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image? Nay, had they not themselves solemnly entered into covenant with God, and promised that all that which he had said unto them they would do, and would be obedient? ch. xxiv. 7. They made a calf in Horeb, the very place where the law was given. It was otherwise with those that received the gospel; they immediately turned from idols, 1 Thess. i. 9. 2. It was especially strange that Aaron should be so deeply implicated in this sin, that he should make the calf, and proclaim the feast! Is this Aaron, who had been with Moses in the mount (ch. xix. 24; xxiv. 9), and knew that there was no manner of similitude seen there, by which they might make an image? Is he aiding and abetting in this rebellion against the Lord? How was it possible that he should ever do so sinful a thing? Either he was strangely surprised into it, and did it when he was half asleep, or he was frightened into it by the outrages of the rabble. The Jews have a tradition that his colleague Hur opposing it the people fell upon him and stoned him (and therefore we never read of him after) and that this frightened Aaron into a compliance.

Here, I. God acquaints Moses with what was doing in the camp while he was absent, v. 7, 8. God says to Moses concerning this sin, 1. That they had corrupted themselves. Sin is the corruption or depravation of the sinner, and it is a self-corruption. 2. That they had turned aside out of the way. Sin is a deviation from the way of our duty into a by-path. 3. That they had turned aside quickly after the law was given them and they had promised to obey it. 4. He tells him particularly what they had done: They have made a calf, and worshipped it. Those sins which are concealed from our governors are naked and open before God. We could not bear to see the thousandth part of that provocation which God sees every day and yet keeps silence. 5. He seems to disown them, in saying to Moses, They are thy people whom thou broughtest up out of the land of Egypt. Those that corrupt themselves not only shame themselves, but even make God himself ashamed of them and of his kindness to them. 6. He sends him down to them with all speed: Go, get thee down.

II. He expresses his displeasure against Israel for this sin, v. 9, 10. 1. He gives this people their true character: "It is a stiff-necked people." The righteous God sees, not only what we do, but what we are. 2. He declares what was their just desert—that his wrath should wax hot against them. Sin exposes us to the wrath of God; and that wrath, if it be not allayed by divine mercy, will burn us up as stubble. 3. He holds out inducements to Moses not to intercede for them: Therefore, let me alone. Thus he would put an honour upon prayer, intimating that nothing but the intercession of Moses could save them from ruin.

III. Moses earnestly intercedes with God on their behalf (v. 11–13): he besought the Lord his God. If God would not be called the God of Israel, yet he hoped he might address him as his own God. He wisely took the hint which God gave him when he said, Let me alone, which, though it seemed to forbid his interceding, did really encourage it, by showing what power the prayer of faith has with God. Observe, 1. His prayer (v. 12): Turn from thy fierce wrath; not as if he thought God was not justly angry, but he begs that he would not be so greatly angry as to consume them. 2. His pleas. He fills his mouth with arguments, not to move God, but to express his own faith and to excite his own fervency in prayer. He urges, (1) God's interest in them, the great things he had already done for them. God had said to Moses (v. 7), They are thy people, whom thou broughtest up out of Egypt; but Moses humbly turns them back upon God again: "They are thy people, thou art their Lord and owner; I am but their servant. Thou broughtest them forth out of Egypt. I was but the instrument in thy hand. "Thou broughtest them out of Egypt, though they were unworthy, and had there served the gods of the Egyptians, Josh. xxiv. 15. If thou didst that for them, notwithstanding their sins in Egypt, wilt thou undo it for their sins of the same nature in the wilderness?" (2) He pleads the concern of God's glory (v. 12): Wherefore should the Egyptians say, For mischief did he bring them out? He cannot bear to hear God reflected on, and therefore this he insists upon, Lord, what will the Egyptians say? If a people so strangely saved should be suddenly ruined, what would the world say of it, especially the Egyptians, who have such an implacable hatred both to Israel and to the God of Israel? They would say, "God was either weak, and could not, or fickle, and would not, complete the salvation he began." What will the Egyptians say? We ought always to be careful that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed through us. (3) He pleads God's promise to the patriarchs that he would multiply their seed, and give them the land of Canaan. God's promises are to be our pleas in prayer.

IV. God graciously abated the rigour of the sentence, and repented of the evil he thought to do (v. 14). See here, 1. The power of prayer; God suffers himself to be prevailed with by the humble believing importunity of intercessors. 2. The compassion of God towards poor sinners, and how ready he is to forgive.

I. The favour of God to Moses, in trusting him with the two tables of the testimony, which, though of common stone, were far more valuable than all the precious stones that adorned the breastplate of Aaron.

II. The familiarity between Moses and Joshua. While Moses was in the cloud, as in the presence-chamber, Joshua continued as near as he might. When Moses came down he came with him, and not till then. Joshua, who was a military man, feared there was a noise of war in the camp, and then he would be missed; but Moses, having received notice of it from God, better distinguished the sound, and was aware that it was the voice of those that sing.

III. The great and just displeasure of Moses against Israel, for their idolatry. He resented it as an offence to God, and the scandal of his people. Moses was the meekest man on the earth, and yet when he saw the calf, and the dancing, his anger waxed hot. Note, It is no breach of the law of meekness to show our displeasure at the wickedness of the wicked. It becomes us to be cool in our own cause, but warm in God's. 1. To convince them that they had forfeited and lost the favour of God, he broke the tables, v. 19, that the sight of it might the more affect them, and fill them with confusion, when they saw what blessings they had lost. 2. To convince them that they had betaken themselves to a God that could not help them, he burnt the calf (v. 20), melted it down, and then filed it to dust; and, that the powder to which it was reduced might be taken notice of throughout the camp, he strewed it upon that water of which they all drank. That it might appear that an idol is nothing in the world (1 Cor. viii. 4), he reduced this to atoms, that it might be as near nothing as could be.

Verses 21–29

Moses, having shown his just indignation against the sin of Israel by breaking the tables and burning the calf, now proceeds to reckon with the sinners and to call them to an account, herein acting as the representative of God. Now,

I. He begins with Aaron, as God began with Adam, because he was the principal person, though not first in the transgression, but drawn into it. Observe here,

1. The just reproof Moses gives him, v. 21. And having prevailed with God for him, to save him from ruin, he here expostulates with him, to bring him to repentance. He puts Aaron upon considering, (1) What he had done to this people: Thou hast brought so great a sin upon them. The people, as the first movers, might be said to bring the sin upon Aaron; but he being a magistrate, who should have suppressed it, and yet aiding and abetting it, might truly be said to bring it upon them, because he hardened their hearts and strengthened their hands in it. (2) What moved him to it: What did this people unto thee? Men can but tempt us to sin; they cannot force us. Men can but frighten us; if we do not comply, they cannot hurt us.

2. The frivolous excuse Aaron makes for himself. (1) He deprecates the anger of Moses only, whereas he should have deprecated God's anger in the first place: Let not the anger of my lord wax hot, v. 22. (2) He lays all the fault upon the people: They are set on mischief, and they said, Make us gods. It is natural to us to endeavour thus to transfer our guilt. Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own. (3) It is well if he did not intend a reflection upon Moses, as accessory to the sin, by staying so long on the mount, in repeating, without need, that invidious surmise of the people, As for this Moses, we know not what has become of him, v. 23. (4) He extenuates and conceals his own share in the sin, and childishly insinuates that when he cast the gold into the fire it came out in this shape; but not a word of his graving and fashioning it, v. 24.

II. The people are next to be judged for this sin. The approach of Moses turned their dancing into trembling. Those that hectored Aaron into a compliance with them in their sin durst not look Moses in the face.

1. How they were exposed to shame by their sin: The people were naked (v. 25), not so much because they had some of them lost their ear-rings, but because they had lost their integrity. It was a shame to them, and a perpetual blot, that they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox. Thus were they made naked, stripped of their ornaments, and exposed to contempt.

2. The course that Moses took to roll away this reproach, not by concealing the sin, or putting any false colour upon it, but by punishing it, and so bearing a public testimony against it.

(1) By whom vengeance was taken—by the children of Levi (v. 26, 28); not by the immediate hand of God himself, as on Nadab and Abihu, but by the sword of man, to teach them that idolatry was an iniquity to be punished by the judge, being a denial of the God that is above, Job. xxxi. 28; Deut. xiii. 9. The innocent must be culled out to be the executioners of the guilty. Now here we are told, [1] How the Levites were called out to this service. Moses clad himself with zeal as with a robe, and summoned all those to appear forthwith that were on God's side, against the golden calf. Who is on the Lord's side? The interest of sin and wickedness is the devil's interest, and all wicked people side with that interest; the interest of truth and holiness is God's interest, with which all godly people side; and it is a case that will not admit a neutrality. [2] How they were commissioned for this service (v. 27): Slay every man his brother, that is, "Slay all those that you know to have been active for the making and worshipping of the golden calf, though they were your own nearest relations, or dearest friends." Yet, it should seem, they were to slay those only whom they found abroad in the streets of the camp; for it might be hoped that those who had retired into their tents were ashamed of what they had done, and were upon their knees, repenting.

(2) On whom vengeance is taken: There fell of the people that day about 3,000 men, v. 28. Probably these were but few, in comparison with the many that were guilty; but these were the men that headed the rebellion, and were therefore picked out, to be made examples of, for terror to all others.

Verses 30-35

Moses, having executed justice upon the principal offenders, is here dealing both with the people and with God.

I. With the people, to bring them to repentance, v. 30.

1. When some were slain, lest the rest should imagine that, because they were exempt from the capital punishment, they were therefore looked upon as free from guilt, Moses here tells the survivors, You have sinned a great sin. To affect them with the greatness of their sin he intimates to them what a difficult thing it would be to make up the quarrel which God had with them for it. The malignity of sin appears in the price of pardons.

2. Yet it was some encouragement to the people (when they were told that they had sinned a great sin) to hear that Moses would go up unto the Lord to make atonement for them. Christ, the great Mediator, went upon greater certainty than this, for he had laid in the bosom of the Father, and perfectly knew all his counsels.

II. He intercedes with God for mercy. Observe,

1. How pathetic his address was. Moses returned unto the Lord, not to receive further instructions about the tabernacle. Moses in this address expresses, (1) His great detestation of the people's sin, v. 31. Oh! this people have sinned a great sin. God had first told him of it (v. 7), and now he tells God of it, by way of lamentation. He does not go about to excuse or extenuate the sin; but what he had said to them by way of conviction he says to God by way of confession: They have sinned a great sin; he came not to make apologies, but to make atonement. (2) His great desire of the people's welfare (v. 32): Yet now it is not too great a sin for infinite mercy to pardon, and therefore if thou wilt forgive their sin. It is an abrupt expression, If thou wilt forgive, is as much as, "O that thou wouldest forgive!" as Luke xix. 42, If thou hadst known is, O that thou hadst known. "But if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written"; that is, "If they must be cut off, let me be cut off with them, and cut short of Canaan; if all Israel must perish, I am content to perish with them; let not the land of promise be mine by survivorship." Thus he expresses his tender affection for the people, and is a type of the good Shepherd, that lays down his life for the sheep (John x. 11), who was to be cut off from the land of the living for the transgression of my people, Isa. liii. 8; Dan. ix. 26. He is also an example of public-spiritedness to all, especially to those in public stations.

2. Observe how prevalent his address was. God would not take him at his word; no, he will not blot any out of his book but those that by their wilful disobedience have forfeited the honour of being enrolled in it (v. 33). This was also an intimation of mercy to the people. Further, in answer to the address of Moses, (1) God promises to go on with his intention of giving them the land of Canaan. Therefore he sends Moses back to them to lead them, though they were unworthy of him, and promises that his angel should go before them. (2) Yet he threatens to remember this sin against them when hereafter he should see cause to punish them for other sins. The Jews have a saying, grounded on this, that henceforward no judgment fell upon Israel but there was in it an ounce of the powder of the golden calf. Stephen says that when they made a calf, and offered sacrifice to the idol, God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven (Acts vii. 41, 42); so that the strange addictedness of that people to the sin of idolatry was a just judgment upon them for making and worshipping the golden calf, and a judgment they were never quite freed from till the captivity of Babylon. See Rom. i. 23–25. Aaron was not plagued, but the people; for his was a sin of infirmity, theirs a presumptuous sin.

CHAP. XXXIII

In this chapter we have a further account of the mediation of Moses between God and Israel, for the making up of the breach that sin had made between them. I. He brings a very humbling message from God to them (ver. 1–3, 5), which helps to prepare them for mercy, ver. 4, 6. II. He settles a correspondence between God and them, ver. 7–11. III. He is earnest with God in prayer, and prevails, 1. For a promise of his presence with the people, ver. 12–17. 2. For a sight of his glory for himself, ver. 18, &c.

Here is, I. The message which God sent by Moses to the children of Israel. 1. He applies to them a mortifying name, by giving them their just character —a stiff-necked people, v. 3, 5. God would have brought them under the yoke of his law, and into the bond of his covenant, but their necks were too stiff to bow to them. Note, God judges of men by the temper of their minds. We know what man does; God knows what he is: we know what proceeds from man; God knows what is in man, and nothing is more displeasing to him than stiff-neckedness. 2. He tells them what they deserved. Had he dealt with them according to their sins, he had taken them away with a swift destruction. 3. He bids them depart and go up hence to the land of Canaan, v. 1. 4. Though he promises to make good his covenant with Abraham, in giving them Canaan, yet he denies them the extraordinary tokens of his presence. "I will send an angel before thee, for thy protector, otherwise the evil angels would soon destroy thee; but I will not go up in the midst of thee, lest I consume thee" (v. 2, 3). Justice said, "Cut them off, and consume them." Mercy said, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" Hos. xi. 8. Well, says God, put off thy ornaments, that I may know what to do with thee; that is, "Put thyself into the posture of a penitent, that mercy may rejoice against judgment," v. 5. Note, Calls to repentance are plain indications of mercy designed.

II. The people's melancholy reception of this message. 1. They mourned (v. 4), for their sin which had provoked God to withdraw from them, and mourned for this as the sorest punishment of their sin. Note, Of all the bitter fruits and consequences of sin, that which true penitents most lament, and dread most, is God's departure from them. 2. In token of great shame and humiliation, those that were undressed did not put on their ornaments (v. 4), and those that were dressed stripped themselves of their ornaments, by the mount; as some read it, at a distance from the mount (v. 6), standing afar off like the publican, Luke xviii. 13.

Verses 7–11

Here is, I. One mark of displeasure put upon them for their further humiliation: Moses took the tabernacle, the tent wherein he gave audience, heard causes, and enquired of God, the guild-hall (as it were) of their camp, and pitched it without, afar off from the camp (v. 7), to signify to them that they had rendered themselves unworthy of it, and that, unless peace was made, it would return to them no more.

II. Many encouragements given them, notwithstanding, to hope that God would yet be reconciled to them.

1. Though the tabernacle was removed, yet every one that was disposed to seek the Lord was welcome to follow it, v. 7. A place was appointed for them to go to without the camp, to solicit God's return to them. When God designs mercy, he stirs up prayer.

2. Moses undertook to mediate between God and Israel. He went out to the tabernacle, the place of treaty, probably pitched between them and the mount (v. 8), and he entered into the tabernacle, v. 9.

3. The people seemed to be in a very good mind and well disposed towards a reconciliation. (1) When Moses went out to go to the tabernacle, the people looked after him (v. 8), in token of their respect to him whom before they had slighted, and their entire dependence upon his mediation. (2) When they saw the cloudy pillar, that symbol of God's presence, they all worshipped, every man at his tent door, v. 10. Their worshipping in their tent doors declared plainly that they were not ashamed publicly to own their respect to God and Moses, as they had publicly worshipped the calf.

4. God was, in Moses, reconciling Israel to himself, and manifested himself very willing to be at peace. (1) God met Moses at the place of treaty, v. 9. If our hearts go forth towards God to meet him he will graciously come down to meet us. (2) God talked with Moses (v. 9), spoke to him face to face, as a man speaks to his friend (v. 11), which intimates that God revealed himself to Moses, not only with greater clearness and evidence of divine light than to any other of the prophets, but also with greater expressions of particular kindness and grace. Moses turned again into the camp, but, because he intended speedily to return to the tabernacle of the congregation, he left Joshua there, for it was not fit that the place should be empty, so long as the cloud of glory stood at the door (v. 9).

Moses, having returned to the door of the tabernacle, becomes a humble and importunate supplicant there for two very great favours.

1. He is very earnest with God for a grant of his presence with Israel in the rest of their march to Canaan, notwithstanding their provocations. Observe how admirably Moses orders this cause before God: how he pleads, and how he speeds.

1. How he pleads. (1) He insists upon the commission God had given him to bring up this people, v. 12. This he begins with: "Lord, it is thou thyself that employest me; and wilt thou not own me? (2) He improves the interest he himself had with God, and pleads God's gracious expressions of kindness to him: Thou hast said, I know thee by name. Now, therefore, says Moses, if it be indeed so, that I have found grace in thy sight, show me thy way, v. 13. By this therefore he takes hold on God: "Lord, if ever thou wilt do anything for me, do this for the people." Thus our Lord Jesus, in his intercession, presents himself to the Father, as one in whom he is always well pleased, and so obtains mercy for us with whom he is justly displeased; and we are accepted in the beloved. (3) He insinuates that the people also, though most unworthy, yet were in some relation to God: "Consider that this nation is thy people, a people that thou hast done great things for, redeemed to thyself, and taken into covenant with thyself; Lord, they are thy own, do not leave them." The offended father considers this, "My child is foolish and froward, but he is my child, and I cannot abandon him." (4) He expresses the great value he had for the presence of God. When God said, My presence shall go with thee, he caught at that word, as that which he could not live and move without: If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence," v. 15. (5) He concludes with an argument taken from God's glory (v. 16): "Wherein shall it be known to the nations that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight, so as to be separated from all people upon earth? How will it appear that we are indeed thus honoured? Is it not in that thou goest with us?"

2. Observe how he speeds. He obtained an assurance of God's favour, (1) To himself (v. 14): I will give thee rest. Moses never entered Canaan, and yet God made good his word that he would give him rest, Dan. xii. 13. (2) To the people for his sake. Gracious generous souls think it not enough to get to heaven themselves, but would have all their friends go thither too. God grants as long as he asks, gives liberally, and does not upbraid him. See the power of prayer, and be quickened hereby to ask, and seek, and knock, and to continue instant in prayer, to pray always and not to faint. See, in type, the prevalency of Christ's intercession, which he ever lives to make for all those that come to God by him, and the ground of that prevalency. It is purely his own merit, not any thing in those for whom he intercedes; it is because thou hast found grace in my sight. And now the matter is settled, God is perfectly reconciled to them, his presence in the pillar of cloud returns to them and shall continue with them; all is well again, and henceforth we hear no more of the golden calf.

II. Having gained this point, he next begs a sight of God's glory, and is heard in this matter also.

1. The humble request Moses makes: I beseech thee, show me thy glory, v. 18. Moses had wonderfully prevailed with God for one favour after another, and the success of his prayers emboldened him to go on still to seek God; the more he had the more he asked! "Show me thy glory; make me to see it (so the word is); "make it some way or other visible, and enable me to bear the sight of it." Not that he was so ignorant as to think God's essence could be seen with bodily eyes; but, having hitherto only heard a voice out of a pillar of cloud or fire, he desired to see some representation of the divine glory, such as God saw fit to gratify him with. Some think that Moses desired a sight of God's glory as a token of his reconciliation, and an earnest of that presence which he had promised them; but he knew not what he asked.

2. The gracious reply God made to this request. (1) He denied that which was not fit to be granted, and which Moses could not bear: Thou canst not see my face, v. 20. A full discovery of the glory of God would quite overpower the faculties of any mortal man in this present state, and overwhelm him, even Moses himself. There is a knowledge and enjoyment of God which must be waited for in another world, when we shall see him as he is, 1 John iii. 2. In the meantime let us adore the height of what we do know of God, and the depth of what we do not. (2) He granted that which would be abundantly satisfying. [1] He should hear what would please him (v. 19): I will make all my goodness pass before thee. He had given him wonderful instances of his goodness in being reconciled to Israel; but that was only goodness in the stream; he would show him goodness in the spring—all his goodness. This was a sufficient answer to his request. "Show me thy glory," says Moses. "I will show thee my goodness," says God. Note, God's goodness is his glory; and he will have us to know him by the glory of his mercy more than by the glory of his majesty. It is never said "I will be angry at whom I will be angry," for his wrath is always just and holy; but I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy, for his grace is always free. He never damns by prerogative, but by prerogative he saves. [2] He should see what he could bear, and what would suffice him. First, Safe in a cleft of the rock, v. 21, 22. That rock was Christ, 1 Cor. x. 4. And it is only through Christ that we have the knowledge of the glory of God. None can see his glory to their comfort but those who stand upon this rock, and take shelter in it. Secondly, He should see more of God than any ever saw on earth, but not so much as those see who are in heaven. That sight of God Moses might not have, but such a sight as we have of a man who has gone past us, so that we only see his back, and have (as we say) a blush of him. When we see what God has done in his works, observe the goings of our God, our King, we see (as it were) his back-parts. If we faithfully improve the discoveries God gives us of himself while we are here, a brighter and more glorious scene will shortly be opened to us; for to him that hath shall be given.

CHAP. XXXIV

God, having in the foregoing chapter intimated to Moses his reconciliation to Israel, here gives proofs of it, proceeding to settle his covenant and communion with them. I. The orders he gives to Moses to come up to the mount, the next morning, and bring two tables of stone with him, ver. 1–4. II. His meeting him there, and the proclamation of his name, ver. 5–9. III. The instructions he gave him there, and his converse with him for forty days together, without intermission, ver. 10–28. IV. The honour he put upon him when he sent him down with his face shining, ver. 29–35. In all this God dealt with Moses as a public person, and mediator between him and Israel, and a type of the great Mediator.

The treaty that was on foot between God and Israel being broken off abruptly, by their worshipping the golden calf, when peace was made all must be begun anew.

I. Moses must prepare for the renewing of the tables, v. 1. Thus, in the first writing of the law upon the heart of man in innocency, both the tables and the writing were the work of God; but when those were broken and defaced by sin, and the divine law was to be preserved in the scriptures, God therein made use of the ministry of man, and Moses first. But the prophets and apostles did only hew the tables, as it were; the writing was God's still, for all scripture is given by inspiration of God. Observe, When God was reconciled to them, he ordered the tables to be renewed, and wrote his law in them, which plainly intimates to us, 1. That even under the gospel of peace and reconciliation by Christ (of which the intercession of Moses was typical) the moral law should continue to bind believers. When our Saviour, in his sermon on the mount, expounded the moral law, and vindicated it from the corrupt glosses with which the scribes and Pharisees had broken it (Matt. v. 19), he did in effect renew the tables, and make them like the first, that is, reduce the law to its primitive sense and intention. 2. That the best evidence of the pardon of sin and peace with God is the writing of the law in the heart. 3. That, if we would have God to write the law in our hearts, we must prepare our hearts for the reception of it.

II. Moses must attend again on the top of mount Sinai, and present himself to God there, v. 2. Moses, accordingly, rose up early (v. 4), to go to the place appointed. It is good to be early at our devotions. The morning is perhaps as good a friend to the graces as it is to the muses.

Verses 5–9

No sooner had Moses got to the top of the mount than God gave him the meeting (v. 5): The Lord descended, by some sensible token of his presence, and manifestation of his glory. He descended in the cloud. His making a cloud his pavilion intimated that, though he made known much of himself, yet there was much more concealed.

I. How God proclaimed his name (v. 6, 7): he did it in transitu—as he passed by him. Fixed views of God are reserved for the future state; the best we have in this world are transient. God now was performing what he had promised Moses, the day before, that his glory should pass by, ch. xxxiii. 22. He proclaimed the name of the Lord, by which he would make himself known. He had made himself known to Moses in the glory of his self-existence and self-sufficiency when he proclaimed that name, I am that I am; now he makes himself known in the glory of his grace, and goodness, and all-sufficiency to us. This is prefixed before the display of his mercy, to teach us to think and to speak even of God's grace and goodness with great seriousness and a holy awe. His greatness and goodness illustrate and set off each other. Many words are here heaped up, to acquaint us with, and convince us of, God's goodness. 1. He is merciful. This bespeaks his tender compassion, like that of a father to his children. 2. He is gracious. His mercy is grace, free grace; this teaches us to be not only pitiful, but courteous, 1 Pet. iii. 8. 3. He is long-suffering, that is, he is slow to anger, and delays the execution of his justice; he waits to be gracious, and lengthens out the offers of his mercy. 4. He is abundant in goodness and truth. It bespeaks promised goodness, goodness and truth put together, goodness engaged by promise, and his faithfulness pledged for the security of it. 5. He keepeth mercy for thousands. 6. He forgiveth iniquity, transgression, and sin. Pardoning mercy is specified, because it is this which opens the door to all other gifts of his divine grace.

II. How Moses received this declaration which God made of himself, and of his grace and mercy. It should seem as if Moses accepted this as a sufficient answer to his request that God would show him his glory. Now we are here told,

1. What impression it made upon him: Moses made haste, and bowed his head, v. 8.

2. What improvement he made of it. He immediately grounded a prayer upon it (v. 9); and a most earnest affectionate prayer it is, (1) For the presence of God with his people Israel in the wilderness: "I pray thee, go among us, for thy presence is all in all to our safety and success." (2) For pardon of sin: "O pardon our iniquity and our sin, else we cannot expect thee to go among us." And, (3) For the privileges of a peculiar people: "Take us for thy inheritance." These things God had already promised, and given Moses assurances of, and yet he prays for them, not as doubting the sincerity of God's grants, but as one solicitous for the ratification of them. Those who have some good hopes, through grace, that their sins are pardoned, must yet continue to pray for pardon, for the renewing of their pardon, and the clearing of it more and more to their souls. Thus Moses, like a man of a truly public spirit, intercedes even for the children that should be born. But it is a strange plea he urges: For it is a stiff-necked people. God had given this as a reason why he would not go along with them, ch. xxxiii. 3. "Yea," says Moses, "the rather go along with us; for the worse they are the more need they have of thy presence and grace to make them better."

Verses 10–17

Reconciliation being made, a covenant of friendship is here settled between God and Israel. The traitors are not only pardoned, but preferred and made favourites again. Well may the assurances of this be ushered in with a behold, a word commanding attention and admiration: Behold, I make a covenant.

1. God's part of this covenant, what he would do for them, v. 10, 11. (1) In general: Before all thy people, I will do marvels. Marvels indeed, for they were without precedent, such as have not been done in all the earth. They were the joy of Israel, and the confirmation of their faith: Thy people shall see, and own the work of the Lord. And they were the terror of their enemies: It is a terrible thing that I will do. Nay, even God's own people should see them with astonishment. 2. In particular: I drive out before thee the Amorite.

II. Their part of the covenant: Observe that which I command thee, We cannot expect the benefit of the promises unless we make conscience of the precepts.

Thou shalt worship no other gods (v. 14), not give divine honour to any creature, or any name whatsoever, the creature of fancy. Those cannot worship God aright who do not worship him alone. That they might not be tempted to worship other gods, they must not join in affinity or friendship with those that did (v. 12). Make no covenant with the inhabitants of the land. If God, in kindness to them, drove out the Canaanites, they ought, in duty to God, not to harbour them. They must particularly take heed of intermarrying with them, v. 15, 16. If they espoused their children, they would be in danger of espousing their gods. That they might not be tempted to make molten gods, they must utterly destroy those they found and all that belong to them, the altars and groves (v. 13).

Verses 18–27

Several appointments relating to their solemn feasts. When they had made the calf, they proclaimed a feast in honour of it; now, that they might never do so again, they are here charged with the observance of the feasts which God had instituted. Note, Men need not be drawn from their religion by the temptation of mirth, for we serve a Master that has abundantly provided for the joy of his servants.

I. Once a week they must rest (v. 21), even in earing time, and in harvest, the most busy times of the year. Harvest-work will prosper the better for the religious observance of the sabbath day in harvest time.

II. Thrice a year they must feast (v. 23); they must then appear before the Lord God, the God of Israel. The country would be left exposed to the insults of their neighbours; and what would become of the poor women and children, and sick and aged, that were left at home? Trust God with them (v. 24): Neither shall any man desire thy land; not only they shall not invade it, but they shall not so much as think of invading it. The way of duty is the way of safety.

III. The three feasts are here mentioned, with their appendages. 1. The passover, and the feast of unleavened bread, in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt; and to this is annexed the law of the redemption of the first-born, v. 18–20. This feast was instituted, ch. xii. 13, and urged again, ch. xxiii. 15. 2. The feast of weeks, that is, that of pentecost, seven weeks after the passover; and to this is annexed the law of the first-fruits. 3. The feast of in-gathering at the year's end, which was the feast of tabernacles (v. 22): of these also he had spoken before, ch. xxiii. 16.

IV. These laws are here repeated to show that not one jot or tittle of the law should pass away. And in the close, 1. Moses is ordered to write these words (v. 27), that the people might be the better acquainted with them by a frequent perusal, and that they might be transmitted to the generations to come. We can never be thankful enough to God for the written word. 2. He is told that according to the tenor of these words God would make a covenant with Moses and Israel; not with Israel immediately, but with them in Moses as mediator.

Verses 28–35

I. The continuance of Moses in the mount, where he was miraculously sustained, v. 28. When we are weary of an hour or two spent in attendance upon God and adoration of him, we should think how many days and nights Moses spent with him. So long he continued without meat and drink (and probably without sleep too), for, 1. The power of God supported him, that he did not need it. 2. He had meat to eat which the world knew not of, for it was his meat and drink to hear the word of God and pray. When God would treat his favourite Moses, it was not with meat and drink, but with his light, law and love, with the knowledge of himself and his will. As Moses, so Elijah and Christ, fasted forty days and forty nights.

II. The coming down of Moses from the mount, greatly enriched and miraculously adorned.

1. He came down enriched with the best treasure; for he brought in his hands the two tables of the law.

2. He came down adorned with the best beauty; for the skin of his face shone, v. 29.

(1) This may be looked upon, [1] As a great honour done to Moses, that the people might never again question his mission. He carried his credentials in his very countenance, The Israelites could not look him in the face but they must there read his commission. Yet, after this, they murmured against him. [2] It was also a great favour to the people, and an encouragement to them, that God put this glory upon him, who was their intercessor, thereby giving them assurance that he was accepted, and they through him. [3] It was the effect of his sight of God. When we have been in the mount with God, we should let our light shine before men, that all we converse with may take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus, Acts iv. 13.

(2) Concerning the shining of Moses's face observe here, [1] Moses was not aware of it himself: He wist not that the skin of his face shone, v. 29. Whatever beauty God puts upon us, we should still be filled with such a humble sense of our own unworthiness, and manifold infirmities, as will make us even overlook and forget that which makes our faces shine. [2] Aaron and the children of Israel saw it, and were afraid, v. 30. Probably they doubted whether it were a token of God's favour or of his displeasure; being conscious of guilt, they feared the worst. [3] Moses put a veil upon his face, when he perceived that it shone, v. 33, 35. This teaches us all a lesson of modesty and humility. [4] When Moses went in before the Lord, to speak with him in the tabernacle of meeting, he put off the veil, v. 34. Then there was no occasion for it, and, before God, every man does and must appear unveiled. This signified also, as it is explained (2 Cor. iii. 16), that when a soul turns to the Lord the veil shall be taken away, that with open face it may behold his glory.

CHAP. XXXV

What should have been said and done upon Moses's coming down the first time from the mount now at last, when with great difficulty reconciliation was made, begins to be said and done. I. Moses gives Israel those instructions, received from God, which required immediate observance. 1. Concerning the sabbath, ver. 1–3. 2. Concerning the contribution that was to be made for the erecting of the tabernacle, ver. 4–9. 3. Concerning the framing of the tabernacle and the utensils of it, ver. 10–19. II. The people bring in their contributions, ver. 20–29. III. The head-workmen are nominated, ver. 30, &c.

Verses 1–19

The erecting and furnishing of the tabernacle being the work to which they were now immediately to apply themselves, here is particular mention of the orders given concerning it.

I. All the congregation is summoned to attend (v. 1).

II. Moses gave them in charge all that which God had commanded him. Both sides having reposed a trust in him, he was true to the trust; yet he was faithful as a servant only, but Christ as a Son, Heb. iii. 5, 6.

III. He begins with the law of the sabbath, Six days shall work be done, work for the tabernacle, but on the seventh day you must not strike a stroke. It is a sabbath of rest. It is a sabbath of sabbaths (so some read it), more honourable and excellent than any of the other feasts, and should survive them all. A sabbath of sabbatism, so others read it, being typical of that sabbatism or rest, both spiritual and eternal, which remains for the people of God, Heb. iv. 9. It is a sabbath and a little sabbath, so some of the Jews would have it read; not only observing the whole day as a sabbath, but an hour before the beginning of it, and an hour after the ending of it, a little sabbath, to show how glad they are of the approach of the sabbath and how loth to part with it.

IV. He orders preparation to be made for the setting up of the tabernacle. Two things were to be done:—

1. All that were able must contribute: Take you from among you an offering, v. 5. The rule is, Whosoever is of a willing heart let him bring. It was not to be a tax imposed upon them, but a benevolence or voluntary contribution, to intimate to us, (1) That God has not made our yoke heavy. (2) That God loves a cheerful giver, and is best pleased with the free-will offering. Those services are acceptable to him that come from the willing heart of a willing people, Ps. cx. 3.

2. All that were skilful must work: Every wise-hearted among you shall come, and make, v. 10. See how God dispenses his gifts variously; and, as every man hath received the gift, so he must minister, 1 Pet. iv. 10. Those that were rich must bring in materials to work on; those that were ingenious must serve the tabernacle with their ingenuity; as they needed one another, so the tabernacle needed them both, 1 Cor. xii. 7–21.

Verses 20–29

I. The offerings that were brought for the service of the tabernacle (v. 21, &c.). 1. It is intimated that they brought their offerings immediately. No season will be more convenient than the present season. 2. It is said that their spirits made them willing (v. 21), and their hearts, v. 29. 3. When it is said that as many as were willing-hearted brought their offerings (v. 22), it should seem as if there were some who were not, who loved their gold better than their God, and would not part with it, no, not for the service of the tabernacle. They are for the true religion, provided it be cheap and will cost them nothing. 4. The offerings were of divers kinds, according as they had. Those that had not precious stones to bring brought goats' hair, and rams' skins. Two mites from a pauper were more pleasing than so many talents from a Dives. God has an eye to the heart of the giver more than to the value of the gift. 5. Many of the things they offered were their ornaments, bracelets, and rings, and tablets or lockets (v. 22); and even the women parted with these. If we think those gospel rules concerning our clothing too strict (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10; 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4), I fear we should scarcely have done as these Israelites did. These rich things that they offered, we may suppose, were mostly the spoils of the Egyptians. Who would have thought that even the wealth of Egypt should have been so well employed? Let every man give according as God hath prospered him, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Extraordinary successes should be acknowledged by extraordinary offerings. But then great care must be taken that Egypt's gods mingle not with Egypt's gold.

II. The work that was done for the service of the tabernacle (v. 25): The women did spin with their hands. Some spun fine work, of blue and purple; others coarse work, of goats' hair, and yet theirs also is said to be done in wisdom, v. 26. As it is not only rich gifts, so it is not only fine work that God accepts. Notice is here taken of the good women's work for God, as well as of Bezaleel's and Aholiab's. Mary's anointing of Christ's head shall be told for a memorial (Matt. xxvi. 13); and a record is kept of the women that laboured in the gospel tabernacle (Phil. iv. 3), and were helpers to Paul in Christ Jesus, Rom. xvi. 3. The poor may relieve the poor, and those that have nothing but their limbs and senses may be very charitable in the labour of love.

Verses 30–35

Here is the divine appointment of the master-workmen, that there might be no strife for the office. God is the God of order and not of confusion. 1. Those whom God called by name to this service he filled with the Spirit of God, to qualify them for it, v. 30, 31. Skill in secular employments is God's gift, and comes from above, Jam. i. 17. Thus when the apostles were appointed to be master-builders in setting up the gospel tabernacle they were filled with the Spirit of God in wisdom and understanding. 2. They were appointed, not only to devise, but to work (v. 32). 3. They were not only to devise and work themselves, but they were to teach others, v. 34. Not only had Bezaleel power to command, but he was to take pains to instruct. Those that rule should teach; and those to whom God has given knowledge should be willing to communicate it for the benefit of others, not coveting to monopolize it.

CHAP. XXXVI

In this chapter, I. The work of the tabernacle is begun, ver. 1–4. II. A stop is put to the people's contributions, ver. 5–7. III. A particular account is given of the making of the tabernacle itself; the fine curtains of it, ver. 8–13. The coarse ones, ver. 14–19. The boards, ver. 20–30. The bars, ver. 31–34. The partition veil, ver. 35, 36. And the hanging for the door, ver. 37, &c.

I. The workmen set in without delay. Then they wrought, v. 1. When God had qualified them for the work, then they applied themselves to it. They began when Moses called them, v. 2. Those are to be called to the building of the gospel tabernacle whom God has by his grace made in some measure fit for the work and free to engage in it. Ability and willingness (with resolution) are the two things to be regarded in the call of ministers. The materials which the people had contributed were delivered by Moses to the workmen, v. 3. Precious souls are the materials of the gospel tabernacle; they are built up a spiritual house, 1 Pet. ii. 5. To this end they are to offer themselves a free-will offering to the Lord, for his service (Rom. xv. 16), and they are then committed to the care of his ministers, as builders, to be framed and wrought upon by their edification and increase in holiness, till they all come, like the curtains of the tabernacle, in the unity of the faith to be a holy temple, Eph. ii. 21, 22; iv. 12, 13.

II. The contributions restrained. The people continued to bring free offerings every morning, v. 3. Now observe, 1. The honesty of the workmen. When they had cut out their work, and found how their stuff held out, they went in a body to Moses to tell him that there needed no more contributions, v. 4, 5. They were men of integrity, that scorned to do so mean a thing as to sponge upon the people, and enrich themselves with that which was offered to the Lord. Those are the greatest cheats that cheat the public. 2. The liberality of the people. A rare instance! Most need a spur to quicken their charity; few need a bridle to check it, yet these did.

The first work they set about was the framing of the house, not made of timber or stone, but of curtains curiously embroidered and coupled together. This served to typify the state of the church in this world, the palace of God's kingdom among men. It is mean and mutable, and in a militant state; shepherds dwelt in tents, and God is the Shepherd of Israel; soldiers dwelt in tents, and the Lord is a man of war, and his church marches through an enemy's country, and must fight its way. The kings of the earth enclose themselves in cedar (Jer. xxii. 15), but the ark of God was lodged in curtains only. Yet there is a beauty in holiness; the curtains were embroidered, so is the church adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, that raiment of needle-work, Ps. xlv. 14.

Verses 14–34

1. The shelter and special protection that the church is under are signified by the curtains of hair-cloth, which were spread over the tabernacle, and the covering of rams' skins and badgers' skins over them, v. 14–19. God has provided for his people a shadow from the heat, and a covert from storm and rain, Isa. iv. 6. Those that dwell in God's house shall find, be the tempest ever so violent, or the dropping ever so continual, it does not rain in. 2. The strength and stability of the church, though it is but a tabernacle, are signified by the boards and bars with which the curtains were borne up, v. 20–34.

Verses 35–38

1. There was a veil made for a partition between the holy place and the most holy, v. 35, 36. This signified the darkness and distance of that dispensation, compared with the New Testament, which shows us the glory of God more clearly and invites us to draw near to it. 2. There was a veil made for the door of the tabernacle, v, 37, 38. At this door the people assembled, though forbidden to enter; for, while we are in this present state, we must get as near to God as we can.

CHAP. XXXVII

Bezaleel and his workmen are still busy, making, I. The ark with the mercy-seat and the cherubim, ver. 1–9. II. The table with its vessels, ver. 10–16. III. The candlestick with its appurtenances, ver. 17–24. IV. The golden altar for incense, ver. 25–28. V. The holy oil and incense, ver. 29.

Verses 1–9

I. Moses had recorded so fully the instructions given him upon the mount for the making of all these things. Why then are so many chapters taken up with this narrative? We must consider, 1. That Moses wrote primarily for the people of Israel, to whom it would be of great use to read and hear often of these divine and sacred treasures with which they were entrusted. The great things of God's law and gospel we need to have inculcated upon us again and again. 2. Moses would thus show the great care which he and his workmen took to make every thing exactly according to the pattern shown him in the mount. Having before given us the original, he here gives us the copy, that we may compare them, and observe how exactly they agree.

II. In these verses we have an account of the making of the ark, with its glorious and most significant appurtenances, the mercy-seat and the cherubim. Consider these three together, and they represent the glory of a holy God, the sincerity of a holy heart, and the communion that is between them, in and by a Mediator.

Here is, 1. The making of the table on which the show-bread was to be continually placed. God is a good householder, that always keeps a plentiful table. Is the world his tabernacle? His providence in it spreads a table for all the creatures: he provides food for all flesh. Is the church his tabernacle? His grace in it spreads a table for all believers, furnished with the bread of life. But observe how much the dispensation of the gospel exceeds that of the law. Though here was a table furnished, it was only with show-bread, bread to be looked upon, not to be fed upon, while it was on this table, and afterwards only by the priests; but to the table which Christ has spread in the new covenant all real Christians are invited guests; and to them it is said, Eat, O friends, come eat of my bread. What the law gave but a sight of at a distance, the gospel gives the enjoyment of, and a hearty welcome to. 2. The making of the candlestick, all beaten work of pure gold only, v. 17, 22. The Bible is a golden candlestick; it is of pure gold, Ps. xix. 10. From it light is diffused to every part of God's tabernacle.

Verses 25–29

Here is, 1. The making of the golden altar, on which incense was to be burnt daily, which signified both the prayers of saints and the intercession of Christ. The rings and staves, and all the appurtenances of this altar, were overlaid with gold, as all the vessels of the table and candlestick were of gold, for these were used in the holy place. 2. The preparing of the incense which was to be burnt upon this altar, and with it the holy anointing oil (v. 29).

CHAP. XXXVIII

Here is an account, I. Of the making of the brazen altar (ver. 1–7), and the laver, ver. 8. II. The preparing of the hangings for the enclosing of the court in which the tabernacle was to stand, ver. 9–20. III. A summary of the gold, silver, and brass, that was contributed to, and used in, the preparing of the tabernacle, ver. 21, &c.

Verses 1–8

Bezaleel having finished the gold-work, which, though the richest, yet was ordered to lie most out of sight, in the tabernacle itself, here goes on to prepare the court, which lay open to the view of all. Two things the court was furnished with, and both made of brass:—

I. An altar of burnt-offering, v. 1–7. On this all their sacrifices were offered.

II. A laver, to hold water for the priests to wash in when they went in to minister, v. 8. This is here said to be made of the looking-glasses (or mirrors) of the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle.

1. It should seem these women were eminent and exemplary for devotion. Anna was such a one long afterwards, who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day, Luke ii. 37.

2. These women parted with their mirrors for the use of the tabernacle. Rather than the workmen should want brass, or not have of the best, they would part with their mirrors, though they could not do well without them.

3. These mirrors were used for the making of the laver. Either they were artfully joined together, or else molten down and cast anew.

Verses 9–20

The walls of the court, or church yard, were like the rest curtains or hangings, made according to the appointment, ch. xxvii. 9, &c. This represented the state of the Old Testament church: it was a garden enclosed; the worshippers were then confined to a little compass. But the enclosure being of curtains only intimated that the confinement of the church in one particular nation was not to be perpetual. The dispensation itself was a tabernacle-dispensation, movable and mutable, and in due time to be taken down and folded up, when the place of the tent should be enlarged and its cords lengthened, to make room for the Gentile world, as is foretold, Isa. liv. 2, 3.

Verses 21–31

Here we have a breviat of the account which, by Moses's appointment, the Levites took and kept of the gold, silver, and brass, that was brought in for the tabernacle's use, and how it was employed. Ithamar the son of Aaron was appointed to draw up this account, and was thus by less services trained up and filled for greater, v. 21. Bezaleel and Aholiab must bring in the account (v. 22, 23), and Ithamar must audit it, and give it in to Moses. And it was thus:—1. All the gold was a free will offering. 2. The silver was levied by way of tax; every man was assessed half a shekel, a kind of poll-money.

CHAP. XXXIX

This chapter gives us an account of the finishing of the work of the tabernacle. I. The last things prepared were the holy garments. The ephod and its curious girdle, ver. 1–5. The onyx-stones for the shoulders, ver. 6, 7. The breastplate with the precious stones in it, ver. 8–21. The robe of the ephod, ver. 22–26. The coats, bonnets, and breeches, for the inferior priests, ver. 27–29. And the plate of the holy crown, ver. 30, 31.

Verses 1–31

In this account of the making of the priests' garments, according to the instructions given (ch. xxviii), we may observe, 1. That the priests' garments are called here clothes of service, v. 1. It is said of those that are arrayed in white robes that they are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple, Rev. vii. 13, 15. 2. That all the six paragraphs here, which give a distinct account of the making of these holy garments, conclude with those words, as the Lord commanded Moses, v. 5, 7, 21, 26, 29, 31. It is an intimation to all the Lord's ministers to make the word of God their rule in all their ministrations, and to act in observance of and obedience to the command of God. 3. That these garments, in conformity to the rest of the furniture of the tabernacle, were very rich and splendid; the church in its infancy was thus taught, thus pleased, with the rudiments of this world. 4. That they were all shadows of good things to come, but the substance is Christ, and the grace of the gospel; when therefore the substance has come, it is a jest to be fond of the shadow. (1) Christ is our great high-priest; when he undertook the work of our redemption, he put on the clothes of service. (2) True believers are spiritual priests. The clean linen with which all their clothes of service must be made is the righteousness of saints (Rev. xix. 8).

Verses 32–43

I. The builders of the tabernacle made very good despatch. It was not much more than five months from the beginning to the finishing of it.

II. They punctually observed their orders, and did not in the least vary from them. They did it according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, v. 32, 42.

III. They brought all their work to Moses, and submitted it to his inspection and censure, v. 33. Though they knew how to do the work better than Moses, Moses had a better and more exact idea of the model than they had, and therefore they could not be well pleased with their own work, unless they had his approbation.

IV. Moses, upon search, found all done according to the rule, v. 43. Behold they had done it according to the pattern shown him, for the same Being that showed him the pattern guided their hand in the work.

V. Moses blessed them. 1. He commended them, and signified his approbation of all they had done. He did not find fault where there was none, as some do, who think they disparage their own judgment if they do not find something amiss in the best and most accomplished performance. In all this work it is probable there might have been found here and there a stitch amiss, and a stroke awry, but Moses was too candid to notice small faults where there were no great ones. 2. He not only praised them, but prayed for them.

CHAP. XL

In this chapter, I. Orders are given for the setting up of the tabernacle and the fixing of all the appurtenances of it in their proper places (ver. 1–8), and the consecrating of it (ver. 9–11), and of the priests, ver. 12–15. II. Care is taken to do all this as it was appointed to be done, ver. 16–33. III. God takes possession of it by the cloud, ver. 34, &c.

Verses 1–15

The materials and furniture of the tabernacle had been viewed severally and approved, and now they must be put together. 1. The time for doing this is fixed to the first day of the first month (v. 2). It is good to begin the year with some good work. Let him that is the first have the first; and let the things of his kingdom be first sought. In Hezekiah's time we find they began to sanctify the temple on the first day of the first month, 2 Chron. xxix. 17. Moses is particularly ordered to set up the tabernacle itself first, in which God would dwell and would be served (v. 2), then to put the ark in its place, and draw the veil before it (v. 3), then to fix the table, and the candlestick, and the altar of incense, without the veil (v. 4, 5), and to fix the hanging of the door before the door. Then in the court he must place the altar of burnt offering, and the laver (v. 6, 7); and, lastly, he must set up the curtains of the court, and a hanging for a court-gate. 2. He directs Moses, when he had set up the tabernacle and all the furniture of it, to consecrate it and them, by anointing them with the oil which was prepared for the purpose, ch. xxx. 25, &c. Everything was sanctified when it was put in its proper place. As everything is beautiful in its season, so is everything in its place. 3. He directs him to consecrate Aaron and his sons.

Verses 16–33

When the tabernacle and the furniture of it were prepared, they set it up in the midst of their camp, while they were in the wilderness.

Here we have an account of that new year's day's work. That which was to be veiled he veiled (v. 21), and that which was to be used he used immediately. What he did he did by special warrant and direction from God, rather as a prophet, or law-giver, than as a priest. He set the wheels a-going, and then left the work in the hands of the appointed ministry. (1) When he had placed the table, he set the show-bread in order upon it (v. 23). (2) As soon as he had fixed the candlestick, he lighted the lamps before the Lord, v. 25. (3) The golden altar being put in its place, immediately he burnt sweet incense thereon (v. 27). (4) The altar of burnt-offering was no sooner set up in the court of the tabernacle than he had a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, ready to offer upon it, v. 29. (5) At the laver likewise, when he had fixed that, Moses himself washed his hands and feet.

As when, in the creation, God had finished this earth, which he designed for man's habitation, he made man, and put him in possession of it, so when Moses had finished the tabernacle, which was designed for God's dwelling-place among men, God came and took possession of it. Where God has a throne and an altar in the soul, there is a living temple. Accordingly, when God descended to take possession of his house, the cloud covered it on the outside, and the glory of the Lord filled it within.

I. The cloud covered the tent. This cloud was intended to be, 1. A token of God's presence constantly visible day and night (v. 38) to all Israel, even to those that lay in the remotest corners of the camp, that they might never again make a question of it, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? 2. A concealment of the tabernacle, and the glory of God in it. God did indeed dwell among them, but he dwelt in a cloud. 3. A protection of the tabernacle. They had sheltered it with one covering upon another, but, after all, the cloud that covered it was its best guard. Those that dwell in the house of the Lord are safe under the divine protection, Ps. xxvii. 4, 5. 4. A guide to the camp of Israel in their march through the wilderness, v. 36, 37. While the cloud continued on the tabernacle, they rested; when it removed, they removed and followed it, as being purely under divine direction.

II. The glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, v. 34, 35. It was in light and fire, and (for aught we know) no otherwise, that the shechinah made itself visible; for God is light.

THE THIRD BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

LEVITICUS

There is nothing historical in all this book of Leviticus except the account which it gives us of the consecration of the priesthood (ch. viii, ix), of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, by the hand of God, for offering strange fire (ch. x.), and of Shelomith's son, by the hand of the magistrate, for blasphemy, ch. xxiv. All the rest of the book is taken up with the laws, chiefly the ecclesiastical laws, which God gave to Israel by Moses, concerning their sacrifices and offerings, their meats and drinks, and divers washings, and the other peculiarities by which God set that people apart for himself, and distinguished them from other nations, all which were shadows of good things to come, which are realized and superseded by the gospel of Christ. We call the book Leviticus, from the Septuagint, because it contains the laws and ordinances of the levitical priesthood (as it is called, Heb. vii. 11), and the ministrations of it. The Levites were principally charged with these institutions, both to do their part and to teach the people theirs. We read, in the close of the foregoing book, of the setting up of the tabernacle, which was to be the place of worship; and, as that was framed according to the pattern, so must the ordinances of worship be, which were there to be administered.

CHAP. I

This book begins with the laws concerning sacrifices, of which the most ancient were the burnt-offerings, about which God gives Moses instructions in this chapter. I. If it was a bullock out of the herd, ver. 3–9. II. If it was a sheep or goat, a lamb or kid, out of the flock, ver. 10–13. III. If it was a turtle-dove or a young pigeon, ver. 14–17. And whether the offering was more or less valuable in itself, if it was offered with an upright heart, according to these laws, it was accepted of God.

Verses 1–2

Observe here, 1. It is taken for granted that people would be inclined to bring offerings to the Lord. Revealed religion supposes natural religion to be an ancient and early institution, since the fall had directed men to glorify God by sacrifice, which was an implicit acknowledgment of their having received all from God as creatures, and their having forfeited all to him as sinners. Provision is made that men should not indulge their own fancies, nor become vain about their sacrifices, lest, while they pretended to honour God, they should really dishonour him. Everything therefore is directed to be done so that the sacrifices might be most significant both of the great sacrifice of atonement which Christ was to offer in the fulness of time and of the spiritual sacrifices of acknowledgment which believers should offer daily. God gave those laws to Israel by Moses. By other prophets God sent messages to his people, but by Moses he gave them laws. As soon as ever the shechinah had taken possession of its new habitation, God talked with Moses from the mercy-seat, while he attended without the veil, or rather at the door, hearing a voice only. The tabernacle was set up to be a place of communion between God and Israel; there, where they performed their services to God, God revealed his will to them. The moral law was given with terror from a burning mountain in thunder and lightning; but the remedial law of sacrifice was given more gently from a mercy-seat, because that was typical of the grace of the gospel, which is the ministration of life and peace.

Verses 3–9

If a man were rich and could afford it, it is supposed that he would bring his burnt-sacrifice, with which he designed to honour God, out of his herd of larger cattle. 1. The beast to be offered must be a male, and without blemish, and the best he had in his pasture. 2. The owner must offer it voluntarily. What is done in religion, so as to please God, must be done by no other constraint than that of love. 3. It must be offered at the door of the tabernacle, where the brazen altar of burnt-offerings stood, which sanctified the gift. He must offer it at the door, as one unworthy to enter, and acknowledging that there is no admission for a sinner into covenant and communion with God, but by sacrifice. 4. The offerer must put his hand upon the head of his offering, v. 4, signifying thereby, (1) The transfer of all his right to, and interest in, the beast, to God. (2) An acknowledgment that he deserved to die, and would have been willing to die if God had required it. (3) A dependence upon the sacrifice, as an instituted type of the great sacrifice on which the iniquity of us all was to be laid. Though the burnt-offerings had not respect to any particular sin, as the sin-offering had, yet they were to make atonement for sin in general. 5. The sacrifice was to be killed by the priests or Levites, before the Lord, that is, in a devout religious manner. 6. The priests were to sprinkle the blood upon the altar (v. 5); for, the blood being the life, it was this that made atonement for the soul. 7. The beast was to be flayed and decently cut up, and divided into its several joints or pieces, and then all the pieces, with the head and the fat were to be burnt together upon the altar, v. 6–9. 8. This is said to be an offering of a sweet savour, or savour of rest, unto the Lord. The burning of flesh is unsavoury in itself; but this, as an act of obedience to a divine command, and a type of Christ, was well pleasing to God: he was reconciled to the offerer. Christ's offering of himself to God is said to be of a sweet-smelling savour (Eph. v. 2), and the spiritual sacrifices of Christians are said to be acceptable to God, through Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 5.

Verses 10–17

Here we have the laws concerning the burnt-offerings, which were of the flock or of the fowls. Those of the middle rank, that could not well afford to offer a bullock, would bring a sheep or a goat; and those that were not able to do that should be accepted of God if they brought a turtle-dove or a pigeon. It is observable that those creatures were chosen for sacrifice which were most mild and gentle, harmless and inoffensive, to typify the innocence and meekness that were in Christ, and to teach the innocence and meekness that should be in Christians. Directions are here given, 1. Concerning the burnt-offerings of the flock, v. 10. The method of managing these is much the same with that of the bullocks. 2. Concerning those of the fowls. They must be either turtle-doves or pigeons, and, if so, they must be young pigeons. The poor man's turtle-doves, or young pigeons, are here said to be an offering of a sweet-smelling savour, as much as that of an ox or bullock that hath horns or hoofs. Yet, after all, to love God with all our heart, and to love our neighbour as ourselves, is better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, Mark xii. 33.

CHAP. II

In this chapter we have the law concerning the meat-offering. I. The matter of it; whether of raw flour with oil and incense (ver. 1), or baked in the oven (ver. 4), or upon a plate (ver. 5, 6), or in a frying pan, ver. 7. II. The management of it, of the flour (ver. 2, 3), of the cakes, ver. 8–10. III. Some particular rules concerning it, That leaven and honey must never be admitted (ver. 11, 12), and salt never omitted in the meat-offering, ver. 13. IV. The law concerning the offering of firstfruits in the ear, ver. 14, & c.

Verses 1–10

The law of this chapter concerns those meat-offerings that were offered by themselves, whenever a man saw cause thus to express his devotion. The first offering we read of in scripture was of this kind (Gen. iv. 3): Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering.

I. This sort of offering was appointed, 1. In condescension to the poor, and their ability, that those who themselves lived only upon bread and cakes might offer an acceptable offering to God out of that which was their own coarse and homely fare. 2. As a proper acknowledgment of the mercy of God to them in their food. This was like a quit-rent, by which they testified their dependence upon God, their thankfulness to him, and their expectations from him. Those that now, with a grateful charitable heart, deal out their bread to the hungry, offer unto God an acceptable meat-offering.

II. The laws of the meat-offerings were these:— 1. The ingredients must always be fine flour and oil, two staple commodities of the land of Canaan, Deut. viii. 8. Oil was to them then in their food what butter is now to us. 2. If it was flour unbaked, besides the oil it must have frankincense put upon it, which was to be burnt with it (v. 1, 2), for the perfuming of the altar. 3. If it was prepared, this might be done in various ways; the offerer might bake it, or fry it, or mix the flour and oil upon a plate. The law was very exact even about those offerings that were least costly. 4. It was to be presented by the offerer to the priest, which is called bringing it to the Lord (v. 8). 5. Part of it was to be burnt upon the altar, for a memorial, that is, in token of their mindfulness of God's bounty to them, in giving them all things richly to enjoy. 6. The remainder of the meat-offering was to be given to the priests, v. 3, 10. Thus God provided that those who served at the altar should live upon the altar, and live comfortably.

I. Leaven and honey are forbidden to be put in any of their meat-offerings. 1. The leaven was forbidden in remembrance of the unleavened bread they ate when they came out of Egypt. 2. Honey was forbidden, though Canaan flowed with it. Some think the chief reason why these two things, leaven and honey, were forbidden, was because the Gentiles used them very much in their sacrifices, and God's people must not learn or use the way of the heathen. Some make this application of this double prohibition: leaven signifies grief and sadness of spirit (Ps. lxxiii. 21), My heart was leavened; honey signifies sensual pleasure and mirth.

II. Salt is required in all their offerings, v. 13. The altar was the table of the Lord; and therefore, salt being always set on our tables, God would have it always used at his. It is called the salt of the covenant, because, as men confirmed their covenants with each other by eating and drinking together, at all which collations salt was used, so God, by accepting his people's gifts and feasting them upon his sacrifices, supping with them and they with him (Rev. iii. 20), did confirm his covenant with them. Among the ancients salt was a symbol of friendship. The salt for the sacrifice was not brought by the offerers, but was provided at the public charge, as the wood was, Ezra vii. 20–22. And there was a chamber in the court of the temple called the chamber of salt, in which they laid it up. Christianity is the salt of the earth.

III. Directions are given about the first-fruits. 1. The oblation of their first-fruits at harvest, of which we read, Deut. xxvi. 2. These were offered to the Lord, not to be burnt upon the altar, but to be given to the priests as perquisites of their office, v. 12. 2. A meat-offering of their first-fruits. The former was required by the law; this was a free-will offering, v. 14–16. (1) Be sure to bring the first ripe and full ears, not such as were small and half-withered. (2) These green ears must be dried by the fire, that the corn, such as it was, might be beaten out of them. (3) Oil and frankincense must be put upon it. Thus wisdom and humility must soften and sweeten the spirits and services of young people. God takes a particular delight in the first ripe fruits of the Spirit and the expressions of early piety and devotion. (4) It must be used as other meat-offerings, v. 16, compare v. 9. He shall offer all the frankincense; it is an offering made by fire. Holy love to God is the fire by which all our offerings must be made; else they are not of a sweet savour to God. Frankincense denotes the mediation and intercession of Christ, by which all our services are perfumed and recommended to God's gracious acceptance.

CHAP. III

In this chapter we have the law concerning the peace-offerings, whether they were, I Of the herd, a bullock, or a heifer, ver. 1–5. Or, II. Of the flock, either a lamb (ver. 6–11) or a goat, ver. 12–17.

Verses 1–5

The burnt-offerings were purely expressive of adoration, and therefore were wholly burnt. But the peace-offerings had regard to God as a benefactor to his creatures, and the giver of all good things to us; and therefore these were divided between the altar, the priest, and the owner. Peace signifies, 1. Reconciliation, concord, and communion. And so these were called peace-offerings, because in them God and his people did, as it were, feast together, in token of friendship. 2. It signifies prosperity and all happiness: Peace be to you was as much as, All good be to you; and so the peace-offerings were offered either, (1) By way of supplication or request for some good that was wanted and desired. Or, (2) By way of thanksgiving for some particular mercy received. It is called a peace-offering of thanksgiving, for so it was sometimes; as in other cases a vow, ch. vii. 15, 16. The sacrifice of praise shall please the Lord better than an ox.

Verses 6–17

Directions are here given concerning the peace-offering, if it was a sheep or a goat. Turtle-doves or young pigeons, which might be brought for whole burnt-offerings, were not allowed for peace-offerings, because they have not fat considerable enough to be burnt upon the altar. The laws concerning a lamb or goat offered for a peace offering are much the same with those concerning a bullock.

CHAP. IV

This chapter is concerning the sin-offering, which was properly intended to make atonement for a sin committed through ignorance, I. By the priest himself, ver. 1–12. Or, II. By the whole congregation, ver. 13–21. Or, III. By a ruler, ver. 22–26. Or, IV. By a private person, ver. 27, &c.

Verses 1–12

Here begin the statutes of another session, another day. From the throne of glory between the cherubim God delivered these orders. Burnt-offerings, meat-offerings, and peace-offerings, it should seem, had been offered before the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai.

I. The general case we have supposed, v. 2. Here observe, 1. Concerning sin in general, that it is described to be against any of the commandments of the Lord; for sin is the transgression of the law, the divine law. It is said likewise, if a soul sin, for it is not sin if it be not some way or other the soul's act; hence it is called the sin of the soul (Mic. vi. 7), and it is the soul that is injured by it, Prov. viii. 36. 2. Concerning the sins for which those offerings were appointed. (1) They are supposed to be overt acts; for, had they been required to bring a sacrifice for every sinful thought or word, the task had been endless. Atonement was made for those in the gross, on the day of expiation, once a year; but these are said to be done against the commandments. (2) They are supposed to be sins of commission, things which ought not to be done. (3) They are supposed to be sins committed through ignorance. But if the offender were either ignorant of the law, as in divers instances we may suppose many were (so numerous and various were the prohibitions), or were surprised into the sin unawares, relief was provided by the remedial law of the sin-offering.

II. The law begins with the case of the anointed priest, that is, the high priest, provided he should sin through ignorance; for the law made men priests who had infirmity. Though his ignorance was of all others least excusable, yet he was allowed to bring his offering. Now the law concerning the sin-offering for the high priest is, 1. That he must bring a bullock without blemish for a sin-offering (v. 3), as valuable an offering as that for the whole congregation (v. 14). 2. The hand of the offerer must be laid upon the head of the offering (v. 4), with a solemn penitent confession of the sin he had committed, putting it upon the head of the sin-offering, ch. xvi. 21. 3. The bullock must be killed, and a great deal of solemnity there must be in disposing of the blood; for it was the blood that made atonement, and without shedding of blood there was no remission, v. 5–7. Some of the blood of the high-priest's sin-offering was to be sprinkled seven times before the veil, with an eye towards the mercy-seat, though it was veiled: some of it was to be put upon the horns of the golden altar, because at that altar the priest himself ministered; and thus was signified the putting away of that pollution which from his sins did cleave to his services. When this was done the remainder of the blood was poured at the foot of the brazen altar. By this rite, the sinner acknowledged that he deserved to have his blood thus poured out like water. It likewise signified the pouring out of the soul before God in true repentance, and typified our Saviour's pouring out his soul unto death. 4. The fat of the inwards was to be burnt upon the altar of burnt-offering, v. 8–10. By this the intention of the offering and of the atonement made by it was directed to the glory of God, who, having been dishonoured by the sin, was thus honoured by the sacrifice.

This is the law for expiating the guilt of a national sin, by a sin-offering. If the leaders of the people, through mistake concerning the law, caused them to err, when the mistake was discovered an offering must be brought, that wrath might not come upon the whole congregation. 1. It is possible that the church may err, and that her guides may mislead her. It is here supposed that the whole congregation may sin, and sin through ignorance. God will always have a church on earth; but he never said it should be infallible, or perfectly pure from corruption on this side heaven. 2. When a sacrifice was to be offered for the whole congregation, the elders were to lay their hands upon the head of it (three of them at least), as representatives of the people and agents for them. 3. The blood of this sin-offering, as of the former, was to be sprinkled seven times before the Lord, v. 17. It was not to be poured out there, but sprinkled only; for the cleansing virtue of the blood of Christ was then and is still sufficiently signified and represented by sprinkling, Isa. lii. 15. It was to be sprinkled seven times. Seven is a number of perfection, because when God had made the world in six days he rested the seventh; so this signified the perfect satisfaction Christ made, and the complete cleansing of the souls of the faithful by it; see Heb. x. 14. When the offering is completed, it is said, atonement is made, and the sin shall be forgiven, v. 20. The promise of remission is founded upon the atonement.

Verses 22–26

Observe here, 1. That God takes notice of and is displeased with the sins of rulers. 2. The sin of the ruler which he committed through ignorance is supposed afterwards to come to his knowledge (v. 23), which must be either by the check of his own conscience or by the reproof of his friends. 3. The sin-offering for a ruler was to be a kid of the goats, not a bullock, as for the priest and the whole congregation; nor was the blood of his sin-offering to be brought into the tabernacle, as of the other two, but it was all bestowed upon the brazen altar (v. 25); nor was the flesh of it to be burnt, as that of the other two, without the camp, which intimated that the sin of a ruler, though worse than that of a common person, yet was not so heinous, nor of such pernicious consequence, as the sin of the high priest, or of the whole congregation. 4. It is promised that the atonement shall be accepted and the sin forgiven (v. 26), that is, if he repent and reform.

Verses 27–35

I. Here is the law of the sin-offering for a common person, which differs from that for a ruler only in this, that a private person might bring either a kid or a lamb, a ruler only a kid; and that for a ruler must be a male, for the other a female. 1. The case supposed: If any one of the common people sin through ignorance, v. 27. If they sin through ignorance, they must bring a sin-offering. We have all need to pray with David to be cleansed from secret faults, the errors which we ourselves do not understand or are not aware of, Ps. xix. 12. 2. That the sins of ignorance committed by a single obscure person did require a sacrifice. 3. That a sin-offering was not only admitted, but accepted, even from one of the common people, and an atonement made by it, v. 31, 35. Here rich and poor, prince and peasant, meet together; they are both alike welcome to Christ upon the same terms. See Job xxxiv. 19.

II. From all these laws concerning the sin-offerings we may learn, 1. To hate sin, and to watch against it. 2. To value Christ, the great and true sin-offering, whose blood cleanses from all sin, which it was not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away. And perhaps there was some allusion to this law concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance in that prayer of Christ's, just when he was offering up himself a sacrifice, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

This chapter, and part of the next, concern the trespass-offering. The difference between this and the sin-offering lay not so much in the sacrifices themselves as in the occasions of the offering of them. They were both intended to make atonement for sin; but the former was more general, this applied to some particular instances. Observe what is here said, I. Concerning the trespass. If a man sin, 1. In concealing his knowledge, when he is adjured, ver. 1. 2. In touching an unclean thing, ver. 2, 3. 3. In swearing, ver. 4. 4. In embezzling the holy things, ver. 14–16. 5. In any sin of infirmity, ver. 17–19. Some other cases there are, in which these offerings were to be offered, ch. vi. 2–4; xiv. 12; xix. 21; Num. vi. 12. II. Concerning the trespass-offerings, 1. Of the flock, ver. 5, 6. 2. Of fowls, ver. 7–10. 3. Of flour, ver. 11–13; but chiefly a ram without blemish, ver. 15, &c.

I. The offences here supposed are, 1. A man's concealing the truth when he was sworn as a witness to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Judges among the Jews had power to adjure not only the witnesses, as with us, but the person suspected, as appears by the high priest adjuring our Saviour, who thereupon answered, though before he stood silent, Matt. xxvi. 63, 64. Now (v. 1), If a soul sin (that is, a person, for the soul is the man), if he hear the voice of swearing (that is, if he be adjured to testify what he knows, if in such a case he refuses to give evidence, or gives it but in part, he shall bear his iniquity. Let all that are called out at any time to bear testimony think of this law, and be free and open in their evidence, and take heed of prevaricating. An oath of the Lord is a sacred thing, and not to be dallied with. 2. A man's touching anything that was ceremonially unclean, v. 2, 3. If a man, polluted by such touch, came into the sanctuary inconsiderately, or if he neglected to wash himself according to the law, then he was to look upon himself as under guilt, and must bring his offering. 3. Rash swearing. If a man bind himself by an oath that he will do or not do such a thing, and the performance of his oath afterwards proves either unlawful or impracticable, by which he is discharged from the obligation, yet he must bring an offering to atone for his folly in swearing so rashly.

II. Now in these cases, 1. The offender must confess his sin and bring his offering (v. 5, 6); and the offering was not accepted unless it was accompanied with a penitential confession and a humble prayer for pardon. 2. The priest must make an atonement for him.

Provision is here made for the poor of God's people, and the pacifying of their consciences under the sense of guilt. Those that were not able to bring a lamb might bring for a sin-offering a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons; nay, if any were so extremely poor that they were not able to procure these, they might bring a pottle of fine flour, and this should be accepted. Thus the expense of the sin-offering was brought lower than that of any other offering, to teach us that no man's poverty shall ever be a bar in the way of his pardon. No man shall say that he had not wherewithal to bear the charges of a journey to heaven.

I. If the sinner brought two doves, one was to be offered for a sin-offering and the other for a burnt-offering, v. 7. Observe, 1. Before he offered the burnt-offering, which was for the honour and praise of God, he must offer the sin-offering, to make atonement. 2. After the sin-offering, which made atonement, came the burnt-offering, as an acknowledgment of the great mercy of God in appointing and accepting the atonement.

II. If he brought fine flour, a handful of it was to be offered, but without either oil or frankincense (v. 11), not only because this would make it too costly for the poor, but because it was a sin-offering, and therefore, to show the loathsomeness of the sin for which it was offered, it must not be made grateful either to the taste by oil or to the smell by frankincense.

Verses 14–19

Here we have the law concerning those that were properly and peculiarly trespass-offerings, which were offered to atone for trespass done against a neighbour. Now injuries done to another may be either in holy things or in common things; of the former we have the law in these verses; of the latter in the beginning of the next chapter. Now if a man did alienate or convert to his own use any thing that was dedicated to God, unwittingly, he was to bring this sacrifice; as suppose he had ignorantly made use of the tithes, or first-fruits, or first-born of his cattle, or had eaten any of those parts of the sacrifices which were appropriated to the priests; this was a trespass. If it was done presumptuously, and in contempt of the law, the offender died without mercy, Heb. x. 28. But in case of negligence and ignorance this sacrifice was appointed. The trespasser must bring an offering to the Lord, which, in all those that were purely trespass-offerings, must be a ram without blemish. He must likewise make restitution to the priest, according to a just estimation of the thing which he had so alienated, adding a fifth part to it.

CHAP. VI

The first seven verses of this chapter might fitly have been added to the foregoing chapter, being a continuation of the law of the trespass-offering, and then at ver. 8 he comes to appoint the several rites and ceremonies concerning, I. The burnt-offering, ver. 8–13. II. The meat-offering (ver. 14–18), particularly that at the consecration of the priest, ver. 19–23. III. The sin-offering, ver. 24, &c.

Verses 1–7

The latter part of the law of the trespass-offering.

I. The trespass supposed, v. 2, 3. Though all the instances relate to our neighbour, yet it is called a trespass against the Lord. He that speaks evil of his brother is said to speak evil of the law, and consequently of the Law-maker, Jam. iv. 11. The trespasses specified are, 1. Denying a trust: If a man lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or, which is worse, which was lent him for his use. 2. Defrauding a partner: If a man lie in fellowship, claiming a sole interest in that wherein he has but a joint-interest. 3. Disowning a manifest wrong: If a man has the front to lie in a thing taken away by violence, which ordinarily cannot be hid. 4. Deceiving in commerce, or, as some think, by false accusation. 5. Detaining what is found, and denying it (v. 3).

II. The trespass-offering appointed. 1. In the day of his trespass-offering he must make satisfaction to his brother. Let him faithfully restore all that he has got by fraud or oppression, with a fifth part added. 2. He must then come and offer his gift, must bring his trespass-offering to the Lord whom he had offended; and the priest must make an atonement for him, v. 6, 7.

Moses was directed to give instructions to the priests; he must command Aaron and his sons, v. 9.

In these verses we have the law of the burnt-offering, as far as it was the peculiar care of the priests. The daily sacrifice of a lamb, which was offered morning and evening for the whole congregation, is here chiefly referred to.

I. The priest must take care of the ashes of the burnt-offering, that they may be decently disposed of, v. 10, 11. He must clear the altar of them every morning, and put them on the east side of the altar, which was furthest from the sanctuary; this he must do in his linen garment, which he always wore when he did any service at the altar; and then he must put on other garments, and must carry the ashes into a clean place without the camp. The priest himself must not only kindle the fire, but clean the hearth, and carry out the ashes. God's servants must think nothing below them but sin.

II. The priest must take care of the fire upon the altar. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar, it shall never go out, v. 13. Though we be not always sacrificing, yet we must keep the fire of holy love always burning; and thus we must pray always.

Verses 14–23

The meat-offering was either that which was offered by the people or that by the priests at their consecration.

I. As to the common meat-offering,

1. Only a handful of it was to be burnt upon the altar; all the rest was allowed to the priests for their food.

2. The laws concerning the eating of it were, (1) That it must be eaten unleavened, v. 16. (2) It must be eaten in the court of the tabernacle (here called the holy place). (3) The males only must eat of it, v. 18. (4) The priests only that were clean might eat of it.

II. As to the consecration meat-offering, which was offered for the priests themselves, it was to be wholly burnt, and none of it eaten, v. 23. The Jewish writers say that the high priest was bound to offer it every day of his life, from the day in which he was anointed. Josephus says, "The high priest sacrificed twice every day at his own charges, and this was his sacrifice." The meat-offering of the priest was to be baked as if it were to be eaten, and yet it must be wholly burnt.

Verses 24–30

We have here so much of the law of the sin-offering as did peculiarly concern the priests that offered it. As, 1. That it must be killed in the place where the burnt-offering was killed (v. 25). 2. That the priest who offered it for the sinner was (with his sons, or other priests, v. 29) to eat the flesh of it, after the blood and fat had been offered to God, in the court of the tabernacle, v. 26. 3. The blood of the sin-offering was with great reverence to be washed out of the clothes on which it happened to light (v. 27). 4. The vessel in which the flesh of the sin-offering was boiled must be broken if it were an earthen one, and, if a brazen one, well washed, v. 28.

CHAP. VII

Here is, I. The law of the trespass-offering (vcr. 1–7), with some further directions concerning the burnt-offering and the meat-offering, ver. 8–10. II. The law of the peace-offering. The eating of it (ver. 11–21), on which occasion the prohibition of eating fat or blood is repeated (ver. 22–27), and the priests' share of it, ver. 28–34. III. The conclusion of those institutions, ver. 35, &c.

Verses 1–10

Observe here, 1. Concerning the trespass-offering, that, being much of the same nature with the sin-offering, it was to be governed by the same rules, v. 6. When the blood and fat were offered to God to make atonement, the priests were to eat the flesh, as that of the sin-offering, in the holy place. The Jews have a tradition (as we have it from the learned bishop Patrick) concerning the sprinkling of the blood of the trespass-offering round about upon the altar, "That there was a scarlet line which went round about the altar exactly in the middle, and the blood of the burnt-offerings was sprinkled round about above the line, but that of the trespass-offerings and peace-offerings round about below the line." It seems the offerer was not himself to have any share of his trespass-offering, (as he was to have of his peace-offering; but it was all divided between the altar and the priest. They offered peace-offerings in thankfulness for mercy, and then it was proper to feast; but they offered trespass-offerings in sorrow for sin, and then fasting was more proper, in token of holy mourning, and a resolution to abstain from sin. 2. Concerning the burnt-offering it is here appointed that the priest that offered it should have the skin (v. 8), which no doubt he might make money of. 3. Concerning the meat-offering, if it was dressed, it was fit to be eaten immediately; and therefore the priest that offered it was to have it, v. 9.

Verses 11–34

I. The nature and intention of the peace-offerings are here more distinctly opened. They were offered either, 1. In thankfulness for some special mercy received, such as recovery from sickness, preservation in a journey, deliverance at sea, redemption out of captivity. Or, 2. In performance of some vow which a man made when he was in distress (v. 16). Or, 3. In supplication for some special mercy, here called a voluntary offering. This accompanied a man's prayers, as the former did his praises.

II. The rites and ceremonies about the peace-offerings are enlarged upon.

1. If the peace-offering was offered for a thanksgiving, a meat-offering must be offered with it, cakes of several sorts, and wafers (v. 12), and (which was peculiar to the peace-offerings) leavened bread must be offered. Unleavened bread was less grateful to the taste, and therefore, though enjoined in the passover for a particular reason, yet in other festivals leavened bread, which was lighter and more pleasant, was appointed, that men might feast at God's table as well as at their own.

2. The flesh of the peace-offerings, both that which was the priest's share and that which was the offerer's, must be eaten quickly, and not kept long, either raw, or dressed, cold. Though they were not obliged to eat it in the holy place, as those offerings that are called most holy, but might take it to their own tents and feast upon it there, yet God would by this law make them to know a difference between that and other meat. (1) Because God would not have that holy flesh to be in danger of putrefying. (2) Because God would not have his people to be niggardly and sparing, and distrustful of providence. (3) The flesh of the peace-offerings was God's treat, and therefore God orders it to be used generously for the entertainment of their friends, and charitably for the relief of the poor.

3. But the flesh, and those that eat it, must be pure. (1) The flesh must touch no unclean thing; if it did, it must not be eaten, but burnt, v. 19. (2) It must not be eaten by any unclean person. When a person was upon any account ceremonially unclean it was at his peril if he presumed to eat of the flesh of the peace-offerings, v. 20, 21. If any dare to partake of the table of the Lord under the pollution of sin unrepented of, and so profane sacred things, they eat and drink judgment to themselves, as those did that ate of the peace-offerings in their uncleanness, 1 Cor. xi. 29.

4. The eating of blood and the fat of the inwards is here again prohibited; and the prohibition is annexed as before to the law of the peace-offerings, ch. iii. 17. To eat of the flesh of that which died of itself, or was torn of beasts, was unlawful; but to eat of the fat of such was doubly unlawful, v. 24. The prohibition of blood is more general (v. 26, 27), because the fat was offered to God only by way of acknowledgment, but the blood made atonement for the soul, and so typified Christ's sacrifice much more than the burning of the fat did; to this therefore a greater reverence must be paid, till these types had their accomplishment in the offering up of the body of Christ once for all.

5. The priest's share of the peace-offerings is here prescribed. Jesus Christ is our great peace-offering; for he made himself a sacrifice, not only to atone for sin, and so to save us from the curse, but to purchase a blessing for us, and all good. By our joyfully partaking of the benefits of redemption we feast upon the sacrifice, to signify which the Lord's supper was instituted.

Verses 35–38

Here is the conclusion of these laws concerning the sacrifices. They are to be considered, 1. As a grant to the priests, v. 35, 36. 2. As a statute for ever to the people, that they should bring these offerings according to the rules prescribed, and cheerfully give the priests their share out of them. God commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations, v. 38. Note, The solemn acts of religious worship are commanded. The observance of the laws of Christ cannot be less necessary than the observance of the laws of Moses was.

CHAP. VIII

This chapter gives us an account of the solemn consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priest's office. I. It was done publicly, ver. 1–4. II. It was done exactly according to God's appointment, ver. 5. 1. They were washed and dressed, ver. 6–9, 13. 2. The tabernacle and the utensils of it were anointed, and then the priests, ver. 10–12. 3. A sin-offering was offered for them, ver. 14–17. 4. A burnt-offering, ver. 18–21. 5. The ram of consecration, ver. 22–30. 6. The continuance of this solemnity for seven days, ver. 31, &c.

Verses 1–13

God had given Moses orders to consecrate Aaron and his sons to the priests' office, when he was with him the first time upon Mount Sinai, Exod. xxviii. and xxix.

I. The orders repeated. The tabernacle was newly set up, which, without the priests, would be as a candlestick without a candle; the law concerning sacrifices was newly given, but could not be observed without priests. Aaron and his sons were near relations to Moses, and therefore he would not consecrate them till he had further orders, lest he should seem too forward to bring honour into his family.

II. The congregation called together, at the door, that is, in the court of the tabernacle, v. 4. It was done thus publicly, 1. Because it was a solemn transaction between God and Israel, and therefore it was fit that both sides should appear, to own the appointment, at the door of the tabernacle of meeting. 2. The spectators of the solemnity could not but be possessed, by the sight of it, with a great veneration for the priests and their office. It was strange that any of those who were witnesses of what was here done should afterwards say, as some of them did, You take too much upon you, you sons of Levi.

III. The Commission read, v. 5. Moses, who was God's representative in this solemnity, produced his orders before the congregation: This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done. The priesthood he delivered to them was that which he had received from the Lord.

IV. The ceremony performed according to the divine ritual. 1. Aaron and his sons were washed with water (v. 6), to signify that they ought now to purify themselves from all sinful dispositions and inclinations, and ever after to keep themselves pure. 2. They were clothed with the holy garments, Aaron with his (v. 7–9), which typified the dignity of Christ our great high priest, and his sons with theirs (v. 13), which typified the decency of Christians, who are spiritual priests. Christ wears the breast-plate of judgment and the holy crown; for the church's high priest is her prophet and king. All believers are clothed with the robe of righteousness, and girt with the girdle of truth, resolution, and close application; and their heads are bound, as the word here is, with the bonnet or diadem of beauty, the beauty of holiness. 3. The high priest was anointed. The tabernacle, and all its utensils, had some of the anointing oil put upon them with Moses's finger (v. 10), so had the altar (v. 11); but he poured it out more plentifully upon the head of Aaron (v. 12), so that it ran down to the skirts of his garments, because his unction was to typify the anointing of Christ with the Spirit, which was not given by measure to him.

Verses 14–30

Sacrifices of each kind must be offered for the priests, that they might with the more tenderness and concern offer the gifts and sacrifices of the people, with compassion on the ignorant, and on those that were out of the way, remembering that they themselves had had sacrifices offered for them, being compassed with infirmity. 1. A bullock, the largest sacrifice, was offered for a sin-offering (v. 14). Ministers, that are to declare the remission of sins to others, should give diligence to get it made sure to themselves in the first place that their own sins are pardoned. Those to whom is committed the ministry of reconciliation must first be reconciled to God themselves. 2. A ram was offered for a burnt-offering, v. 18–21. By this they gave to God the glory of this great honour which was now put upon them, and returned him praise for it, as Paul thanked Christ Jesus for putting him into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 12. 3. Another ram, called the ram of consecration, was offered for a peace-offering, v. 22, &c. All the ceremonies about this offering, as those before, were appointed by the express command of God.

Verses 31–36

Moses, having done his part of the ceremony, now leaves Aaron and his sons to do theirs.

I. They must boil the flesh of their peace-offering, and eat it in the court of the tabernacle, and what remained they must burn with fire, v. 31, 32.

II. They must not stir out of the court of the tabernacle for seven days, v. 33. The priesthood being a good warfare, they must thus learn to endure hardness, and to disentangle themselves from the affairs of this life, 2 Tim. ii. 3, 4. The work lasted seven days; for it was a kind of creation: and this time was appointed in honour of the sabbath, which, probably, was the last day of the seven, for which they were to prepare during the six days. They attended to keep the charge of the Lord: we have every one of us a charge to keep, an eternal God to glorify, an immortal soul to provide for, needful duty to be done, our generation to serve; and it must be our daily care to keep this charge, for it is the charge of the Lord our Master. Lastly, We are told (v. 36) that Aaron and his sons did all that was commanded. But after all the ceremonies that were used in their consecration there was one point of ratification which was reserved to be the honour and establishment of Christ's priesthood, which was this, that they were made priests without an oath, but Christ with an oath (Heb. vii. 21), for neither such priests nor their priesthood could continue, but Christ's is a perpetual and unchangeable priesthood.

CHAP. IX

Aaron and his sons, having been solemnly consecrated to the priesthood, are in this chapter entering upon the execution of their office, the very next day after their consecration was completed. I. Moses appoints a meeting between God and his priests, as the representatives of his people, ordering them to attend him, and and assuring them that he would appear to them, ver. 1–7. II. The meeting is held according to the appointment. 1. Aaron attends on God by sacrifice, offering a sin-offering and a burnt-offering for himself (ver. 8–14), and then the offerings for the people, whom he blessed in the name of the Lord, ver. 15–22. 2. God signifies his acceptance, (1) Of their persons, by showing them his glory, ver. 23. (2) Of their sacrifices, by consuming them with fire from heaven, ver. 24.

Verses 1–7

Orders are here given for another solemnity upon the eighth day. The priests had not so much as one day's respite from service, but were busily employed the very next day; for their consecration was the filling of their hands. Now, 1. Moses raises their expectation of a glorious appearance of God to them this day (v. 4): "To day the Lord will appear to you that are the priests." We are not now to expect such appearances; we Christians walk more by faith, and less by sight, than they did. But we may be sure that God draws nigh to those who draw nigh to him, and that the offerings of faith are really acceptable to him, though, the sacrifices being spiritual, the tokens of the acceptance are, as it is fit they should be, spiritual likewise. 2. He puts both priests and people upon preparing to receive this favour which God designed them. Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel, are all summoned to attend, v. 1. (1) Aaron is ordered to prepare his offerings: A young calf for a sin-offering, v. 2. The Jewish writers suggest that a calf was appointed for a sin-offering to remind him of his sin in making the golden calf. (2) Aaron must direct the people to get theirs ready. (3) Aaron must offer his own first, and then the people's, v. 7. [1] The high priest made atonement for himself, as one that was joined with sinners; but we have a high priest that was separated from sinners, and needed no atonement. When Messiah the prince was cut off as a sacrifice, it was not for himself; for he knew no sin. [2] He must make an atonement for the people, by offering their sacrifices. He must make atonement as the Lord commanded. See here the mercy of God, that he not only allows an atonement to be made, but commands it. No room therefore is left to doubt but that the atonement which is commanded will be accepted.

Verses 8–22

These being the first offerings that ever were offered by the levitical priesthood, according to the newly-enacted law of sacrifices, the manner of offering them is particularly related. 1. Aaron with his own hands slew the offering (v. 8), and did the work of the inferior priests. Therefore, as Moses before, so Aaron now offered some of each of the several sorts of sacrifices that were appointed. 2. He offered these besides the burnt-sacrifice of the morning, which was every day offered first, v. 17. When Aaron had done all that on his part was to be done about the sacrifices he lifted up his hand towards the people, and blessed them, v. 22. Aaron lifted up his hands in blessing them, to intimate whence he desired and expected the blessing to come, even from heaven, which is God's throne. Aaron could but crave a blessing, it is God's prerogative to command it. Aaron, when he had blessed, came down; Christ, when he blessed, went up.

We are not told what Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle to do, v. 23. Some of the Jewish writers say, "They went in to pray for the appearance of the divine glory." But, when they came out, they both joined in blessing the people, who stood expecting the promised appearance of the divine glory; and it was now (when Moses and Aaron concurred in praying) that they had what they waited for. Note, God's manifestations of himself, of his glory and grace, are commonly given in answer to prayer. The glory of God appeared, not while the sacrifices were in offering, but when the priests prayed, which intimates that the prayers and praises of God's spiritual priests are more pleasing to God than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

I. The glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people, v. 23. What the appearance of it was we are not told; no doubt it was such as carried its own evidence along with it. Those that dwell in God's house with an eye of faith may behold the beauty of the Lord.

II. There came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed the sacrifice, v. 24. Whether this fire came from heaven, or out of the most holy place, or from that visible appearance of the glory of God which all the people saw, it was a manifest token of God's acceptance of their service.

1. This fire did consume (or, as the word is, eat up) the present sacrifice. (1) It signified the turning away of God's wrath from them. Its fastening upon the sacrifice, and consuming that, signified God's acceptance of that as an atonement for the sinner. (2) It signified God's entering into covenant and communion with them.

2. This fire did, as it were, take possession of the altar. This also was a figure of good things to come. The Spirit descended upon the apostles in fire (Acts ii. 3). And the descent of this holy fire into our souls to kindle in them pious and devout affections towards God, and such a holy zeal as burns up the flesh and the lusts of it, is a certain token of God's gracious acceptance of our persons and performances.

III. We are here told how the people were affected with this discovery of God's glory and grace; they received it, 1. With the highest joy: They shouted; so stirring up themselves and one another to a holy triumph. 2. With the lowest reverence: They fell on their faces, humbly adoring the majesty of that God who vouchsafed thus to manifest himself to them.

CHAP. X

The story of this chapter is as sad an interruption to the institutions of the levitical law as that of the golden calf was to the account of the erecting of the tabernacle. Here is, I. The sin and death of Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, ver. 1, 2. II. The quieting of Aaron under this sore affliction, ver. 3. III. Orders given and observed about the funeral and mourning, ver. 4–7. IV. A command to the priests not to drink wine when they went in to minister, ver. 8–11. V. The care Moses took that they should go on with their work, ver. 12, &c.

Here is, I. The great sin that Nadab and Abihu were guilty of. But what was their sin? All the account here given of it is that they offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not (v. 1), and the same, Num. iii. 4. 1. Nadab and Abihu were so proud of the honour they were newly advanced to, and so ambitious of doing the highest and most honourable part of their work immediately, that though the service of this day was extraordinary, and done by particular direction from Moses, yet without receiving orders, they took their censers, and they would enter into the tabernacle and burn incense. And then their offering strange fire is the same with offering strange incense, which is expressly forbidden, Exod. xxx. 9. 2. Presuming thus to burn incense of their own without order, no marvel that they made a further blunder, and instead of taking of the fire from the altar, which was newly kindled from before the Lord and which henceforward must be used in offering both sacrifice and incense (Rev. viii. 5), they took common fire, probably from that with which the flesh of the peace-offerings was boiled, and this they made use of in burning incense; not being holy fire, it is called strange fire. 3. Incense was always to be burned by only one priest at a time, but here they would both go in together to do it. 4. They did it rashly, and with precipitation. They snatched their censers, without due reverence, when all the people fell upon their faces, before the glory of the Lord. 5. There is reason to suspect that they were drunk when they did it, because of the law which was given upon this occasion, v. 8. They had been feasting upon the peace-offerings, and the drink-offerings, and so their heads were light. 6. No doubt it was done presumptuously.

II. The dreadful punishment of this sin: There went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them, v. 2.

But why did the Lord deal thus severely with them? Were they not the sons of Aaron, the saint of the Lord, nephews to Moses, the great favourite of heaven? 1. The sin was greatly aggravated. It was a manifest contempt of Moses, and the divine law that was given by Moses. Hitherto it had been expressly observed concerning every thing that was done that they did it as the Lord commanded Moses, in opposition to which it is here said they did that which the Lord commanded them not, but they did it of their own heads. God was now teaching his people obedience, and to do every thing by rule, as becomes servants; for priests therefore to break rules and disobey was such a provocation as must by no means go unpunished. 2. Their punishment was a piece of necessary justice, now at the first settling of the ceremonial institutions. And no doubt this exemplary piece of justice at first prevented many irregularities afterwards. Thus Ananias and Sapphira were punished, when they presumed to lie to the Holy Ghost, that newly-descended fire.

Verses 3–7

We may well think that when Nadab and Abihu were struck with death, all about them were struck with horror. Moses was composed, though it touched him in a very tender part. He kept possession of his own soul.

I. He endeavours to pacify Aaron under this sad dispensation, v. 3.

1. What it was that Moses suggested to his poor brother upon this occasion: This is it that the Lord spoke. What was it that God spoke? It was this (the Lord by his grace speak it to all our hearts!) I will be sanctified in those that come nigh me, whoever they are, and before all the people I will be glorified. What was there in this to quiet Aaron? Two things:— (1) This must silence him, that his sons deserved their death; for they were thus cut off from their people because they did not sanctify and glorify God. (2) This must satisfy him, that the death of his sons redounded to the honour of God, and his impartial justice would for it be adored throughout all ages.

2. What good effects this had upon him: Aaron held his peace, that is, he patiently submitted to the holy will of God in this sad providence. When God corrects us or ours for sin, it is our duty to be silent under the correction, not to quarrel with God, arraign his justice, or charge him with folly, but to acquiesce in all that God does; not only bearing, but accepting, the punishment of iniquity. The most effectual arguments to quiet a gracious spirit under afflictions are those that are fetched from God's glory. Far be it from him that he should honour his sons more than God, or wish that God's name, or house, or law, should be exposed to reproach or contempt for the preserving of the reputation of his family.

II. Moses gives orders about the dead bodies. It was not fit that they should be left to lie where they fell. But Moses takes care of this matter, that though they died by the hand of justice in the act of sin, yet they should be decently buried, and they were so, v. 4, 5. They carried them out of the camp to be buried. It was a very awful affecting sight to the people. The names of Nadab and Abihu had become very great and honourable among them. Nadab and Abihu (who had been in the mount with God, Exod. xxiv. 1) were looked upon as the great favourites of heaven, and the hopes of their people; and now on a sudden, when the tidings of the event had scarcely reached their ears, to see them both carried out dead, with the visible marks of divine vengeance upon them, as sacrifices to the justice of God, they could not choose but cry out, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? 1 Sam. vi. 20.

III. He gives directions about the mourning.

1. That the priests must not mourn. But here it was forbidden both to Aaron and his sons, because, (1) They were now actually in waiting, doing a great work, which must by no means cease (Neh. vi. 3); and it was very much for the honour of God that their attendance on him should take place of their respects to their nearest relations, and that all services should give way to those of their ministry. (2) Their brethren were cut off for their transgression by the immediate hand of God, and therefore they must not mourn for them lest they should seem to countenance the sin, or impeach the justice of God in the punishment. It was very hard, no doubt, for Aaron and his sons to restrain themselves upon such an extraordinary occasion from inordinate grief, but reason and grace mastered the passion, and they bore the affliction with an obedient patience. Happy those who thus are themselves under God's government, and have their passions under their own government.

2. The people must mourn: Let the whole house of Israel bewail the burning which the Lord has kindled. The congregation must lament, not only the loss of their priests, but especially the displeasure of God which appeared in it.

Verses 8–11

Aaron having been very observant of what God said to him by Moses, now God does him the honour to speak to him immediately (v. 8): The Lord spoke unto Aaron. Do not drink wine, nor strong drink, when you go into the tabernacle, and this at his peril, lest you die, v. 9. Probably they had seen the ill effect of it in Nadab and Abihu, and therefore must take warning by them. Observe here, 1. The prohibition itself: Do not drink wine nor strong drink. At other times they were allowed (it was not expected that every priest should be a Nazarite), but during the time of their ministration they were forbidden it. This was one of the laws in Ezekiel's temple (Ezek. xliv. 21), and so it is required of gospel ministers that they be not given to wine, 1 Tim. iii. 3. 2. The penalty annexed to the prohibition: Lest you die; lest you die when you are in drink, and so that day come upon you unawares, Luke xxi. 34. Or, "Lest you do that which will make you liable to be cut off by the hand of God." 3. The reasons assigned for this prohibition. They must needs be sober, else they could not duly discharge their office; they will be in danger of erring through wine, Isa. xxviii. 7. They must be sure to keep sober, (1) That they might themselves be able to distinguish, in their ministrations, between that which was sacred and that which was common, and might never confound them, v. 10. (2) That they might be able to teach the people (v. 11), for that was a part of the priests' work (Deut. xxxiii. 10); and those that are addicted to drunkenness are very unfit to teach people God's statutes, both because those that live after the flesh can have no experimental acquaintance with the things of the Spirit, and because such teachers pull down with one hand what they build up with the other.

Moses is here directing Aaron to go on with his service after this interruption. Afflictions should rather quicken us to our duty than take us off from it. Observe (v. 12), He spoke unto Aaron and to his sons that were left. The notice taken of their survivorship intimates, 1. That Aaron should take comfort under the loss of two of his sons, from this consideration, that God had graciously spared him the other two. 2. That God's sparing them should be an engagement upon them to proceed in his service, and not to fly off from it. Here were four priests consecrated together, two were taken away, and two left; therefore the two that were left should endeavour to fill up the places of those that were gone, by double care and diligence in the services of the priesthood.

I. Moses repeats the directions he had formerly given them about eating their share of the sacrifices, v. 12–14, 15.

II. He enquires concerning one deviation from the appointment, which it seems had happened upon this occasion, which was this:—There was a goat to be sacrificed as a sin-offering for the people, ch. ix. 15. Now the law of the sin-offerings was that if the blood of them was brought into the holy place, as that of the sin-offerings for the priest was, then the flesh was to be burnt without the camp. Now the blood of this goat was not brought into the holy place, and yet, it seems, it was burnt without the camp. Moses charged the fault upon Eleazar and Ithamar (v. 16), but it is probable that what they did was by Aaron's direction, and therefore he apologized for it. He makes his affliction his excuse, v. 19. Such things have befallen me, such sad things, which could not but go near his heart, and make it very heavy. He was a high priest taken from among men, and could not put off natural affection when he put on the holy garments. He held his peace (v. 3), yet his sorrow was stirred. He makes this an excuse for his varying from the appointment about the sin-offering. He could not have eaten it but in his mourning, and with a sorrowful spirit; and would this have been accepted? The acquiescence of Moses in this excuse: He was content, v. 20. Perhaps he thought it justified what they had done. God had provided that what could not be eaten might be burnt.

CHAP. XI

The ceremonial law is described by the apostle (Heb. ix. 9, 10) to consist, not only "in gifts and sacrifices," but "in meats, and drinks, and divers washings" from ceremonial uncleanness, the laws concerning which begin with this chapter, which puts a difference between some sorts of flesh-meat and others, allowing some to be eaten as clean and forbidding others as unclean. But there is "another kind of flesh of beasts," concerning which the law directs here (ver. 1–8), "another of fishes" (ver. 9–12), "another of birds" (ver. 13–19), and "another of creeping things," which are distinguished into two sorts, flying creeping things (ver. 20–28) and creeping things upon the earth, ver. 29–43. And the law concludes with the general rule of holiness, and reasons for it, ver. 44, &c.

Verses 1–8

Now that Aaron was consecrated a high priest over the house of God, God spoke to him with Moses, and appointed them both as joint-commissioners to deliver his will to the people. It was particularly required of the priests that they should put a difference between clean and unclean, and teach the people to do so. They might eat flesh, but not all kinds of flesh; some they must look upon as unclean and forbidden to them, others as clean and allowed them. But what reason can be given for this law? Most of the meats forbidden as unclean are such as were really unwholesome, and not fit to be eaten; and those of them that we think wholesome enough, and use accordingly, as the rabbit, the hare, and the swine, perhaps in those countries, and to their bodies, might be hurtful. The Lord is for the body, and it is not only folly, but sin against God to prejudice our health for the pleasing of our appetite. It should seem there had been, before this, some difference between the Hebrews and other nations in their food, kept up by tradition; for the Egyptians and they would not eat together, Gen. xliii. 32. The learned observe further, That most of the creatures which by this law were to be abominated as unclean were such as were had in high veneration among the heathen, not so much for food as for divination and sacrifice to their gods; and therefore those are here mentioned as unclean, and an abomination, which yet they would not be in any temptation to eat, that they might keep up a religious loathing of that for which the Gentiles had a superstitious value. The swine, with the later Gentiles, was sacred to Venus, the owl to Minerva, the eagle to Jupiter, the dog to Hecate, &c., and all these are here made unclean. As to the beasts, there is a general rule laid down, that those which both part the hoof and chew the cud were clean, and those only: these are particularly mentioned in the repetition of this law (Deut. xiv. 4, 5), where it appears that the Israelites had variety enough allowed them, and needed not to complain of the confinement they were under. Those beasts that did not both chew the cud and divide the hoof were unclean, by which rule the flesh of swine, and of hares, and of rabbits, was prohibited to them, though commonly used among us. Of all the creatures here forbidden as unclean, none has been more dreaded and detested by the pious Jews than swine's flesh. Many were put to death by Antiochus because they would not eat it. Some suggest that the prohibition of these beasts as unclean was intended to be a caution to the people against the bad qualities of these creatures. We must not be filthy nor wallow in the mire as swine, nor be timorous and faint-hearted as hares, nor dwell in the earth as rabbits; let not man that is in honour make himself like these beasts that perish.

Verses 9–19

Here is, 1. A general rule concerning fishes, which were clean and which not. All that had fins and scales they might eat, and only those odd sorts of water-animals that have not were forbidden, v. 9, 10. Concerning the prohibited fish it is said, They shall be an abomination to you (v. 10–12), that is, "You shall count them unclean, and not only not eat of them, but keep at a distance from them." Thus God's spiritual Israel, as they are dignified above others by the gospel-covenant of adoption and friendship, so they must be mortified more than others by the gospel-commands of self-denial and bearing the cross. 2. Concerning fowls here is no general rule given, but a particular enumeration of those fowls that they must abstain from as unclean, which implies an allowance of all others. Of the fowls here forbidden, (1) Some are birds of prey, as the eagle, vulture, &c., and God would have his people to abhor every thing that is barbarous and cruel, and not to live by blood and rapine. Doves that are preyed upon were fit to be food for man and offerings to God; but kites and hawks that prey upon them must be looked upon as an abomination to God and man. (2) Others of them are solitary birds, that abide in dark and desolate places, as the owl and the pelican (Ps. cii. 6), and the cormorant and raven (Isa. xxxiv. 11); for God's Israel should not be a melancholy people, nor affect sadness and constant solitude. (3) Others of them feed upon that which is impure, as the stork on serpents, others of them on worms; and we must not only abstain from all impurity ourselves, but from communion with those that allow themselves in it. (4) Others of them were used by the Egyptians and other Gentiles in their divinations. Some birds were reckoned fortunate, others ominous; and their soothsayers had great regard to the flights of these birds, all which therefore must be an abomination to God's people, who must not learn the way of the heathen.

Verses 20–42

Here is the law, 1. Concerning flying insects, as flies, wasps, bees, &c.; these they might not eat (v. 20), nor indeed are they fit to be eaten; but there were several sorts of locusts which in those countries were very good meat, and much used: John Baptist lived upon them in the desert, and they are here allowed them, v. 21, 22. 2. Concerning the creeping things on the earth; these were all forbidden (v. 29, 30), and again, v. 41, 42. Dust is the meat of the creeping things, and therefore they are not fit to be man's meat. 3. Concerning the dead carcases of all these unclean animals. (1) Every one that touched them was to be unclean until the evening, v. 24–28. It was a ceremonial uncleanness they contracted, which for the time forbade them to come into the tabernacle, or to eat of any of the holy things, or so much as to converse familiarly with their neighbours. But the uncleanness continued only till the evening. And we must learn, by daily renewing our repentance every night for the sins of the day, to cleanse ourselves from the pollution we contract by them, that we may not lie down in our uncleanness. (2) Even the vessels, or other things they fell upon, were thereby made unclean until the evening (v. 32), and if they were earthen vessels they must be broken, v. 33. We ought as industriously to preserve our precious souls from the pollutions of sin, and as speedily to cleanse them when they are polluted, as they were to preserve and cleanse their bodies and household goods from those ceremonial pollutions.

Here is, I. The exposition of this law, or a key to let us into the meaning of it. It was not intended merely for a bill of fare, or as the directions of a physician about their diet, but God would hereby teach them to sanctify themselves and to be holy, v. 44. These rudiments of the world were their tutors and governors (Gal. iv. 2, 3), to bring them to that which is the revival of our first state in Adam and the earnest of our best state with Christ, that is, holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. This is indeed the great design of all the ordinances, that by them we may sanctify ourselves and learn to be holy. Even this law concerning their food, which seemed to stoop so very low, aimed thus high. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord. If it was such a provocation for a man to eat swine's flesh himself, much more it must be so to offer swine's blood at God's altar; see Prov. xv. 8.

II. The reasons of this law. 1. I am the Lord your God, v. 44. "Therefore you are bound to do thus, in pure obedience." 2. I am holy, v. 44, and again, v. 45. If God be holy, we must be so, else we cannot expect to be accepted of him. All these ceremonial restraints were designed to teach us that we must not fashion ourselves according to our former lusts in our ignorance, 1 Pet. 1. 14. 3. I am the Lord that bringeth you out of the land of Egypt, v. 45. He that had done more for them than for any other people might justly expect more from them.

III. The conclusion of this statute: This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, &c., v. 46, 47. This law was to them a statute for ever, that is, as long as that economy lasted; but under the gospel we find it expressly repealed by a voice from heaven to Peter (Acts x. 15), as it had before been virtually set aside by the death of Christ, with the other ordinances that perished in the using. And now we are sure that meat commends us not to God (1 Cor. viii. 8), and that nothing is unclean of itself (Rom. xiv. 14), nor does that defile a man which goes into his mouth, but that which comes out from the heart, Matt. xv. 11. Let us therefore, 1. Give thanks to God that we are not under this yoke, but that to us every creature of God is allowed as good. 2. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. 3. Be strictly and conscientiously temperate in the use of the good creatures God has allowed us. Nature is content with little, grace with less, but lust with nothing.

CHAP. XII

After the laws concerning clean and unclean food come the laws concerning clean and unclean persons; and the first is in this chapter concerning the ceremonial uncleanness of women in child-birth, ver. 1–5. And concerning their purification from that uncleanness, ver. 6, &c.

Verses 1–5

The law here pronounces women lying-in ceremonially unclean. The Jews say, "The law extended even to an abortion, if the child was so formed as that the sex was distinguishable." 1. There was some time of strict separation immediately after the birth. During these days she was separated from her husband and friends, and those that necessarily attended her were ceremonially unclean, which was one reason why the males were not circumcised till the eighth day, because they participated in the mother's pollution during the days of her separation. 2. There was also a longer time appointed for their purifying. During this time they were only separated from the sanctuary and forbidden to eat of the passover, or peace-offerings, or, if a priest's wife, to eat of any thing that was holy to the Lord. If sin had not entered, nothing but purity and honour had attended all the productions of that great blessing, Be fruitful and multiply. The exclusion of the woman for so many days from the sanctuary, and all participation of the holy things, signified that our original corruption would have excluded us for ever from the enjoyment of God and his favours if he had not graciously provided for our purifying.

Verses 6–8

A woman that had lain in, when the time set for her return to the sanctuary had come, must bring her offerings, v. 6. 1. A burnt-offering; a lamb if she was able; if poor, a pigeon. This she was to offer in thankfulness to God for his mercy to her, in bringing her safely through the pains of child-bearing and all the perils of child-bed, and in desire and hopes of God's further favour both to her and to the child. When a child is born there is joy and there is hope, and therefore it was proper to bring this offering. But, besides this, 2. She must offer a sin-offering, which must be the same for poor and rich, a turtle-dove or a young pigeon; for, whatever difference there may be between rich and poor in the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of atonement is the same for both. This sin-offering was intended either, (1) To complete her purification from that ceremonial uncleanness which, though it was not in itself sinful, yet was typical of moral pollution; or, (2) To make atonement for that which was really sin, either an inordinate desire of the blessing of children or discontent or impatience under the pains of child-bearing. According to this law, we find that the mother of our blessed Lord, though he was not conceived in sin as others, yet accomplished the days of purification, and then presented her son to the Lord, being a first-born, and brought her own offering, a pair of turtle-doves, Luke ii. 22–24. So poor were Christ's parents that they were not able to bring a lamb for a burnt-offering; and so early was Christ made under the law, to redeem those that were under it.

CHAP. XIII

The next ceremonial uncleanness is that of the leprosy, concerning which the law was very large and particular; we have the discovery of it in this chapter, and the cleansing of the leper in the next. Scarcely any one thing in all the levitical law takes up so much room as this. I. Rules are here given by which the priest must judge whether the man had the leprosy or no, according as the symptom was that appeared. 1. If it was a swelling, a scab, or a bright spot, ver. 1–17. 2. If it was a bile, ver. 18–23. 3. If it was an inflammation, ver. 24–28. 4. If it was in the head or beard, ver. 29–37. 5. If it was a bright spot, ver. 38, 39. 6. If it was in a bald head, ver. 40–44. II. Direction is given how the leper must be disposed of, ver. 45, 46. III. Concerning the leprosy in garments, ver. 47, &c.

I. Concerning the plague of leprosy we may observe in general, That it was rather an uncleanness than a disease; or, at least, so the law considered it, and therefore employed not the physicians but the priests about it. Christ is said to cleanse lepers, not to cure them. We do not read of any that died of the leprosy, but it rather buried them alive, by rendering them unfit for conversation with any but such as were infected like themselves. It is said to have begun first in Egypt, whence it spread into Syria. The Jews retained the idolatrous customs they had learnt in Egypt, and therefore God justly caused this with some others of the diseases of Egypt to follow them. Yet we read of Naaman the Syrian, who was a leper, 2 Kings v. 1. There were other breakings-out in the body which did very much resemble the leprosy, but were not it, which might make a man sore and loathsome and yet not ceremonially unclean. The judgment of it was referred to the priests. Lepers were looked upon as stigmatized by the justice of God, and therefore it was left to his servants the priests, who might be presumed to know his mark best, to pronounce who were lepers and who were not. It was a figure of the moral pollution of men's minds by sin, which is the leprosy of the soul, defiling to the conscience, and from which Christ alone can cleanse us; for herein the power of his grace infinitely transcends that of the legal priesthood, that the priest could only convict the leper (for by the law is the knowledge of sin), but Christ can cure the leper, he can take away sin. Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean, which was more than the priests could do, Matt. viii. 2. It is a work of great importance, but of great difficulty, to judge of our spiritual state: we have all cause to suspect ourselves, being conscious to ourselves of sores and spots, but whether clean or unclean is the question.

II. Several rules are here laid down by which the judgment of the priest must be governed. 1. If the sore was but skin-deep, it was to be hoped it was not the leprosy, v. 4. But, if it was deeper than the skin, the man must be pronounced unclean, v. 3. The infirmities that consist with grace do not sink deep into the soul, but the mind still serves the law of God, and the inward man delights in it, Rom. vii. 22, 25. But if the matter be really worse than it shows, and the inwards be infected, the case is dangerous. 2. If the sore be at a stay, and does not spread, it is no leprosy, v, 5, 6. But if it spread much abroad, and continue to do so after several inspections, the case is bad, v. 7, 8. If men do not grow worse, but a stop be put to the course of their sins and their corruptions be checked, it is to be hoped they will grow better; but if sin gets ground, and they become worse every day, they are going downhill. 3. If there was proud raw flesh in the rising, the priest needed not to wait any longer, it was certainly a leprosy, v. 10, 11. Nor is there any surer indication of the badness of a man's spiritual state than the heart's rising in self-conceit, confidence in the flesh, and resistance of the reproofs of the word and strivings of the Spirit. 4. If the eruption, whatever it was, covered all the skin from head to foot, it was no leprosy (v. 12, 13); for it was an evidence that the vitals were sound and strong, and nature hereby helped itself, throwing out what was burdensome and pernicious. There is hope in the small-pox when they come out well: so if men freely confess their sins, and hide them not, there is no danger comparable to theirs that cover their sins. Some gather this from it, that there is more hope of the profane than of hypocrites. The publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of heaven before scribes and Pharisees. In one respect, the sudden breakings-out of passion, though bad enough, are not so dangerous as malice concealed. Others gather this, that, if we judge ourselves, we shall not be judged; if we see and own that there is no health in us, no soundness in our flesh, by reason of sin, we shall find grace in the eyes of the Lord. 5. The priest must take time in making his judgment, and not give it rashly.

Verses 18–37

The priest is here instructed what judgment to make if there was any appearance of a leprosy, either, 1. In an old ulcer or bile, that has been healed, v. 18, &c. When old sores, that seemed to be cured, break out again, it is to be feared there is a leprosy in them; such is the danger of those who, having escaped the pollutions of the world, are again entangled therein and overcome. Or, 2. In a burn by accident, for this seems to be meant, v. 24, &c. The burning of strife and contention often proves the occasion of the rising up and breaking out of that corruption which witnesses to men's faces that they are unclean.

I. Provisos that neither a freckled skin nor a bald head should be mistaken for a leprosy, v. 38–41. Every deformity must not forthwith be made a ceremonial defilement.

II. A particular brand set upon the leprosy if at any time it did appear in a bald head: The plague is in his head, he is utterly unclean, v. 44. If the leprosy of sin have seized the head, if the judgment be corrupted, and wicked principles which countenance and support wicked practices, be embraced, it is an utter uncleanness. Soundness in the faith keeps the leprosy from the head.

III. Directions what must be done with the convicted leper. When the priest, upon mature deliberation, had solemnly pronounced him unclean,

1. He must pronounce himself so, v. 45. He must put himself into the posture of a mourner and cry, Unclean, unclean. He must therefore, (1) Humble himself under the mighty hand of God, not insisting upon his cleanness when the priest had pronounced him unclean. He must signify this by rending his clothes, uncovering his head, and covering his upper lip, all tokens of shame and confusion of face, and very significant of that self-loathing and self-abasement which should fill the hearts of penitents, the language of which is self-judging. (2) He must give warning to others to take heed of coming near him. Wherever he went, he must cry to those he saw at a distance, "I am unclean, unclean, take heed of touching me." Not that the leprosy was catching, but by the touch of a leper ceremonial uncleanness was contracted. And this was all that the law could do. The law only shows us our disease; the gospel shows us our help in Christ.

2. He must then be shut out of the camp, and afterwards, when they came to Canaan, out of the city, town, or village, where he lived, and dwell alone (v. 46), associating with none but those that were lepers like himself.

Verses 47–59

This is the law concerning the plague of leprosy in a garment, whether linen or woollen. A leprosy in a garment, with discernible indications of it, is a thing which to us now is altogether unaccountable. The process was much the same with that concerning a leprous person. The garment suspected to be tainted was not to be burnt immediately, but it must be shown to the priest. If, upon search, it was found that there was a leprous spot it must be burnt. If the cause of the suspicion was gone, it must be washed, and then might be used, v. 58.

CHAP. XIV

The former chapter directed the priests how to convict a leper of ceremonial uncleanness. The remedy here is only adapted to the ceremonial part of his disease; but the authority Christ gave to his ministers was to cure the lepers, and so to cleanse them. We have here, I. The solemn declaration of the leper's being clean, ver. 1–9. II. The sacrifices which he was to offer to God eight days after, ver. 10–32. III. The management of a house in which appeared signs of a leprosy, ver. 33–53. And the conclusion and summary of this whole matter, ver. 54, &c.

Verses 1–9

I. It is supposed that the plague of the leprosy was not an incurable disease. Uzziah's indeed continued to the day of his death, but Miriam's lasted only seven days: we may suppose that it often wore off in process of time.

II. The judgment of the cure, as well as that of the disease, was referred to the priest. He must go out of the camp to the leper, to see whether his leprosy was healed, v. 3. It was in mercy to the poor lepers that the priests particularly had orders to attend them. When the leper was shut out, and could not go to the priests, it was well that the priests might come to him. Is any sick? Let him send for the elders, the ministers, Jam. v. 14. If we apply it to the spiritual leprosy of sin, it intimates that when we withdraw from those who walk disorderly, that they may be ashamed, we must not count them as enemies, but admonish them as brethren, 2 Thess. iii. 15. And also that when God by his grace has brought those to repentance who were shut out of communion for scandal, they ought with tenderness, and joy, and sincere affection, to be received in again. Thus Paul orders concerning the excommunicated Corinthian that when he had given evidences of his repentance they should forgive him, and comfort him, and confirm their love towards him, 2 Cor. ii. 7, 8.

III. If it was found that the leprosy was healed, the priest must declare it with a particular solemnity. The leper or his friends were to get ready two birds caught for this purpose (any sort of wild birds that were clean), and cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop. 1. A preparation was to be made of blood and water, with which the leper must be sprinkled. One of the birds was to be killed over an earthen cup of spring water, so that the blood of the bird might discolour the water. 2. The living bird, with a little scarlet wool, and a bunch of hyssop, must be fastened to a cedar stick, dipped in the water and blood, which must be so sprinkled upon him that was to be cleansed, v. 6, 7. The cedar-wood signified the restoring of the leper to his strength and soundness, for that is a sort of wood not apt to putrefy. The scarlet wool signified his recovering a florid colour again, for the leprosy made him white as snow. And the hyssop intimated the removing of the disagreeable scent which commonly attended the leprosy. The cedar the stateliest plant, and hyssop the meanest, are here used together in this service (see 1 Kings iv. 33). The leper must be sprinkled seven times, to signify a complete purification, in allusion to which David prays, Wash me throughly, Ps. li. 2. Naaman was directed to wash seven times, 2 Kings v. 10. 3. The living bird was then to be let loose in the open field, to signify that the leper, being cleansed, was now no longer under restraint and confinement, but might take his liberty to go where he pleased. But this being signified by the flight of a bird towards heaven was an intimation to him henceforward to seek the things that are above, and not to spend this new life to which God had restored him merely in the pursuit of earthly things. Those whose souls before bowed down to the dust (Ps. xliv. 25), in grief and fear, now fly in the open firmament of heaven, and soar upwards upon the wings of faith and hope, and holy love and joy. 4. The priest must, upon this, pronounce him clean. Those are clean indeed whom Christ pronounces so, and they need not regard what men say of them. But, though Christ was the end of the law for righteousness, yet being in the days of his flesh made under the law, which as yet stood unrepealed, he ordered those lepers whom he had cured miraculously to go and show themselves to the priest, and offer for their cleansing according to the law, Matt. viii. 4; Luke v. 14. 5. When the leper was pronounced clean, he must wash his body and his clothes, and shave off all his hair (v. 8), must still tarry seven days out of the camp, and on the seventh day must do it again, v. 9. The priest having pronounced him clean from the disease, he must make himself as clean as ever he could from all the remains of it, and from all other defilements.

Observe, I. To complete the purification of the leper, on the eighth day, after the former solemnity performed without the camp, he was to attend at the door of the tabernacle, and was there to be presented to the Lord, with his offering, v. 11. Observe here, 1. That the mercies of God oblige us to present ourselves to him, Rom. xii. 1. 2. When God has restored us to the liberty of ordinances again, after restraint by sickness, distance, or otherwise, we should take the first opportunity of testifying our respect to God, and our affection to his sanctuary.

II. Three lambs the cleansed leper was to bring, with a meat-offering, and a log of oil, which was about half a pint. Now, 1. Most of the ceremony peculiar to this case was about the trespass-offering, the lamb for which was offered first, v. 12. The Jews say that the leper stood without the gate of the tabernacle and the priest within, and thus the ceremony was performed through the gate, signifying that now he was admitted with other Israelites to attend in the courts of the Lord's house again, and was as welcome as ever; though perhaps the name might stick by him as long as he lived (as we read of one who probably was cleansed by our Lord Jesus, who yet afterwards is called Simon the leper, Matt. xxvi. 6). Cleansed lepers are as welcome to the blood and the oil as consecrated priests. 2. Besides this there must be a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, a lamb for each, v. 19, 20. By each of these offerings, it is said, the priests shall make an atonement for him. (1) His moral guilt shall be removed. (2) His ceremonial pollution shall be removed, which had kept him from the participation of the holy things. And this is called making an atonement for him, because our restoration to the privileges of God's children, typified hereby, is owing purely to the great propitiation. The burnt-offering, besides the atonement that was made by it, was a thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy to him: and the more immediate the hand of God was both in the sickness and in the cure the more reason he had thus to give glory to him, and thus, as our Saviour speaks (Mark i. 44), to offer for his cleansing all those things which Moses commanded for a testimony unto them.

Verses 21–32

We have here the gracious provision which the law made for the cleansing of poor lepers. If they were not able to bring three lambs, and three tenth-deals of flour, they must bring one lamb, and one tenth-deal of flour, and, instead of the other two lambs, two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, v. 21, 22. Here see, 1. That the poverty of the person concerned would not excuse him if he brought no offerings at all. Let none think that because they are poor God requires no service from them, since he has considered them, and demands that which it is in the power of the poorest to give. "My son, give me thy heart, and with that the calves of thy lips shall be accepted instead of the calves of the stall." 2. That God expected from those who were poor only according to their ability. If there be first a willing mind and an honest heart, two pigeons, when they are the utmost a man is able to get, are as acceptable to God as two lambs.

Verses 33–53

This is the law concerning the leprosy in a house. The leprosy in a house is as unaccountable as the leprosy in a garment. Now, 1. It is supposed that even in Canaan itself, the land of promise, their houses might be infected with a leprosy. 2. It is likewise taken for granted that the owner of the house will make the priest acquainted with it, as soon as he sees the least cause to suspect the leprosy in his house. Sin, where that reigns in a house, is a plague there, as it is in a heart. And masters of families should be aware and afraid of the first appearance of gross sin in their families, and put away the iniquity, whatever it is, far from their tabernacles, Job xxii. 23. 3. If the priest, upon search, found that the leprosy had got into the house, he must try to cure it, by taking out that part of the building that was infected, v. 40, 41. This was like cutting off a gangrened limb for the preservation of the rest of the body. 4. If yet it remained in the house, the whole house must be pulled down, and all the materials carried to the dunghill, v. 44, 45. 5. If the taking out the infected stones cured the house, and the leprosy did not spread any further, then the house must be cleansed; not only aired, that it might be healthful, but purified from the ceremonial pollution, that it might be fit to be the habitation of an Israelite. The ceremony of its cleansing was much the same with that of cleansing a leprous person, v. 49, &c. And the same care should we take to reform whatever is amiss in our families, that we and our houses may serve the Lord; see Gen. xxxv. 2.

Verses 54–57

This is the conclusion of this law concerning the leprosy. We may see in this law, 1. The gracious care God took of his people Israel. When Naaman the Syrian was cured of his leprosy he was not bidden to show himself to the priest, though he was cured in Jordan, as the Jews that were cured by our Saviour were. 2. The religious care we ought to take of ourselves, to keep our minds from the dominion of all sinful affections and dispositions, which are both their disease and their defilement, that we may be fit for the service of God.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter we have laws concerning other ceremonial uncleannesses contracted either by bodily disease like that of the leper, or some natural incidents, and this either, I. In men, ver. 1–18. Or, II. In women, ver. 19–33. We need not be at all curious in explaining these antiquated laws, it is enough if we observe the general intention; but we have need to be very cautious lest sin take occasion by the commandment to become more exceedingly sinful.

Verses 1–18

We have here the law concerning the ceremonial uncleanness that was contracted by running issues in men, which was, usually, the effect of a dissolute life. A vile disease for vile deserts. Now whoever had this disease upon him, 1. He was himself unclean, v. 2. He must not dare to come near the sanctuary. 2. He made every person and thing unclean that he touched, or that touched him, v. 4–12. This signified the contagion of sin, the danger we are in of being polluted by conversing with those that are polluted. 3. When he was cured of the disease, yet he could not be cleansed from the pollution without a sacrifice, for which he was to prepare by bathing in spring water, v. 13–15. This signified the great gospel duties of faith and repentance, and the great gospel privileges of the application of Christ's blood to our souls for our justification and his grace for our sanctification.

Verses 19–33

This is concerning the ceremonial uncleanness which women lay under from their issues. This made the woman unclean (v. 25) and every thing she touched unclean, v. 26, 27. And if she was cured, and found by seven days' trial that she was perfectly free from her issue of blood, she was to be cleansed by the offering of two turtle-doves or two young pigeons, to make an atonement for her, v. 28, 29.

By these laws they were taught that they were purified unto God a peculiar people, and were intended by the holy God for a kingdom of priests, a holy nation. They were also taught to preserve the honour of their purity, and to keep themselves from all sinful pollutions. In all these laws there seems to be a special regard had to the honour of the tabernacle, to which none must approach in their uncleanness, that they defile not my tabernacle. Thus they were taught never to draw near to God but with an awful humble sense of their distance and danger.

Let us bless God that we are not under the yoke of these carnal ordinances, that, as nothing can destroy us, so nothing can defile us, but sin. Those may now partake of the Lord's supper who durst not then eat of the peace-offerings. Let us all see how indispensably necessary real holiness is to our future happiness, and get our hearts purified by faith, that we may see God.

CHAP. XVI

In this chapter we have the institution of the annual solemnity of the day of atonement, or expiation, which had as much gospel in it as perhaps any of the appointments of the ceremonial law, as appears by the reference the apostle makes to it, Heb. ix. 7, &c. This is concerning the stated sacrifice, in which the whole nation was interested. The whole service of the day is committed to the high priest. I. He must never come into the most holy place but upon this day, ver. 1, 2. II. He must come dressed in linen garments, ver. 4. III. He must bring a sin-offering and a burnt-offering for himself (ver. 3), offer his sin-offering (ver. 6–11), then go within the veil with some of the blood of his sin-offering, burn incense, and sprinkle the blood before the mercy-seat, ver. 12–14. IV. Two goats must be provided for the people, lots cast upon them, and, 1. One of them must be a sin-offering for the people (ver. 5, 7–9), and the blood of it must be sprinkled before the mercy-seat (ver. 15–17), and then some of the blood of both the sin-offerings must be sprinkled upon the altar, ver. 18, 19. 2. The other must be a scape-goat (ver. 10), the sins of Israel must be confessed over him, and then he must be sent away into the wilderness (ver. 20–22), and he that brought him away must be ceremonially unclean, ver. 26. V. The burnt-offerings were then to be offered, the fat of the sin-offerings burnt on the altar, and their flesh burnt without the camp, ver. 23–25, 27, 28. VI. The people were to observe the day religiously by a holy rest and holy mourning for sin; and this was to be a statute for ever, ver. 29, &c.

Verses 1–4

Here is, I. The date of this law concerning the day of atonement: it was after the death of the two sons of Aaron (v. 1), which we read, ch. x. 1. 1. Lest Aaron should fear that any remaining guilt of that sin should cleave to his family, he is directed how to make atonement for his house. 2. The priests being warned by the death of Nadab and Abihu to approach to God with reverence and godly fear, directions are here given how the nearest approach might be made.

II. The design of this law. One intention of it was to preserve a veneration for the most holy place, within the veil, where the Shechinah, or divine glory, was pleased to dwell between the cherubim. Within the veil none must ever come but the high priest only, and he but on one day in the year. But see what a blessed change is made by the gospel of Christ; all good Christians have now boldness to enter into the holiest, through the veil, every day (Heb. x. 19, 20); and we come boldly (not as Aaron must, with fear and trembling) to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, Heb. iv. 16. The objects of faith the more they are conversed with the more do they manifest of their greatness and goodness: now therefore we are welcome to come at all times into the holy place not made with hands. Then Aaron must not come near at all times, lest he die; we now must come near at all times that we may live: it is distance only that is our death.

III. The person to whom the work of this day was committed, and that was the high priest only: Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place, v. 3.

IV. The attire of the high priest in this service. He was not to be dressed up in his rich garments, he was not to put on the ephod, with the precious stones in it, but only the linen clothes which he wore in common with the inferior priests, v. 4. That meaner dress did best become him on this day of humiliation.

Verses 5–14

The Jewish writers say that for seven days before the day of expiation the high priest was to dwell in a chamber of the temple, that he might prepare himself. During those seven days he himself did the work of the inferior priests. 1. He was to begin the service of the day very early with the usual morning sacrifice, after he had first washed his whole body before he dressed himself, and his hands and feet again afterwords. He then burned the daily incense, dressed the lamps, and offered the extraordinary sacrifice appointed (Num. xxix. 8). 2. He must now put off his rich robes, bathe himself, put on the linen garments, and present unto the Lord his own bullock, which was to be a sin-offering for himself and his house, v. 6. 3. He must then cast lots upon the two goats, which were to make (both together) one sin-offering for the congregation. One of these goats must be slain, in token of a satisfaction to be made to God's justice for sin, the other must be sent away, in token of the remission or dismission of sin by the mercy of God. Both must be presented together to God (v. 7) before the lot was cast upon them, and afterwards the scape-goat by itself, v. 10. Some think that goats were chosen for the sin-offering because, by the disagreeableness of their smell, the offensiveness of sin is represented. 4. The next thing to be done was to kill the bullock for the sin-offering for himself and his house, v. 11. 5. He took a censer of burning coals and a dish full of the sweet incense and then went into the holy of holies, set the coals down upon the floor, and scattered the incense upon them, so that the room was immediately filled with smoke. The Jews say that he was to go in side-ways, that he might not look directly upon the ark where the divine glory was, then he must come out backwards, out of reverence to the divine majesty; and, after a short prayer, he was to show himself to the people. 6. He then fetched the blood of the bullock and took that in with him the second time into the holy of holies, which was now filled with the smoke of the incense, and sprinkled with his finger of that blood towards the mercy-seat, once over against the top of it and then seven times towards the lower part of it, v. 14.

Verses 15–19

When the priest had come out from sprinkling the blood of the bullock before the mercy-seat, 1. He must next kill the goat which was the sin-offering for the people (v. 15) and go the third time into the holy of holies, to sprinkle the blood of the goat, as he had done that of the bullock; and thus he was to make atonement for the holy place (v. 16). God, being reconciled to them, might continue with them. 2. He must then do the same for the outward part of the tabernacle that he had done for the inner room. The reason intimated is because the tabernacle remained among them in the midst of their uncleanness, v. 16. God would hereby show them how much their hearts needed to be purified. 3. He must then put some of the blood, both of the bullock and of the goat mixed together, upon the horns of the altar that is before the Lord, v. 18, 19.

Verses 20–28

The high priest having presented unto the Lord the expiatory sacrifices, by the sprinkling of their blood, 1. He is next to confess the sins of Israel, with both his hands upon the head of the scape-goat (v. 20, 21); and whenever hands were imposed upon the head of any sacrifice it was always done with confession. In the latter and more degenerate ages of the Jewish church they had a set form of confession prepared for the high priest. By this confession he must put the sins of Israel upon the head of the goat. 2. The goat was then to be sent away immediately by the hand of a fit person into a wilderness, a land not inhabited; and God allowed them to make this construction of it, that the sending away of the goat was the sending away of their sins, by a free and full remission: He shall bear upon him all their iniquities, v. 22. The later Jews had a custom to tie one shred of scarlet cloth to the horns of the goat and another to the gate of the temple, or to the top of the rock where the goat was lost, and they concluded that if it turned white, as they say it usually did, the sins of Israel were forgiven, as it is written, Though your sins have been as scarlet, they shall be as wool: and they add that for forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans the scarlet cloth never changed colour at all, which is a fair confession that, having rejected the substance, the shadow stood them in no stead. 3. The high priest must then put off his linen garments in the tabernacle, and leave them there, the Jews say never to be worn again by himself or any other, for they made new ones every year; and he must bathe himself in water, put on his rich clothes, and then offer both his own and the people's burnt-offerings, v. 23, 24. When we have the comfort of our pardon God must have the glory of it. 4. The flesh of both those sin-offerings whose blood was taken within the veil was to be all burnt at a distance without the camp, to signify both our putting away sin by true repentance, and the spirit of burning, and God's putting it away by a full remission, so that it shall never rise up in judgment against us. 5. He that took the scape-goat into the wilderness, and those that burned the sin-offering, were to be looked upon as ceremonially unclean, and must not come into the camp till they had washed their clothes and bathed their flesh in water, which signified the defiling nature of sin. 6. When all this was done, the high priest went again into the most holy place to fetch his censer, and so returned to his own house with joy, because he had done his duty, and died not.

Verses 29–34

I. We have here some additional directions in reference to this great solemnity, particularly,

1. The day appointed for this solemnity. It must be observed yearly on the tenth day of the seventh month, v. 29.

2. The duty of the people on this day. (1) They must rest from all their labours: It shall be a sabbath of rest, v. 31. (2) They must afflict their souls. They must refrain from all bodily refreshments and delights, in token of inward humiliation and contrition of soul for their sins. They all fasted on this day from food (except the sick and children), and laid aside their ornaments.

3. The perpetuity of this institution: It shall be a statute for ever, v. 29, 34. It must not be intermitted any year, nor ever let fall till that constitution should be dissolved, and the type should be superseded by the antitype. The annual repetition of the sacrifices showed that there was in them only a faint and feeble effort towards making atonement; it could be done effectually only by the offering up of the body of Christ once for all, and that once was sufficient; that sacrifice needed not to be repeated.

II. Let us see what there was of gospel in all this.

1. Here are typified the two great gospel privileges of the remission of sin and access to God, both which we owe to the mediation of our Lord Jesus. Here then let us see,

(1) The expiation of guilt which Christ made for us. He is himself both the maker and the matter of the atonement; for he is, [1] The priest, the high priest, that makes reconciliation for the sins of the people, Heb. ii. 17. No man was to be with the high priest when he made atonement (v. 17); for our Lord Jesus was to tread the wine-press alone, and of the people there must be none with him (Isa. lxiii. 3); therefore, when he entered upon his sufferings, all his disciples forsook him and fled, for if any of them had been taken and put to death with him it would have looked as if they had assisted in making the atonement. But, whereas the atonement which the high priest made pertained only to the congregation of Israel, Christ is the propitiation, not for their sins only, that are Jews, but for the sins of the whole Gentile world. And in this also Christ infinitely excelled Aaron, that Aaron needed to offer sacrifice for his own sin first, of which he was to make confession upon the head of his sin-offering; but our Lord Jesus had no sin of his own to answer for. [2] As he is the high priest, so he is the sacrifice with which atonement is made; for he is all in all in our reconciliation to God. Thus he was prefigured by the two goats, which both made one offering: the slain goat was a type of Christ dying for our sins, the scape-goat a type of Christ rising again for our justification. First, The atonement is said to be completed by putting the sins of Israel upon the head of the goat. They deserved to have been abandoned and sent into a land of forgetfulness, but that punishment was here transferred to the goat that bore their sins, with reference to which God is said to have laid upon our Lord Jesus (the substance of all these shadows) the iniquity of us all (Isa. liii. 6), and he is said to have borne our sins, even the punishment of them, in his own body upon the tree, 1 Pet. ii. 24. Secondly, The consequence of this was that all the iniquities of Israel were carried into a land of forgetfulness. Thus Christ, the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world, by taking it upon himself, John i. 29. And, when God forgives sin, he is said to remember it no more (Heb. viii. 12), to cast it behind his back (Isa. xxxviii. 17), into the depths of the sea (Mic. vii. 19), and to separate it as far as the east is from the west, Ps. ciii. 12.

(2) The entrance into heaven which Christ made for us is here typified by the high priest's entrance into the most holy place. This the apostle has expounded (Heb. ix. 7, &c.), and he shows, [1] That heaven is the holiest of all, but not of that building, and that the way into it by faith, hope, and prayer, through a Mediator, was not then so clearly manifested as it is to us now by the gospel. [2] That Christ our high priest entered into heaven at his ascension once for all. [3] That he entered by his own blood (Heb. ix. 12), sprinkling his blood, as it were, before the mercy-seat, where it speaks better things than the blood of bulls and goats could do. Hence he is said to appear in the midst of the throne as a lamb that had been slain, Rev. v. 6. The intercession of Christ is there set forth before God as incense, as this incense. And as the high priest interceded for himself first, then for his household, and then for all Israel, so our Lord Jesus, in the xviith of St. John, recommended himself first to his Father, then his disciples who were his household, and then all that should believe on him through their word, as all Israel.

2. Here are likewise typified the two great gospel duties of faith and repentance, by which we are qualified for the atonement, and come to be entitled to the benefit of it. (1) By faith we must put our hands upon the head of the offering, relying on Christ as the Lord our Righteousness, pleading his satisfaction as that which was alone able to atone for our sins and procure us a pardon. "Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me." (2) By repentance we must afflict our souls; not only fasting for a time from the delights of the body, but inwardly sorrowing for our sins, and living a life of self-denial and mortification.

CHAP. XVII

In this chapter we have two prohibitions necessary for the preservation of the honour of that atonement. I. That no sacrifice should be offered by any other than the priests, nor anywhere but at the door of the tabernacle, and this upon pain of death, ver. 1–9. II. That no blood should be eaten, and this under the same penalty, ver. 10, &c.

Verses 1–9

This statute obliged all the people of Israel to bring all their sacrifices to God's altar, to be offered there.

I. How it stood before. 1. It was allowed to all people to build altars, and offer sacrifices to God, where they pleased. 2. This liberty had been an occasion of idolatry. The Israelites themselves had learned in Egypt to sacrifice to demons. And some of them, it should seem, practised it even since the God of Israel had so gloriously appeared for them, and with them.

II. How this law settled it. It is hard to construe this as a temporary law, when it is expressly said to be a statute for ever (v. 7); and therefore it should seem rather to forbid only the killing of beasts for sacrifice anywhere but at God's altar. They must not offer sacrifice, as they had done, in the open field (v. 5), no, not to the true God, but it must be brought to the priest, to be offered on the altar of the Lord. If any should transgress this law, and offer sacrifice anywhere but at the tabernacle, 1. The guilt was great: Blood shall be imputed to that man; he hath shed blood, v. 4. Idolatrous sacrifices were looked upon, not only as adultery, but as murder: he that offereth them is as if he slew a man, Isa. lxvi. 3. 2. The punishment should be severe: That man shall be cut off from among his people.

III. How this law was observed. 1. While the Israelites kept their integrity they had a tender and very jealous regard to this law, as appears by their zeal against the altar which was erected by the two tribes and a half, which they would by no means have left standing if they had not been satisfied that it was never designed, nor should ever be used, for sacrifice or offering, Josh. xxii. 12, &c. 2. The breach of this law was for many ages the corruption of the Jewish church, witness that complaint which so often occurs in the history even of the good kings, Howbeit the high places were not taken away; and it was an inlet to the grossest idolatries.

IV. How the matter stands now, and what use we are to make of this law. 1. It is certain that the spiritual sacrifices we are now to offer are not confined to any one place. We have now no temple nor altar that sanctifies the gift, nor does the gospel unity lie in one place, but in one heart, and the unity of the spirit. 2. Christ is our altar, and the true tabernacle (Heb. viii. 2; xiii. 10); in Him God dwells among us, and it is in him that our sacrifices are acceptable to God, and in him only, 1 Pet. ii. 5.

Verses 10–16

We have here, A repetition and confirmation of the law against eating blood. We have met with this prohibition twice before in the levitical law (ch. iii. 17; vii. 26), besides the place it had in the precepts of Noah, Gen. ix. 4. But here, 1. The prohibition is repeated again and again, and reference had to the former laws to this purport (v. 12). A great stress is laid upon it, as a law which has more in it than at first view one would think. 2. It is made binding, not only on the house of Israel, but on the strangers that sojourned among them (v. 10). 3. The penalty annexed to this law is very severe (v. 10). 4. A reason is given for this law (v. 11): because it is the blood that makes atonement for the soul. The sinner deserved to die; therefore the sacrifice must die. Now, the blood being so—that ordinarily beasts were killed for man's use by the drawing out of all their blood—God appointed the sprinkling or pouring out of the blood of the sacrifice upon the altar to signify that the life of the sacrifice was given to God instead of the sinner's life, and as a ransom or counterprice for it; therefore without shedding of blood there was no remission, Heb. ix. 22. For this reason they must eat no blood, and, (1) It was then a very good reason; for God would by this means preserve the honour of that way of atonement which he had instituted. But, (2) This reason is now superseded, which intimates that the law itself was ceremonial, and is now no longer in force: the blood of Christ who has come is that alone which makes atonement for the soul, and of which the blood of the sacrifices was an imperfect type. The blood, provided it be so prepared as not to be unwholesome, is now allowed for the nourishment of our bodies, because it is no longer appointed to make an atonement for the soul.

CHAP. XVIII

Here is, I. A general law against all conformity to the corrupt usages of the heathen, ver. 1–5. II. Particular laws, 1. Against incest, ver. 6–18. 2. Against beastly lusts, and barbarous idolatries, ver. 19–23. III. The enforcement of these laws from the ruin of the Canaanites, ver. 24–30.

Verses 1–5

After divers ceremonial institutions, God here returns to the enforcement of moral precepts. The former are still of use to us as types, the latter still binding as laws. We have here, 1. The sacred authority by which these laws are enacted: I am the Lord your God (v. 2, 4, 30). 2. A strict caution to take heed of retaining the relics of the idolatries of Egypt, where they had dwelt, and of receiving the infection of the idolatries of Canaan, whither they were now going, v. 3. If we keep God's commandments in sincerity, though we come short of sinless perfection, we shall find that the way of duty is the way of comfort, and will be the way to happiness. It is the description of the righteousness which is by the law, the man that doeth them shall live ἐν αὐτοῖς—in them (Rom. x. 5), and is urged to prove that the law is not of faith, Gal. iii. 12. The alteration which the gospel has made is in the last word: still the man that does them shall live, but not live in them; for the law could not give life, because we could not perfectly keep it. He shall owe his life to the grace of Christ, and not to the merit of his own works; see Gal. iii. 21, 22.

Verses 6–18

These laws relate to the seventh commandment.

I. That which is forbidden as to the relations here specified is approaching to them to uncover their nakedness, v. 6.

1. It is chiefly intended to forbid the marrying of any of these relations. Marriage is a divine institution, intended for the comfort of human life, and the decent and honourable propagation of the human race, such as became the dignity of man's nature above that of the beasts. These prohibitions, besides their being enacted by an incontestable authority, are in themselves highly reasonable and equitable. (1) By marriage two were to become one flesh, therefore those that before were in a sense one flesh by nature could not, without the greatest absurdity, become one flesh by institution. (2) Marriage puts an equality between husband and wife. The inequality between master and servant, noble and ignoble, is founded in consent and custom, and there is no harm done if that be taken away by the equality of marriage; but the inequality between parents and children, uncles and nieces, aunts and nephews, either by blood or marriage, is founded in nature, and cannot without confusion be taken away by the equality of marriage. (3) No relations that are equals are forbidden, except brothers and sisters, by the whole blood or half blood, or by marriage. The making use of the ordinance of marriage for the patronising of incestuous mixtures is so far from justifying them, or extenuating their guilt, that it adds the guilt of profaning an ordinance of God, and prostituting that to the vilest of purposes which was instituted for the noblest ends. But,

2. Uncleanness, committed with any of these relations out of marriage, is likewise forbidden here.

II. The relations forbidden are most of them plainly described; and it is generally laid down as a rule that what relations of a man's own he is bound up from marrying the same relations of his wife he is likewise forbidden to marry, for they two are one. That law which forbids marrying a brother's wife (v. 16) had an exception peculiar to the Jewish state, that, if a man died without issue, his brother or next of kin should marry the widow, and raise up seed to the deceased (Deut. xxv. 5), for reasons which held good only in that commonwealth.

Verses 19–30

I. A law to preserve the honour of the marriage-bed, that it should not be unseasonably used (v. 19), nor invaded by an adulterer, v. 20.

II. A law against that which was the most unnatural idolatry, causing their children to pass through the fire to Moloch, v. 21. Moloch (as some think) was the idol in and by which they worshipped the sun, that great fire of the world; and therefore in the worship of it they made their own children either sacrifices to this idol, burning them to death before it, or devotees to it, causing them to pass between two fires, as some think, or to be thrown through one, to the honour of this pretended deity, imagining that the consecrating of but one of their children in this manner to Moloch would procure good fortune for all the rest of their children.

III. A law against unnatural lusts, sodomy and bestiality, sins not to be named nor thought of without the utmost abhorrence imaginable, v. 22, 23. Other sins level men with the beasts, but these sink them much lower.

IV. Arguments against these and the like abominable wickednesses. 1. Sinners defile themselves with these abominations. All sin is defiling to the conscience, but these are sins that have a peculiar turpitude in them. 2. The souls that commit them shall be cut off, v. 29. Fleshly lusts war against the soul, and will certainly be the ruin of it if God's mercy and grace prevent not. For these and the like sins the Canaanites were to be destroyed.

V. The chapter concludes with a sovereign antidote against this infection: Therefore you shall keep my ordinance that you commit not any one of these abominable customs, v. 30. A close and constant adherence to God's ordinances is the most effectual preservative from the infection of gross sin. It is the grace of God only that will secure us, and that grace is to be expected only in the use of the means of grace.

CHAP. XIX

I. The laws of this chapter, which were peculiar to the Jews, are, 1. Concerning their peace-offerings, ver. 5–8. 2. Concerning the gleanings of their fields, ver. 9, 10. 3. Against mixtures of their cattle, seed, and cloth, ver. 19. 4. Concerning their trees, ver. 23–25. 5. Against some superstitious usages, ver. 26–28. But, II. Most of these precepts are binding on us, for they are expositions of most of the ten commandments. 1. Here is the preface to the ten commandments, "I am the Lord," repeated fifteen times. 2. A sum of the ten commandments. All the first table in this, "Be you holy," ver. 2. All the second table in this, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour" (ver. 18), and an answer to the question, "Who is my neighbour?" ver. 33, 34. 3. Something o each commandment. (1) The first commandment implied in that which is often repeated here, "I am your God." And here is a prohibition of enchantment (ver. 26) and witchcraft (ver. 31), which make a god of the devil. (2) Idolatry, against the second commandment, is forbidden, ver. 4. (3) Profanation of God's name, against the third, ver. 12. (4) Sabbath-sanctification is pressed, ver. 3, 30. (5) Children are required to honour their parents (ver. 3), and the aged, ver. 32. (6) Hatred and revenge are here forbidden, against the sixth commandment, ver. 17, 18. (7) Adultery (ver. 20–22), and whoredom, ver. 29. (8) Justice is here required in judgment (ver. 15), theft forbidden (ver. 11), fraud and withholding dues (ver. 13), and false weights, ver. 35, 36. (9) Lying, ver. 11. Slandering, ver. 14. Tale-bearing, and false-witness bearing, ver. 16. (10) The tenth commandment laying a restraint upon the heart, so does that (ver. 17), "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart." And here is a solemn charge to observe all these statutes, ver. 37. Now these are things which need not much help for the understanding of them, but require constant care and watchfulness for the observing of them. "A good understanding have all those that do these commandments."

Verses 1–10

Moses is ordered to deliver the summary of the laws to all the congregation of the children of Israel (v. 2). Many of the precepts here given they had received before, but it was requisite that they should be repeated, that they might be remembered. In these verses it is required,

I. That Israel be a holy people, because the God of Israel is a holy God, v. 2. And this is now the law of Christ. You shall be holy, for I am holy, 1 Pet. i. 15, 16. Israel was sanctified by the types and shadows (ch. xx. 8), but we are sanctified by the truth, or substance of all those shadows, John xvii. 17; Tit. ii. 14.

II. That children be obedient to their parents: "You shall fear every man his mother and his father," v. 3. 1. The fear here required includes inward reverence and esteem, outward expressions of respect, obedience to the lawful commands of parents, care and endeavour to please them and make them easy, and to avoid everything that may offend and grieve them, and incur their displeasure. The Jewish doctors ask, "What is this fear that is owing to a father?" And they answer, "It is not to stand in his way nor to sit in his place, not to contradict what he says nor to carp at it, not to call him by his name, either living or dead, but 'My Father,' or 'Sir'; it is to provide for him if he be poor, and the like." 2. Children, when they grow up to be men, must not think themselves discharged from this duty: every man, though he be a wise man, and a great man, yet must reverence his parents, because they are his parents. 3. The mother is put first, which is not usual, to show that the duty is equally owing to both. 4. It is added, and keep my sabbaths. If God provides by his law for the preserving of the honour of parents, parents must use their authority over their children for the preserving of the honour of God, particularly the honour of his sabbaths. The ruin of young people has often been observed to begin in the contempt of their parents and the profanation of the sabbath day. 5. The reason added to both these precepts is, "I am the Lord your God; the Lord of the sabbath and the God of your parents."

III. That God only be worshipped, and not by images (v. 4): "Turn you not to idols, to Elilim, to vanities, things of no power, no value, gods that are no gods. You are the work of God's hands, be not so absurd as to worship gods the work of your own hands."

IV. That the sacrifices of their peace-offerings should always be offered, and eaten, according to the law, v. 5–8.

V. That they should leave the gleanings of their harvest and vintage for the poor, v. 9, 10. When they gathered in their corn, they must leave some standing in the corner of the field; the Jewish doctors say, "It should be a sixtieth part of the field"; and they must also leave the gleanings and the small clusters of their grapes, which at first were overlooked.

Verses 11–18

We are taught here,

I. To be honest and true in all our dealings, v. 11. Whatever we have in the world, we must see to it that it be honestly come by, for we cannot be truly rich, nor long rich, with that which is not.

II. To maintain a very reverent regard to the sacred name of God (v. 12).

III. Neither to take nor keep anyone's right from him, v. 13. We must not take that which is none of our own, either by fraud or robbery; nor detain that which belongs to another. Let the day-labourer have his wages as soon as he has done his day's work, if he desire it.

IV. To be particularly tender of the credit and safety of those that cannot help themselves, v. 14. 1. The credit of the deaf: Thou shalt not curse the deaf; that is, not only those that are naturally deaf, that cannot hear at all, but also those that are absent, and at present out of hearing. 2. The safety of the blind we must likewise be tender of, and not put a stumbling-block before them; for this is to add affliction to the afflicted. This prohibition implies a precept to help the blind, and remove stumbling-blocks out of their way. The Jewish writers, thinking it impossible that any should be so barbarous as to put a stumbling-block in the way of the blind, understood it figuratively, that it forbids giving bad counsel to those that are simple and easily imposed upon, by which they may be led to do something to their own prejudice.

V. Judges and all in authority are here commanded to give verdict and judgment without partiality (v. 15). Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, Exod. xxiii. 3. Whatever may be given to a poor man as an alms, yet let nothing be awarded him as his right but what he is legally entitled to, nor let his poverty excuse him from any just punishment for a fault. The Jews say, "Judges were obliged by this law to be so impartial as not to let one of the contending parties sit while the other stood, nor permit one to say what he pleased and bid the other be short"; see James ii. 1–4.

VI. We are all forbidden to do anything injurious to our neighbour's good name (v. 16), either, 1. In common conversation: Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer. The word used for a tale-bearer signifies a pedlar, or petty chapman, the interlopers of trade; for tale-bearers pick up ill-natured stories at one house and utter them at another, and commonly barter slanders by way of exchange. See this sin condemned, Prov. xi. 13; xx. 19; Jer. ix. 4, 5; Ezek. xxii. 9. Or, 2. In witness-bearing: Neither shalt thou stand as a witness against the blood of thy neighbour, if his blood be innocent. The Jewish doctors put this further sense upon it: "He that can by his testimony clear one that is accused is obliged by this law to do it"; see Prov. xxiv. 11, 12.

VII. We are commanded to rebuke our neighbour in love (v. 17): 1. Rather rebuke him than hate him for an injury done to thyself. If we apprehend that our neighbour has any way wronged us, we must not conceive a secret grudge against him, and estrange ourselves from him. We must rather endeavour to convince our brother of the injury, reason the case fairly with him. This is the rule our Saviour gives in the case, Luke xvii. 3. 2. Therefore rebuke him for his sin against God, because thou lovest him. Note, Friendly reproof is a duty we owe to one another, and we ought both to give it and take it in love. Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be a kindness, Ps. cxli. 5.

VIII. We are here required to put off all malice, and to put on brotherly love, v. 18. 1. We must be ill-affected to none. 2. We must be well-affected to all: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. We must do to our neighbour as we would be done to ourselves (Matt. vii. 12), putting our souls into his soul's stead, Job xvi. 4, 5. Nay, we must in many cases deny ourselves for the good of our neighbour, as Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19, &c. Herein the gospel goes beyond even that excellent precept of the law; for Christ, by laying down his life for us, has taught us even to lay down our lives for the brethren, in some cases (1 John iii. 16), and so to love our neighbour better than ourselves.

I. A law against mixtures, v. 19. God in the beginning made the cattle after their kind (Gen. i. 25), and we must acquiesce in the order of nature God hath established, believing that is best and sufficient, and not covet monsters. The sowing of mingled corn and the wearing of linsey-woolsey garments are forbidden, either as superstitious customs of the heathen or to intimate how careful they should be not to mingle themselves with the heathen nor to weave any of the usages of the Gentiles into God's ordinances. Ainsworth suggests that it was to lead Israel to the simplicity and sincerity of religion.

II. A law for punishing adultery committed with one that was a bondmaid that was espoused, v. 20–22. It was for the honour of marriage, though but begun by betrothing, that the crime should be punished; but it was for the honour of freedom that it should not be punished as the debauching of a free woman was, so great was the difference then made between bond and free (Gal. iv. 30); but the gospel of Christ knows no such distinction, Col. iii. 11.

III. A law concerning fruit trees, that for the first three years after they were planted, if they should happen to be so forward as to bear in that time, yet no use should be made of the fruit, v. 23–25. It was therefore the practice of the Jews to pluck off the fruit, as soon as they perceived it knit, from their young trees, as gardeners do sometimes, because their early bearing hinders their growing. If any did come to perfection, it was not to be used in the service either of God or man; but what they bore the fourth year was to be holy to the Lord, either given to the priests, or eaten before the Lord with joy, as their second tithe was, and thenceforward it was all their own. This law in the case of fruit trees seems to be parallel with that in the case of animals, that no creature should be accepted as an offering till it was past eight days old, nor till that day were children to be circumcised; see ch. xxii. 27. God would have the first-fruits of their trees, but, because for the first three years they were as inconsiderable as a lamb or a calf under eight days old, therefore God would not have them, for it is fit he should have every thing at its best; and yet he would not allow them to be used, because his first-fruits were not as yet offered: they must therefore be accounted as uncircumcised, that is, as an animal under eight days old, not fit for any use.

IV. A law against the superstitious usages of the heathen, v. 26–28. 1. Eating upon the blood, as the Gentiles did, who gathered the blood of their sacrifices into a vessel for their demons (as they fancied) to drink. The blood of God's sacrifices was to be sprinkled on the altar, and then poured at the foot of it, and conveyed away. 2. Enchantment and divination, and a superstitious observation of the times, some days and hours lucky and others unlucky. Curious arts of this kind, it is likely, had been of late invented by the Egyptian priests. It would be unpardonable in those to whom were committed the oracles of God to ask counsel of the devil, and yet worse in Christians to whom the Son of God is manifested, who has destroyed the work of the devil. For Christians to have their nativities cast, and their fortunes told them, to use spells and charms for the cure of diseases and the driving away of evil spirits, to be affected with the falling of the salt, a hare crossing the way, cross days, or the like, is an intolerable affront to the Lord Jesus, a support of paganism and idolatry, and a reproach both to themselves and to that worthy name by which they are called. 3. There was a superstition even in trimming themselves used by the heathen, which must not be imitated by the people of God: You shall not round the corners of your heads. Those that worshipped the hosts of heaven, in honour of them, cut their hair so that their heads might resemble the celestial globe; but, as the custom was foolish in itself, so, being done with respect to their false gods, it was idolatrous. 4. The rites and ceremonies by which they expressed their sorrow at their funerals must not be imitated, v. 28. They must not make cuts or prints in their flesh for the dead; for the heathen did so to pacify the infernal deities. Christ by his sufferings has altered the property of death, and made it a true friend to every true Israelite; and now, as there needs nothing to make death propitious to us, so we sorrow not as those that have no hope. Lastly, The prostituting of their daughters to uncleanness, which is here forbidden (v. 29), seems to have been practised by the heathen in their idolatrous worships.

I. A law for the preserving of the honour of the time and place appropriated to the service of God, v. 30. 1. Sabbaths must be religiously observed. 2. The sanctuary must be reverenced. Though now there is no place holy by divine institution, as the tabernacle and temple then were, yet this law obliges us to respect the solemn assemblies of Christians for religious worship, as being held under a promise of Christ's special presence in them.

II. A caution against all communion with those that were in league with familiar spirits: "Regard them not, seek not after them, be not in fear of any evil from them nor in hopes of any good from them.

III. A charge to young people to show respect to the aged: Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, v. 32. Those whom God has honoured with the common blessing of long life we ought to honour. Those who in age are wise and good are worthy of double honour; their credit and comfort must be carefully consulted, and their counsels asked and hearkened to, Job xxxii. 6, 7. Note, Religion teaches good manners, and obliges us to give honour to those to whom honour is due.

IV. A charge to the Israelites to be very tender of strangers, v. 33, 34. "Thou shalt not vex a stranger, but love him as thyself, and as one of thy own people." Strangers are God's particular care, as the widow and the fatherless are, because it is his honour to help the helpless, Ps. cxlvi. 9. It argues a generous disposition, and a pious regard to God, as a common Father, to be kind to strangers. But here is a reason added peculiar to the Jews: "For you were strangers in the land of Egypt. God then favoured you, therefore do you now favour the strangers."

V. Justice in weights and measures is here commanded. That there should be no cheat in them, v. 35. That they should be very exact, v. 36.

VI. The chapter concludes with a general command (v. 37): You shall observe all my statutes, and do them.

CHAP. XX

In this chapter we have, I. Many particular crimes that are made capital. 1. Giving their children to Molech, ver. 1–5. 2. Consulting witches, ver. 6, 27. 3. Cursing parents, ver. 9. 4. Adultery, ver. 10. 5. Incest, ver. 11, 12, 14, 17, 19–21. 6. Unnatural lusts, ver. 13, 15, 16, 18. II. General commands given to be holy, ver. 7, 8, 22–26.

Verses 1–9

I. Three sins are in these verses threatened with death:—

1. Parents abusing their children, by sacrificing them to Molech, v. 2, 3. It was not enough to tell them they might spare their children, but they must be told, (1) That the criminal himself should be put to death as a murderer: The people of the land shall stone him with stones (v. 2), which was looked upon as the worst capital punishment among the Jews. (2) That all his aiders and abetters should be cut off likewise by the righteous hand of God. If his neighbours concealed him, and would not come in as witnesses against him,—if the magistrates connived at him, and would not pass sentence upon him, rather pitying his folly than hating his impiety,—God himself would reckon with them, v. 4, 5.

2. Children's abusing their parents, by cursing them, v. 9. If children should speak ill of their parents, or wish ill to them, or carry it scornfully or spitefully towards them, it was an iniquity to be punished by the judges, who were employed as conservators both of God's honour and of the public peace, which were both attacked by this unnatural insolence.

3. Persons abusing themselves by consulting such as have familiar spirits, v. 6. By this, as much as any thing, a man diminishes, disparages, and deceives himself, and so abuses himself. What greater madness can there be than for a man to go to a liar for information, and to an enemy for advice? Those do so who turn after those that deal in the black art, and know the depths of Satan.

II. In the midst of these particular laws comes in that general charge, v. 7, 8, where we have,

1. The duties required; and they are two: (1) That in our principles, affections, and aims, we be holy: Sanctify yourselves and be you holy. (2) That in all our actions, and in the whole course of our conversation, we be obedient to the laws of God: You shall keep my statutes. Make the tree good, and the fruit will be good.

2. The reasons to enforce these duties. (1) "I am the Lord your God; therefore be holy, that you may resemble him whose people you are, and may be pleasing to him. Holiness becomes his house and household." (2) I am the Lord who sanctifieth you. God sanctifieth them by peculiar privileges, laws, and favours, which distinguished them from all other nations, and dignified them as a people set apart for God. He gave them his word and ordinances to be means of their sanctification, and his good Spirit to instruct them.

Sins against the seventh commandment are here ordered to be severely punished.

I. Lying with another man's wife was made a capital crime. The adulterer and the adulteress that had joined in the sin must fall alike under the sentence: they shall both be put to death, v. 10.

II. Incestuous connections, whether by marriage or not.

III. The unnatural lusts of sodomy and bestiality (sins not to be mentioned without horror) were to be punished with death.

Verses 22–27

The last verse is a particular law, which comes in after the general conclusion, as if omitted in its proper place: it is for the putting of those to death that dealt with familiar spirits, v. 27. Those that are in league with the devil have in effect made a covenant with death.

The rest of these verses repeat and inculcate what had been said before.

I. Their dignity. They had the Lord for their God, v. 24. They were his, his care, his choice, his treasure.

II. Their duty; this is inferred from their dignity. God had done more for them than for others, and therefore expected more from them than from others.

III. Their danger. They were going into an infected place (v. 24): You shall inherit their land, a land flowing indeed with milk and honey, which they would have the comfort of if they kept their integrity; but, withal, it was a land full of idols, idolatries, and superstitious usages, which they would be apt to fall in love with, having brought from Egypt with them a strange disposition to take that infection.

CHAP. XXI

This chapter is a law obliging priests with the utmost care and jealousy to preserve the dignity of their priesthood. I. The inferior priests are here charged both concerning their mourning and concerning their marriages and their children, ver. 1–9. II. The high priest is restrained more than any of them, ver. 10–15. III. Neither the one nor the other must have any blemish, ver. 16, &c.

Verses 1–9

It was before appointed that the priests should teach the people the statutes God had given concerning the difference between clean and unclean, ch. x. 10, 11. Now here it is provided that they should themselves observe what they were to teach the people. The priests were to draw nearer to God than any of the people, and to be more intimately conversant with sacred things, and therefore it was required of them that they should keep at a greater distance than others from every thing that was defiling.

I. They must take care not to disparage themselves in their mourning for the dead. "It made a man ceremonially unclean to come within six feet of a dead corpse"; nay, it is declared (Num. xix. 14) that all who come into the tent where the dead body lies shall be unclean seven days. 1. The priests should never put themselves under this incapacity of coming into the sanctuary, unless it were for one of their nearest relations, v. 1–3. 2. They must not be extravagant in the expressions of their mourning. Their mourning must not be either, (1) Superstitious, according to the manner of the heathen, who cut off their hair, and let out their blood, in honour of the imaginary deities which presided (as they thought) in the congregation of the dead, that they might engage them to be propitious to their departed friends. Nor, (2) Must it be passionate or immoderate. Note, God's ministers must be examples to others of patience under affliction, particularly that which touches in a very tender part, the death of their near relations.

II. They must take care not to degrade themselves in their marriage, v. 7. A priest must not marry a woman of ill fame, that either had been guilty or was suspected to have been guilty of uncleanness.

III. Their children must be afraid of doing any thing to disparage them (v. 9): If the daughter of any priest play the whore, her crime is great; she not only polluteth but profaneth herself: other women have not that honour to lose that she has, who, as one of a priest's family, has eaten of the holy things, and is supposed to have been better educated than others.

Verses 10–15

More was expected from a priest than from other people, but more from the high priest than from other priests, because upon his head the anointing oil was poured. It is called the crown of the anointing oil of his God (v. 12); for the anointing of the Spirit is, to all that have it, a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty. The high priest being thus dignified,

I. He must not defile himself at all for the dead, no, not for his nearest relations, his father or his mother, much less his child or brother, v. 11. Our Lord Jesus, the great high priest of our profession, touched the dead body of Jairus's daughter, the bier of the widow's son, and the grave of Lazarus, to show that he came to alter the property of death, and to take off the terror of it, by breaking the power of it. Now that it cannot destroy it does not defile.

II. He might not marry a widow (as other priests might), much less one divorced, or a harlot, v. 13, 14. The reason of this was to put a difference between him and other priests in this matter.

III. He might not profane his seed among his people, v. 15. It may be a caution to him in disposing of his children; he must not profane his seed by marrying them unsuitably. Ministers' children are profaned if they be unequally yoked with unbelievers.

The priesthood being confined to one particular family, and entailed upon all the male issue of that family throughout their generations, it was very likely that some or other in after-ages that were born to the priesthood would have natural blemishes and deformities.

I. The law concerning priests that had blemishes was, 1. That they might live upon the altar (v. 22): He shall eat of the sacrifices with the other priests, even the most holy things, such as the show-bread and the sin-offerings, as well as the holy things, such as the tithes and first-fruits, and the priests' share of the peace-offerings. The blemishes were such as they could not help, and therefore, though they might not work, they must not starve. 2. Yet they must not serve at the altar, at either of the altars, nor be admitted to attend or assist the other priests in offering sacrifice of burning incense, v. 17, 21, 23. It was for the credit of the sanctuary that none should appear there who were any way disfigured, either by nature or accident.

II. Under the gospel, 1. Those that labour under any such blemishes as these have reason to thank God that they are not thereby excluded from offering spiritual sacrifices to God; nor, if otherwise qualified for it, from the office of the ministry. There is many a healthful beautiful soul lodged in a crazy deformed body. Yet, 2. We ought to infer hence how incapable those are to serve God acceptably whose minds are blemished and deformed by any reigning vice. Those are unworthy to be called Christians, and unfit to be employed as ministers, that are spiritually blind, and lame, and crooked, whose sins render them scandalous and deformed, so as that the offerings of the Lord are abhorred for their sakes.

CHAP. XXII

In this chapter we have divers laws concerning the priests and sacrifices, all for the preserving of the honour of the sanctuary. I. That the priests should not eat of the holy things in their uncleanness, ver. 1–9. II. That no stranger who did not belong to some family of the priests should eat of the holy things (ver. 10–13), and, if he did it unwittingly, he must make restitution, ver. 14–16. III. That the sacrifices which were offered must be without blemish, ver. 17–25. IV. That they must be more than eight days old (ver. 26–28), and that the sacrifices of thanksgiving must be eaten the same day they were offered, ver. 29, &c.

Verses 1–9

Those that had a natural blemish, though they were forbidden to do the priests' work, were yet allowed to eat of the holy things: and the Jewish writers say that "to keep them from idleness they were employed in the wood-room, to pick out that which was worm-eaten, that it might not be used in the fire upon the altar; they might also be employed in the judgment of leprosy": but,

I. Those that were under any ceremonial uncleanness, which possibly they contracted by their own fault, might not so much as eat of the holy things while they continued in their pollution.

II. As to the design of this law we may observe, 1. This obliged the priests carefully to preserve their purity, and to dread every thing that would defile them. 2. This impressed the people with a reverence for the holy things.

Verses 10–16

The holy things were to be eaten by the priests and their families.

I. Here is a law that no stranger should eat of them, that is, no person whatsoever but the priests only, and those that pertained to them, v. 10. The priests are charged with this care, not to profane the holy things by permitting the strangers to eat of them (v. 15) or suffer them to bear the iniquity of trespass (v. 16). Note, We must not only be careful that we do not bear iniquity ourselves, but we must do what we can to prevent others bearing it.

II. Here is an explanation of the law, showing who were to be looked upon as belonging to the priest's family, and who not. 1. Sojourners and hired servants abode not in the house for ever; they were in the family, but not of it; and therefore they might not eat of the holy things (v. 10): but the servant that was born in the house or bought with money, being a heirloom to the family, though a servant, yet might eat of the holy things, v. 11. 2. As to the children of the family, concerning the sons there could be no dispute, they were themselves priests, but concerning the daughters there was a distinction. While they continued in their father's house they might eat of the holy things; but, if they married such as were not priests, they lost their right (v. 12). 3. Here is a demand of restitution to be made by him that had no right to the holy things, and yet should eat of them unwittingly, v. 14.

III. This law might be dispensed with in a case of necessity, as it was when David and his men ate of the show-bread, 1 Sam. xxi. 6. And our Saviour justifies them, and gives a reason for it, which furnishes us with a lasting rule in all such cases, that God will have mercy and not sacrifice, Matt. xii. 3, 4, 7. Rituals must give way to morals.

Verses 17–33

Here are four laws concerning sacrifices:—

I. Whatever was offered in sacrifice to God should be without blemish, otherwise it should not be accepted. Moreover a difference is made between what was brought as a free-will offering and what was brought as a vow, v. 23. According to this law great care was taken to search all the beasts that were brought to be sacrificed, that there might, to a certainty, be no blemish in them. The heathen priests were many of them not so strict in this matter, but would receive sacrifices for their gods that were ever so scandalous; but let strangers know that the God of Israel would not be so served. It is an instruction to us to offer to God the best we have in our spiritual sacrifices. If our devotions are ignorant, and cold, and trifling, and full of distractions, we offer the blind, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice.

II. That no beast should be offered in sacrifice before it was eight days old, v. 26, 27. It was provided before that the firstlings of their cattle, which were to be dedicated to God, should not be brought to him till after the eighth day, Exod. xxii. 30. Here it is provided that no creature should be offered in sacrifice till it was eight days old complete. Sooner than that it was not fit to be used at men's tables, and therefore not at God's altar.

III. That the dam and her young should not both be killed in one day, whether in sacrifice or for common use, v. 28. It looked ill-natured towards the species to kill two generations at once, as if one designed the ruin of the kind.

IV. That the flesh of their thank-offerings should be eaten on the same day that they were sacrificed, v. 29, 30. This is a repetition of what we had before, ch. vii. 15; xix. 6, 7. The chapter concludes with such a general charge as we have often met with, to keep God's commandments, and not to profane his holy name, v. 31, 32.

CHAP. XXIII

Hitherto the levitical law has been chiefly conversant about holy persons, holy things, and holy places; in this chapter we have the institution of holy times. I. The weekly feast of the sabbath, ver. 3. II. The yearly feasts, 1. The passover, and the feast of unleavened bread (ver. 4–8), to which was annexed the offering of the sheaf of firstfruits, ver. 9–14. 2. Pentecost, ver. 15–22. 3. The solemnities of the seventh month. The feast of trumpets on the first day (ver. 23–25), the day of atonement on the tenth day (ver. 26–32), and the feast of tabernacles on the fifteenth, ver. 33, &c.

Here is, I. A general account of the holy times which God appointed (v. 2), and it is only his appointment that can make time holy; for he is the Lord of time, and as soon as ever he had set its wheels a-going it was he that sanctified and blessed one day above the rest, Gen. ii. 3. Man may by his appointment make a good day (Esth. ix. 19), but it is God's prerogative to make a holy day. Now, concerning the holy times here ordained, observe, 1. They are called feasts. The day of atonement, which was one of them, was a fast; yet, because most of them were appointed for joy and rejoicing, they are in the general called feasts. Some read it, These are my assemblies, but I would rather read it, These are my solemnities; and, reading it so here, the day of atonement was as great a solemnity as any of them. 2. They are the feasts of the Lord (my feasts). 3. They were proclaimed; for they were not to be observed by the priests only that attended the sanctuary, but by all the people. 4. They were to be sanctified and solemnized with holy convocations, that the services of these feasts might appear the more honourable and august, and the people the more unanimous in the performance of them.

II. A repetition of the law of the sabbath in the first place. Though the annual feasts were made more remarkable by the general attendance at the sanctuary, yet these must not eclipse the brightness of the sabbath, v. 3. Christ appointed the New Testament sabbath to be a holy convocation, by meeting his disciples once and again (and perhaps oftener) on the first day of the week. "Whether you have opportunity of sanctifying it in a holy convocation or not, yet let it be the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings. Put a difference between that day and other days in your families.

Verses 4–14

Here again the feasts are called the feasts of the Lord, because he appointed them. They were most of them times of joy and rejoicing. The weekly sabbath is so, and all their yearly solemnities, except the day of atonement. God would thus teach them that wisdom's ways are pleasantness, and engage them to his service by encouraging them to be cheerful in it and to sing at their work. Seven days were days of strict rest and holy convocations; the first day and the seventh of the feast of unleavened bread, the day of pentecost, the day of the feast of trumpets, the first day and the eighth of the feast of tabernacles, and the day of atonement: here were six for holy joy and one only for holy mourning.

I. A repetition of the law of the passover, which was to be observed on the fourteenth day of the first month, in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt and the distinguishing preservation of their first-born, mercies never to be forgotten.

II. An order for the offering of a sheaf of the first-fruits, upon the second day of the feast of unleavened bread; the first is called the sabbath, because it was observed as a sabbath (v. 11), and, on the morrow after, they had this solemnity. A sheaf or handful of new corn was brought to the priest, who was to heave it up, in token of his presenting it to the God of Heaven, and to wave it to and fro before the Lord, as the Lord of the whole earth, and this should be accepted for them as a thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy to them in clothing their fields with corn, and of their dependence upon God, and desire towards him, for the preserving of it to their use. And the offering of this sheaf of first-fruits in the name of the whole congregation did, as it were, sanctify to them their whole harvest. We find that when they came into Canaan the manna ceased upon the very day that the sheaf of first-fruits was offered; they had eaten of the old corn the day before (Josh. v. 11), and then on this day they offered the first-fruits, by which they became entitled to the new corn too (v. 12), so that there was no more occasion for manna. This sheaf of first-fruits was typical of our Lord Jesus, who has risen from the dead as the first-fruits of those that slept, 1 Cor. xv. 20. They were not to eat of their new corn till God's part was offered to him out of it (v. 14), for we must always begin with God, begin our lives with him, begin every day with him, begin every meal with him, begin every affair and business with him; seek first the kingdom of God.

Here is the institution of the feast of pentecost, or weeks, as it is called (Deut. xvi. 9), because it was observed fifty days, or seven weeks, after the passover. It is also called the feast of harvest, Exod. xxiii. 16. For as the presenting of the sheaf of first-fruits was an introduction to the harvest, and gave them liberty to put in the sickle, so they solemnized the finishing of their corn-harvest at this feast. 1. Then they offered a handful of ears of barley, now they offered two loaves of wheaten bread, v. 17. This was leavened. At the passover they ate unleavened bread, but now at pentecost it was leavened, because it was an acknowledgment of God's goodness to them in their ordinary food, which was leavened. 2. With that sheaf of first-fruits they offered only one lamb for a burnt-offering, but with these loaves of first-fruits they offered seven lambs, two rams, and one bullock, all for a burnt-offering, so giving glory to God, as the Lord of their harvest. They offered likewise a kid for a sin-offering, and lastly, two lambs for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, to beg a blessing upon the corn they had gathered in. 3. That one day was to be kept with a holy convocation, v. 21. It was one of the days on which all Israel was to meet God and one another, at the place which the Lord should choose. Some suggest that whereas seven days were to make up the feast of unleavened bread there was only one day appointed for the feast of pentecost, because this was a busy time of the year with them, and God allowed them speedily to return to their work in the country. This annual feast was instituted in remembrance of the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai, the fiftieth day after they came out of Egypt. But the period and perfection of this feast was the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles on the day of this feast (Acts ii. 1), in which the law of faith was given, fifty days after Christ our passover was sacrificed for us.

To the institution of the feast of pentecost is annexed a repetition of that law by which they were required to leave the gleanings of their fields, and the corn that grew on the ends of the butts, for the poor, v. 22. It also taught them that the joy of harvest should express itself in charity to the poor.

Verses 23–32

I. The institution of the feast of trumpets, on the first day of the seventh month, v. 24, 25. That which is here made peculiar to this festival is that it was a memorial of blowing of trumpets. They blew the trumpet every new moon (Ps. lxxxi. 3), but in the new moon of the seventh month it was to be done with more than ordinary solemnity; for they began to blow at sun-rise and continued till sun-set. Now, 1. This is here said to be a memorial, perhaps of the sound of the trumpet upon Mount Sinai when the law was given, which must never be forgotten. 2. The Jewish writers suppose it to have a spiritual signification. Now at the beginning of the year they were called by this sound of trumpet to shake off their spiritual drowsiness, to search and try their ways, and to amend them: the day of atonement was the ninth day after this; and thus they were awakened to prepare for that day, by sincere and serious repentance. 3. It was typical of the preaching of the gospel, by which joyful sound souls were to be called in to serve God and keep a spiritual feast to him.

II. A repetition of the law of the day of atonement, that is, so much of it as concerned the people. 1. They must on this day rest from all manner of work. The reason is: For it is a day of atonement. He that would do the work of a day of atonement in its day, as it should be done, had need lay aside the thoughts of every thing else. 2. They must afflict their souls, and this upon pain of being cut off by the hand of God, v. 27, 29, 32. They must mortify the body, and deny the appetites of it. 3. The entire day must be observed: From even to even you shall afflict your souls (v. 32).

We have here, I. The institution of the feast of tabernacles, which was one of the three great feasts at which all the males were bound to attend, and celebrated with more expressions of joy than any of them.

1. As to the directions for regulating this feast, observe, (1) It was to be observed five days after the day of atonement. We may suppose, though they were not all bound to attend on the day of atonement, as on the three great festivals, yet that many of the devout Jews came up so many days before the feast of tabernacles as to enjoy the opportunity of attending on the day of atonement. The afflicting of their souls on the day of atonement prepared them for the joy of the feast of tabernacles. The more we are grieved and humbled for sin, the better qualified we are for the comforts of the Holy Ghost. (2) It was to continue eight days, the first and last of which were to be observed as sabbaths. (3) During the first seven days of this feast all the people were to leave their houses, and the women and children in them, and to dwell in booths made of the boughs of thick trees, particularly palm trees, v. 40, 42. (4) They were to rejoice before the Lord God during all the time of this feast, v. 40. The tradition of the Jews is that they were to express their joy by dancing, and singing hymns of praise to God, with musical instruments.

2. As to the design of this feast,

(1) It was to be kept in remembrance of their dwelling in tents in the wilderness.

(2) It was a feast of in-gathering, so it is called, Exod. xxiii. 16.

II. The summary and conclusion of these institutions.

1. God appointed these feasts (v. 37, 38), besides the sabbaths and your free-will offerings. God's institutions leave room for free-will offerings. The feasts of the Lord, declared unto us, are not so numerous, nor the observance of them so burdensome and costly, as theirs then were, but more spiritual and significant, and surer sweeter earnests of the everlasting feast, at the last in-gathering.

CHAP. XXIV

In this chapter we have, I. A repetition of the laws concerning the lamps and the show-bread, ver. 1–9. II. A violation of the law against blasphemy, with the imprisonment, trial, condemnation, and execution, of the blasphemer, ver. 10–14, with ver. 23. III. The law against blasphemy reinforced (ver. 15, 16), with sundry other laws, ver. 17, &c.

Verses 1–9

Care is here taken, and orders are given, for the decent furnishing of the candlestick and table in God's house.

I. The lamps must always be kept burning. 1. The people were to provide oil (v. 2), the best, pure olive-oil, beaten, probably it was double-strained. Ministers are as burning and shining lights in Christ's church, but it is the duty of people to provide comfortably for them, as Israel for the lamps. Scandalous maintenance makes a scandalous ministry. 2. The priests were to tend the lamps; they must snuff them, clean the candlestick, and supply them with oil, morning and evening, v. 3, 4. Thus it is the work of the ministers of the gospel to hold forth that word of life, not to set up new lights, but, by expounding and preaching the word, to make the light of it more clear and extensive.

II. The table must always be kept spread. This was appointed before, Exod. xxv. 30. 1. There was a loaf for every tribe, for in our Father's house there is bread enough. Even after the revolt of the ten tribes this number of loaves was continued (2 Chron. xiii. 11), for the sake of those few of each tribe that retained their affection to the temple and continued their attendance on it. 2. A handful of frankincense was put in a golden saucer. When the bread was removed, and given to the priests, this frankincense was burnt upon the golden altar for a memorial instead of the bread, as a humble acknowledgment, and all the loaves were consigned to the priests. 3. Every sabbath it was renewed. Christ's ministers should provide new bread for his house every sabbath day, the production of their fresh studies in the scripture, that their proficiency may appear to all, II Tim. iv. 1, 5.

Verses 10–23

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws. We have here an account of the evil manners of a certain nameless mongrel Israelite, and the good laws occasioned thereby.

I. The offender was the son of an Egyptian father and an Israelitish mother (v. 10); his mother was of the tribe of Dan, v. 11. This notice is taken of his parentage either, 1. To intimate what occasioned the quarrel he was engaged in. The Jews say, "He offered to set up his tent among the Danites in the right of his mother, but was justly opposed by some or other of that tribe, and informed that his father being an Egyptian he had no part nor lot in the matter, but must look upon himself as a stranger." Or, 2. To show the common ill effect of such mixed marriages.

II. The occasion of the offence was contention: He strove with a man of Israel.

III. The offence itself was blasphemy and cursing, v. 11. 1. He blasphemed the name of the Lord. It is probable that finding himself aggrieved by the divine appointment, which separated between the Israelites and strangers, he impudently reproached both the law and the Law-maker, and set him at defiance. 2. He cursed either God himself or the person with whom he strove.

IV. The caution with which he was proceeded against for this sin. Moses himself would not give judgment hastily, but committed the offender into custody, till he had consulted the oracle in this case. They waited to know what was the mind of the Lord, whether he was to be put to death by the hand of the magistrate or to be left to the judgment of God.

V. Sentence passed upon this offender by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth himself: Let all the congregation stone him, v. 14.

VI. A standing law made upon this occasion for the stoning of blasphemers, v. 15, 16. Magistrates are the guardians of both tables, and ought to be as jealous for the honour of God against those that speak contemptuously of his being and government as for the public peace and safety against the disturbers of them.

VII. A repetition of some other laws annexed to this new law. 1. That murder should be punished with death (v. 17, and again v. 21). 2. That maimers should in like manner be punished by the law of retaliation, v. 19, 20. This law we had before, Exod. xxii. 4, 5. And it was more agreeable to that dispensation, in which were revealed the rigour of the law and what sin deserved, than to the dispensation we are under, in which are revealed the grace of the gospel and the remission of sins: and therefore our Saviour has set aside this law (Matt. v. 38, 39), not to restrain magistrates from executing public justice, but to restrain us all from returning personal injuries and to oblige us to forgive as we are and hope to be forgiven. 3. That hurt done wilfully to a neighbour's cattle should be punished by making good the damage, v. 18, 21. 4. That strangers, as well as native Israelites, should be both entitled to the benefit of this law, so as not to suffer wrong, and liable to the penalty of this law in case they did wrong.

CHAP. XXV

The law of this chapter concerns the lands and estates of the Israelites in Canaan, the occupying and transferring of which were to be under the divine direction, as well as the management of religious worship; for, as the tabernacle was a holy house, so Canaan was a holy land. God appointed, I. That every seventh year should be a year of rest from occupying the land, a sabbatical year, ver. 1–7. II. That every fiftieth year should be a year of jubilee, that is, 1. A year of release of debts and mortgages, and return to the possession of their alienated lands, ver. 8–17. Particular directions are given, (1) Concerning the sale and redemption of lands, ver. 23–28. (2) Of houses in cities and villages, with a proviso for Levite-cities, ver. 29–34 2. A year of release of servants and bond-slaves. (1) Here is inserted a law for the kind usage of poor debtors, ver. 35–38. (2) Then comes the law for the discharge of all Israelites that were sold for servants, in the year of jubilee, if they were not redeemed before. [1] If they were sold to Israelites, ver. 39–46. And [2] If sold to proselytes, ver. 47–55.

Verses 1–7

The law of Moses laid a great deal of stress upon the sabbath; that law not only revived the observance of the weekly sabbath, but, for the further advancement of the honour of them, added the institution of a sabbatical year: In the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, v. 4. This sabbatical year began in September, at the end of harvest, the seventh month of their ecclesiastical year: and the law was, 1. That at the seed-time, which immediately followed the end of their in-gathering, they should sow no corn in their land, and that they should not in the spring dress their vineyards, and consequently that they should not expect either harvest or vintage the next year. 2. That what their ground did produce of itself they should not claim any property or use in, otherwise than from hand to mouth, but leave it for the poor, servants, strangers, and cattle, v. 5–7. It must be a sabbath of rest to the land; they must neither do any work about it, nor expect any fruit from it; all annual labours must be intermitted in the seventh year, as much as daily labours on the seventh day. It was a kindness to their land to let it rest sometimes, and would keep it in heart (as our husbandmen express it) for posterity, whose satisfaction God would have them to consult, and not to use the ground as if it were designed only for one age. 3. This year of rest typified the spiritual rest which all believers enter into through Christ, our true Noah, who giveth us comfort and rest concerning our work, and the toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed, Gen. v. 29.

Verses 8–22

The general institution of the jubilee, v. 8, &c.

1. When it was to be observed: after seven sabbaths of years (v. 8).

2. How it was to be proclaimed, with sound of trumpet in all parts of the country (v. 9), both to give notice to all persons of it, and to express their joy and triumph in it; and the word jobel, or jubilee, is supposed to signify some particular sound of the trumpet distinguishable from any other. The trumpet was sounded in the close of the day of atonement. When their peace was made with God, then liberty was proclaimed.

3. What was to be done in that year extraordinary; besides the common rest of the land, which was observed every sabbatical year (v. 11, 12), and the release of personal debts (Deut. xv. 2, 3), there was to be the legal restoration of every Israelite to all the property, and all the liberty, which had been alienated from him since the last jubilee.

(1) The property which every man had in his dividend of the land of Canaan could not be alienated any longer than till the year of jubilee. Now this was no wrong to the purchaser, because the year of jubilee was fixed, and every man knew when it would come, and made his bargain accordingly. They shall not have power to sell, but only to make leases for any term of years, not going beyond the next jubilee. By this means it was provided, That the distinction of tribes should be kept up; that none should grow exorbitantly rich, by laying house to house, and field to field (Isa. v. 8), but should rather apply themselves to the cultivating of what they had than the enlarging of their possessions.

(2) The liberty which every man was born to, if it were sold or forfeited, should likewise return at the year of jubilee: You shall return every man to his family, v. 10. Those that were sold into other families thereby became strangers to their own; but in this year of redemption they were to return.

II. A law upon this occasion against oppression in buying and selling of land; neither the buyer nor the seller must overreach, v. 14–17. It must be settled what the clear yearly value of the land was, and then how many years' purchase it was worth till the year of jubilee. It is easy to observe that the nearer the jubilee was the less must the value of the land be. According to the fewness of the years thou shalt diminish the price.

III. Assurance given them that they should be no losers, but great gainers, by observing these years of rest. It is promised, 1. That they should be safe: You shall dwell in the land in safety, v. 18, and again v. 19. The word signifies both outward safety and inward security and confidence of spirit. 2. That they should be rich: You shall eat your fill. 3. That they should not want food convenient that year in which they did neither sow nor reap: I will command my blessing in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years, v. 21. It was intended for an encouragement to all God's people, in all ages, to trust him in the way of duty, and to cast their care upon him.

Here is, 1. A law concerning the real estates of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, and the transferring of them. No land should be sold for ever from the family to whose lot it fell in the division of the land. And the reason given is, The land is mine, and you are strangers and sojourners with me, v. 23. If a man was constrained through poverty to sell his land for the subsistence of his family, yet, if afterwards he was able, he might redeem it before the year of jubilee (v. 24, 26, 27), and the price must be settled according to the number of years since the sale and before the jubilee. If the person himself was not able to redeem it, his next kinsman might (v. 25): The redeemer thereof, he that is near unto him, shall come and shall redeem, so it might be read. The kinsman is called Goel, the redeemer (Num. v. 8; Ruth iii. 9), to whom belonged the right of redeeming the land. And this typified Christ, who assumed our nature, that he might be our kinsman. If the land was not redeemed before the year of jubilee, then it should return of course to him that had sold or mortgaged it: In the jubilee it shall go out, v. 28. This was a figure of the free grace of God towards us in Christ, by which we are restored to the favour of God, and become entitled to paradise, from which our first parents were expelled for disobedience. A difference was made between houses in walled cities, and lands in the country, or houses in country villages. Houses in walled cities were more the fruits of their own industry than land in the country, which was the immediate gift of God's bounty; and therefore, if a man sold a house in a city, he might redeem it any time within a year after the sale, but otherwise it was confirmed to the purchaser for ever, and should not return, no, not at the year of the jubilee, v. 29, 30. This provision was made to encourage strangers and proselytes to come and settle among them. Though they could not purchase land in Canaan to them and their heirs, yet they might purchase houses in walled cities. A clause is added in favour of the Levites, by way of exception from these rules.

II. A law for the relief of the poor, and the tender usage of poor debtors, and these are of more general and perpetual obligation than the former.

1. The poor must be relieved, v. 35. Here is, (1) Our brother's poverty and distress supposed. All men are to be looked upon and treated as brethren, for we have all one Father, Mal. ii. 10. (2) Our duty enjoined: Thou shalt relieve him. By sympathy, pitying the poor; by service, doing for them; and by supply, giving to them according to their necessity and thy ability.

2. Poor debtors must not be oppressed: If thy brother be waxen poor, and have occasion to borrow money of thee for the necessary support of his family, take thou no usury of him, either for money or victuals, v. 36, 37.

We have here the laws concerning servitude, designed to preserve the honour of the Jewish nation as a free people, and rescued by a divine power out of the house of bondage, into the glorious liberty of God's sons, his first-born. Now the law is,

I. That a native Israelite should never be made a bondman for perpetuity. If he was sold for debt, or for a crime, by the house of judgment, he was to serve but six years, and to go out the seventh; this was appointed, Exod. xxi. 2. But if he sold himself through extreme poverty, having nothing at all left him to preserve his life, and if it was to one of his own nation that he sold himself, in such a case it is here provided, 1. That he should not serve as a bond-servant (v. 39), nor be sold with the sale of a bondman (v. 42). He shall serve thee as a hired servant, whom the master has the use of only. God had redeemed them out of Egypt, and therefore they must never be exposed to sale as bondmen. 2. That while he did serve he should not be ruled with rigour, as the Israelites were in Egypt, v. 43. Both his work and his usage must be such as were fitting for a son of Abraham. 3. That at the year of jubilee he should go out free, he and his children, and should return to his own family, v. 41. For ten days before the jubilee-trumpet sounded, the servants that were to be discharged by it did express their great joy by feasting, and wearing garlands on their heads.

II. That they might purchase bondmen of the heathen nations that were round about them for the year of jubilee should give no discharge to them, v. 44, 46.

III. That if an Israelite sold himself for a servant to a wealthy proselyte that sojourned among them care should be taken that he should have the same advantages as if he had sold himself to an Israelite, and in some respects greater. 1. That he should not serve as a bondman, but as a hired servant. Also he was to go free at the year of jubilee, v. 54. 2. That he should have this further advantage that he might be redeemed again before the year of jubilee, v. 48, 49.

CHAP. XXVI

This chapter is a solemn conclusion of the main body of the levitical law. The precepts that follow in this and the following book are repetitions and explications. Now this chapter contains a general enforcement of all those laws by promises of reward in case of obedience, and threatenings of punishment for disobedience, the former to work upon hope, the latter on fear, those two handles of the soul, by which it is taken hold of and managed. Here is, I. A repetition of two or three of the principal commandments, ver. 1, 2. II. An inviting promise of all good things, if they would but keep God's commandments, ver. 3–13. III. A terrible threatening of ruining judgments which would be brought upon them if they were refractory and disobedient, ver. 14–39. IV. A gracious promise of mercy to those of them that would repent and reform, ver. 40, &c. Deut. xxviii. is parallel to this.

Here is, I. The inculcating of those precepts of the law which were of the greatest consequence, and by which especially their obedience would be tried, v. 1, 2. They are the abstract of the second and fourth commandments. 1. "Be sure you never worship images, nor ever make any sorts of images or pictures for a religious use," v. 1. Next to God's being, unity, and universal influence, it is necessary that we know and believe that he is an infinite Spirit; and therefore to represent him by an image in the making of it, to confine him to an image in the consecrating of it, and to worship him by an image in bowing down to it, changes his truth into a lie and his glory into shame, as much as any thing. 2. "Be sure you keep up a great veneration for sabbaths and religious assemblies," v. 2. As nothing tends more to corrupt religion than the use of images in devotion, so nothing contributes more to the support of it than keeping the sabbaths and reverencing the sanctuary. These make up very much of the instrumental part of religion, by which the essentials of it are kept up.

II. Great encouragements given them to live in constant obedience to all God's commandments. Human governments enforce their laws with penalties to be inflicted for the breach of them; but God will be known as the rewarder of those that seek and serve him. 1. Plenty and abundance of the fruits of the earth. Before they had reaped their corn and threshed it, the vintage would be ready; and, before they had finished their vintage, it would be high time to begin their sowing. The plenty should be so great that they should bring forth the old to be given away to the poor because of the new, to make room for it in their barns. 2. Peace under the divine protection: "You shall dwell in your land safely (v. 5); both really safe, and safe in your own apprehensions; you shall lie down to rest in the power and promise of God, and not only none shall hurt you, but none shall so much as make you afraid," v. 6. See Ps. iv. 8. 3. Victory and success in their wars abroad, while they had peace and tranquillity at home, v. 7, 8. 4. The increase of their people: I will make you fruitful and multiply you, v. 9. 5. The favour of God, which is the fountain of all good: I will have respect unto you, v. 9. If the eye of our faith be unto God, the eye of his favour will be unto us. 6. Tokens of his presence in and by his ordinances: I will set my tabernacle among you, v. 11. 7. The grace of the covenant, as the fountain and foundation, the sweetness and security, of all these blessings: I will establish my covenant with you, v. 9. Let them perform their part of the covenant, and God would not fail to perform his. All covenant-blessings are summed up in the covenant-relation (v. 12): I will be your God, and you shall be my people; and they are all grounded upon their redemption: I am your God, because I brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, v. 13.

After God had set the blessing before them he here sets the curse before them, the death and evil which would make them miserable if they were disobedient.

I. How their sin is described, which would bring all this misery upon them. Not sins of ignorance and infirmity; God had provided sacrifices for those. Not the sins they repented of and forsook; but the sins that were presumptuously committed, and obstinately persisted in. Two things would certainly bring this ruin upon them:—

1. A contempt of God's commandments (v. 14). Their sin is supposed to begin in mere carelessness, and neglect, and omission. (1) Despising God's statutes, both the duties enjoined and the authority enjoining them, thinking meanly of the law and the Law-maker. (2) Abhorring his judgments, their very souls abhorring them. Those that turn from it will turn against it, and their hearts will rise at it. (3) Breaking his covenant. When men have come to such a pitch of impiety as to despise and abhor the commandment, the next step will be to disown God, and all relation to him. Those that reject the precept will come at least to renounce the covenant.

2. A contempt of his corrections. Even their disobedience would not have been their destruction if they had not been obstinate and impenitent in it, notwithstanding the methods God took to reclaim them. Three ways this is expressed:—(1) "If you will not for all this hearken to me," v. 18, 21, 27. (2) If you walk contrary to me, v. 21, 23, 27. All sinners walk contrary to God, to his truths, laws, and counsels; but those especially that are incorrigible under his judgments. (3) If you will not be reformed by these things. God's design in punishing is to reform, by giving men sensible convictions of the evil of sin, and obliging them to seek unto him for relief: this is the primary intention; but those that will not be reformed by the judgments of God must expect to be ruined by them.

II. How the misery is described which their sin would bring upon them, under two heads:—

1. God himself would be against them; and this is the root and cause of all their misery. Those that cast off God deserve that he should cast them off. Those that are obstinate and incorrigible, when they have weathered one storm must expect another more violent.

2. The whole creation would be at war with them.

(1) Temporal judgments threatened. [1] Diseases of body, which should be epidemical. [2] Famine and scarcity of bread. [3] Your choice men shall die in battle, and those that hate you shall reign over you, and justly, since you are not willing that the God that loved you should reign over you, 2 Chron. xii. 8. [4] Wild beasts, lions, bears, and wolves, which should increase upon them. [5] Captivity, or dispersion: I will scatter you among the heathen (v. 33), in your enemies' land, v. 34. Never were any people so incorporated and united among themselves as they were; but for their sin God would scatter them, so that they should be lost among the heathen, from whom God had graciously distinguished them, but with whom they had wickedly mingled themselves. [6] The utter ruin and desolation of their land, which should be so remarkable that their very enemies themselves, who had helped it forward, should in the review be astonished at it, v. 32. First, Their cities should be waste. Secondly, Their sanctuaries should be a desolation. Thirdly, The country itself should be desolate, not tilled or husbanded (v. 34, 35). [7] The destruction of their idols: I will destroy your high places, v. 30. Those that will not be parted from their sins by the commands of God shall be parted from them by his judgments; since they would not destroy their high places, God would.

(2) Spiritual judgments are here threatened. These should seize the mind; for he that made the mind can, when he pleases, make his sword approach to it. It is here threatened, [1] That they should find no acceptance with God: I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours, v. 31. [2] That they should have no courage in their wars, but should be quite dispirited and disheartened. [3] That they should have no hope of the forgiveness of their sins (v. 39).

Here the chapter concludes with gracious promises of the return of God's favour to them upon their repentance, that they might not (unless it were their own fault) pine away in their iniquity. As bad as things are, they may be mended. Yet there is hope in Israel.

I. How the repentance which would qualify them for this mercy is described, v. 40, 41. The instances of it are three:—1. Confession, by which they must give glory to God, and take shame to themselves. They must in their confession put sin under its worst character, as walking contrary to God. 2. Remorse and godly sorrow for sin: If their uncircumcised heart be humbled. An impenitent, unbelieving, unhumbled heart, is called an uncircumcised heart, the heart of a Gentile that is a stranger to God, rather than the heart of an Israelite in covenant with him. True circumcision is of the heart (Rom. ii. 29), without which the circumcision of the flesh avails nothing, Jer. ix. 26. A humble heart under humbling providences prepares for deliverance and true comfort. 3. Submission to the justice of God in all his dealings; if they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity (v. 41 and again v. 43), that is, if they justify God and condemn themselves, then they are penitents indeed.

II. How the mercy which they should obtain upon their repentance is described. 1. They should not be abandoned: Though they have despised my judgments, yet, for all that, I will not cast them away, v. 43, 44. He speaks as a tender Father that cannot find in his heart to disinherit a son that has been very provoking. 2. They should be remembered: I will remember the land with favour, which is grounded upon the promise before, I will remember my covenant (v. 42), which is repeated, v. 45. God is said to remember the covenant when he performs the promises of it, purely for his faithfulness' sake. The word covenant is thrice repeated, to intimate that God is ever mindful of it and would have us to be so. When those that have walked contrary to God in a way of sin return to him by sincere repentance, though he has walked contrary to them in a way of judgment he will return to them in a way of special mercy, pursuant to the covenant of redemption and grace. None are so ready to repent as God is to forgive upon repentance, through Christ, who is given for a covenant.

CHAP. XXVII

Having given laws concerning instituted services, here he directs concerning vows and voluntary services, the free-will offerings of their mouth. Perhaps some devout serious people among them might be so affected with what Moses had delivered to them in the foregoing chapter as in a pang of zeal to consecrate themselves, or their children, or estates to him. Here is, I. The law concerning what was sanctified to God, persons (ver. 2–8), cattle, clean or unclean (ver. 9–13), houses and lands (ver. 14–25), with an exception of firstlings, ver. 26, 27. II. Concerning what was devoted, ver. 28, 29. III. Concerning tithes, ver. 30, &c.

This is part of the law concerning singular vows, extraordinary ones, which though God did not expressly insist on, yet, if they were consistent with and conformable to the general precepts, he would be well pleased with.

I. The case is here put of persons vowed to God by a singular vow, v. 2. If a man consecrated himself, or a child, to the service of the tabernacle, to be employed there in some inferior office, as sweeping the floor, carrying out ashes, running errands, or the like, the person so consecrated shall be for the Lord, that is, "God will graciously accept the good will." Thou didst well that it was in thy heart, 2 Chron. vi. 8. But forasmuch as he had no occasion to use their service about the tabernacle, a whole tribe being appropriated to the use of it, those that were thus vowed were to be redeemed, and the money paid for their redemption was employed for the repair of the sanctuary, or other uses of it, as appears by 2 Kings xii. 14, where it is called, in the margin, the money of the souls of his estimation. A book of rates is accordingly provided, by which the priests were to go in their estimation. The poor shall be valued according to their ability, v. 8. Something they must pay, that they might learn not to be rash in vowing to God. Yet not more than their ability, but that they might not ruin themselves and their families by their zeal.

II. The case is put of beasts vowed to God.

The law concerning real estates dedicated to the service of God by a singular vow.

I. Suppose a man, in his zeal for the honour of God, should sanctify his house to God (v. 14), the house must be valued by the priest, and the money got by the sale of it was to be converted to the use of the sanctuary, which by degrees came to be greatly enriched with dedicated things, 1 Kings xv. 15. If the owner be inclined to redeem it himself, he must not have it so cheap as another, but must add a fifth part to the price, for he should have considered before he had vowed it, v. 15.

II. Suppose a man should sanctify some part of his land to the Lord, giving it to pious uses, then a difference must be made between land that came to the donor by descent and that which came by purchase, and accordingly the case altered.

I. A caution given that no man should make such a jest of sanctifying things to the Lord as to sanctify any firstling to him, for that was his already by the law, v. 26.

II. Things or persons devoted are here distinguished from things or persons that were only sanctified. 1. Devoted things were most holy to the Lord, and could neither revert nor be alienated, v. 28. 2. Devoted persons were to be put to death, v. 29. Not that it was in the power of any parent or master thus to devote a child or a servant to death; but it must be meant of the public enemies of Israel.

III. A law concerning tithes, which were paid for the service of God before the law, as appears by Abraham's payment of them (Gen. xiv. 20), and Jacob's promise of them, Gen. xxviii. 22. It is here appointed, That they should pay tithe of all their increase, their corn, trees, and cattle, v. 30, 32. And we are taught in general to honour the Lord with our substance (Prov. iii. 9), and in particular to support and maintain his ministers, and to be ready to communicate to them, Gal. vi. 6; 1 Cor. ix. 11. And how this may be done in a fitter and more equal proportion than that of the tenth, which God himself appointed of old, I cannot see.

IV. The last verse seems to have reference to this whole book, of which it is the conclusion: These are the commandments which the Lord commanded Moses, for the children of Israel. Many of these commandments are moral, and of perpetual obligation; others of them, which were ceremonial and peculiar to the Jewish economy, have notwithstanding a spiritual significance, and are instructive to us who are furnished with a key to let us into the mysteries contained in them. Upon the whole matter, we may see cause to bless God that we have not come to Mount Sinai, Heb. xii. 18. 1. That we are not under the dark shadows of the law, but enjoy the clear light of the gospel, which shows us Christ the end of the law for righteousness, Rom. x. 4. The doctrine of our reconciliation to God by a Mediator is not clouded with the smoke of burning sacrifices, but cleared by the knowledge of Christ and him crucified. 2. That we are not under the heavy yoke of the law, and the carnal ordinances of it (as the apostle calls them, Heb. ix. 10), imposed till the time of reformation, a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear (Acts xv. 10), but under the sweet and easy institutions of the gospel, which pronounces those the true worshippers that worship the Father in spirit and truth, by Christ only, and in his name, who is our priest, temple, altar, sacrifice, purification, and all. Having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, let us draw near with a true heart, and in full assurance of faith, worshipping God with so much the more cheerfulness and humble confidence, still saying, Blessed be God for Jesus Christ!

THE FOURTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

NUMBERS

The titles of the five books of Moses, which we use in our Bibles, are all borrowed from the Greek translation of the Seventy, the most ancient version of the Old Testament that we know of. But the title of this book only we turn into English; in all the rest we retain the Greek word itself. This book was thus entitled because of the numbers of the children of Israel, so often mentioned in this book, and so well worthy to give a title to it, because it was the remarkable accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude. It also relates to two numberings of them, one at Mount Sinai (ch. i.), the other in the plains of Moab, thirty-nine years after, ch. xxvi. The book is almost equally divided between histories and laws, intermixed.

We have here, I. The histories of the numbering and marshalling of the tribes (ch. i.–iv.), the dedication of the altar and Levites (ch. vii., viii.), their march (ch. ix., x), their murmuring and unbelief, for which they were sentenced to wander forty years in the wilderness (ch. xi.–xiv.), the rebellion of Korah (ch. xvi., xvii.), the history of the last year of the forty (ch. xx.–xxvi), the conquest of Midian, and the settlement of the two tribes (ch. xxxi., xxxii.), with an account of their journeys, ch. xxxiii. II. Divers laws about the Nazarites, &c. (ch. v., vi.); and again about the priests' charge, &c. (ch. xviii., xix.), feasts (ch. xxviii., xxix.), and vows (ch. xxx.), and relating to their settlement in Canaan, ch. xxvii., xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi. An abstract of much of this book we have in a few words in Ps. xcv. 10, Forty years long was I grieved with this generation; and an application of it to ourselves in Heb. iv. 1, Let us fear lest we seem to come short. Many considerable nations were now in being, that dwelt in cities and fortified towns, of which no notice is taken, no account kept, by the sacred history: but very exact records are kept of the affairs of a handful of people, that dwelt in tents, and wandered strangely in a wilderness, because they were the children of the covenant. For the Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.

CHAP. I

Israel was now to be formed into a commonwealth, or rather a kingdom; for "the Lord was their King" (1 Sam. xii. 12), their government a theocracy, and Moses under him was king in Jeshurun, Deut. xxxiii. 5. Now, for the right settlement of this holy state, next to the institution of good laws was necessary the institution of good order; an account therefore must be taken of the subjects of this kingdom, which is done in this chapter, where we have, I. Orders given to Moses to number the people, ver. 1–4. II. Persons nominated to assist him herein, ver. 5–16. III. The particular number of each tribe, as it was given in to Moses, ver. 17–43. IV. The sum total of all together, ver. 44–46. V. An exception of the Levites, ver. 47, &c.

Verses 1–16

I. We have here a commission issued out for the numbering of the people of Israel; and David, long after, paid dearly for doing it without a commission. Here is,

1. The date of this commission, v. 1. (1) The place: it is given at God's court in the wilderness of Sinai, from his royal palace, the tabernacle of the congregation. (2) The time: In the second year after they came up out of Egypt; we may call it the second year of that reign. The laws in Leviticus were given in the first month of that year; these orders were given in the beginning of the second month.

2. The directions given for the execution of it, v. 2, 3. (1) None were to be numbered but the males, and those only such as were fit for war. (2) Nor were any to be numbered who through age, or bodily infirmity, blindness, lameness, or chronical diseases, were unfit for war. (3) The account was to be taken according to their families, that it might not only be known how many they were, and what were their names, but of what tribe and family, or clan, nay, of what particular house every person was; or, reckoning it the muster of an army, to what regiment every man belonged, that he might know his place himself and the government might know where to find him. They were numbered a little before this, when their poll-money was paid for the service of the tabernacle, Exod. xxxviii. 25, 26. But it should seem they were not then registered by the house of their fathers, as now they were.

3. Commissioners are named for the doing of this work. Moses and Aaron were to preside (v. 3), and one man of every tribe, that was renowned in his tribe, and was presumed to know it well, was to assist in it.

II. Why was this account ordered to be taken and kept? For several reasons. 1. To prove the accomplishment of the promise made to Abraham, that God would multiply his seed exceedingly, which promise was renewed to Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 14), that his seed should be as the dust of the earth. 2. It was to intimate the particular care which God himself would take of his Israel. God is called the Shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1. Now the shepherds always kept count of their flocks, and delivered them by number to their under-shepherds, that they might know if any were missing; in like manner God numbers his flock. 3. It was to put a difference between the true-born Israelites and the mixed multitude that were among them; none were numbered but Israelites. 4. It was in order to their being marshalled into several districts, for the more easy administration of justice, and their more regular march through the wilderness.

We have here the speedy execution of the orders given for the numbering of the people. It was begun the same day that the orders were given, The first day of the second month; compare v. 18 with v. 1.

In the particulars here left upon record, we may observe, 1. That the numbers are registered in words at length (as I may say), and not in figures; to every one of the twelve tribes it is repeated, for the greater ceremony and solemnity of the account, that they were numbered by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names. Thus every man might know who were his relations or next of kin, on which some laws we have already met with did depend. 2. That they all end with hundreds, only Gad with fifty (v. 25), but none of the numbers descend to units or tens. 3. That Judah is the most numerous of them all, more than double to Benjamin and Manasseh, and almost 12,000 more than any other tribe, v. 27. It was Judah whom his brethren must praise because from him Messiah the Prince was to descend. Judah was to lead the van through the wilderness, and therefore was furnished accordingly with greater strength than any other tribe.

Verses 44–46

We have here the sum total at the foot of the account; they were in all 600,000 fighting men, and 3,550 over. Some think that when this was their number some months before (Exod. xxxviii. 26) the Levites were reckoned with them, but now that tribe was separated for the service of God, yet so many more had by this time attained to the age of twenty years as that still they were the same number, to show that whatever we part with for the honour and service of God it shall certainly be made up to us one way or other.

Care is here taken to distinguish from the rest of the tribes the tribe of Levi, which, in the matter of the golden calf, had distinguished itself, Exod xxxii. 26. Note, Singular services shall be recompensed with singular honours.

I. It was the honour of the Levites that they were made guardians of the spiritualities; to them was committed the care of the tabernacle and the treasures thereof, both in their camps and in their marches. 1. When they moved the Levites were to take down the tabernacle, to carry it and all that belonged to it, and then to set it up again in the place appointed, v. 50, 51. It was for the honour of the holy things that none should be permitted to see them, or touch them, but those only who were called of God to the service. 2. When they rested the Levites were to encamp round about the tabernacle (v. 50, 53), that they might be near their work, and resident upon their charge, always ready to attend, and that they might be a guard upon the tabernacle, to preserve it from being either plundered or profaned.

II. It was their further honour that as Israel, being a holy people, was not reckoned among the nations, so they, being a holy tribe, were not reckoned among other Israelites, but numbered afterwards by themselves, v. 49.

CHAP. II

The thousands of Israel, having been mustered in the former chapter, in this are marshalled, and a regular disposition is made of their camp, by a divine appointment. Here is, I. A general order concerning it, ver. 1, 2. II. Particular directions for the posting of each of the tribes, in four distinct squadrons, three tribes in each squadron. 1. In the van-guard on the east were posted Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, ver. 3–9. 2. In the right wing, southward, Reuben, Simeon, and Gad, ver. 10–16. 3. In the rear, westward, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, ver. 18–24. 4. In the left wing, northward, Dan, Asher, and Napthali, ver. 25–31. 5. The tabernacle in the centre, ver. 17. III. The conclusion of this appointment, ver. 32, &c.

Verses 1–2

Here is the general appointment given both for their orderly encampment where they rested and their orderly march when they moved. 1. They all dwelt in tents, and when they marched carried all their tents along with them. 2. Those of a tribe were to pitch together, every man by his own standard. Those that are of kin to each other should, as much as they can, be acquainted with each other; and the bonds of nature should be improved for the strengthening of the bonds of Christian communion. 3. Every one must know his place and keep in it. 4. Every tribe had its standard, flag, or ensign, and it should seem every family had some particular ensign of their father's house. It is uncertain how these standards were distinguished: some conjecture that the standard of each tribe was of the same colour with the precious stone in which the name of that tribe was written in the high priest's ephod. Some of them say the four principal standards were, Judah a lion, Reuben a man, Joseph an ox, and Dan an eagle, making the appearances in Ezekiel's vision to allude to it. 5. They were to pitch about the tabernacle, which was to be in the midst of them, as the tent or pavilion of a general in the centre of an army. That they might be a guard and defence upon the tabernacle and the Levites on every side. 6. Yet they were to pitch afar off, in reverence to the sanctuary. It is supposed (from Josh. iii. 4) that the distance between the nearest part of the camp and the tabernacle was 2,000 cubits, that is, 1,000 yards, little more than half a measured mile with us.

We have here the particular distribution of the twelve tribes into four squadrons, three tribes in a squadron, one of which was to lead the other two. 1. God himself appointed them their place, to prevent strife and envy among them. If God in his providence advance others above us, and abase us, we ought to be as well satisfied in his doing it in that way as if he did it, as this was done here, by a voice out of the tabernacle. And as far as our place comes to be our choice our Saviour has given us a rule in Luke xiv. 8, Sit not down in the highest room; and another in Matt. xx. 27, He that will be chief, let him be your servant. Those that are most humble and most serviceable are really most honourable. 2. Every tribe had a captain, a prince, or commander-in-chief, whom God himself nominated, the same that had been appointed to number them, ch. i. 5. Most of them have El, God, at one end or other of their names. Nethaneel, the gift of God; Eliab, my God a Father; Elizur, my God a rock; Shelumiel, God my peace; Eliasaph, God has added; Elishama, my God has heard; Gamaliel, God my reward; Pagiel, God has met me. 3. Those tribes were placed together under the same standard that were nearest of kin to each other; Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, were the three younger sons of Leah, and they were put together; and Issachar and Zebulun would not grudge to be under Judah, since they were his younger brethren. Reuben and Simeon would not have been content in their place. Therefore Reuben, Jacob's eldest son, is made chief of the next squadron; Simeon, no doubt, is willing to be under him, and Gad, the son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, is fitly added to them in Levi's room: Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, are all the posterity of Rachel. Dan, the eldest son of Bilhah, is made a leading tribe, though the son of a concubine, that more abundant honour might be bestowed on that which lacked; and it was said, Dan should judge his people, and to him were added the two younger sons of the handmaids. Thus unexceptionable was the order in which they were placed. 4. The tribe of Judah was in the first post of honour, encamped towards the rising sun, and in their marches led the van, not only because it was the most numerous tribe, but chiefly because from that tribe Christ was to come. Judah was the first of the twelve sons of Jacob that was blessed. He therefore being first in blessing, though not in birth, is put first, to teach children how to value the smiles of their godly parents and dread their frowns. 5. The tribe of Levi pitched closely about the tabernacle, within the rest of their tribes, v. 17. They must defend the sanctuary, and then the rest of the tribes must defend them. Civil powers should protect the religious interests of a nation, and be a defence upon that glory. 6. The camp of Dan, though posted in the left wing when they encamped, was ordered in their march to bring up the rear, v. 31. They were the most numerous, next to Judah, and therefore were ordered into a post which, next to the front, required the most strength.

CHAP. III

This chapter and the next are concerning the tribe of Levi, which was to be mustered and marshalled by itself. The Levites are in this chapter considered, I. As attendants on, and assistants to, the priests in the temple-service. And so we have an account, 1. Of the priests themselves (ver. 1–4) and their work, ver. 10. 2. Of the gift of the Levites to them (ver. 5–9), in order to which they are mustered (ver. 14–16), and the sum of them taken, ver. 39. Each particular family of them is mustered, has its place assigned and its charge, the Gershonites (ver. 17–26), the Kohathites (ver. 27–32), the Merarites, ver. 33–39. II. As equivalents for the first-born, ver. 11–13. 1. The first-born are numbered, and the Levites taken instead of them, as far as the number of the Levites went, ver. 40–45. 2. What first-born there were more than the Levites were redeemed, ver. 46, &c.

Verses 1–13

I. The family of Aaron is confirmed in the priests' office, v. 10. They had been called to it before, and consecrated; here they are appointed to wait on their priests' office: the apostle uses this phrase (Rom. xii. 7), Let us wait on our ministry. The office of the ministry requires a constant attendance and great diligence; so frequent are the returns of its work, and yet so transient its favourable opportunities, that it must be waited on. The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death, which forbids the invading of the priests' office by any other person whatsoever; none must come nigh to minister but Aaron and his sons only, all others are strangers. It also lays a charge on the priests, as door-keepers in God's house, to take care that none should come near who were forbidden by the law.

II. A particular account is given of this family of Aaron; what we have met with before concerning them is here repeated. The two younger: Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the sight of Aaron. They kept under their father's eye, and took instruction from him in all they did, because probably Nadab and Abihu got out of their father's sight when they offered strange fire.

III. A grant is made of the Levites to be assistants to the priests in their work: Give the Levites to Aaron, v. 9. Aaron was to have a greater propriety in, and power over, the tribe of Levi than any other of the princes had in and over their respective tribes. Here is, 1. The service for which the Levites were designed: they were to minister to the priests in their ministration to the Lord (v. 6), and to keep Aaron's charge (v. 7). The Levites killed the sacrifices, and then the priests needed only to sprinkle the blood and burn the fat: the Levites prepared the incense, the priests burnt it. They were to keep, not only Aaron's charge, but the charge of the whole congregation. 2. The consideration upon which the Levites were demanded; they were taken instead of the first-born.

The Levites being granted to Aaron to minister to him, they are here delivered to him by tale, that he might know what he had, and employ them accordingly.

I. By what rule they were numbered: Every male from a month old and upward, v. 15. The rest of the tribes were numbered only from twenty years old and upwards, and of them those only that were able to go forth to war; but into the number of the Levites they must take in both infants and infirm; being exempted from the war, it was not insisted upon that they should be of age and strength for the wars. Though it appears afterwards that little more than a third part of the Levites were fit to be employed in the service of the tabernacle (about 8,000 out of 22,000, ch. iv. 47, 48), yet God would have them all numbered as retainers to his family.

II. How they were distributed into three classes, according to the number of the sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath and Merari, and these subdivided into several families, v. 17–20.

1. Concerning each of these three classes we have an account, (1) Of their number. (2) Of their post about the tabernacle on which they were to attend. The Gershonites pitched behind the tabernacle, westward, v. 23. The Kohathites on the right hand, southward, v. 29. The Merarites on the left hand, northward, v. 35. And, to complete the square, Moses and Aaron, with the priests, encamped in the front, eastward, v. 38. (3) Of their chief or head. As each class had its own place, so each had its own prince. (4) Of their charge, when the camp moved. The Gershonites were charged with the custody and carriage of all the curtains and hangings and coverings of the tabernacle and court (v. 25, 26), the Kohathites of all the furniture of the tabernacle—the ark, altar, table, &c. (v. 31, 32), the Merarites of the heavy carriage, boards, bars, pillars, &c., v. 36, 37.

2. Here we may observe, (1) That the Kohathites, though they were the second house, yet were preferred before the elder family of the Gershonites. Besides that Aaron and the priests were of that family, they were more numerous, and their post and charge more honourable, which probably was ordered to put an honour upon Moses, who was of that family. Yet, (2) The posterity of Moses were not at all dignified or privileged, but stood upon the level with other Levites.

III. The sum total of the numbers of this tribe. They are computed in all 22,000, v. 39. That which is especially observable here is that the tribe of Levi was by much the least of all the tribes.

Verses 40–51

Here is the exchange made of the Levites for the first-born. 1. The first-born were numbered from a month old, v. 42, 43. Bishop Patrick is decidedly of opinion that none were numbered but those only that were born since their coming out of Egypt, when the first-born were sanctified, Exod. xiii. 2. If there were 22,000 first-born males, we may suppose as many females, and all these brought forth in the first year after they came out of Egypt, we must hence infer that in the last year of their servitude, even when it was in the greatest extremity, there were abundance of marriages made among the Israelites; they were not discouraged by the present distress, but married in faith, expecting that God would shortly visit them with mercy, and that their children, though born in bondage, should live in liberty and honour. They were not only kept alive, but greatly increased, in a barren wilderness. 2. The number of the first-born, and that of the Levites, by a special providence, came pretty near to each other. 3. The small number of first-born which exceeded the number of the Levites (273 in all) were to be redeemed, at five shekels apiece, and the redemption money given to Aaron; for it would not do well to have them added to the Levites.

CHAP. IV

In the former chapter an account was taken of the whole tribe of Levi, in this we have an account of those of that tribe who were in the prime of their time for service, betwixt thirty and fifty years old. I. The serviceable men of the Kohathites are ordered to be numbered, and their charges are given them, ver. 2–20. II. Of the Gershonites, ver. 24–28. III. Of the Merarites, ver. 29–33. IV. The numbers of each, and the sum total at last, are recorded, ver. 34, &c.

Verses 1–20

We have here a second muster of the tribe of Levi. As that tribe was taken out of all Israel to be God's peculiar, so the middle-aged men of that tribe were taken from among the rest to be actually employed in the service of the tabernacle.

I. Who were to be taken into this number. All the males from thirty years old to fifty. The service of God requires the best of our strength, and the prime of our time, which cannot be better spent than to the honour of him who is the first and best. And a man may make a good soldier much sooner than a good minister.

1. They were not to be employed till they were thirty years old. They were entered as probationers at twenty-five years old (ch. viii. 24), and in David's time, when there was more work to be done, at twenty (1 Chron. xxiii. 24, and so Ezra iii. 8); but they must be five years learning and waiting, and so fitting themselves for service; in David's time they were ten years in preparation, from twenty to thirty. John Baptist began his public ministry, and Christ his, at thirty years old. This gives us two good rules:— (1) That ministers must not be novices, 1 Tim. iii. 6. It is a work that requires ripeness of judgment and great steadiness. (2) That they must learn before they teach, serve before they rule, and must first be proved, 1 Tim. iii. 10.

2. They were discharged at fifty years old from the toilsome part of the service, particularly that of carrying the tabernacle.

II. How their work is described. They are said to enter into the host, or warfare, to do the work in the tabernacle. Those that enter into the ministry must look upon themselves as entered into the host, and approve themselves good soldiers, 2 Tim. ii. 3. Now, as to the sons of Kohath in particular, here is,

1. Their service appointed them, in the removes of the tabernacle. Afterwards, when the tabernacle was fixed, they had other work assigned them; but this was the work of the day, which was to be done in its day. Now the Kohathites were to carry all the holy things of the tabernacle. (1) Aaron, and his sons the priests, must pack up the things which the Kohathites were to carry, as here directed, v. 5, &c. (2) All the holy things must be covered, the ark and table with three coverings, all the rest with two. Even the ashes of the altar, in which the holy fire was carefully preserved and raked up, must have a purple cloth spread over them, v. 13. Even the brazen altar, though in the court of the sanctuary it stood open to the view of all, yet was covered in the carriage of it. This signified the darkness of that dispensation. That which is now brought to light by the gospel, and revealed to babes, was then hidden from the wise and prudent. They saw only the coverings, not the holy things themselves (Heb. x. 1); but now Christ has destroyed the face of the covering, Isa. xxv. 7. (3) When all the holy things were covered, then the Kohathites were to carry them on their shoulders.

2. Eleazar, now the eldest son of Aaron, is appointed overseer of the Kohathites in this service (v. 16).

3. Great care must be taken to preserve the lives of these Levites, by preventing their irreverent approach to the most holy things: Cut you not off the Kohathites, v. 18. (1) The Kohathites must not see the holy things till the priests had covered them, v. 20. And, (2) When the holy things were covered, they might not touch them, at least not the ark, called here the holy thing, upon pain of death, v. 15. Thus were the Lord's ministers themselves then kept in fear, and that was a dispensation of terror, as well as darkness; but now, through Christ, the case is altered: we have seen with our eyes, and our hands have handled, the word of life (1 John i. 1), and we are encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace.

Verses 21–33

We have here the charge of the other two families of the Levites, which, though not so honourable as the first, yet was necessary, and was to be done regularly. 1. The Gershonites were charged with all the drapery of the tabernacle, the curtains, and hangings, and the coverings of badgers' skins, v. 22–26. 2. The Merarites were charged with the heavy carriage, the boards and bars, the pillars and sockets, the pins and cords, and these were delivered to them by name, v. 31, 32.

Verses 34–49

We have here a particular account of the numbers of the three families of the Levites respectively, that is, of the effective men, between thirty years old and fifty. The whole number of the able men of the tribe of Levi who entered into God's host to war his warfare was but 8,580, whereas the able men of the other tribes that entered into the host of Israel to war their warfare were many more. The least of the tribes had almost four times as many able men as the Levites, and some of them more than eight times as many; for those that are engaged in the service of this world, and war after the flesh, are many more than those that are devoted to the service of God, and fight the good fight of faith.

CHAP. V

In this chapter we have, I. An order, pursuant to the laws already made, for the removing of the unclean out of the camp, ver. 1–4. II. A repetition of the laws concerning restitution, in case of wrong done to a neighbour (ver. 5–8), and concerning the appropriating of the hallowed things to the priests, ver. 9, 10. III. A new law made concerning the trial of a wife suspected of adultery, by the waters of jealousy, ver. 11, &c.

Verses 1–10

I. A command for the purifying of the camp, by turning out from within its lines all those that were ceremonially unclean, by issues, leprosies, or the touch of dead bodies, until they were cleansed according to the law, v. 2, 3.

1. These orders are executed immediately, v. 4. The camp was now newly-modelled and put in order, and therefore, to complete the reformation of it, it is next to be cleansed. God's tabernacle was now fixed in the midst of their camp, and therefore they must be careful to keep it clean. The person, the place, in the midst of which God dwells, must not be defiled; for, if it be, he will be affronted, offended, and provoked to withdraw, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.

2. This expulsion of the unclean out of the camp was to signify, (1) What the governors of the church ought to do: they must separate between the precious and the vile, and purge out scandalous persons. It is for the glory of Christ and the edification of his church that those who are openly and incorrigibly profane and vicious should be put out and kept from Christian communion till they repent. (2) What God himself will do in the great day: he will throughly purge his floor, and gather out of his kingdom all things that offend. As here the unclean were shut out of the camp, so into the new Jerusalem no unclean thing shall enter, Rev. xxi. 27.

II. A law concerning restitution, in case of wrong done to a neighbour. 1. He must confess his sin, confess it to God, confess it to his neighbour, and so take shame to himself. 2. He must bring a sacrifice, a ram of atonement, v. 8. Satisfaction must be made for the offence done to God, whose law is broken, as well as for the loss sustained by our neighbour; restitution in this case is not sufficient without faith and repentance. 3. Yet the sacrifices would not be accepted till full amends were made to the party wronged, not only the principal, but a fifth part added to it, v. 7. If the party wronged was dead, and he had no near kinsman who was entitled to the debt, it must be given to the priest, v. 8. Note, Some work of piety or charity is a piece of necessary justice to be done by those who are conscious to themselves that they have done wrong, but know not how otherwise to make restitution.

III. A general rule concerning hallowed things given upon this occasion, that, whatever was given to the priest, his it shall be, v. 9, 10.

Verses 11–31

We have here the law concerning the solemn trial of a wife whose husband was jealous of her.

I. What was the case supposed: That a man had some reason to suspect his wife to have committed adultery, v. 12–14. The sin of adultery is justly represented as an exceedingly sinful sin. It is committing a trespass against the husband, robbing him of his honour, alienating his right, introducing a spurious breed into his family to share with his children in his estate, and violating her covenant with him. Hence, 1. Let all wives be admonished not to give any the least occasion for the suspicion of their chastity. 2. Let all husbands be admonished not to entertain any causeless or unjust suspicions of their wives. If charity in general, much more conjugal affection, teaches to think no evil, 1 Cor. xiii. 5.

II. What was the course prescribed in this case, that, if the suspected wife was innocent, she might not continue under the reproach and uneasiness of her husband's jealousy, and, if guilty, her sin might find her out, and others might hear, and fear, and take warning. Her husband must bring her to the priest, with the witnesses that could prove the ground of his suspicion, and desire that she might be put upon her trial. If she confessed, saying, "I am defiled," she was not put to death, but was divorced and lost her dowry; if she said, "I am pure," then they proceeded. God will find out some way or other to clear the innocency of the innocent, and to bring forth their righteousness as the light. To the pure all things are pure, but to the defiled nothing is so, Tit. i. 15.

CHAP. VI

In this chapter we have, I. The law concerning Nazarites, 1. What it was to which the vow of a Nazarite obliged him, ver. 1–8. 2. A remedial law in case a Nazarite happened to be polluted by the touch of a dead body, ver. 9–12. 3. The solemnity of his discharge when his time was up, ver. 13–21. II. Instructions given to the priests how they should bless the people, ver. 22, &c.

After the law for the discovery and shame of those that by sin had made themselves vile, there follows this for the direction and encouragement of those who by their eminent piety and devotion had made themselves honourable. There were those who went under the character of Nazarites, and were celebrated by that title as persons professing greater strictness and zeal in religion than other people. Joseph is called a Nazarite among his brethren (Gen. xlix. 26).

I. The general character of a Nazarite: it is a person separated unto the Lord, v. 2. Some were Nazarites for life, either by divine designation, as Samson (Judg. xiii. 5), and John Baptist (Luke i. 15), or by their parents' vow concerning them, as Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 11. Of these this law speaks not. Others were so for a certain time, and by their own voluntary engagement, and concerning them rules are given by this law. A woman might bind herself with the vow of a Nazarite, under the limitations we find, ch. xxx. 3. The Nazarites were, 1. Devoted to the Lord during the time of their Nazariteship, and, it is probable, spent much of their time in the study of the law, in acts of devotion, and instructing others. 2. They were separated from common persons and common things. 3. They separated themselves by vowing a vow. Every Israelite was bound by the divine law to love God with all his heart, but the Nazarites by their own act and deed bound themselves to some religious observances, as fruits and expressions of that love, which other Israelites were not bound to. Christ was called in reproach a Nazarene, so were his followers: but he was no Nazarite according to this law; he drank wine, and touched dead bodies, yet in him this type had its accomplishment, for in him all purity and perfection met; and every true Christian is a spiritual Nazarite, separated by vow unto the Lord.

II. The particular obligations that the Nazarites lay under.

1. They must have nothing to do with the fruit of the vine, v. 3, 4. They must drink no wine nor strong drink, nor eat grapes, no, not the kernel nor the husk; they might not so much as eat a raisin. Those who gave the Nazarites wine to drink did the tempter's work (Amos ii. 12), persuading them to that forbidden fruit. That it was reckoned a perfection and praise not to drink wine appears from the instance of the Rechabites, Jer. xxxv. 6. They were to drink no wine, (1) That they might be examples of temperance and mortification. Drinking a little wine for the stomach's sake is allowed, to help that, 1 Tim. v. 23. But drinking much wine for the palate's sake, to please that, does by no means become those who profess to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. (2) That they might be qualified to employ themselves in the service of God. They must not drink, lest they should forget the law (Prov. xxxi. 5), lest they should err through wine Isa. xxviii. 7. Let all Christians oblige themselves to be very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink; for, if the love of these once gets the mastery of a man, he becomes a very easy prey to Satan.

2. They must not cut their hair, v. 5. They must neither poll their heads nor shave their beards; this was that mark of Samson's Nazariteship which we often read of in his story. Now, (1) This signified a noble neglect of the body and the ease and ornament of it, which became those who, being separated to God, ought to be wholly taken up with their souls, to secure their peace and beauty. (2) Some observe that long hair is spoken of as a badge of subjection (1 Cor. xi. 5, &c.); so that the long hair of the Nazarites denoted their subjection to God, and their putting themselves under his dominion.

3. They must not come near any dead body, v. 6, 7.

4. All the days of their separation they must be holy to the Lord, v. 8.

III. The provision that was made for the cleansing of a Nazarite, if he happened unavoidably to contract a ceremonial pollution by the touch of a dead body. He must be purified from the ceremonial pollution he had contracted, as others must, upon the seventh day, v. 9. Nay, more was required for the purifying of the Nazarite than of any other person that had touched a dead body; he must bring a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, and an atonement must be made for him, v. 10, 11. This teaches us that sins of infirmity, and the faults we are overtaken in by surprise, must be seriously repented of, and that an application must be made of the virtue of Christ's sacrifice to our souls for the forgiveness of them every day, 1 John ii. 1, 2.

IV. The law for the solemn discharge of a Nazarite from his vow, when he had completed the time he fixed to himself. The Jews say that the time of a Nazarite's vow could not be less than thirty days; and if a man said, "I will be a Nazarite but for two days," yet he was bound for thirty; but it should seem Paul's vow was for only seven days (Acts xxi. 27). When the time of the vowed separation was out, he was to be made free, 1. Publicly, at the door of the tabernacle (v. 13). 2. It was to be done with sacrifices, v. 14. He must bring one of each sort of the instituted offerings. (1) A burnt-offering. (2) A sin-offering. (3) A peace-offering, in thankfulness to God, who had enabled him to fulfil his vow. (4) To these were added the meat-offerings and drink-offerings. (5) Part of the peace-offering, with a cake and wafer, was to be waved for a wave-offering (v. 19, 20); and this was a gratuity to the priest, who had it for his pains, after it had been first presented to God. (6) Besides all this, he might bring his free-will offerings, such as his hand shall get, v. 21. And, to grace the solemnity, it was common upon this occasion to have their friends to be at charges with them, Acts xxi. 24. Lastly, One ceremony more was appointed, which was like the cancelling of the bond when the condition is performed, and that was the cutting off of his hair, which had been suffered to grow all the time of his being a Nazarite, and burning it in the fire over which the peace-offerings were boiling, v. 18. This intimated that his full performance of his vow was acceptable to God in Christ the great sacrifice, and not otherwise.

Here, I. The priests, among other good offices which they were to do, are appointed solemnly to bless the people in the name of the Lord, v. 23. Though the priest of himself could do no more than beg a blessing, yet being an intercessor by office, and doing that in his name who commands the blessing, the prayer carried with it a promise, and he pronounced it as one having authority with his hands lifted up and his face towards the people. Now, 1. This was a type of Christ's errand into the world, which was to bless us (Acts iii. 26), as the high priest of our profession. 2. It was a pattern to gospel ministers, the masters of assemblies, who are in like manner to dismiss their solemn assemblies with a blessing. The same that are God's mouth to his people, to teach and command them, are his mouth likewise to bless them.

II. A form of blessing is here prescribed them. Here observe, 1. That the blessing is commanded upon each particular person: The Lord bless thee. If we take the law to ourselves, we may take the blessing to ourselves, as if our names were inserted. 2. That the name Jehovah is three times repeated in it, and each with a different accent in the original. 3. That the favour of God is all in all in this blessing, for that is the fountain of all good. (1) The Lord bless thee! (2) The Lord make his face shine upon thee, alluding to the shining of the sun upon the earth, to enlighten and comfort it, and to renew the face of it. (3) The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee. This is to the same purport with the former, and it seems to allude to the smiles of a father upon his child, or of a man upon his friend whom he takes pleasure in. 4. That the fruits of this favour conveyed by this blessing are protection, pardon, and peace. (1) Protection from evil, v. 24. The Lord keep thee. (2) Pardon of sin, v. 25. The Lord be gracious or merciful, unto thee. (3) Peace (v. 26), including all that good which goes to make up a complete happiness.

III. God here promises to ratify and confirm the blessing: They shall put my name upon the children of Israel, v. 27.

CHAP. VII

God having set up house (as it were) in the midst of the camp of Israel, the princes of Israel here come visiting. I. They brought presents, 1. Upon the dedication of the tabernacle, for the service of that, ver. 1–9. 2. Upon the dedication of the altar, for the use of that, ver. 10–88. And, II. God graciously signified his acceptance of them, ver. 89. The two foregoing chapters were the records of additional laws which God gave to Israel, this is the history of the additional services which Israel performed to God.

Verses 1–9

The offering of the princes to the service of the tabernacle.

I. When it was; not till it was fully set up, v. 1. When all things were done both about the tabernacle itself, and the camp of Israel which surrounded it.

II. Who it was that offered: The princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, v. 2.

III. What was offered: six waggons, with each of them a yoke of oxen to draw them, v. 3.

IV. How the offering was disposed of, and what use was made of it: the waggons and oxen were given to the Levites, to be used in carrying the tabernacle. 1. The Gershonites, that had the light carriage, the curtains and hangings, had but two waggons, and two yoke of oxen (v. 7). 2. The Merarites, that had the heavy carriage, and that which was most unwieldy, the boards, pillars, sockets, &c., had four waggons, and four yoke of oxen allotted them (v. 8). Observe here, How God wisely and graciously ordered the most strength to those that had the most work. Each had waggons according to their service. 3. The Kohathites, that had the most sacred carriage, had no waggons at all, because they were to carry their charges upon their shoulders (v. 9), with a particular care and veneration.

Verses 10–89

We have here an account of the great solemnity of dedicating the altars, both that of burnt-offerings and that of incense; they had been sanctified before, when they were anointed (Lev. viii. 10, 11), but now they were handselled, as it were, by the princes, with their free-will offerings. They began the use of them with rich presents, great expressions of joy and gladness, and extraordinary respect to those tokens of God's presence with them. Now observe here,

I. That the princes and great men were first and forwardest in the service of God. It is justly expected that those who have more than others should do more good than others with what they have, else they are unfaithful stewards, and will not make up their account with joy.

II. The offerings they brought were very rich and valuable.

1. They brought some things to remain for standing service, twelve large silver dishes, each about sixty ounces weight, as many large silver cups, or bowls, of about thirty-five ounces—the former to be used for the meat-offerings, the latter for the drink-offerings—the former for the flesh of the sacrifices, the latter for the blood. The golden spoons being filled with incense were intended, it is probable, for the service of the golden altar, for both the altars were anointed at the same time.

2. They brought some things to be used immediately, offerings of each sort. Hereby they signified their thankful acceptance of, and cheerful submission to, all those laws concerning the sacrifices which God had lately by Moses delivered to them. And, though it was a time of joy and rejoicing, yet it is observable that still in the midst of their sacrifices we find a sin-offering.

3. They brought their offerings each on a separate day, in the order that they had been lately put into, so that the solemnity lasted twelve days.

4. All their offerings were exactly the same, though it is probable that neither the princes nor the tribes were all alike rich; but thus it was intimated that all the tribes of Israel had an equal share in the altar, and an equal interest in the sacrifices that were offered upon it.

5. Nahshon, the prince of the tribe of Judah, offered first, because God had given that tribe the first post of honour in the camp; and the rest of the tribes acquiesced.

6. Though the offerings were all the same, yet the account of them is repeated at large for each tribe, in the same words. We find Christ taking particular notice of what was cast into the treasury, Mark xii. 41. Though what is offered be but little, yet if it be according to our ability it shall be recorded.

7. The sum total is added at the foot of the account (v. 84–88), to show how much God was pleased with the mention of his freewill-offerings, and what a great deal they amounted to in the whole, when every prince brought in his quota!

8. God signified his gracious acceptance of these presents that were brought him, by speaking familiarly to Moses, as a man speaks to his friend, from off the mercy-seat (v. 89, ch. xii. 8); and in speaking to him he did in effect speak to all Israel, showing them this token for good, Ps. ciii. 7.

CHAP. VIII

This chapter is concerning the lamps or lights of the sanctuary. I. The burning lamps in the candlestick, which the priests were charged to tend, ver. 1–4. II. The living lamps (if I may so call them), the Levites, who as ministers were burning and shining lights. The ordination of the priests we had an account of, Lev. viii. Here we have an account of the ordination of the Levites, the inferior clergy. 1. How they were purified, ver 5–8. 2. How they were parted with by the people, ver. 9, 10. 3. How they were presented to God in lieu of the first-born, ver. 11–18. 4. How they were consigned to Aaron and his sons, to be ministers to them, ver. 19. 5. How all these orders were duly executed, ver. 20–22. And, lastly, The age appointed for their ministration, ver. 23, &c.

Verses 1–4

Directions were given long before this for the making of the golden candlestick (Exod. xxv. 31), and it was made according to the pattern shown to Moses in the mount, Exod. xxxvii. 17. But now it was that the lamps were first ordered to be lighted, when other things began to be used. Observe, 1. Who must light the lamps; Aaron himself, he lighted the lamps, v. 3. As the people's representative to God, he thus did the office of a servant in God's house, lighting his Master's candle. The scripture is a light shining in a dark place, 2 Pet. i. 19. Now the work of ministers is to light these lamps, by expounding and applying the word of God. The priest lighted the middle lamp from the fire of the altar, and the rest of the lamps he lighted one from another, which (says Mr. Ainsworth) signifies that the fountain of all light and knowledge is in Christ, who has the seven spirits of God figured by the seven lamps of fire (Rev. iv. 5), but that in the expounding of scripture one passage must borrow light from another. He also supposes that, seven being a number of perfection, by the seven branches of the candlestick is shown the full perfection of the scripture, which are able to make us wise to salvation. 2. To what end the lamps were lighted. They were not lighted like tapers in an urn, to burn to themselves, but to give light to the other side of the tabernacle, for therefore candles are lighted, Matt. v. 15. Therefore we have light, that we may give light.

Verses 5–26

We read before of the separating of the Levites from among the children of Israel when they were numbered, and the numbering of them by themselves (ch. iii. 6, 15), that they might be employed in the service of the tabernacle. Now here we have directions given for their solemn ordination (v. 6), and the performance of it, v. 20. All Israel must know that they took not this honour to themselves, but were called of God to it; nor was it enough that they were distinguished from their neighbours, but they must be solemnly devoted to God. Note, All that are employed for God must be dedicated to him, according as the degree of the employment is. Christians must be baptized, ministers must be ordained; we must first give ourselves unto the Lord, and then our services. Observe, in what method this was done:

I. The Levites must be cleansed, and were so. The rites and ceremonies of their cleansing were to be performed, 1. By themselves. Those must be clean that bear the vessels of the Lord. 2. By Moses. He must sprinkle the water of purifying upon them, which was prepared by divine direction. It is our duty to cleanse ourselves, and God's promise that he will cleanse us.

II. The Levites, being thus prepared, must be brought before the Lord in a solemn assembly of all Israel, and the children of Israel must put their hands upon them (v. 10), so transferring their interest in them and in their service (to which, as a part, the whole body of the people was entitled) to God and to his sanctuary. This imposition of hands by the children of Israel upon the Levites did not make them ministers of the sanctuary, but only signified the people's parting with that tribe out of their militia, and civil incorporations, in order to their being made ministers by Aaron, who was to offer them before the Lord.

III. Sacrifices were to be offered for them, a sin-offering first (v. 12), and then a burnt-offering, to make an atonement for the Levites. See here, 1. That we are all utterly unworthy and unfit to be admitted into and employed in the service of God, till atonement be made for sin, and thereby our peace made with God. 2. That it is by sacrifice, by Christ the great sacrifice, that we are reconciled to God, and made fit to be offered to him. It is by him that Christians are sanctified to the work of their Christianity, and ministers to the work of their ministry.

IV. The Levites themselves were offered before the Lord for an offering of the children of Israel, v. 11. Aaron gave them up to God, as being first given up by themselves, and by the children of Israel.

V. God here declares his acceptance of them: The Levites shall be mine, v. 14. All whom God owns he employs; angels themselves have their services.

VI. They are then given as a gift to Aaron and his sons (v. 19), yet so as that the benefit accrued to the children of Israel. 1. The Levites must act under the priests as attendants on them. Aaron offers them to God (v. 11), and then God gives them back to Aaron, v. 19. Our hearts, our children, our estates, are never more ours, more truly, more comfortably ours, than when we have offered them up to God. 2. They must act for the people. God's ministers, while they keep within the sphere of their office and conscientiously discharge the duty of it, must be looked upon as some of the most useful servants of their country.

VII. The time of their ministration is fixed. 1. They were to enter upon the service at twenty-five years old, v. 24. A very good age for ministers to begin their public work at. 2. They were to have a writ of ease at fifty years old; then they were to return from the warfare, as the phrase is (v. 25), not cashiered with disgrace, but preferred rather to the rest which their age required, to be loaded with the honours of their office, as hitherto they had been with the burdens of it. If God's grace provide that men shall have ability according to their work, man's prudence should take care that men have work only according to their ability. The aged are most fit for trusts, and to keep the charge; the younger are most fit for work, and to do the service.

CHAP. IX

This chapter is, I. Concerning the great ordinance of the passover; 1. Orders given for the observance of it, at the return of the year, ver. 1–5. 2. Provisos added in regard to such as should be ceremonially unclean, or otherwise disabled, at the time when the passover was to be kept, ver. 6–14. II. Concerning the great favour of the pillar of cloud, which was a guide to Israel through the wilderness, ver. 15, &c.

Here we have,

I. An order given for the solemnization of the passover, the day twelvemonth after they came out of Egypt, on the fourteenth day of the first month of the second year, some days before they were numbered, for that was done in the beginning of the second month. Observe, 1. God gave particular orders for the keeping of this passover. And, for aught that appears, after this they kept no passover till they came to Canaan, Josh. v. 10. This was an early indication of the abolishing of the ceremonial institutions at last. The ordinance of the Lord's supper (which came in the room of the passover) was not thus intermitted or set aside in the first days of the Christian church, though those were days of greater difficulty and distress than Israel knew in the wilderness; nay, in the times of persecution, the Lord's supper was celebrated more frequently than afterwards. The Israelites in the wilderness could not forget their deliverance out of Egypt. All the danger was when they came to Canaan. However, because the first passover was celebrated in a hurry it was the will of God that at the return of the year, when they were more composed, and better acquainted with the divine law, they should observe it again, that their children might more distinctly understand the solemnity and the better remember it hereafter. 2. Moses faithfully transmitted to the people the orders given him, v. 4. 3. The people observed the orders given them, v. 5. They kept the passover even in the wilderness. Thus is God's Israel provided for in a desert.

II. Instructions given concerning those that were ceremonially unclean when they were to eat the passover. The law of the passover required every Israelite to eat of it. They must therefore wash, and then compass God's altar. Now, Certain men were defiled by the dead body of a man (v. 6), and they lay under that defilement seven days (ch. xix. 11), and in that time might not eat of the holy things, Lev. vii. 20. This was not their iniquity, but their infelicity.

The directions which God gave in this case, and in other similar cases, explanatory of the law of the passover. This disagreeable accident produced good laws. Those that happened to be ceremonially unclean at the time when the passover should be eaten were allowed to eat it that day month, when they were clean; so were those that happened to be in a journey afar off, v. 10, 11.

We have here the history of the cloud; not a natural history: who knows the balancings of the clouds? but a divine history of a cloud that was appointed to be the visible sign and symbol of God's presence with Israel.

I. When the tabernacle was finished this cloud, which before had hung on high over their camp, settled upon the tabernacle, and covered it, to show that God manifests his presence with his people in and by his ordinances.

II. That which appeared as a cloud by day appeared as a fire by night. And thus we are taught to set God always before us, and to see him near us both night and day. Something of the nature of that divine revelation which the Old Testament church was governed by might also be signified by these visible signs of God's presence, the cloud denoting the darkness and the fire the terror of that dispensation, in comparison with the more clear and comfortable discoveries God has made of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ.

III. This pillar of cloud and fire directed and determined all the motions, marches, and encampments, of Israel in the wilderness. And the guidance of this cloud is spoken of as signifying the guidance of the blessed Spirit. We are not now to expect such sensible tokens of the divine presence and guidance as this was, but the promise is sure to all God's spiritual Israel that he will guide them by his counsel (Ps. lxxiii. 24), even unto death (Ps. xlviii. 14), that all the children of God shall be led by the Spirit of God (Rom. viii. 14). In our affections and actions we must follow the direction of his word and Spirit; all the motions of our souls must be guided by the divine will; at the commandment of the Lord our hearts should always move and rest.

CHAP. X

In this chapter we have, I. Orders given about the making and using of silver trumpets, which seems to have been the last of all the commandments God gave upon Mount Sinai, and one of the least, yet not without its significance, ver. 1–10 II. The history of the removal of Israel's camp from Mount Sinai, and their orderly march into the wilderness of Paran, ver. 11–28. III. Moses's treaty with Hobab, his brother-in-law, ver 29–32. IV. Moses's prayer at the removing and resting of the ark, ver. 33, &c.

Verses 1–10

We have here directions concerning the public notices that were to be given to the people upon several occasions by sound of trumpet. The trumpets were to be sounded for the calling of assemblies, v. 2. Thus they are told to blow the trumpet in Zion for the calling of a solemn assembly together, to sanctify a fast, Joel ii. 15. But, that the trumpet might not give an uncertain sound, they are directed, if only the princes and elders were to meet, to blow but one of the trumpets; but, if the body of the people were to be called together, both trumpets must be sounded. For the journeying of the camps, to give notice when each squadron must move. When the trumpets were blown for this purpose, they must sound an alarm (v. 5), a broken, quavering, interrupted sound, which was proper to excite and encourage the minds of people in their marches against their enemies; whereas a continued equal sound was more proper for the calling of the assembly together (v. 7): yet when the people were called together to deprecate God's judgments we find an alarm sounded, Joel ii. 1. At the first sounding, Judah's squadron marched, at the second Reuben's, at the third Ephraim's, at the fourth Dan's, v. 5, 6. For the animating and encouraging of their armies, when they went out in battle (v. 9). For the solemnizing of their sacred feasts, v. 10. One of their feasts was called a memorial of the blowing of trumpets, Lev. xxiii. 23, &c. Holy work should be done with holy joy.

Verses 11–28

Here is, I. A general account of the removal of the camp of Israel from Mount Sinai, before which mountain it had lain now about a year, in which time and place a great deal of memorable business was done. Observe, 1. The signal given (v. 11): The cloud was taken up. 2. The march begun: They took their journey according to the commandment of the Lord, and just as the cloud led them, v. 13. Some think that mention is thus frequently made in this and the foregoing chapter of the commandment of the Lord, guiding and governing them in all their travels, to obviate the calumny and reproach which were afterwards thrown upon Israel, that they tarried so long in the wilderness, because they had lost themselves there, and could not find the way out. Note, Those that have given up themselves to the direction of God's word and Spirit steer a steady course, even when they seem to be bewildered. 3. The place they rested in, after three days' march:

They went out of the wilderness of Sinai, and rested in the wilderness of Paran.

II. A particular draft of the order of their march, according to the late model. 1. Judah's squadron marched first, v. 14–16. The leading standard, now lodged with that tribe, was an earnest of the sceptre which in David's time should be committed to it, and looked further to the captain of our salvation, of whom it was likewise foretold that unto him should the gathering of the people be. 2. Then came those two families of the Levites which were entrusted to carry the tabernacle. 3. Reuben's squadron marched forward next, taking place after Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord, v. 18–20. 4. Then the Kohathites followed with their charge, the sacred furniture of the tabernacle, in the midst of the camp, the safest and most honourable place, v. 21. 5. Ephraim's squadron followed next after the ark (v. 22–24). 6. Dan's squadron followed last, v. 25–27. It is called the rearward, or gathering host, of all the camps, because it gathered up all that were left behind; not the women and children (these we may suppose were taken care of by the heads of their families in their respective tribes), but all the unclean, the mixed multitude, and all that were weak and feeble, and cast behind in their march.

Verses 29–36

Here is, I. An account of what passed between Moses and Hobab, now upon this advance which the camp of Israel made towards Canaan. Some think that Hobab was the same with Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, and that the story, Exod. xviii., should come in here; it seems more probably that Hobab was the son of Jethro, and that when the father, being aged, went to his own land (Exod. xviii. 27), he left his son Hobab with Moses. Now this Hobab stayed contentedly with Israel while they encamped at Mount Sinai, near his own country; but, now that they were removing, he was for going back to his own country and kindred, and his father's house. Here is, 1. The kind invitation Moses gives him to go forward with them to Canaan, v. 29. Note, Those that are bound for the heavenly Canaan should invite and encourage all their friends to go along with them. 2. Hobab's inclination, and present resolution, to go back to his own country, v. 30. He was indeed a son of Abraham's loins (for the Midianites descended from Abraham by Keturah), but not an heir of Abraham's faith (Heb. xi. 8), else he would not have given Moses this answer. 3. The great importunity Moses used with him to alter his resolution, v. 31, 32. He urges, That he might be serviceable to them: We are to encamp in the wilderness (a country well known to Hobab), and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.

We do not find any reply that Hobab here made to Moses, and therefore we hope that his silence gave consent, and he did not leave them. And we find (Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 6) that his family was no loser by it.

II. An account of the communion between God and Israel in this removal. They left the mount of the Lord (v. 33), that Mount Sinai where they had seen his glory and heard his voice. But when they left the mount of the Lord they took with them the ark of the covenant of the Lord, by which their stated communion with God was to be kept up. For,

1. By it God did direct their paths. The ark of the covenant went before them, some think in place, at least in this removal; others think only in influence. The ark (that is, the God of the ark) is said to search out a resting place for them.

2. By it they did in all ways acknowledge God. Moses, as the mouth of the congregation, lifted up a prayer, both at the removing and at the resting of the ark; and it is an example to us to begin and end every day's journey, and every day's work, with prayer.

(1) Here is his prayer when the ark set forward: Rise up, Lord, and let thy enemies be scattered, v. 35. Note, [1] There are those in the world that are enemies to God, and haters of him: secret and open enemies; enemies of his truths, his laws, his ordinances, his people. [2] The scattering and defeating of God's enemies is a thing to be earnestly desired, and believingly expected, by all the Lord's people.

(2) His prayer when the ark rested, v. 36. [1] That God would cause his people to rest. So some read it, "Return, O Lord, the many thousands of Israel, return them to their rest again after this fatigue." [2] That God himself would take up his rest among them. So we read it: Return to the thousands of Israel, the ten thousand thousand, so the word is. The welfare and happiness of the Israel of God consist in the continual presence of God among them.

CHAP. XI

Hitherto things had gone pretty well in Israel; little interruption had been given to the methods of God's favour to them since the matter of the golden calf; the people seemed teachable in marshalling and purifying the camp, the princes devout and generous in dedicating the altar, and there was good hope that they would be in Canaan presently. But at this chapter begins a melancholy scene. I. Their murmurings kindled a fire among them, which yet was soon quenched by the prayer of Moses, ver. 1–3. II. No sooner was the fire of judgment quenched than the fire of sin breaks out again, 1. The people fret for want of flesh, ver. 4–9. 2 Moses frets for want of help, ver. 10–15. Now, (1) God promises to gratify them both, to appoint help for Moses (ver. 16, 17), and to give the people flesh, ver. 18–23. And, (2) He presently makes good both these promises. For [1] The Spirit of God qualifies the seventy elders for the government, ver. 24–30. [2] The power of God brings quails to feast the people, ver. 31, 32. Yet, [3] The justice of God plagued them for their murmurings, ver. 33, &c.

Verses 1–3

I. The people's sin. They complained, v. 1. The law discovered sin, but could not destroy it; checked it, but could not conquer it. They complained. When they were furnished with so much matter for thanksgiving, one may justly wonder where they found any matter for complaint.

II. God's just resentment of the affront given to him by this sin: The Lord heard it, and his anger was kindled.

III. The judgment wherewith God chastised them for this sin. We read of their murmurings several times, when they came first out of Egypt, Exod. xv., and xvi., and xvii. But we do not read of any plagues inflicted on them for their murmurings, as there were now; for now they had had great experience of God's care of them, and therefore now to distrust him was so much the more inexcusable.

IV. Their cry to Moses, who was their tried intercessor, v. 2. When he slew them, then they sought him, and made their application to Moses to stand their friend.

V. The prevalence of Moses's intercession for them: When Moses prayed unto the Lord God had respect to him and his offering, and the fire was quenched.

VI. A new name given hereupon to the place, to perpetuate the shame of a murmuring people. The place was called Taberah, a burning (v. 3), that others might hear, and fear, and take warning not to sin as they did.

Verses 4–15

These verses represent things sadly unhinged and out of order in Israel, both the people and the prince uneasy.

I. Here is the people fretting, and speaking against God himself.

1. Who were the criminals? (1) The mixed multitude began, they fell a-lusting, v. 4. The rabble that came with them out of Egypt, expecting only the land of promise, but not a state of probation in the way to it. These were the scabbed sheep that infected the flock, the leaven that leavened the whole lump. (2) Even the children of Israel took the infection, as we are informed, v. 4.

2. What was the crime? (1) They magnified the plenty and dainties they had had in Egypt (v. 5), as if God had done them a great deal of wrong in taking them thence. They remember the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick (precious stuff indeed to be fond of!), but they do not remember the brick-kilns and the task-masters, the voice of the oppressor and the smart of the whip. (2) They were sick of the good provision God had made for them, v. 6. It was bread from heaven, angels' food. While they lived on manna, they seemed to be exempted from the curse which sin has brought on man, that in the sweat of his face should he eat bread. And yet they speak of the manna with such scorn, as if it were not good enough to be meat for swine: Our soul is dried away. (3) They could not be satisfied unless they had flesh to eat. (4) They distrusted the power and goodness of God as insufficient for their supply: Who will give us flesh to eat? taking it for granted that God could not. (5) They were eager and importunate in their desires; they lusted a lust, so the word is, lusted greatly and greedily, till they wept again for vexation. (6) Flesh is good food, and may lawfully be eaten; yet they are said to lust after evil things. What is lawful of itself becomes evil to us when it is what God does not allot to us and yet we eagerly desire it.

II. Moses himself, though so meek and good a man, is uneasy upon this occasion: Moses also was displeased. Now, 1. It must be confessed that the provocation was very great. These murmurings of theirs reflected great dishonour upon God, and Moses laid to heart the reproaches cast on him. 2. Yet Moses came short of his duty both to God and Israel in these expostulations. (1) He undervalues the honour God had put upon him. (2) He complains too much of a sensible grievance, and lays too near his heart a little noise and fatigue. (3) He magnifies his own performances, that all the burden of the people lay upon him. (4) He is not so sensible as he ought to be of the obligation he lay under, by virtue of the divine commission and command, to do the utmost he could for his people. (5) He takes too much to himself when he asks, Whence should I have flesh to give them (v. 13), as if he were the housekeeper, and not God. (6) He speaks distrustfully of the divine grace when he despairs of being able to bear all this people, v. 14. (7) It was worst of all passionately to wish for death, and desire to be killed out of hand. Is this Moses? Is this the meekest of all the men on the earth? The best have their infirmities, and fail sometimes in the exercise of that grace for which they are most eminent. Lord, lead us not into temptation.

God's gracious answer to both the foregoing complaints:

I. Provision is made for the redress of the grievances Moses complains of. If he find the weight of government lie too heavy upon him, though he was a little too passionate in his remonstrance, yet he shall be eased, not by being discarded from the government himself, but by having assistants appointed him.

1. Moses is directed to nominate the persons, v. 16. The number he is to choose is seventy men, according to the number of the souls that went down into Egypt.

2. God promises to qualify them.

II. Even the humour of the discontented people shall be gratified too, that every mouth may be stopped. They are ordered to sanctify themselves (v. 18), that is, to put themselves into a posture to receive such a proof of God's power as should be a token both of mercy and judgment.

1. God promises (shall I say?)—he threatens rather, that they shall have their fill of flesh, and, if they have not a better government of their appetites than now it appears they have, they shall be surfeited with it (v. 19, 20).

2. Moses objects the improbability of making good this word, v. 21, 22. It is an objection like that which the disciples made, Mark viii. 4, Whence can a man satisfy these men? He objects the number of the people, as if he that provided bread for them all could not, by the same unlimited power, provide flesh too. He reckons it must be the flesh either of beasts or fishes, little thinking that the flesh of birds, little birds, should serve the purpose.

3. God gives a short but sufficient answer to the objection in that question, Has the Lord's hand waxed short? v. 23. God here brings Moses to this first principle, sets him back in his lesson, to learn the ancient name of God, The Lord God Almighty.

Verses 24–30

The performance of God's word to Moses, that he should have help in the government of Israel.

I. Here is the case of the seventy privy-counsellors in general. Moses, though a little disturbed by the tumult of the people, yet was thoroughly composed by the communion he had with God, and soon came to himself again. 1. He did his part; he presented the seventy elders before the Lord, round the tabernacle (v. 24), that they might there stand ready to receive the grace of God, in the place where he manifested himself. 2. God was not wanting to do his part. He gave of his Spirit to the seventy elders, (v. 25).

II. Here is the particular case of two of them, Eldad and Medad, probably two brothers.

1. They were nominated by Moses to be assistants in the government, but they went not out unto the tabernacle as the rest did, v. 26.

2. The Spirit of God found them out in the camp, where they were hidden among the stuff, and there they prophesied, that is, they exercised their gift of praying, preaching, and praising God, in some private tent. There was a special providence in it that these two should be absent, for thus it appeared that it was indeed a divine Spirit which the elders were actuated by, and that Moses gave them not that Spirit, but God himself.

3. Information of this was given to Moses (v. 27): Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp. Whoever the person was that brought the tidings, he seems to have looked upon it as an irregularity.

4. Joshua moved to have them silenced: My lord Moses, forbid them, v. 28. It is probable that Joshua himself was one of the seventy. He does not desire that they should be punished for what they had done, but only restrained for the future.

5. Moses rejected the motion, and reproved him that made it (v. 29): "Enviest thou for my sake?" Though Joshua was Moses's particular friend and confidant, though he said this out of a respect to Moses, whose honour he was very loth to see lessened by the call of those elders, yet Moses reproved him. We must not be forward to condemn and silence those that differ from us, as if they did not follow Christ because they do not follow him with us, Mark ix. 38. Shall we reject those whom Christ has owned, or restrain any from doing good because they are not in everything of our mind? Moses was of another spirit; so far from silencing these two, and quenching the Spirit in them, he wishes all the Lord's people were prophets, that is, that he would put his Spirit upon them.

6. The elders, now newly ordained, immediately entered upon their administration (v. 30); when their call was sufficiently attested by their prophesying, they went with Moses to the camp, and applied themselves to business.

Verses 31–35

God, having performed his promise to Moses by giving him assessors in the government. He here performs his promise to the people by giving them flesh. Observe, 1. How the people were gratified with flesh in abundance: A wind (a south-east wind, as appears, Ps. lxxviii. 26) brought quails, v. 31. It is uncertain what sort of animals they were; the psalmist calls them feathered fowl, or fowl of wing. The learned bishop Patrick inclines to agree with some modern writers, who think they were locusts, a delicious sort of food well known in those parts, the rather because they were brought with a wind, lay in heaps, and were dried in the sun for use. Whatever they were, they answered the intention, they served for a month's feast for Israel, such an indulgent Father was God to his froward family. 2. How greedy they were of this flesh that God sent them. They flew upon the spoil with an insatiable appetite, not regarding what Moses had told them from God, that they would surfeit upon it, v. 32. 3. How dearly they paid for their feasts, when it came into the reckoning: The Lord smote them with a very great plague (v. 33), some bodily disease, which probably was the effect of their surfeit, and was the death of many of them. The remembrance of this is preserved in the name given to the place, v. 34. Moses called it Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of lusters or of lust.

CHAP. XII

In the foregoing chapter we had the vexation which the people gave to Moses; in this we have his patience tried by his own relations. I. Miriam and Aaron, his own brother and sister, affronted him, ver. 1–3. II. God called them to an account for it, ver. 4–9. III. Miriam was smitten with a leprosy for it, ver. 10. IV. Aaron submits, and Moses meekly intercedes for Miriam, ver. 11–13. V. She is healed, but put to shame for seven days, ver. 14–16. And this is recorded to show that the best persons and families have both their follies and their crosses.

Verses 1–3

Here is, I. The unbecoming passion of Aaron and Miriam: they spoke against Moses, v. 1. It should seem that Miriam began the quarrel, and Aaron, not having been employed or consulted in the choice of the seventy elders, was for the present somewhat disgusted, and so was the sooner drawn in to take his sister's part. Two things they quarrelled with Moses about:—1. About his marriage: some think a late marriage with a Cushite or Arabian; others because of Zipporah, whom on this occasion they called, in scorn, an Ethiopian woman, and who, they insinuated, had too great an influence upon Moses in the choice of these seventy elders. 2. About his government; not the mismanagement of it, but the monopolizing of it (v. 2): "Hath the Lord spoken only by Moses?"

II. The wonderful patience of Moses under this provocation. He, as a deaf man, heard not. When God's honour was concerned, as in the case of the golden calf, no man more zealous than Moses; but, when his own honour was touched, no man more meek: as bold as a lion in the cause of God, but as mild as a lamb in his own cause. Sometimes the unkindness of our friends is a greater trial of our meekness than the malice of our enemies.

Verses 4–9

Moses did not resent the injury done him, nor complain of it to God, nor make any appeal to him; but God resented it. The more silent we are in our own cause the more is God engaged to plead it. The accused innocent needs to say little if he knows the judge himself will be his advocate.

I. The cause is called, and the parties are summoned forthwith to attend at the door of the tabernacle, v. 4, 5.

II. Aaron and Miriam were made to know that great as they were they must not pretend to be equal to Moses, nor set up as rivals with him, v. 6–8. 1. It was true that God put a great deal of honour upon the prophets. God made himself known to them, either by dreams when they were asleep, or by visions when they were awake, and by them made himself known to others. Now he does it not by dreams and visions, as of old, but by the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. 2. Yet the honour put upon Moses was far greater (v. 7): My servant Moses is not so, he excels them all. To recompense Moses for his meekly and patiently bearing the affronts which Miriam and Aaron gave him, God not only cleared him, but praised him. (1) Moses was a man of great integrity and tried fidelity. He is faithful in all my house. This is put first in his character, because grace excels gifts, love excels knowledge, and sincerity in the service of God puts a greater honour upon a man and recommends him to the divine favour more than learning, abstruse speculations, and an ability to speak with tongues. (2) Moses was therefore honoured with clearer discoveries of God's mind, and a more intimate communion with God, than any other prophet whatsoever.

Now let Miriam and Aaron consider who it was that they insulted: Were you not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?

III. God, having thus shown them their fault and folly, next shows them his displeasure (v. 9): The anger of the Lord was kindled against them. But indeed it was indication enough of his displeasure that he departed, and would not so much as hear their excuse. The removal of God's presence from us is the surest and saddest token of God's displeasure against us. Woe unto us if he depart; and he never departs till we by our sin and folly drive him from us.

Verses 10–16

Here is, I. God's judgment upon Miriam (v. 10): The cloud departed from off that part of the tabernacle, in token of God's displeasure, and presently Miriam became leprous. Her foul tongue (says Bishop Hall) is justly punished with a foul face. While Moses needs a veil to hide his glory, Miriam needs one to hide her shame. Miriam was struck with a leprosy, but not Aaron, because she was first in the transgression, and God would put a difference between those that mislead and those that are misled. Aaron as priest was to be the judge of the leprosy. He was struck through her side, and could not pronounce her leprous without blushing and trembling, knowing himself to be equally obnoxious.

II. Aaron's submission hereupon (v. 11, 12); he humbles himself to Moses, confesses his fault, and begs pardon. He that but just now joined with his sister in speaking against Moses is here forced for himself and his sister to make a penitent address to him. In his submission, 1. He confesses his own and his sister's sin, v. 11. 2. He begs Moses's pardon: Lay not this sin upon us. 3. He recommends the deplorable condition of his sister to Moses's compassionate consideration (v. 12): Let her not be as one dead.

III. The intercession made for Miriam (v. 13): He cried unto the Lord with a loud voice, because the cloud, the symbol of his presence, was removed and stood at some distance, and to express his fervency in this request, Heal her now, O Lord, I beseech thee. So Miriam here was healed by the prayer of Moses, whom she had abused.

IV. The accommodating of this matter so as that mercy and justice might meet together. 1. Mercy takes place so far as that Miriam shall be healed; Moses forgives her, and God will. See 2 Cor. ii. 10. But, 2. Justice takes place so far as that Miriam shall be humbled (v. 14): Let her be shut out from the camp seven days.

V. The hindrance that this gave to the people's progress: The people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again, v. 15. God did not remove the cloud, and therefore they did not remove their camp. This was intended, 1. As a rebuke to the people, who were conscious to themselves of having sinned after the similitude of Miriam's transgression, in speaking against Moses. 2. As a mark of respect to Miriam. If the camp had removed during the days of her suspension, her trouble and shame had been the greater. Those that are under censure and rebuke for sin ought to be treated with a great deal of tenderness, and not be over-loaded, no, not with the shame they have deserved, not counted as enemies (2 Thess. iii. 15), but forgiven and comforted, 2 Cor. ii. 7. Sinners must be cast out with grief and penitents taken in with joy.

CHAP. XIII

It is a memorable and very melancholy story which is related in this and the following chapter, of the turning back of Israel from the borders of Canaan, when they were just ready to set foot in it, and the sentencing of them to wander and perish in the wilderness for their unbelief and murmuring. It is referred to Ps. xcv. 7, &c., and improved for warning to Christians, Heb. iii. 7, &c. In this chapter we have, I. The sending of twelve spies before them into Canaan, ver. 1–16. II. The instructions given to these spies, ver. 17–20. III. Their executing their commission according to their instructions, and their return from the search, ver. 21–25. IV. The report they brought back to the camp of Israel, ver. 26, &c.

Here we have, I. Orders given to send spies to search out the land of Canaan. It is here said, God directed Moses to send them (v. 1, 2), but it appears (Deut. i. 22) that the motion came originally from the people; they came to Moses, and said, We will send men before us. They would not take God's word that it was a good land. How absurd was it for them to send to spy out a land which God himself had spied out for them. But thus we ruin ourselves by giving more credit to the reports and representations of sense than to divine revelation; we walk by sight, not by faith. The people making this motion to Moses, he consulted God in the case, who bade him gratify the people in this matter, and send spies before them: "Let them walk in their own counsels."

II. The persons nominated that were to be employed in this service (v. 4, &c.), one of each tribe, that it might appear to be the act of the people in general. This was designed for the best, but it proved to have this ill effect that the quality of the persons occasioned the evil report they brought up to be the more credited and the people to be the more influenced by it. Some think that they are all named for the sake of two good ones that were among them, Caleb and Joshua. Notice is taken of the change of Joshua's name upon this occasion, v. 16. The name by which he was generally called and known in his own tribe was Oshea, but Moses called him Joshua, and now he ordered others to call him so. Oshea signifies a prayer for salvation, Save thou; Joshua signifies a promise of salvation, He will save, in answer to that prayer: so near is the relation between prayers and promises. Prayers prevail for promises, and promises direct and encourage prayers. Jesus is the same name with Joshua, and it is the name of our Lord Christ, of whom Joshua was a type as successor to Moses, Israel's captain, and conqueror of Canaan. Joshua was the saviour of God's people from the powers of Canaan, but Christ is their Saviour from the powers of hell.

III. The instructions given to those spies. They were sent into the land of Canaan to take account of its present state, v. 17. Two heads of enquiry were given them: 1. Concerning the land itself: See whether it be good or bad, and (v. 20) whether it be fat or lean. Moses himself was well satisfied that Canaan was a very good land, but he sent these spies to bring an account of it for the satisfaction of the people. 2. Concerning the inhabitants—their number, few or many,—their size and stature, whether strong able-bodied men or weak.

IV. Moses dismisses the spies with this charge, Be of good courage, intimating that they should bring an encouraging account to the people and make the best of everything.

Verses 21–25

We have here a short account of the survey which the spies made of the promised land. 1. They went quite through it, from Zin in the south, to Rehob, near Hamath, in the north, v. 21. See ch. xxxiv. 3, 8. They divided themselves into several companies, and so passed unsuspected, as wayfaring men. 2. They took particular notice of Hebron (v. 22), probably because near there was the field of Machpelah, where the patriarchs were buried (Gen. xxiii. 19). To this sepulchre they made a particular visit, and found the adjoining city in the possession of the sons of Anak. Where the bodies of their ancestors kept possession for them the giants kept possession against them. 3. They brought a bunch of grapes with them, and some other of the fruits of the land, as a proof of the extraordinary goodness of the country. The place whence they took it was called the valley of the cluster, that famous cluster which was to Israel both the earnest and the specimen of all the fruits of Canaan.

Verses 26–33

At length the messengers return, but they agree not in their report.

I. The major part discourage the people from going forward to Canaan.

1. Observe their report. (1) They could not deny but that the land of Canaan was a very fruitful land: the bunch of grapes they brought with them was an ocular demonstration of it, v. 27. And yet afterwards they contradict themselves, when they say (v. 32), It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; some think that there was a great plague in the country at the time they surveyed it. They invidiously imputed it to the unwholesomeness of the air, and thence took occasion to disparage the country. But (2) They represented the conquest of it as altogether impracticable, and that it was to no purpose to attempt it. Nothing served their ill purpose more than a description of the giants, on whom they lay a great stress. They gave it in as their judgment, We are not able to go up against them (v. 31), and therefore must think of taking some other course.

2. Now, even if they had been to judge only by human probabilities, they could not have been excused from the imputation of cowardice. Were not the hosts of Israel very numerous? Effective men, well marshalled and modelled, closely embodied, and entirely united in interest and affection. Moses, their commander-in-chief, was wise and brave; and if the people had put on resolution, and behaved themselves valiantly, what could have stood before them?

3. But, though they deserved to be posted for cowards, this was not the worst, the scripture brands them for unbelievers. (1) They had tokens of God's presence with them. The Canaanites were stronger than Israel; suppose they were, but were they stronger than the God of Israel? Their cities are walled against us, but can they be walled against heaven? Besides this, (2) They had had very great experience of the length and strength of God's arm, lifted up and made bare on their behalf. Were not the Egyptians as much stronger than they as the Canaanites were? And yet, without a sword drawn by Israel or a stroke struck, the chariots and horsemen of Egypt were quite routed and ruined; the Amalekites were discomfited. (3) They had particular promises made them of victory and success in their wars against the Canaanites. God had given Abraham all possible assurances that he would put his seed into possession of that land, Gen. xv. 18; xvii. 8. He had expressly promised them by Moses that he would drive out the Canaanites from before them (Exod. xxxiii. 2), and that he would do it by little and little, Exod. xxiii. 30. And after all this, for them to say, We are not able to go up against them, was in effect to say, "God himself is not able to make his words good."

II. Caleb encouraged them to go forward, though he was seconded by Joshua only (v. 30): Caleb stilled the people. Caleb signifies all heart, and he answered his name, was hearty himself, and would have made the people so if they would have hearkened to him. 1. He speaks very confidently of success: We are well able to overcome them, as strong as they are. 2. He animates the people to go on, and, his lot lying in the van, he speaks as one resolved to lead them on with bravery: "Let us go up at once. Let us go up and possess it."

CHAP. XIV

This chapter gives us an account of that fatal quarrel between God and Israel upon which, for their murmuring and unbelief, he swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest. Here is, I. The mutiny and rebellion of Israel against God, upon the report of the evil spies, ver. 1–4. II. The fruitless endeavour of Moses and Aaron, Caleb and Joshua, to still the tumult, ver. 5–10. III. Their utter ruin justly threatened by an offended God, ver. 11, 12. IV. The humble intercession of Moses for them, ver. 13–19. V. A mitigation of the sentence in answer to the prayer of Moses; they shall not all be cut off, but the decree goes forth ratified with an oath, published to the people, again and again repeated, that this whole congregation should perish in the wilderness, and none of them enter Canaan but Caleb and Joshua only, ver. 20–35. VI. The present death of the evil spies, ver. 36–39. VII. The rebuke given to those who attempted to go forward notwithstanding, ver. 40–45. And this is written for our admonition, that we "fall not after the same example of unbelief."

Verses 1–4

What mischief the evil spies made by their unfair representation.

I. How the people fretted themselves: They lifted up their voices and cried (v. 1); giving credit to the report of the spies rather than to the word of God. Those that cried when nothing hurt them deserved to have something given them to cry for.

II. How they flew in the face of their governors—murmured against Moses and Aaron, and in them reproached the Lord, v. 2, 3. The congregation of elders began the discontent (v. 1). 1. They look back with a causeless discontent. They wish that they had died in Egypt. Never were so many months spent so pleasantly as these which they had spent since they came out of Egypt. How base were the spirits of these degenerate Israelites, who desired rather to die in the wilderness. 2. They look forward with a groundless despair, taking it for granted (v. 3) that if they went on they must fall by the sword. And here is a most wicked blasphemous reflection upon God himself, as if he had brought them hither on purpose that their wives and children, those poor innocents, should be a prey.

III. How they came at last to this desperate resolve, that, instead of going forward to Canaan, they would go back again to Egypt. Were it not better for us to return to Egypt? Let us make a captain and return to Egypt. 1. It was the greatest folly in the world to wish themselves in Egypt, or to think that if they were there it would be better with them than it was. 2. It was a most senseless, ridiculous thing to talk of returning thither through the wilderness. We are uneasy at that which is, complain of our place and lot, and we would shift; but is there any place or condition in this world that has not something in it to make us uneasy if we are disposed to be so? The way to better our condition is to get our spirits into a better frame; and instead of asking, "Were it not better to go to Egypt?" ask, "Were it not better to be content, and make the best of that which is?"

Verses 5–10

The friends of Israel here interpose to save them if possible from ruining themselves, but in vain.

I. The best endeavours were used to still the tumult.

1. The clamour and noise of the people were so great that Moses and Aaron could not be heard; and, therefore, to gain audience in the sight of all the assembly, they fell on their faces, thus expressing, (1) Their humble prayers to God to still the tumult of the people. (2) The great trouble and concern of their own spirits. They fall down as men astonished and even thunderstruck, amazed to see a people throw away their own mercies. What they said to the people Moses relates in the repetition of this story. Deut. i. 29, 30, Be not afraid; the Lord your God shall fight for you.

2. Caleb and Joshua did their part: they rent their clothes in a holy indignation at the sin of the people, and a holy dread of the wrath of God, which they saw ready to break out against them. No reasoning could be more pertinent and pathetic than theirs was (v. 7–9), and they spoke as with authority.

(1) They assured them of the goodness of the land they had surveyed, and that it was really worth venturing for.

(2) They made nothing of the difficulties that seemed to lie in the way of their gaining the possession of it: Fear not the people of the land, v. 9. Whatever formidable ideas have been given you of them, the lion is not so fierce as he is painted. They are bread for us, that is, "they are set before us rather to be fed upon than to be fought with." Though the Canaanites dwell in walled cities, they are naked: Their defence has departed from them. The other spies took notice of their strength, but these of their wickedness, and thence inferred that God had forsaken them, and therefore their defence had departed.

(3) They showed them plainly that all the danger they were in was from their own discontents, and that they would succeed against all their enemies if they did not make God their enemy.

II. It was all to no purpose; they were deaf to this fair reasoning; nay, they were exasperated by it, and grew more outrageous: All the congregation bade stone them with stones, v. 10. Caleb and Joshua knew they appeared for God and his glory, and therefore doubted not but God would appear for them and their safety. And they were not disappointed, for immediately the glory of the Lord appeared, to the terror and confusion of those that were for stoning the servants of God.

Verses 11–19

When the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle we may suppose that Moses took it for a call to him immediately to come and attend there. Now here we are told what God said to him there.

1. He showed him the great evil of the people's sin, v. 11. Two things God justly complains of to Moses:—(1) Their sin. They provoke me, or (as the word signifies) they reject, reproach, despise me, for they will not believe me. It was their unbelief that made this a day of provocation in the wilderness, Heb. iii. 8. (2) Their continuance in it: How long will they do so? The more God has done for us the greater is the provocation if we distrust him.

2. He showed him the sentence which justice passed upon them for it, v. 12. What remains now but that I should make a full end of them? They wish to die; and let them die, and neither root nor branch be left of them.

II. The humble intercession Moses made for them.

1. The prayer of his petition is, in one word, Pardon. I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people (v. 19), that is, "Do not bring upon them the ruin they deserve." This was Christ's prayer for those that crucified him, Father, forgive them.

2. The pleas are many, and strongly urged.

(1) He insists most upon the plea that is taken from the glory of God, v. 13–16. "If this people that have made so great a noise be all consumed, if their mighty pretensions come to nothing, and their light go out in a snuff, it will be told with pleasure in Gath, and published in the streets of Askelon; and what construction will the heathen put upon it? It will be impossible to make them understand it as an act of God's justice, but they will impute it to the failing of God's power.

(2) He pleads God's proclamation of his name at Horeb (v. 17, 18); Let the power of the Lord be great. To enforce this petition, he refers to the word which God had spoken: The Lord is long-suffering and of great mercy. God's goodness had there been spoken of as his glory; God gloried in it, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. Now here he prays that upon this occasion he would glorify it. He does not ask that they may not be corrected, but that they may not be disinherited.

(3) He pleads past experience: As thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt, v. 19. Moses looks upon it as a good plea, Lord, forgive, as thou hast forgiven. It will be no more a reproach to thy justice, nor any less the praise of thy mercy, to forgive now, than it has been formerly.

Verses 20–35

God's answer to the prayer of Moses, which sings both of mercy and judgment.

I. The extremity of the sentence is receded from (v. 20). See what countenance and encouragement God gives to our intercessions for others, that we may be public-spirited in prayer. Here is a whole nation rescued from ruin by the effectual fervent prayer of one righteous man.

II. The glorifying of God's name is, in the general, resolved upon, v. 21. Moses in his prayer had shown a great concern for the glory of God. All the world shall see how God hates sin even in his own people, and will reckon for it, and yet how gracious and merciful he is, and how slow to anger. Thus when our Saviour prayed, Father, glorify thy name, he was immediately answered, I have glorified it, and will glorify it yet again, John xii. 28.

III. The sin of this people which provoked God to proceed against them is here aggravated, v. 22, 27. 1. They tempted God—tempted his power. They tempted his justice, whether he would resent their provocations and punish them or no. 2. They murmured against him. This is much insisted on, v. 27. 3. They did this after they had seen God's miracles in Egypt and in the wilderness, v. 2. 4. They had repeated the provocations ten times, that is, very often.

IV. The sentence passed upon them for this sin. 1. That they should not see the promised land (v. 23), nor come into it, v. 30. The promise of God should be fulfilled to their posterity, but not to them. 2. That they should immediately turn back into the wilderness, v. 25. Their next remove should be a retreat. 3. That all those who had now grown up to men's estate should die in the wilderness, not all at once, but by degrees. They wished that they might die in the wilderness, and God said Amen to their passionate wish. 4. That in pursuance of this sentence they should wander to and fro in the wilderness, like travellers that have lost themselves, for forty years. (1) That hereby they might be brought to repentance, and find mercy with God in the other world, whatever became of them in this. (2) That they might sensibly feel what a dangerous thing it is for God's covenant-people to break with him. For God never leaves any till they first leave him. (3) That a new generation might in this time be raised up, which could not be done all of a sudden. And the children, being brought up under the tokens of God's displeasure against their fathers, might take warning not to tread in the steps of their fathers' disobedience.

V. The mercy that was mixed with this severe sentence.

1. Mercy to Caleb and Joshua, that though they should wander with the rest in the wilderness, yet they, and they only of all that were now above twenty years old, should survive the years of banishment, and live to enter Canaan. Caleb only is spoken of (v. 24), and a particular mark of honour put upon him, both, (1) In the character given of him: he had another spirit, different from the rest of the spies, an after-spirit, which furnished him with second thoughts, and he followed the Lord fully, kept close to his duty, and went through with it, though deserted and threatened; and, (2) In the recompence promised to him: Him will I bring in due time into the land whereinto he went. When Caleb is again mentioned (v. 30) Joshua stands with him, compassed with the same favours and crowned with the same honours, having stood with him in the same services.

2. Mercy to the children even of these rebels. They should have a seed preserved, and Canaan secured to that seed: Your little ones, now under twenty years old, which you, in your unbelief, said should be a prey, them will I bring in, v. 31.

Verses 36–45

Here is, I. The sudden death of the ten evil spies. While the sentence was passing upon the people, before it was published, they died of the plague before the Lord, v. 36, 37. 1. They sinned themselves, in bringing up a slander upon the land of promise. Note, Those greatly provoke God who misrepresent religion, cast reproach upon it, and raise prejudices in men's minds against it, or give occasion to those to do so who seek occasion. 2. They made Israel to sin. They designedly made all the congregation murmur against God.

II. The special preservation of Caleb and Joshua: They lived still, v. 38.

III. The publication of the sentence to all the people, v. 36. He told them all what the decree was which had gone forth concerning them, and which could not be reversed, that they must all die in the wilderness, and Canaan must be reserved for the next generation.

IV. The foolish fruitless attempts of some of the Israelites to enter Canaan, notwithstanding the sentence.

1. They were now eager to go forward towards Canaan, v. 40. They were up early, mustered all their force, got together in a body, and begged of Moses to lead them on against the enemy. But, though God was glorified by this recantation of theirs, they were not benefited by it, because it came too late.

2. Moses utterly disallows their motion, and forbids the expedition they were meditating: Go not up, v. 41–43. He gives them warning of the danger: "The Canaanites are before you to attack you, and the Lord is not among you to protect you and fight for you, and therefore look to yourselves that you be not smitten before your enemies." Those that are out of the way of their duty are from under God's protection, and go at their peril.

3. They venture notwithstanding. Never was people so perverse and so desperately resolved in every thing to walk contrary to God. God bade them go, and they would not; he forbade them, and they would.

4. The expedition speeds accordingly, v. 45. The enemy had posted themselves upon the top of the hill, to make good that pass against the invaders, and, being informed by their scouts of their approach, sallied out upon them, and defeated them, and it is probable that many of the Israelites were killed.

CHAP. XV

This chapter, which is mostly concerning sacrifice and offering, comes in between the story of two rebellions (one ch. xiv., the other ch. xvi.), to signify that these legal institutions were typical of the gifts which Christ was to receive even for the rebellious, Ps lxviii. 18. In the foregoing chapter, upon Israel's provocation, God had determined to destroy them, and in token of his wrath had sentenced them to perish in the wilderness. But, upon Moses's intercession, he said, "I have pardoned"; and, in token of that mercy, in this chapter he repeats and explains some of the laws concerning offerings, to show that he was reconciled to them. Here is, I. The law concerning the meat-offerings and drink-offerings (ver. 1–12) both for Israelites and for strangers (ver. 13–16), and a law concerning the heave-offerings of the first of their dough, ver. 17–21. II. The law concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance, ver. 22–29. III. The punishment of presumptuous sins (ver. 30, 31), and an instance given in the sabbath-breaker, ver. 32–36. IV. A law concerning fringes, for memorandums, upon the borders of their garments, ver. 37, &c.

I. Full instructions given concerning the meat-offerings and drink-offerings, which were appendages to all the sacrifices of animals. The beginning of this law is very encouraging: When you come into the land of your habitation which I give unto you, then you shall do so and so, v. 2. This was a plain intimation, not only that God was reconciled to them, but that he would secure the promised land to their seed. Now the intent of this law is to direct what proportion the meat-offering and drink-offering should bear to the several sacrifices to which they were annexed.

II. Natives and strangers are here set upon a level, in this as in other matters (v. 13–16): "One law shall be for you and for the stranger that is proselyted to the Jewish religion." Now, 1. This was an invitation to the Gentiles to become proselytes, and to embrace the faith and worship of the true God. In civil things there was a difference between strangers and true-born Israelites, but not in the things of God. 2. This was an obligation upon the Jews to be kind to strangers, and not to oppress them, because they saw them owned and accepted of God. Communion in religion should slay all enmities. It was a happy presage of the calling of the Gentiles, and of their admission into the church. If the law made so little difference between Jew and Gentile, much less would the gospel make, which broke down the partition-wall, and reconciled both to God in one sacrifice, without the observance of the legal ceremonies.

III. A law for the offering of the first of their dough unto the Lord. This, as the former, goes upon the comfortable supposition of their having come into the promised land, v. 18. They must not only offer him the first-fruits and tenths of the corn in their fields, but when they had it in their houses, in their kneading troughs, when it was almost ready to be set upon their tables, God must have a further tribute, part of their dough must be heaved or offered up to God (v. 20, 21), and the priest must have it for the use of his family. Thus they must own their dependence upon God for their daily bread. Christ has taught us to pray not, Give us this year our yearly harvest, but Give us this day our daily bread.

Verses 22–29

We have here the laws concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance; the Jews understand it of idolatry, or false worship, through the error of their teachers. If they had failed in the offerings they must bring an offering of atonement, though the omission had been through forgetfulness or mistake. 1. The case is put of a national sin, committed through ignorance, and become customary through a vulgar error (v. 24). Now, if there should appear to have been a general neglect of that appointment, then a sacrifice must be offered for the whole congregation. It is likewise supposed to be the case of a particular person. Thus atonement shall be made for the soul that sins, when he sins through ignorance, v. 28. Sins committed ignorantly shall be forgiven, through Christ the great sacrifice, who, when he offered up himself once for all upon the cross, seemed to explain the intention of his offering in that prayer, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. And Paul seems to allude to this law concerning sins of ignorance (1 Tim. i. 13), I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly and in unbelief. And it looked favourably upon the Gentiles that this law of atoning for sins of ignorance is expressly made to extend to those who were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel (v. 29), but supposed to be proselytes of righteousness. Thus the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles.

Verses 30–36

Here is, I. The general doom passed upon presumptuous sinners. Those are to be reckoned presumptuous sinners that sin with a high hand, as the original phrase is (v. 30), that is, that fight against God, and dare him to do his worst, see Job xv. 25. It imputes folly to Infinite Wisdom, and iniquity to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth; such is the malignity of wilful sin. The sentence passed on such is dreadful. There remains no sacrifice for those sins; the law provided none.

II. A particular instance of presumption in the sin of sabbath-breaking. The offence was the gathering of sticks on the sabbath day (v. 32), which, it is probable, were designed to make a fire of, whereas they were commanded to bake and seethe what they had occasion for the day before, Exod. xvi. 23. It appears by the context to have been done presumptuously, and in affront both of the law and to the Law-maker. It seems, even common Israelites, though there was much amiss among them, yet would not contentedly see the sabbath profaned. The law had already made the profanation of the sabbath a capital crime (Exod. xxxi. 14, ch. xxxv. 2); but they were in doubt, either concerning the offence (whether this that he had done should be deemed a profanation or no) or concerning the punishment, what death he should die. Sentence was passed; the prisoner was adjudged a sabbath-breaker, according to the intent of that law, and as such he must be put to death; and to show how great the crime was, and how displeasing to God, and that others might hear and fear and not do in like manner presumptuously, that death is appointed him which was looked upon as most terrible: He must be stoned with stones, v. 35. Note, God is jealous for the honour of his sabbaths, and will not hold those guiltless, whatever men do, that profane them. Execution was done pursuant to the sentence. v. 36. He was stoned to death by the congregation. As many as could were employed in the execution, that those, at least, might be afraid of breaking the sabbath, who had thrown a stone at this sabbath-breaker. This intimates that the open profanation of the sabbath is a sin which ought to be punished and restrained by the civil magistrate, who, as far as overt acts go, is keeper of both tables. See Neh. xiii. 17. One would think there could be no great harm in gathering a few sticks, on what day soever it was, but God intended the exemplary punishment of him that did so for a standing warning to us all, to make conscience of keeping holy the sabbath.

Provision had been just now made by the law for the pardon of sins of ignorance and infirmity; now here is an expedient provided for the preventing of such sins. They are ordered to make fringes upon the borders of their garments, which were to be memorandums to them of their duty. The sign appointed is a fringe of silk, and a blue riband bound on the top of it to keep it tight, v. 38. Our Saviour, being made under the law, wore these fringes; hence we read of the hem or border of his garment, Matt. ix. 20. These borders the Pharisees enlarged, that they might be thought more holy and devout than other people. Many look upon their ornaments to feed their pride, but they must look upon these ornaments to awaken their consciences to a sense of their duty.

After the repetition of some ceremonial appointments, the chapter closes with that great and fundamental law of religion, Be holy unto your God.

CHAP. XVI

The date of the history contained in this chapter is altogether uncertain. Probably these mutinies happened after their removal back again from Kadesh-barnea. Presently after new laws given follows the story of a new rebellion. Here is, I. A daring and dangerous rebellion raised against Moses and Aaron, by Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, ver. 1–15. 1 Korah and his accomplices contend for the priesthood against Aaron, ver. 3. Moses reasons with them, and appeals to God for a decision of the controversy, ver. 4–11. 2. Dathan and Abiram quarrel with Moses, and refuse to obey his summons, which greatly grieves him, ver 12–15. II. A solemn appearance of the pretenders to the priesthood before God, and a public appearance of the glory of the Lord. III. The deciding of the controversy, and the crushing of the rebellion, by the cutting off of the rebels. IV. A new insurrection of the people, ver. 41–43. 1. God stayed the insurrection by a plague, ver. 45. 2. Aaron stayed the plague by offering incense, ver. 46–50. The manner and method of recording this story plainly shows the ferment to have been very great.

Here is, I. An account of the rebels, who and what they were, men of distinction and quality, that made a figure. Korah was the ring-leader: he formed and headed the faction. With him joined Dathan and Abiram, chief men of the tribe of Reuben, the eldest son of Jacob. Probably Korah was disgusted both at the preferment of Aaron to the priesthood and the constituting of Elizaphan to the head of the Kohathites (ch. iii. 30); and perhaps the Reubenites were angry that the tribe of Judah had the first post of honour in the camp. And, these being themselves men of renown, they seduced into the conspiracy two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly (v. 2).

II. The rebels' remonstrance, v. 3. That which they quarrel with is the settlement of the priesthood upon Aaron and his family. 1. They proudly boast of the holiness of the congregation, and the presence of God in it. Small reason they had to boast of the people's purity, or of God's favour, as the people had been so frequently and so lately polluted with sin. 2. They unjustly charge Moses and Aaron with taking the honour they had to themselves, whereas it was evident, beyond contradiction, that they were called of God to it, Heb. v. 4. See here, (1) What spirit levellers are of, and those that despise dominions, and resist the powers that God has set over them; they are proud, envious, ambitious, turbulent, wicked, and unreasonable men. (2) What usage even the best and most useful men may expect.

III. Moses's conduct when this remonstrance was published against him.

1. He fell on his face (v. 4), as before, ch. xiv. 5. He applied to God, by prayer, for direction what to say and to do upon this sad occasion.

2. He agrees to refer the case to God, and leave it to him to decide it, as one well assured of the goodness of his title, and yet well content to resign, if God thought fit, to gratify this discontented people with another nomination.

3. He argues the case fairly with them, to still the mutiny with fair reasoning, if possible, before the appeal came to God's tribunal, for then he knew it would end in the confusion of his complainants.

(1) He calls them the sons of Levi, v. 7, and again v. 8. Levites, and yet rebels.

(2) He retorts their charge upon themselves. They had unjustly charged Moses and Aaron with taking too much upon them, though they had done no more than what God put upon them; nay, says Moses, You take too much upon you, you sons of Levi.

(3) He shows them the privilege they had as Levites, which was sufficient for them, they needed not to aspire to the honour of the priesthood, v. 9, 10.

(4) He convicts them of the sin of undervaluing those privileges: Seemeth it a small thing unto you?

(5) He interprets their mutiny to be a rebellion against God (v. 11); while they pretended to assert the holiness and liberty of the Israel of God, they really took up arms against the God of Israel: You are gathered together against the Lord.

Verses 12–22

Here is, I. The insolence of Dathan and Abiram, and their treasonable remonstrance. Moses had heard what Korah had to say, and had answered it; now he summons Dathan and Abiram to bring in their complaints (v. 12); but they would not obey his summons. They send their articles of impeachment against Moses; and the charge runs very high. 1. They charge him with having done them a great deal of wrong in bringing them out of Egypt, invidiously calling that a land flowing with milk and honey, v. 13. 2. They charge him with a design upon their lives, that he intended to kill them in the wilderness. 3. They charge him with a design upon their liberties, that he meant to enslave them, by making himself a prince over them. A prince over them! Was he not a tender father to them? nay, their devoted servant for the Lord's sake? 4. They charge him with cheating them, raising their expectations of a good land, and then defeating them (v. 14): Thou hast not brought us, as thou promisedst us, into a land that floweth with milk and honey; and pray whose fault was that? He had brought them to the borders of it, and was just ready, under God, to put them in possession of it; but they thrust it away from them, and shut the door against themselves; so that it was purely their own fault that they were not now in Canaan, and yet Moses must bear the blame.

II. Moses's just resentment of their insolence, v. 15. In this discomposure,

1. He appeals to God concerning his own integrity; God was his witness, (1) That he never got any thing by them: I have not taken one ass from them, not only not by way of bribery and extortion, but not by way of recompence or gratuity for all the good offices he had done them. He got more in his estate when he kept Jethro's flock than when he came to be king in Jeshurun. (2) That they never lost any thing by him: Neither have I hurt any one of them.

2. He begs of God to plead his cause, and clear him, by showing his displeasure at the incense which Korah and his company were to offer, with whom Dathan and Abiram were in confederacy. Lord, says he, Respect not thou their offering.

III. Issue joined between Moses and his accusers. 1. Moses challenges them to appear with Aaron next morning, at the time of offering up the morning incense, and refer the matter to God's judgment, v. 16, 17. 2. Korah accepts the challenge, and makes his appearance with Moses and Aaron at the door of the tabernacle, to make good his pretensions, v. 18, 19. They took every man his censer. Perhaps these were some of the censers which these heads of families had made use of at their family-altars.

IV. The judgment set, and the Judge taking the tribunal, and threatening to give sentence against the whole congregation. 1. The glory of the Lord appeared, v. 19. The same glory that appeared to install Aaron in his office at first (Lev. ix. 23) now appeared to confirm him in it, and to confound those that oppose him. 2. God threatened to consume them all in a moment, and, in order to that, bade Moses and Aaron stand from among them, v. 21.

V. The humble intercession of Moses and Aaron for the congregation, v. 22. 1. Their posture was importuning: they fell on their faces, prostrating themselves before God, as supplicants in good earnest, that they might prevail for sparing mercy. Though the people had treacherously deserted them, and struck in with those that were in arms against them, yet they approved themselves faithful to the trusts reposed in them, as shepherds of Israel, who were to stand in the breach when they saw the flock in danger. Note, If others fail in their duty to us, this does not discharge us from our duty to them, nor take off the obligations we lie under to seek their welfare. 2. Their prayer was a pleading prayer, and it proved a prevailing one. Observe in the prayer, (1) The title they give to God: The God of the spirits of all flesh. See what man is; he is a spirit in flesh, a soul embodied, a creature wonderfully compounded of heaven and earth. See what God is; he is the God of the spirits of all mankind. (2) The argument they insist on; it is much the same with that which Abraham urged in his intercession for Sodom (Gen. xviii. 23): Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? Such is the plea here: Shall one man sin and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?

We have here the determining of the controversy with Dathan and Abiram, who rebelled against Moses, as in the next paragraph the determining of the controversy with Korah and his company, who would be rivals with Aaron. It should seem that Dathan and Abiram had set up a spacious tabernacle in the midst of the tents of their families, where they kept court, met in council, and hung out their flag of defiance against Moses; it is here called the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, v. 24, 27.

I. Public warning is given to the congregation to withdraw immediately from the tents of the rebels. 1. God bids Moses speak to this purport, v. 24. This was in answer to Moses's prayer. He had begged that God would not destroy the whole congregation. God never promised to save by miracles those that would not save themselves by means. Moses that had prayed for them must preach this to them, and warn them to flee from this wrath to come. 2. Moses accordingly repairs to the head-quarters of the rebels, leaving Aaron at the door of the tabernacle, v. 25. Dathan and Abiram had contumaciously refused to come up to him (v. 12), yet he humbly condescends to go down to them, to try if he could yet convince and reclaim them. 3. Proclamation is made that all manner of persons, as they tendered their own safety, should forthwith depart from the tents of these wicked men (v. 26).

II. The congregation takes the warning, but the rebels themselves continue obstinate, v. 27. 1. God, in mercy, inclined the people to forsake the rebels. 2. God, in justice, left the rebels to the obstinacy and hardness of their own hearts. They impudently stood in the doors of their tents, as if they would outface God himself, and dare him to his worst.

III. Sentence is solemnly pronounced upon them by Moses in the name of the Lord, and the decision of the controversy is put upon the execution of that sentence by the almighty power of God.

IV. Execution is immediately done. It appeared that God and his servant Moses understood one another very well; for, as soon as ever Moses had spoken the word, God did the work, the earth clave asunder (v. 31), opened her mouth, and swallowed them all up, them and theirs (v. 32), and then closed upon them, v. 33. This judgment was, 1. Unparalleled. 2. It was very terrible to the sinners themselves to go down alive into their own graves. 3. It was severe upon their poor children, though we cannot particularly tell how bad they might be to deserve it or how good God might be otherwise to them to compensate it, yet of this we are sure in general, that Infinite Justice did them no wrong.

V. All Israel is alarmed at the judgment: They fled at the cry of them, v. 34. Note, Others' ruins should be our warnings.

We must now look back to the door of the tabernacle, where we left the pretenders to the priesthood, with their censers in their hands ready to offer incense; and here we find,

I. Vengeance taken on them, v. 35. This punishment was no less strange or dreadful, and in it it appeared, 1. That our God is a consuming fire. 2. That it is at our peril if we meddle with that which does not belong to us. God is jealous of the honour of his own institutions, and will not have them invaded. Had they been content with their office as Levites, which was sacred and honourable, and better than they deserved, they might have lived and died with joy and reputation.

II. Care is taken to perpetuate the remembrance of this vengeance. Orders are given about their censers, 1. That they be secured, because they are hallowed. Eleazar is charged with this, v. 37. Now Eleazar is ordered to scatter the fire, with the incense that was kindled with it, in some unclean place without the camp, to signify God's abhorrence of their offering as a polluted thing: The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord. But he is to gather up the censers out of the mingled burning, God's fire and theirs, because they are hallowed. 2. That they be used in the service of the sanctuary. They must be beaten into broad plates for a covering of the brazen altar, v. 38–40. These pretenders thought to have ruined the altar, by laying the priesthood in common again; but, to show that Aaron's office was so far from being shaken by their impotent malice that it was rather confirmed by it, their censers, which offered to rival his, were used both for the adorning and for the preserving of the altar at which he ministered. These censers were preserved in terrorem, that others might hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously.

Here is, I. A new rebellion raised the very next day against Moses and Aaron. On the morrow (v. 41) the body of the people mutinied. 1. Though they were so lately terrified by the sight of the punishment of the rebels. The same sins were re-acted and all these warnings slighted. 2. Though they were so lately saved from sharing in the same punishment. Their charge runs very high: You have killed the people of the Lord. Could anything have been said more unjustly and maliciously? It was plain enough that Moses and Aaron had no hand in their death (they did what they could to save them), so that in charging them with murder they did in effect charge God himself with it. The terrors of his judgments as they were here executed on the disobedient, shows how necessary the grace of God is to the effectual change of men's hearts and lives. Love will do what fear could not.

II. God's speedy appearance against the rebels. When they had gathered against Moses and Aaron, perhaps with a design to depose or murder them, they looked towards the tabernacle, as if their misgiving consciences expected some frowns thence, and, behold, the glory of the Lord appeared (v. 42), for the protection of his servants, and the confusion of his and their accusers and adversaries.

III. The intercession which Moses and Aaron made for them. 1. They both fell on their faces, humbly to intercede with God for mercy. This they had done several times before, upon similar occasions; and, though the people had basely requited them for it, yet, God having graciously accepted them, they still have recourse to the same method. This is praying always. 2. Moses, perceiving that the plague had begun in the congregation of the rebels, sent Aaron by an act of his priestly office to make atonement for them, v. 46. And Aaron readily went and burned incense between the living and the dead. By this it appeared, (1) That Aaron was a very good man, and a man that had a true love for the children of his people, though they hated and envied him. (2) That Aaron was a very bold man—bold to venture into the midst of an enraged rabble, bold to venture into the midst of the infection. To save their lives he put his own into his hand, not counting it dear to him, so that he might but fulfil his ministry. (3) That Aaron was a man of God, and ordained for men, in things pertaining to God. His call to the priesthood was hereby abundantly confirmed and set above all contradiction. (4) That Aaron was a type of Christ, who came into the world to make an atonement for sin.

IV. The result and issue of the whole matter. God showed them what he could do by his power, and what he might do in justice, but then showed them what he would do in his love and pity: he would, notwithstanding all this, preserve them a people to himself in and by a mediator.

CHAP. XVII

Enough had been done in the chapter before to quash all pretensions of the families of the tribe of Levi that would set up in competition with Aaron, but the princes of the rest of the tribes began to murmur. If the head of a tribe must be a priest, why not the head of some other tribe than that of Levi? He that searches the heart knew this thought to be in the breast of some of them, and before it broke out into any overt act graciously anticipated it, to prevent bloodshed; and it is done by miracle in this chapter, not a miracle of wrath, as before, but of grace. I. The matter is put upon trial by the bringing of twelve rods, one for each prince, before the Lord, ver. 1–7. II. Upon trial, the matter is determined by the miraculous blossoming of Aaron's rod, ver. 8, 9. III. The decision of the controversy is registered by the preservation of the rod, ver. 10, 11. IV. The people acquiesce in it with some reluctance, ver. 12, 13.

Verses 1–7

Here we have, I. Orders given for the bringing in of a rod for every tribe that God by a miracle might make it known on whom he had conferred the honour of the priesthood. 1. It seems then the priesthood was a preferment worth seeking and striving for, even by the princes of the tribes. 2. It seems there were those who would not acquiesce in the divine appointment, but would make an interest in opposition to it. God will rule, but Israel will not be ruled; and this is the quarrel. 3. It is an instance of the grace of God that, having wrought divers miracles to punish sin, he would work one more on purpose to prevent it. The directions are, (1) That twelve rods or staves should be brought in. It is probable that they were all made of the almond-tree. It should seem they were but twelve in all, with Aaron's, for, when Levi comes into the account, Ephraim and Manasseh make but one, under the name of Joseph. (2) That the name of each prince should be written upon his rod. (3) That they should be laid up in the tabernacle, for one night, before the testimony, that is, before the ark, which, with its mercy-seat, was a symbol, token, or testimony, of God's presence with them. (4) They were to expect that the rod of the tribe, or prince, whom God chose to the priesthood, should bud and blossom, v. 5.

II. The preparing of the rods accordingly. The princes brought them in, and Moses laid them up before the Lord.

Here is, I. The final determination of the controversy concerning the priesthood by a miracle, v. 8, 9. The rods or staves were brought out from the most holy place where they were laid up, and publicly produced before the people; and, while all the rest of the rods remained as they were, Aaron's rod only, of a dry stick, became a living branch, budded, and blossomed, and yielded almonds. This was miraculous, and took away all suspicion of a fraud, as if in the night Moses had taken away Aaron's rod, and put a living branch of an almond tree in the room, of it; for no ordinary branch would have buds, blossoms, and fruits upon it, all at once. Now,

1. This was a plain indication to the people that Aaron was chosen to the priesthood. Bishop Hall here observes that fruitfulness is the best evidence of a divine call, and that the plants of God's setting, and the boughs cut off from them, will flourish. See Ps. xcii. 12–14. The trees of the Lord, though they seem dry trees, are full of sap.

2. It was a very proper sign to represent the priesthood itself, which was hereby confirmed to Aaron. (1) That it should be fruitful and serviceable to the church of God. (2) That there should be a succession of priests. Here were not only almonds for the present, but buds and blossoms promising more hereafter. (3) That yet this priesthood should not be perpetual, but in process of time, like the branches and blossoms of a tree, should fail and wither.

3. It was a type and figure of Christ and his priesthood. He was to grow up before God, as this before the ark, like a tender plant, and a root out of a dry ground, Isa. liii. 2.

II. The record of this determination, by the preserving of the rod before the testimony, in perpetuam rei memoriam—that it might be had in perpetual remembrance, v. 10, 11. 1. The design of God in all his providences is to take away sin, and to prevent it. 2. What God does for the taking away of sin is done in real kindness to us, that we die not. All the bitter potions he gives, and all the sharp methods he uses with us, are for the cure of a disease which otherwise would certainly be fatal.

III. The outcry of the people hereupon (v. 12, 13): Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. Shall we be consumed with dying? This may be considered as the language either, 1. Of a repining people quarrelling with the judgments of God, which, by their own pride and obstinacy, they had brought upon themselves. They seem to speak despairingly, as if God was a hard Master, that sought advantage against them. Or, 2. Of a repenting people. We submit to the divine will in this appointment; we will not contend any more, lest we all perish.

CHAP. XVIII

Aaron being now fully established in the priesthood in this chapter God gives him full instructions concerning his office or rather repeats those which he had before given him. He tells him, I. What must be his work and the care and charge committed to him, and what assistance he should have from the Levites in that work, ver. 1–7. II. What should be his and the Levites' wages for this work. 1. The perquisites or fees peculiar to the priests, ver. 8–19. 2. The settled maintenance of the Levites, ver. 20–24. III. The portion which must be paid to the priests out of the Levites' maintenance, ver. 25–32. Thus every one knew what he had to do, and what he had to live upon.

Verses 1–7

The coherence of this chapter with that foregoing is very observable.

I. The people, in the close of that chapter, had complained of the difficulty and peril that there were in drawing near to God. Now, in answer to this complaint, God here gives them to understand by Aaron that the priests should come near for them as their representatives.

II. A great deal of honour God had now lately put upon Aaron. Now God comes to him to remind him of the burden that was laid upon him, and the duty required from him as a priest. He would see reason to receive the honours of his office with reverence and holy trembling, when he considered how great was the charge committed to him.

1. God tells him of the danger that attended his dignity, v. 1. (1) That both the priests and Levites (thou, and thy sons, and thy father's house) should bear the iniquity of the sanctuary; that is, if the sanctuary were profaned by the intrusion of strangers, or persons in their uncleanness, the blame should lie upon the Levites and priests, who ought to have kept them off. (2) That the priests should themselves bear the iniquity of the priesthood; that is, if they either neglected any part of their work or permitted any other persons to invade their office, and take their work out of their hands, they should bear the blame of it.

2. He tells him of the duty that attended his dignity. (1) That he and his sons must minister before the tabernacle of witness (v. 2); that is (as bishop Patrick explains it), before the most holy place, in which the ark was, on the outside of the veil of that tabernacle, but within the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. They were to attend the golden altar, the table, and candlestick, which no Levite might approach to. You shall serve, v. 7. Not, "You shall rule". Ministers must remember that they are ministers, that is, servants, of whom it is required that they be humble, diligent, and faithful. (2) That the Levites must assist him and his sons, and minister to them in all the service of the tabernacle (v. 2–4), though they must by no means come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary. (3) That both priests and Levites must carefully watch against the profanation of sacred things. The Levites must keep the charge of the tabernacle. And the priests must keep the charge of the sanctuary (v. 5), must instruct the people, and admonish them concerning the due distance they were to keep.

Verses 8–19

The priest's service is called a warfare; and who goes a-warring at his own charges? As they were well employed, so they were well provided for. Those that served at the altar lived upon the altar, So those that preach the gospel should live upon the gospel, and live comfortably, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14. Scandalous maintenance makes scandalous ministers. Now observe, 1. That much of the provision that was made for them arose out of the sacrifices which they themselves were employed to offer. 2. Their maintenance was such as left them altogether disentangled from the affairs of this life. Thus provision is made that a gospel ministry should continue till Christ comes, by an ordinance for ever. Lo, I am with you (that is their maintenance and support) always, even to the end of the world.

Verses 20–32

A further account of the provision that was made both for the Levites and for the priests, out of the country.

I. They must have no inheritance in the land; only cities to dwell in were afterwards allowed them, but no ground to occupy. God dispenses his favours variously. The Levites have the honour of attending the tabernacle, which is denied the Israelites; but then the Israelites have the honour of inheritances in Canaan, which is denied the Levites.

II. But they must both have tithes of the land. Besides the first-fruits which were appropriated to the priests, the tithe also was appropriated. 1. The Levites had the tithes of the people's increase (v. 21). The Levites were the smallest tribe of the twelve, and yet, besides all other advantages, they had a tenth part of the yearly profits, without the trouble and expense of ploughing and sowing. 2. The priests had the tenths of the Levites' tithes settled upon them. The order for this Moses is directed to give to the Levites, whom God would have to pay it with cheerfulness, rather than the priests to demand it with authority. (1) The Levites were to give God his dues out of their tithes, as well as the Israelites out of their increase. Those that are employed to assist the devotions of others must be sure to pay their own, as a heave-offering to the Lord. Prayers and praises lifted up to God, or rather the heart lifted up in them, are now our heave-offerings. (2) This was to be given to Aaron the priest (v. 28), and to his successors the high priests, to be divided and disposed of in such proportions as they should think fit among the inferior priests.

CHAP. XIX

This chapter is only concerning the preparing and using of the ashes which were to impregnate the water of purification. The people had complained of the strictness of the law, which forbade their near approach to the tabernacle, ch. xvii. 13. In answer to this complaint, they are here directed to purify themselves, so as that they might come as far as they had occasion without fear. Here is, I. The method of preparing these ashes, by the burning of a red heifer, with a great deal of ceremony, ver. 1–10. II. The way of using them. 1. They were designed to purify persons from the pollution contracted by a dead body, ver. 11–16. 2. They were to be put into running water (a small quantity of them), with which the person to be cleansed must be purified, ver. 17–22. And that this ceremonial purification was a type and figure of the cleansing of the conscience of believers from the pollutions of sin appears by the apostle's discourse, Heb. ix. 13, 14, where he compares the efficacy of the blood of Christ with the sanctifying virtue that was in "the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean."

Verses 1–10

We have here the divine appointment concerning the solemn burning of a red heifer to ashes, and the preserving of the ashes, that of them might be made, not a beautifying, but a purifying, water, for that was the utmost the law reached to; it offered not to adorn as the gospel does, but to cleanse only.

I. There was a great deal of care employed in the choice of the heifer that was to be burnt, much more than in the choice of any other offering, v. 2.

It must not only be without blemish, typifying the spotless purity and sinless perfection of the Lord Jesus, but it must be a red heifer, because of the rarity of the colour, that it might be the more remarkable. And it must be one on which never came yoke, which was not insisted on in other sacrifices, but thus was typified the voluntary offer of the Lord Jesus, when he said, Lo, I come. He was bound and held with no other cords than those of his own love.

II. There was to be a great deal of ceremony in the burning of it. The care of doing it was committed to Eleazar. By him that was next to Aaron in dignity. Now,

1. The heifer was to be slain without the camp, as an impure thing, which bespeaks the insufficiency of the methods prescribed by the ceremonial law to take away sin.

2. Eleazar was to sprinkle the blood directly before the door of the tabernacle, and looking steadfastly towards it, v. 4. This made it in some sort an expiation; for the sprinkling of the blood before the Lord was the chief solemnity in all the sacrifices of atonement.

3. The heifer was to be wholly burnt, v. 5. The priest was to cast into the fire, while it was burning, cedarwood, hyssop, and scarlet, which were used in the cleansing of lepers (Lev. xiv. 6, 7), that the ashes of these might be mingled with the ashes of the heifer, because they were designed for purification.

4. The ashes of the heifer (separated as well as they could from the ashes of the wood wherewith it was burnt) were to be carefully gathered up by the hand of a clean person, and laid up for the use of the congregation, as there was occasion (v. 9).

5. All those that were employed in this service were made ceremonially unclean by it; even Eleazar himself, though he did but sprinkle the blood, v. 7. All the sacrifices which were offered for sin were therefore looked upon as impure, because the sins of men were laid upon them, as all our sins were upon Christ, who therefore is said to be made sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21.

Directions are here given concerning the use and application of the ashes which were prepared for purification.

I. In what cases there needed a purification with these ashes. No other is mentioned here than the ceremonial uncleanness that was contracted by the touch of a dead body, or of the bone or grave of a dead man, or being in the tent or house where a dead body lay, v. 11, 14–16. The law could not conquer death, nor abolish it and alter the property of it, as the gospel does by bringing life and immortality to light, and so introducing a better hope. Since our Redeemer was dead and buried, death is no more destroying to the Israel of God, and therefore dead bodies are no more defiling; but while the church was under the law, the pollution contracted by dead bodies could not but form in their minds melancholy and uncomfortable notions concerning death, while believers now through Christ can triumph over it. O grave! where is thy victory? Where is thy pollution?

II. How the ashes were to be used and applied in these cases. 1. A small quantity of the ashes must be put into a cup of spring water, and mixed with the water, which thereby was made, as it is here called, a water of separation, because it was to be sprinkled on those who were separated or removed from the sanctuary by their uncleanness. As the ashes of the heifer signified the merit of Christ, so the running water signified the power and grace of the blessed Spirit, who is compared to rivers of living water; and it is by his operation that the righteousness of Christ is applied to us for our cleansing. 2. This water must be applied by a bunch of hyssop dipped in it, with which the person or thing to be cleansed must be sprinkled (v. 18), in allusion to which David prays, Purge me with hyssop. Faith is the bunch of hyssop wherewith the conscience is sprinkled and the heart purified. The blood of Christ is said to be the blood of sprinkling (Heb. xii. 24), and with it we are said to be sprinkled from an evil conscience (Heb. x. 22), that is, we are freed from the uneasiness that arises from a sense of our guilt. And it is foretold that Christ, by his baptism, shall sprinkle many nations, Isa. lii. 15.

CHAP. XX

At this chapter begins the history of the fortieth year (which was the last year) of the Israelites' wandering in the wilderness. And since the beginning of their second year, when they were sentenced to perform their quarantine in the desert, there to wear away the tedious revolution of forty years, there is little recorded concerning them till this last year, which brought them to the borders of Canaan, and the history of this year is almost as large as the history of the first year. This chapter gives an account of, I. The death of Miriam, ver. 1. II. The fetching of water out of the rock, in which observe, 1. The distress Israel was in, for want of water, ver. 2. 2. Their discontent and murmuring in that distress, ver. 3–5. 3. God's pity and power engaged for their supply with water out of the rock, ver. 6–9. 4. The infirmity of Moses and Aaron upon this occasion, ver. 10, 11. 5. God's displeasure against them, ver. 12, 13. III. The negotiation with the Edomites. Israel's request (ver. 14–17), and the repulse the Edomites gave them, ver. 18–21. IV. The death of Aaron the high priest upon Mount Hor, the instalment of Eleazar in his room, and the people's mourning for him, ver. 22, &c.

After thirty-eight years' tedious marches, or rather tedious rests, in the wilderness, backward towards the Red Sea, the armies of Israel now at length set their faces towards Canaan again, and had come not far off from the place where they were when, by the righteous sentence of divine Justice, they were made to begin their wanderings. Hitherto they had been led about as in a maze of labyrinth. They were now brought into the right way again; they abode in Kadesh (v. 1).

I. Here dies Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, and as it should seem older than either of them. She must have been so if she was that sister that was set to watch Moses when he was put into the ark of bulrushes, Exod. ii. 4. Miriam died there, v. 1. She was a propheteſs, and had been an instrument of much good to Israel, Mic. vi. 4. When Moses and Aaron with their rod went before them, to work wonders for them, Miriam with her timbrel went before them in praising God for these wondrous works (Exod. xv. 20), and therein did them real service; yet she had once been a murmurer (ch. xii. 1), and must not enter Canaan.

II. Here there is another Meribah.

1. There was no water for the congregation, v. 2. It is probable that for some time they had been in a country where they were supplied in an ordinary way, and when common providence supplied them it was fit that the miracle should cease. But in this place it fell out that there was no water, or not sufficient for the congregation.

2. Hereupon they murmured, mutinied (v. 2), gathered themselves together, and took up arms against Moses and Aaron. (1) They wished they had died as malefactors by the hands of divine justice, rather than thus seem for a while neglected by the divine mercy. (2) They were angry that they were brought out of Egypt, and led through this wilderness. The present want was of water only, yet, now that they are disposed to find fault, it shall be looked upon as an insufferable hardship put upon them that they have not vines and figs.

3. Moses and Aaron made them no reply, but retired to the door of the tabernacle to know God's mind in this case, v. 6.

4. God appeared, to determine the matter; not on his tribunal of justice, to sentence the rebels according to their deserts. But he appeared, (1) On his throne of glory, to silence their unjust murmuring (v. 6). Note, A believing sight of the glory of the Lord would be an effectual check to our lusts and passions, and would keep our mouths as with a bridle. (2) On his throne of grace, to satisfy their just desires. It was requisite that they should have water. Moses must a second time in God's name command water out of a rock for them, to show that God is as able as ever to supply his people with good things. (3) He bids him speak to the rock, which would do as it was bidden, to shame the people who had been so often spoken to, and would not hear nor obey. (4) He promises that the rock should give forth water (v. 8), and it did so (v. 11).

5. Moses and Aaron acted improperly in the management of this matter, so much so that God in displeasure told them immediately that they should not have the honour of bringing Israel into Canaan, v. 10–12.

(1) It is uncertain what it was in this management that was so provoking to God. The fault was complicated. First, God bade them speak to the rock, and they spoke to the people, and smote the rock, which at this time they were not ordered to do, but they thought speaking would not do. Secondly, They assumed too much of the glory of this work of wonder to themselves: Must we fetch water? as if it were done by some power or worthiness of theirs. Thirdly, Unbelief was the great transgression (v. 12): You believed me not. Dr. Lightfoot's notion of their unbelief is that they doubted whether now at last, when the forty years had expired, they should enter Canaan, and whether they must not for the murmurings of the people be condemned to another period of toil, because a new rock was now opened for their supply, which they took for an indication of their longer stay. Fourthly, They said and did all in heat and passion. Fifthly, That which aggravated all the rest, and made it the more provoking, was that it was public, before the eyes of the children of Israel, to whom they should have been examples of faith, and hope, and meekness.

(2) From the whole we may learn, [1] That the best of men have their failings. [2] That God judges not as man judges concerning sins.

Lastly, The place is hereupon called Meribah, v. 13. It is called Meribah-Kadesh (Deut. xxxii. 51), to distinguish it from the other Meribah. It is the water of strife; to perpetuate the remembrance of the people's sin, and Moses's, and yet of God's mercy, who supplied them with water, and owned and honoured Moses notwithstanding.

Verses 14–21

We have here the application made by Israel to the Edomites. The nearest way to Canaan from the place where Israel now lay encamped was through the country of Edom.

I. Moses sends ambassadors to treat with the king of Edom for leave to pass through his country. 1. They are to claim kindred with the Edomites. Both nations descended from Abraham and Isaac, their common ancestors. 2. They are to give a short account of the history and present state of Israel. And in this there was a double plea: (1) Israel had been abused by the Egyptians, and therefore ought to be pitied and succoured by their relations. (2) Israel had been wonderfully saved by the Lord, and therefore ought to be countenanced and favoured (v. 16). 3. They are humbly to beg a passport through their country. 4. They are to give security for the good behaviour of the Israelites in this march.

II. The ambassadors returned with a refusal, v. 18. Edom, that is, the king of Edom, threatened, if they attempted to enter his country, it should be at their peril. This was owing, 1. To their jealousy of the Israelites. 2. It was owing to the old enmity which Esau bore to Israel. If they had no reason to fear damage by them, yet they were not willing to show so much kindness to them. Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing.

Verses 22–29

The chapter began with the funeral of Miriam, and it ends with the funeral of her brother Aaron.

I. God bids Aaron die, v. 24. 1. There is something of displeasure in these orders. Aaron must not enter Canaan, because he had failed in his duty at the waters of strife. The mention of this, no doubt, went to the heart of Moses, who knew himself, perhaps, at that time, to be the guiltier of the two. 2. There is much of mercy in them. Aaron, though he dies for his transgression, is not put to death as a malefactor, by a plague, or fire from heaven, but dies with ease and in honour. He is not cut off from his people, as the expression usually is concerning those that die by the hand of divine justice, but he is gathered to his people, as one that died in the arms of divine grace. 3. There is much of type and significancy in them. Aaron must not enter Canaan, to show that the Levitical priesthood could make nothing perfect: that must be done by the bringing in of a better hope.

II. Aaron submits, and dies in the method and manner appointed, and, for aught that appears, with as much cheerfulness as if he had been going to bed.

1. He puts on his holy garments to take his leave of them, and goes up with his brother and son to the top of Mount Hor, and probably some of the elders of Israel with him, v. 27. His going up the hill to die signified that the death of saints (and Aaron is called the saint of the Lord) is their ascension; they rather go up than go down to death.

2. Moses, whose hands had first clothed Aaron with his priestly garments, now strips him of them; for, in reverence to the priesthood, it was not fit that he should die in them.

3. Moses immediately puts the priestly garments upon Eleazar his son, clothes him with his father's robe, and strengthens him with his girdle, Isa. xxii. 21. Now, (1) This was a great comfort to Moses, a happy earnest and indication to the church of the care God would take that as one generation of ministers and Christians (spiritual priests) passes away another generation should come up instead of it. (2) It was a great satisfaction to Aaron to see his son, who was dear to him, thus preferred, and his office, which was dearer, thus preserved and secured. (3) It was a great kindness to the people.

CHAP. XXI

The armies of Israel now begin to emerge out of the wilderness, and to come into a land inhabited, to enter upon action, and take possession of the frontiers of the land of promise. I. The defeat of Arad the Canaanite, ver. 1–3. II. The chastisement of the people with fiery serpents for their murmurings, and the relief granted them upon their submission by a brazen serpent, ver. 4–9. III. Several marches forward, and some occurrences, by the way ver. 10–20. IV. The celebrated conquest of Sihon king of the Amorites (ver. 21–32), and of Og king of Bashan (ver. 33–35), and possession taken of their land.

1. The descent which Arad the Canaanite made upon the camp of Israel, hearing that they came by way of the spies; for, though the spies which Moses had sent thirty-eight years before then passed and repassed unobserved, yet their coming, and their errand, it is likely, were afterwards known to the Canaanites, gave them an alarm, and induced them to keep an eye upon Israel. 2. His success at first in this attempt. His advance-guards picked up some straggling Israelites, and took them prisoners, v. 1. 3. Israel's humble address to God upon this occasion, v. 2. It was a temptation to them to murmur as their fathers did, and to despair of getting possession of Canaan; but God, who thus tried them by his providence, enabled them by his grace to quit themselves well in the trial, and to trust in him for relief. 4. The victory which the Israelites obtained over the Canaanites, v. 3. A strong party was sent out, probably under the command of Joshua, which not only drove back these Canaanites, but followed them to their cities and utterly destroyed them, and so returned to the camp. Vincimur in praelio, sed non in bello—We lose a battle, but we finally triumph. What is said of the tribe of Gad is true of all God's Israel, a troop may overcome them, but they shall overcome at the last.

Verses 4–9

I. The fatigue of Israel by a long march round the land of Edom, because they could not obtain passage through it the nearest way: The soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way, v. 4.

II. Their unbelief and murmuring upon this occasion, v. 5. They have bread enough and to spare; and yet they complain there is no bread, because, though they eat angels' food, yet they are weary of it; manna itself is loathed, and called light bread, fit for children, not for men and soldiers. What will those be pleased with whom manna will not please? Let not the contempt which some cast upon the word of God cause us to value it the less: it is the bread of life, substantial bread, and will nourish those who by faith feed upon it to eternal life, whoever calls it light bread.

III. The righteous judgment which God brought upon them for their murmurings, v. 6. He sent fiery serpents among them, which bit or stung many of them to death. The wilderness through which they had passed was all along infested with those fiery serpents, as appears, Deut. viii. 15. But hitherto God had wonderfully preserved his people from receiving hurt by them, till now that they murmured. These serpents are called fiery, from their colour, or from their rage, or from the effects of their bitings. They in their pride had lifted themselves up against God and Moses, and now God humbled and mortified them, by making these despicable animals a plague to them.

IV. Their repentance and supplication to God under this judgment, v. 7. They confess their fault: We have sinned. It is to be feared that they would not have owned the sin if they had not felt the smart. They beg the prayers of Moses for them. Afflictions often change men's sentiments concerning God's people, and teach them to value those prayers which, at a former period, they had scorned. Moses, to show that he had heartily forgiven them, blesses those who had cursed him, and prays for those who had despitefully used him. Herein he was a type of Christ, who interceded for his persecutors, and a pattern to us to go and do likewise, and thus to show that we love our enemies.

V. The wonderful provision which God made for their relief. God ordered Moses to make the representation of a fiery serpent, which he did, in brass, and set it up on a very long pole, so that it might be seen from all parts of the camp, and every one that was stung with a fiery serpent was healed by looking up to this serpent of brass. The people prayed that God would take away the serpents from them (v. 7), but God saw fit not to do this: for he gives effectual relief in the best way, though not in our way. The Jews themselves say that it was not the sight of the brazen serpent that cured them, but, in looking up to it, they looked up to God as the Lord that healed them. But there was much of gospel in this appointment. Our Saviour has told us so (John iii. 14, 15), that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness so the Son of man must be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish. Observe then a resemblance,

1. Between their disease and ours. The devil is the old serpent, a fiery serpent, hence he appears (Rev. xii. 3) as a great red dragon. Sin is the biting of this fiery serpent; it is painful to the startled conscience, and poisonous to the seared conscience. Satan's temptations are called his fiery darts, Eph. vi. 16.

2. Between their remedy and ours. (1) It was God himself that devised and prescribed this antidote against the fiery serpents; so our salvation by Christ was the contrivance of Infinite Wisdom; God himself has found the ransom. (2) It was a very unlikely method of cure; so our salvation by the death of Christ is to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness. (3) That which cured was shaped in the likeness of that which wounded. So Christ, though perfectly free from sin himself, yet was made in the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. viii. 3), so like that it was taken for granted that this man was a sinner, John ix. 24. (4) The brazen serpent was lifted up; so was Christ. He was lifted up upon the cross (John xii. 33, 34), for he was made a spectacle to the world. He was lifted up by the preaching of the gospel. The word here used for a pole signifies a banner, or ensign, for Christ crucified stands for an ensign of the people, Isa. xi. 10. Some make the lifting up of the serpent to be a figure of Christ's triumphing over Satan, the old serpent, whose head he bruised, when in his cross he made an open show of the principalities and powers which he had spoiled and destroyed, Col. ii. 15.

3. Between the application of their remedy and ours. They looked and lived, and we, if we believe, shall not perish; it is by faith that we look unto Jesus, Heb. xii. 2. Look unto me, and be you saved, Isa. xlv. 22. Whoever looked up to this healing sign, though from the outmost part of the camp, though with a weak and weeping eye, was certainly healed; so whosoever believes in Christ, though as yet but weak in faith, shall not perish.

We have here an account of the several stages and removals of the children of Israel, till they came into the plains of Moab, out of which they at length passed over Jordan into Canaan, as we read in the beginning of Joshua. Natural motions are quicker the nearer they are to their centre. The Israelites were now drawing near to the promised rest, and now they set forward, as the expression is, v. 10. It were well if we would do thus in our way to heaven, and the nearer we come to heaven be so much the more active and abundant in the work of the Lord. Two things especially are observable:

1. The wonderful success which God blessed his people with, near the brooks of Arnon, v. 13–15. They had now compassed the land of Edom. It is well that there are more ways than one to Canaan. The enemies of God's people may retard their passage, but cannot prevent their entrance into the promised rest. Care is taken to let us know that the Israelites in their march religiously observed the orders which God gave them to use no hostility against the Moabites (Deut. ii. 9), because they were the posterity of righteous Lot.

2. The wonderful supply which God blessed his people with at Beer (v. 16), which signifies the well or fountain. Hitherto we have found, when they were supplied with water, they asked it in unjust discontent, and God gave it in just displeasure; but here we find, (1) That God gave it in love (v. 16): Gather the people together, to be witnesses of the wonder, and joint-sharers in the favour, and I will give them water. Before they prayed, God granted. (2) That they received it with joy and thankfulness, which made the mercy doubly sweet to them, v. 17. Then they sang this song, to the glory of God and the encouragement of one another, Spring up, O well! Thus they pray that it may spring up, for promised mercies must be fetched in by prayer. As the brazen serpent was a figure of Christ, who is lifted up for our cure, so is this well a figure of the Spirit, who is poured forth for our comfort, and from whom flow to us rivers of living waters, John vii. 38. (3) That whereas before the remembrance of the miracle was perpetuated in the names given to the places, which signified the people's strife and murmuring, now it was perpetuated in a song of praise. The princes digged the well—the seventy elders; with their staves they made holes in the soft sandy ground, and God caused the water miraculously to spring up in the holes which they made. God promised to give them water, but they must open the ground to receive it, and give it vent. God's favours must be expected in the use of such means as lie within our power, but still the excellency of the power is of God.

Verses 21–35

An account of the victories obtained by Israel over Sihon and Og.

I. Israel sent a peaceable message to Sihon king of the Amorites (v. 21), but received an unpeaceable return. Sihon's army was routed, and not only so, but all his country came into the possession of Israel, v. 24, 25. This seizure is justified, 1. Against the Amorites themselves, for they were the aggressors, and provoked the Israelites to battle. 2. Against the Moabites, who had formerly been the lords-proprietors of this country. (1) The justification itself is that though it was true this country had belonged to the Moabites, yet the Amorites had taken it from them some time before, and were now in full and quiet possession of it, v. 26. This country being designed in due time for Israel, it is beforehand put into the hand of the Amorites, who little think that they have it but as trustees till Israel come of age, and then must surrender it. We understand not the vast reaches of Providence, but known unto God are all his works, as appears in this instance. (2) For proof of the allegation, he refers to the authentic records of the country, for so their proverbs or songs were, one of which he quotes some passages out of (v. 27–30), which sufficiently proves what is vouched for, namely, [1] That such and such places that are here named, though they had been in the possession of the Moabites, had by right of war become the dominion of Sihon king of the Amorites. [2] That the Moabites were utterly disabled and even Chemosh their god had given them up, as unable to rescue them out of the hands of Sihon, v. 29.

II. Og king of Bashan, instead of being warned by the fate of his neighbours to make peace with Israel, is instigated by it to make war with them, which proves in like manner to be his destruction. Og was also an Amorite, and more likely to prevail, because of his own gigantic strength and stature. Here observe, 1. That the Amorite begins the war (v. 33). His country was very rich and pleasant. Bashan was famous for the best timber (witness the oaks of Bashan), and the best breed of cattle, witness the bulls and kine of Bashan, and the lambs and rams of that country, which are celebrated, Deut. xxxii. 14. 2. That God interests himself in the cause, bids Israel not to fear this threatening force. Giants are but worms before God's power. 3. That Israel not only routs the enemies' army, but gains the enemies' country, which afterwards was part of the inheritance of the two tribes and a half that were first seated on the other side Jordan.

CHAP. XXII

At this chapter begins the famous story of Balak and Balaam, their attempt to curse Israel, and the baffling of that attempt; God's people are long afterwards told to remember what Balak the king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him, that they might know the righteousness of the Lord, Mic. vi. 5. In this chapter we have, I. Balak's fear of Israel, and the plot he had to get them cursed, ver. 1–4. II. The embassy he sent to Balaam, a conjurer, to fetch him for that purpose, and the disappointment he met with in the first embassy, ver. 5–14. III. Balaam's coming to him upon his second message, ver. 15–21. IV. The opposition Balaam met with by the way, ver. 22–35. V. The interview at length between Balak and Balaam, ver. 36, &c.

The children of Israel have at length finished their wanderings in the wilderness out of which they went up (ch. xxi. 18), and are now encamped in the plains of Moab near Jordan, where they continued till they passed through Jordan under Joshua, after the death of Moses.

I. The fright which the Moabites were in upon the approach of Israel, v. 2–4. Notwithstanding the old friendship between Abraham and Lot, the Moabites resolved to ruin Israel if they could, and therefore they will take it for granted, without any ground for the suspicion, that Israel resolves to ruin them. These fears they communicated to their neighbours, the elders of Midian, that some measures might be concerted between them for their common safety. They had reason to court Israel's friendship, and to come in to their assistance; but having forsaken the religion of their father Lot, and being sunk into idolatry, they hated the people of the God of Abraham.

II. The project which the king of Moab formed to get the people of Israel cursed, that is, to set God against them. He trusted more to his arts than to his arms, and had a notion that if he could get but some prophet or other, with his powerful charms, to imprecate evil upon them, and to pronounce a blessing upon himself and his forces, then, though otherwise too weak, he should be able to deal with them. This notion arose, 1. Out of the remains of some religion; for it owns a dependence upon some visible sovereign powers that rule in the affairs of the children of men. 2. Out of the ruins of the true religion; for if the Midianites and Moabites had not wretchedly degenerated from the faith and worship of their pious ancestors, Abraham and Lot, they could not have imagined it possible to do any mischief with their curses to a people who alone adhered to the service of the true God, from whose service they had themselves revolted.

III. The court which he made to Balaam the son of Beor, a famous conjurer to engage him to curse Israel. This Balaam lived a great way off, in that country whence Abraham came, and where Laban lived. And to gain him, 1. He makes him his friend. 2. In effect he makes him his god, by the great power he attributes to his word.

IV. The restraint God lays upon Balaam, forbidding him to curse Israel. He lodges the messengers, and takes a night's time to consider what he shall do, and to receive instructions from God, v. 8. In the night God comes to him, probably in a dream, and enquires what business those strangers had with him. He knows it, but he will know it from him. Balaam gives him an account of their errand (v. 9–11), and God thereupon charges him not to go with them, nor attempt to curse that blessed people, v. 12. Balaam is charged not only not to go to Balak, but not to offer to curse this people, which he might have attempted at a distance; and the reason is given: They are blessed.

V. The return of the messengers without Balaam. 1. Balaam is not faithful in returning God's answer to the messengers, v. 13. He only tells them, The Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you. He did not tell them, as he ought to have done, that Israel was a blessed people, and must by no means be cursed.

A second embassy sent to Balaam, to fetch him over to curse Israel.

I. The temptation Balak laid before Balaam. Now he tempted him with honours, laid a bait not only for his covetousness, but for his pride and ambition. See how artfully Balak managed the temptation. 1. The messengers he sent were more, and more honourable, v. 15. 2. The request was very urgent. This powerful prince becomes a suitor to him: "Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee (v. 16), no, not God, nor conscience, nor any fear either of sin or shame." 3. The proffers were high: "I will promote thee to very great honour among the princes of Moab."

II. Balaam's seeming resistance of, but real yielding to, this temptation. We may here discern in Balaam a struggle between his convictions and his corruptions. 1. His convictions charged him to adhere to the command of God, and he spoke their language, v. 18. Nor could any man have said better: "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, and that is more than he can give or I can ask, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God." 2. His corruptions at the same time strongly inclined him to go contrary to the command. He seemed to refuse the temptation, v. 18. But even then he expressed no abhorrence of it, as Christ did when he had the kingdoms of the world offered him (Get thee hence, Satan), and as Peter did when Simon Magus offered him money: Thy money perish with thee. But it appears (v. 19) that he had a strong inclination to accept the proffer; for he would further attend, to know what God would say to him, hoping that he might alter his mind and give him leave to go. This was a vile reflection upon God Almighty, as if he could change his mind. Note, It is a very great affront to God, and a certain evidence of the dominion of corruption in the heart, to beg leave to sin.

III. The permission God gave him to go, v. 20. God came to him, probably by an angel, and told him he might, if he pleased, go with Balak's messengers. So he gave him up to his own heart's lust. Note, As God sometimes denies the prayers of his people in love, so sometimes he grants the desires of the wicked in wrath.

Verses 22–35

An account of the opposition God gave to Balaam in his journey towards Moab.

I. Here is God's displeasure against Balaam for undertaking this journey: God's anger was kindled because he went, v. 22. Note, 1. The sin of sinners is not to be thought the less provoking to God because he permits it. 2. Nothing is more displeasing to God than malicious designs against his people; he that touches them touches the apple of his eye.

II. The way God took to let Balaam know his displeasure against him: An angel stood in the way for an adversary.

1. Balaam had notice given him of God's displeasure, by the ass, and this did not startle him. The ass saw the angel, v. 23. How vainly did Balaam boast that he was a man whose eyes were open, and that he saw the visions of the Almighty (ch. xxiv. 3, 4), when the ass he rode on saw more than he did, his eyes being blinded with covetousness and ambition. Let none be puffed up with a conceit of visions and revelations, when even an ass saw an angel; to save both herself and her senseless rider, (1) She turned aside out of the way, v. 23. Balaam should have taken the hint of this, and considered whether he was not out of the way of his duty; but, instead of this, he beat her into the way again. Thus those who by wilful sin are running headlong into perdition are angry at those that would prevent their ruin. (2) She had not gone much further before she saw the angel again, and then, to avoid him, ran up to a wall, and crushed her rider's foot, v. 24, 25. The crushing of Balaam's foot, though it was the saving of his life, provoked him so much that he smote his ass the second time. (3) Upon the next encounter with the angel, the ass fell down under Balaam, v. 26, 27. Balaam the third time smote his ass, though she had now done him the best piece of service that ever she did him, saving him from the sword of the angel, and by her falling down teaching him to do likewise. (4) When all this would not work upon him, God opened the mouth of the ass, and she spoke to him once and again; and yet neither did this move him. Here Mr. Ainsworth observes that the devil, when he tempted our first parents to sin, employed a subtle serpent, but that God, when he would convince Balaam, employed a silly ass, a creature dull and sottish to a proverb. [1] The ass complained of Balaam's cruelty (v. 28): What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me? Note, The righteous God will not see the meanest and weakest abused; but either they shall be enabled to speak in their own defence or he will some way or other speak for them. His brutish head-strong passion so blinded him that he could not observe or consider the strangeness of the thing. Nothing besots men worse than unbridled anger. [2] The ass reasoned with him, v. 30. God enabled not only a dumb creature to speak, but a dull creature to speak to the purpose.

2. Balaam at length had notice of God's displeasure by the angel, and this did startle him. When God opened his eyes he saw the angel (v. 31), and then he himself fell flat upon his face. God has many ways of breaking and bringing down the hard and unhumbled heart. (1) The angel reproved him for his outrageousness (v. 32, 33): Wherefore hast thou smitten thy ass? (2) Balaam then seemed to relent (v. 34): "I have sinned, sinned in undertaking this journey, sinned in pushing on so violently"; but he excused it with this, that he saw not the angel; yet, now that he did see him, he was willing to go back again. Here is no sign that his heart is turned, but, if his hands are tied, he cannot help it. Thus many leave their sins only because their sins have left them. There seems to be a reformation of the life, but what will this avail if there be no renovation of the heart? (3) The angel however continued his permission: "Go with the men, v. 35. Go, if thou hast a mind to be made a fool of, and to be shamed before Balak, and all the princes of Moab. Go, only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak, whether thou wilt or no," for this seems not to be a precept but a prediction of the event, that he should not only not be able to curse Israel, but should be forced to bless them.

We have here the meeting between Balak and Balaam, confederate enemies to God's Israel; but here they seem to differ in their expectations of the success. 1. Balak speaks of it with confidence, not doubting but to gain his point now that Balaam had come. 2. Balaam speaks doubtfully of the issue, and bids Balak not depend too much upon him (v. 38): "Have I now any power at all to say any thing?

Gladly would I curse Israel; but I must not, I cannot, God will not suffer me." 3. They address themselves with all speed to the business. Balaam is nobly entertained over night, a sacrifice of thanksgiving is offered to the gods of Moab, for the safe arrival of this welcome guest, and he is treated with a feast upon the sacrifice, v. 40. And the next morning, that no time might be lost, Balak takes Balaam in his chariot to the high places of his kingdom. And now Balaam is really as solicitous to please Balak as ever he had pretended to be to please God.

CHAP. XXIII

In this chapter we have Balak and Balaam busy at work to do Israel a mischief, and, for aught that appears, neither Moses nor the elders of Israel know any thing of the matter, but God baffles the attempt, without any intercession or contrivance of theirs. Here is, I. The first attempt to curse Israel. 1. The preparation made for it by sacrifice, ver. 1–3. 2. The contrary instruction God gave Balaam, ver. 4, 5. 3. The blessing Balaam was compelled to pronounce upon Israel, instead of a curse, ver. 7–10. 4. The great disappointment of Balak, ver. 11, 12. II. The second attempt, in the same manner made, and in the same manner frustrated, ver. 13–26. III. Preparations made for a third attempt (ver. 27–30), the issue of which we have in the next chapter.

Verses 1–12

I. Great preparation made for the cursing of Israel. That which was aimed at was to engage the God of Israel to forsake them, and either to be on Moab's side or to stand neutral, as if he would eat the flesh of bulls or drink the blood of goats. Ridiculous nonsense, to think that these would please God, and gain his favour, when there could be in them no exercise either of faith or obedience! Yet, it should seem, they offered these sacrifices to the God of heaven, the supreme Numen—Divinity, and not to any of their local deities.

II. The turning of the curse into a blessing, by the overruling power of God, in love to Israel, which is the account Moses gives of it, Deut. xxiii. 5.

1. God puts the blessing into the mouth of Balaam. While the sacrifices were burning, Balaam retired: he went solitary, into some dark grove on the top of the high place, v. 3, marg. Thus much he knew, that solitude gives a good opportunity for communion with God. But Balaam retired with a peradventure only, having some thoughts that God might meet him; but being conscious to himself of guilt, and knowing that God had lately met him in anger, he had reason to speak doubtfully: Peradventure the Lord will come to meet me, v. 3. But, whatever he intended, God designed to serve his own glory by him, and therefore met Balaam, v. 4. God would constrain him to utter such a confession, to the honour of God and Israel, as should render those for ever inexcusable who should appear in arms against them. When Balaam was aware that God met him, he boasted of his performances: I have prepared seven altars, and offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram. However, though the sacrifice was an abomination, God took the occasion of Balaam's expectation to put a word into his mouth (v. 5).

2. Balaam pronounces the blessing in the ears of Balak. He pronounces Israel safe and happy, and so blesses them.

(1) He pronounces them safe, and out of the reach of his envenomed darts. [1] He owns that the design was to curse them, that Balak sent for him out of his own country, and that he came, with that intent, v. 7. [2] He owns the design defeated, and his own inability to accomplish it. He could not so much as give them an ill word or an ill wish: How shall I curse those whom God has not cursed? v. 8. Not that therefore he would not do it, but therefore he could not do it. This is a fair confession, First, Of the weakness and impotency of his own magic skill. Secondly, It is a confession of the sovereignty and dominion of the divine power. He owns that he could do no more than God would suffer him to do. Thirdly, It is a confession of the inviolable security of the people of God.

(2) He pronounces them happy in three things:—

[1] Happy in their peculiarity, and distinction from the rest of the nations: From the top of the rock I see him, v. 9. And it seems to have been a great surprise to him that whereas, it is probable, they were represented to him as a rude and disorderly rabble, that infested the countries round about in rambling parties, he saw them a regular incorporated camp, in which appeared all the marks of discipline and good order. Note, It is the duty and honour of those that are dedicated to God to be separated from the world. Those who make conscience of peculiar duties may take the comfort of peculiar privileges.

[2] Happy in their numbers, not so few and despicable as they were represented to him, but an innumerable company, which made them both honourable and formidable (v. 10): Who can count the dust of Jacob? The number of the people was the thing that Balak was vexed at (ch. xxii. 3). He takes notice of the number, First, Of the dust of Jacob; that is, the people of Jacob, concerning whom it was foretold that they should be as the dust for number, Gen. xxviii. 14. Secondly, Of the fourth part of Israel, alluding to the form of their camp, which was cast into four squadrons, under four standards.

[3] Happy in their end: Let me die the death of the righteous Israelites, that are in covenant with God, and let my last end, or future state, be like theirs, or my recompence, namely, in the other world. Here, First, It is taken for granted that death is the end of all men; the righteous themselves must die: and it is good for us to think of this with application, as Balaam himself does here, speaking of his own death. Secondly, He goes upon the supposition of the soul's immortality, and a different state on the other side death, to which this is a noble testimony, and an evidence of its being anciently known and believed. Thirdly, He pronounces the righteous truly blessed, not only while they live, but when they die. Fourthly, He shows his opinion of religion to be better than his resolution; there are many who desire to die the death of the righteous, but do not endeavour to live the life of the righteous. Gladly would they have their end like theirs, but not their way. They would be saints in heaven, but not saints on earth. Now,

III. We are told, 1. How Balak fretted at it, v. 11. He pretended to honour the Lord with his sacrifices, and to wait for the answer God would send him; and yet, when it did not prove according to his mind, he forgot God. 2. How Balaam was forced to acquiesce in it. He submits because he cannot help it.

Verses 13–30

Here is, I. Preparation made the second time, as before, for the cursing of Israel. 1. The place is changed, v. 13. 2. The sacrifices are repeated, new altars are built, a bullock and a ram offered on every altar, and Balak attends his sacrifice as closely as ever, v. 14, 15. 3. Balaam renews his attendance on God, and God meets him the second time, and puts another word into his mouth, not to reverse the former, but to ratify it, v. 16, 17.

II. A second conversion of the curse into a blessing by the overruling power of God; and this blessing is both larger and stronger than the former, and quite cuts off all hopes of altering it. Balak having been so forward to ask what the Lord had spoken (v. 17), Balaam now addresses himself particularly to him (v. 18): Rise up, Balak, and hear.

1. Two things Balaam in this discourse informs Balak of:—

(1) That he had no reason to hope that he should ruin Israel.

[1] It would be to no purpose to attempt to ruin them.

First, Because God is unchangeable. He never changes his mind, and therefore never recalls his promise.

Secondly, Because Israel are at present unblamable. There was no idolatry among them, which is in a particular manner called iniquity and perverseness. Balaam knew that nothing would separate between them and God but sin.

Thirdly, Because the power of both was irresistible. They had the presence of God with them. They had the joy of that presence, and were always made to triumph in it.

[2] From all this he infers that it was to no purpose for him to think of doing them a mischief by all the arts he could use, v. 23. The curses of hell can never take place against the blessings of heaven.

(2) Balaam shows him that he had more reason to fear being ruined by them, for they were likely to make bloody work among his neighbours; and, if he and his country escaped, it was not because he was too great for them to meddle with, but because he fell not within their commission, v. 24.

2. Now what was the issue of this disappointment?

(1) Balak and Balaam were both of them sick of the cause. Balak is now willing to have his conjurer silenced. If thou canst not curse them, I beseech thee not to bless them. Balaam is still willing to own himself overruled, and appeals to what he had said in the beginning of this enterprise (ch. xxii. 38): All that the Lord speaketh, that I must do, v. 26.

(2) Yet they resolve to make another attempt. The place to which Balak now took Balaam was the top of Peor, the most eminent high place in all his country, where, it is probable, Baal was worshipped, and it was thence called Baal-peor.

CHAP. XXIV

This chapter continues and concludes the history of the defeat of the counsels of Balak and Balaam against Israel, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. In this chapter we are told, I. What the blessing was into which that intended curse was turned, ver. 1–9. II. How Balak dismissed Balaam from his service thereupon, ver. 10–13. III. The predictions Balaam left behind him concerning Israel, and some of the neighbouring nations, ver. 14, &c.

Verses 1–9

The blessing itself which Balaam here pronounces upon Israel is much the same with the two we had in the foregoing chapter; but the introduction to it is different.

I. The method of proceeding here varies. Balaam laid aside the enchantments which he had hitherto depended on, used no spells, or charms, or magic arts, finding they did him no service; it was to no purpose to deal with the devil for a curse, when it was plain that God was determined immovably to bless, v. 1. He did not now retire into a solitary place as before, but set his face directly towards the wilderness where Israel lay encamped. Now the Spirit of God came upon him, that is, the Spirit of prophecy. He used a different preface now from what he had used before (v. 3, 4), yet savouring very much (as some think) of pride and vain-glory, taking all the praise of this prophecy to himself, and magnifying himself as one of the cabinet-council of heaven. When he attempted to curse Israel, he owns, he was in a mistake, but now he began to see his error, and yet still he remained blinded by covetousness and ambition, those foolish and hurtful lusts. Many have their eyes open that have not their hearts open, are enlightened, but not sanctified.

II. Yet the blessing is for substance the same with those before. Several things he admires in Israel:—

1. Their beauty (v. 5): How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Though they dwelt not in stately palaces, but in coarse and homely tents, and these, no doubt, sadly weather-beaten, yet Balaam sees a beauty in those tents, because of their admirable order, according to their tribes, v. 2. Nothing recommends religion more to the good opinion of those that look upon it at a distance than the unity and harmony of its professors, Ps. cxxxiii. 1.

2. Their fruitfulness and increase. This may be intended by those similitudes (v. 6) of the valleys, gardens, and trees, as well as by those expressions (v. 7), He shall pour the water out of his buckets; that is, God shall water them with his blessing like rain from heaven, and then his seed shall be in many waters.

3. Their honour and advancement. As the multitude of the people is the honour of the prince, so the magnificence of the prince is the honour of the people; Balaam therefore foretells that their king shall be higher than Agag. Agag, it is probable, was the most potent monarch in those parts.

4. Their power and victory, v. 8. (1) He looks back upon what they had done, or rather what had been done for them: God brought them forth out of Egypt; this he had spoken of before, ch. xxiii. 22. (2) He looks down upon their present strength. (3) He looks forward to their future conquests.

5. Their courage and security: He lay down as a lion, as a great lion, v. 9. Lions do not retire into places of shelter to sleep, but lie down anywhere, knowing that none dares meddle with them.

6. Their interest, and influence upon their neighbours. Their friends, and those in alliance with them, were happy.

Verses 10–14

We have here the conclusion of this vain attempt to curse Israel, and the total abandonment of it. 1. Balak made the worst of it. He broke out into a rage against Balaam (v. 10). He forbade him his presence, expelled him his country, upbraided him with the preferments he had designed to bestow upon him, but now would not (v. 11). 2. Balaam made the best of it. (1) He endeavours to excuse the disappointment. Balak could not say that he had cheated him, since he had given him fair notice of the check he found himself under. (2) He endeavours to atone for it, v. 14. He will gratify his curiosity with some predictions concerning the nations about him. He will satisfy him with an assurance that, whatever this formidable people should do to his people, it should not be till the latter days. He will put him into a method of doing Israel a mischief without the ceremonies of enchantment and execration. Since he could not have leave from God to curse them, he puts him in a way of getting help from the devil to tempt them.

Verses 15–25

The office of prophets was both to bless and to prophesy in the name of the Lord.

I. He personates a true prophet admirably well, God permitting and directing him to do so, because, whatever he was, the prophecy itself was a true prophecy. He saw the vision of the Almighty, but not so as to be changed into the same image. He calls God the Most High, and the Almighty. Yet he had no true fear of him, love to him, or faith in him, so far may a man go towards heaven, and yet come short.

II. Here is his prophecy concerning him that should be the crown and glory of his people Israel, who is, 1. David, the type under whom the forces of Israel should do valiantly, v. 18. This was fulfilled when David smote Moab, 2 Sam. viii. 2. And at the same time the Edomites likewise were brought into obedience to Israel, v. 14. But, 2. Our Lord Jesus, the promised Messiah, is chiefly pointed at in the antitype, and of him it is an illustrious prophecy; it was the will of God that notice should thus be given of his coming, a great while before, not only to the people of the Jews, but to other nations, because his gospel and kingdom were to extend themselves so far beyond the borders of the land of Israel. It is here foretold, (1) That his coming should not be yet for a great while: "I shall see him, but not now; I do see him in vision, but at a very great distance, through the interposing space of 1,500 years at least. (2) That he shall come out of Jacob, and Israel, as a star and a sceptre, the former denoting his glory and lustre, as the bright and morning star, the latter his power and authority; it is he that shall have dominion. (3) That his kingdom shall be universal, and victorious over all opposition, which was typified by David's victories over Moab and Edom. Christ shall be king, not only of Jacob and Israel, but of all the world.

III. Here is his prophecy concerning the Amalekites and Kenites, part of whose country, it is probable, he had now in view. 1. The Amalekites were now the chief of the nations (v. 20). Here Balaam confirms that doom of Amalek which Moses had read (Exod. xvii. 14, 16). 2. The Kenites were now the securest of the nations; their situation was such as that nature was their engineer, and had strongly fortified them: "Thou puttest thy nest (like the eagle) in a rock, v. 21. Thou thinkest thyself safe, and yet the Kenites shall be wasted (v. 22) and gradually brought to decay, till they be carried away captive by the Assyrians," which was done at the captivity of the ten tribes. Even a nest in a rock will be no perpetual security.

IV. Here is a prophecy that looks as far forward as the Grecks and Romans, for theirs is supposed to be meant by the coast of Chittim, v. 24.

1. The introduction to this parable; this article of his prophecy is very observable (v. 23): Alas! who shall live when God doeth this? Either, (1) These events are so distant, and so far off to come, that it is hard to say who shall live till they come. Or, (2) They will be so dismal, and make such desolations, that scarcely any will escape or be left alive.

2. The prophecy itself is observable. Both Greece and Italy lie much upon the sea, and therefore their armies were sent forth mostly in ships. Now he seems here to foretell, (1) That the forces of the Grecians should humble and bring down the Assyrians, who were united with the Persians, which was fulfilled when the eastern country was overrun by Alexander. (2) That theirs and the Roman forces should afflict the Hebrews, or Jews, who were called the children of Eber; this was fulfilled in part when the Grecian empire was oppressive to the Jewish nation, but chiefly when the Roman empire ruined it. But, (3) That Chittim, that is, the Roman empire, in which the Grecian was at length swallowed up, should itself perish when the stone cut out of the mountain without hands shall consume all these kingdoms, and particularly the feet of iron and clay, Dan. ii. 34. Thus (says Dr. Lightfoot) Balaam, instead of cursing the church, curses Amalek the first, and Rome the last enemy of the church.

CHAP. XXV

Israel, having escaped the curse of Balaam, here sustains a great deal of damage and reproach by the counsel of Balaam, who, it seems, before he left Balak, put him into a more effectual way than that which Balak thought of to separate between the Israelites and their God. None are more fatally bewitched than those that are bewitched by their own lusts. Here is, I. The sin of Israel; they were enticed by the daughters of Moab both to whoredom and to idolatry, ver. 1–3. II. The punishment of this sin by the hand of the magistrate (ver. 4, 5) and by the immediate hand of God, ver. 9. III. The pious zeal of Phinehas in slaying Zimri and Cozbi, two impudent sinners, ver. 6, 8, 14, 15. IV. God's commendation of the zeal of Phinehas, ver. 10–13. V. Enmity put between the Israelites and the Midianites, their tempters, as at first between the woman and the serpent, ver. 16, &c.

Verses 1–5

I. The sin of Israel, to which they were enticed by the daughters of Moab and Midian; they were guilty both of corporal and spiritual whoredoms, for Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor, v. 3. Not all, nor the most, but very many, were taken in this snare. Now concerning this observe, That whoredom and idolatry went together. They first defiled and debauched their consciences, by committing lewdness with the women, and then were easily drawn, in complaisance to them, and in contempt of the God of Israel, to bow down to their idols. And they were more likely to do so if, as it is commonly supposed, and seems probable by the joining of them together, the uncleanness committed was a part of the worship and service performed to Baal-peor. It was a great aggravation of the sin that Israel abode in Shittim, where they had the land of Canaan in view, and were just ready to enter and take possession of it.

II. God's just displeasure against them for this sin. Israel's whoredoms did that which all Balaam's enchantments could not do. 1. A plague immediately broke out. Epidemical diseases are the just punishments of epidemical sins; one infection follows the other. 2. The ringleaders are ordered to be put to death by the hand of public justice, which will be the only way to stay the plague (v. 4). The judges must first order them to be slain with the sword (v. 5), and their dead bodies must be hanged up, that the stupid Israelites might be possessed with a sense of the evil of the sin.

Here is a remarkable contest between wickedness and righteousness, and righteousness carries the day, as no doubt it will at last.

I. Never was vice more daring than it was in Zimri, a prince of a chief house in the tribe of Simeon. He publicly appeared leading a Midianitish harlot in the sight of Moses, and all the good people of Israel. It was an affront to the justice of the nation, and bade defiance to that. It was an affront to the religion of the nation, and put a contempt upon that.

II. Never was virtue more daring than it was in Phinehas. Being aware of the insolence of Zimri, in a holy indignation at the offenders he rises up from his prayers, takes his sword or half-pike, follows those impudent sinners into their tent, and stabs them both, v. 7, 8. It is not at all difficult to justify Phinehas in what he did; for, being now heir-apparent to the high-priesthood, no doubt he was one of those judges of Israel whom Moses had ordered, by the divine appointment, to slay all those whom they knew to have joined themselves to Baal-peor. God testified his acceptance of the pious zeal of Phinehas. He put an honour upon Phinehas. Though he did no more than it was his duty to do as a judge, yet because he did it with extraordinary zeal against sin, and did it when the other judges, out of respect to Zimri's character as a prince, were afraid, God showed himself particularly well pleased with him, and it was counted to him for righteousness, Ps. cvi. 31. Phinehas, upon this occasion, though a young man, is pronounced his country's patriot and best friend, v. 11. The priesthood is entailed by covenant upon his family. It was designed for him before, but now it was confirmed to him.

Verses 16–18

God had punished the Israelites for their sin with a plague; as a Father he corrected his own children with a rod. The mischief which the Midianites did to Israel by enticing them to whoredom must be remembered and punished with as much severity as that which the Amalekites did in fighting with them when they came out of Egypt, Exod. xvii. 14.

CHAP. XXVI

This book is called Numbers, from the numberings of the children of Israel, of which it gives an account. Once they were numbered at Mount Sinai, in the first year after they came out of Egypt, which we had an account of, ch. i. and ii. And now a second time they were numbered in the plains of Moab, just before they entered Canaan, and of this we have an account in this chapter. We have, I. Orders given for the doing of it, ver. 1–4. II. A register of the families and numbers of each tribe (ver. 5–50), and the sum total, ver. 51. III. Direction given to divide the land among them, ver. 52–56. IV. The families and numbers of the Levites by themselves, ver. 57–62. V. Notice taken of the fulfilling of the threatening in the death of all those that were first numbered (ver. 63–65), and to this there seems to have been a special regard in the taking and keeping of this account.

Verses 1–4

Moses did not number the people but when God commanded him. David in his time did it without a command, and paid dearly for it. God now appointed him to take the sum of them. Eleazar was joined in commission with him, as Aaron had been before, by which God confirmed his succession. They were now to go by the same rule that they had gone by in the former numbering, counting those only that were able to go forth to war, for this was the service now before them.

Verses 5–51

This is the register of the tribes as they were now enrolled, in the same order that they were numbered in ch. i.

I. The account that is here kept of the families of each tribe, which must not be understood of such as we call families, those that live in a house together, but such as were the descendants of the several sons of the patriarchs. The families of the twelve tribes are thus numbered:—Of Dan but one, for Dan had but one son, and yet that tribe was the most numerous of all except Judah, v. 42, 43. Zebulun was divided into three families, Ephraim into four, Issachar into four, Naphtali into four, and Reuben into four; Judah, Simeon, and Asher had five families apiece, Gad and Benjamin seven apiece, and Manasseh eight. Benjamin brought ten sons into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 21), but three of them, it seems, either died childless or their families were extinct, for here we find seven only of those names preserved.

II. The numbers of each tribe. In this account we may observe, 1. That all the three tribes that were encamped under the standard of Judah, who was the ancestor of Christ, had increased. 2. That none of the tribes had increased so much as that of Manasseh, which in the former account was the smallest of all the tribes, only 32,200, while here it is one of the most considerable. 3. That none of the tribes decreased so much as Simeon did; from 59,300, it sunk to 22,000, little more than a third part of what it was. Some conjecture that most of those 24,000 who were cut off by the plague for the iniquity of Peor were of that tribe; for Zimri, who was a ringleader in that iniquity, was a prince of that tribe.

III. In the account of the tribe of Reuben mention is made of the rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, who were of that tribe, in confederacy with Korah a Levite, v. 9–11.

Verses 52–56

If any ask why such a particular account is kept of the tribes, and families, and numbers, of the people of Israel, here is an answer for them; as they were multiplied, so they were portioned, not by common providence, but by promise; and, for the support of the honour of divine revelation, God will have the fulfilling of the promise taken notice of both in their increase and in their inheritance.

Verses 57–62

Levi was God's tribe, a tribe that was to have no inheritance with the rest in the land of Canaan, and therefore was not numbered with the rest, but by itself; so it had been numbered in the beginning of this book at Mount Sinai, and therefore came not under the sentence passed upon all that were then numbered, that none of them should enter Canaan but Caleb and Joshua; for of the Levites that were not numbered with them, nor were to go forth to war, Eleazar and Ithamar, and perhaps others who were above twenty years old then (as appears, ch. iv. 16, 28), entered Canaan; and yet this tribe, now at its second numbering, had increased but 1,000, and was still one of the smallest tribes.

Verses 63–65

That which is observable in this conclusion of the account is the execution of the sentence passed upon the murmurers (ch. xiv. 29), that not one of those who were numbered from twenty years old and upwards should enter Canaan, except Caleb and Joshua. In the muster now made it appeared that there was not one man numbered now that was numbered then except Caleb and Joshua, v. 64, 65. Herein appeared, 1. The righteousness of God, and his faithfulness to his threatenings, when once the decree has gone forth. 2. The goodness of God to this people, notwithstanding their provocations. And, though the number fell a little short of what it was at Mount Sinai, yet those now numbered had this advantage, that they were all middle-aged men, between twenty and sixty, in the prime of their time for service; and during the thirty-eight years of their wandering and wasting in the wilderness they had an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the laws and ordinances of God.

CHAP. XXVII

Here is, I. The case of Zelophehad's daughters determined, ver. 1–11. II. Notice given to Moses of his death approaching, ver. 12–14. III. Provision made of a successor in the government, 1. By the prayer of Moses, ver. 15–17. 2. By the appointment of God, ver. 18, &c.

Verses 1–11

Mention is made of the case of these daughters of Zelophehad in the chapter before, v. 33. It was a singular case, and the like did not at this time occur in all Israel, that the head of a family had no sons, but daughters only. Their case is again debated (ch. xxxvi.) upon another article of it; and, according to the judgments given in their case, we find them put in possession, Josh., xvii. 3, 4. One would suppose that their personal character was such as added weight to their case.

Here is, I. Their case stated by themselves, and their petition upon it presented to the highest court of judicature. We find not that they had any advocate to speak for them, but they managed their own cause ingeniously enough, which they could do the better because it was plain and honest, and spoke for itself.

1. What it is they petition for: That they might have a possession in the land of Canaan, among the brethren of their father, v. 4. God had said to Moses (ch. xxvi. 53) that the land of Canaan was to be divided among those that were now numbered; these daughters knew that they were not numbered, and therefore by this rule must expect no inheritance. If they had had a brother, they would not have applied to Moses for an order to inherit with him. But, having no brother, they beg for a possession. There is a debt which children owe to the memory of their parents, required by the fifth commandment: Honour thy father and mother.

2. What their plea is: That their father did not die under any attainder which might be thought to have corrupted his blood and forfeited his estate, but he died in his own sin (v. 3), chargeable only with the common iniquities of mankind, for which to his own Master he was to stand or fall, but laid not himself open to any judicial process before Moses and the princes.

II. Their case determined by the divine oracle. 1. The petition is granted (v. 7). 2. The point is settled for all future occasions. These daughters of Zelophehad consulted, not only their own comfort and the credit of their family, but the honour and happiness of their sex likewise; for on this particular occasion a general law was made that, in case a man had no son, his estate should go to his daughters (v. 8); not to the eldest as the eldest son, but to them all in co-partnership, share and share alike. "If a man have no issue at all his estate shall go to his brethren; if no brethren, then to his father's brethren; and, if there be no such, then to his next kinsman."

Verses 12–14

1. God tells Moses of his fault, his speaking unadvisedly with his lips at the waters of strife, where he did not express, so carefully as he ought to have done, a regard to the honour both of God and Israel, v. 14. 2. He tells Moses of his death. Notice is given him of it in such a manner as might best serve to sweeten and mollify the sentence, and reconcile him to it. (1) Moses must die, but he shall first have the satisfaction of seeing the land of promise, v. 12. (2) Moses must die, but death does not cut him off, it only gathers him to his people, brings him to rest with the holy patriarchs that had gone before him. (3) Moses must die, but only as Aaron died before him, v. 13. And Moses had seen how easily and cheerfully Aaron had put off the priesthood first and then the body; let not Moses therefore be afraid of dying; it was but to be gathered to his people, as Aaron was gathered.

Verses 15–23

Here, I. Moses prays for a successor. Envious spirits do not love their successors, but Moses was not one of these. We should concern ourselves, both in our prayers and in our endeavours, for the rising generation, that religion may flourish. In this prayer Moses expressed, 1. A tender concern for the people of Israel: That the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd. 2. A believing dependence upon God, as the God of the spirits of all flesh. Moses prays to God, not to send an angel but to set a man over the congregation, that is, to nominate and appoint one whom he would qualify and own as ruler of his people Israel.

II. God, in answer to his prayer, appoints him a successor, even Joshua, who had long since signalized himself by his courage in fighting Amalek, his humility in ministering to Moses, and his faith and sincerity in witnessing against the report of the evil spies.

1. God directs Moses how to secure the succession to Joshua. (1) He must ordain him: Lay thy hand upon him, v. 18. This was done in token of Moses's transferring the government to him, as the laying of hands on the sacrifice put the offering in the place and stead of the offerer; also in token of God's conferring the blessing of the Spirit upon him, which Moses obtained by prayer. It is said (Deut. xxxiv. 9), Joshua was full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands on him. This rite of imposing hands we find used in the New Testament in the setting apart of gospel ministers, denoting a solemn designation of them to the office and an earnest desire that God would qualify them for it and own them in it. It is the offering of them to Christ and his church for living sacrifices. (2) He must present him to Eleazar and the people, set him before them, that they might know him to be designed of God for this great trust and consent to that designation. (3) He must give him a charge, v. 19. (4) He must put some of his honour upon him, v. 20. (5) He must appoint Eleazar the high priest, with his breastplate of judgment, to be his privy-council (v. 21). This was a direction to Joshua. Though he was full of the Spirit, and had all this honour put upon him, yet he must do nothing without asking counsel of God, not leaning to his own understanding. Thus the government of Israel was now purely divine, for both the designation and direction of their princes were entirely so.

2. Moses does according to these directions, v. 22, 23. He cheerfully ordained Joshua, (1) Though it was a present lessening to himself, and amounted almost to a resignation of the government. (2) Though it might appear a perpetual slur upon his family, first to ordain Eleazar high priest, and then Joshua, one of another tribe, chief ruler, while his own children had no preferment at all, but were left in the rank of common Levites, this was such an instance of self-denial and submission to the will of God as was more his glory than the highest advancement of his family could have been.

CHAP. XXVIII

Now that the people were numbered, orders given for the dividing of the land, and a general of the forces nominated and commissioned, one would have expected that the next chapter should begin the history of the campaign. It contains the ordinances of worship, and provides that now, as they were on the point of entering Canaan, they should be sure to take their religion along with them, and not forget this, in the prosecution of their wars, ver. 1, 2. The laws are here repeated and summed up concerning the sacrifices that were to be offered, I. Daily, ver. 3–8. II. Weekly, ver. 9, 10. III. Monthly, ver. 11–15. IV. Yearly. 1. At the passover, ver. 16–25. 2. At pentecost, ver. 26–31. And the next chapter is concerning the annual solemnities of the seventh month.

Verses 1–8

Here is, I. A general order given concerning the offerings of the Lord, which were to be brought in their season, v. 2. God saw fit now to repeat the law of sacrifices, 1. Because this was a new generation of men, that were most of them unborn when the former laws were given. 2. Because they were now entering upon war, and might be tempted to think that while they were engaged in that they should be excused from offering sacrifices. Inter arma silent leges—law is little regarded amidst the clash of arms. They were peculiarly concerned to keep their peace with God when they were at war with their enemies. 3. Because possession was now to be given them of the land of promise, that land flowing with milk and honey, where they would have plenty of all good things. "Now" (says God), "when you are feasting yourselves, forget not to offer the bread of your God."

II. The particular law of the daily sacrifice, a lamb in the morning and a lamb in the evening, which, for the constancy of it duly as the day came, is called a continual burnt-offering (v. 3), which intimates that when we are bidden to pray always, and to pray without ceasing, it is intended that at least every morning and every evening we offer up our solemn prayers and praises to God.

The new moons and the sabbaths are often spoken of together, as great solemnities in the Jewish church.

Now we have here the sacrifices appointed, 1. For the sabbaths. Every sabbath day the offering must be doubled. 2. For the new moons. Some suggest that, as the sabbath was kept with an eye to the creation of the world, so the new moons were sanctified with an eye to the divine providence, which appoints the moon for seasons, guiding the revolutions of time by its changes.

Verses 16–31

The appointment of the passover sacrifices; not that which was the chief, the paschal lamb (sufficient instructions had formerly been given concerning that), but those which were to be offered upon the seven days of unleavened bread, which followed it, v. 17–25. The first and last of those seven days were to be sanctified as sabbaths, by a holy rest and a holy convocation, and on each of the seven days they were to be liberal in their sacrifices, in token of their great and constant thankfulness for their deliverance out of Egypt. The sacrifices are likewise appointed which were to be offered at the feast of pentecost, here called the day of the first-fruits, v. 26. In the feast of unleavened bread they offered a sheaf of their first-fruits of barley (which with them was first ripe) to the priest (Lev. xxiii. 10), as an introduction to the harvest; but now, about seven weeks after, they were to bring a new meat-offering to the Lord, at the end of harvest. It was at this feast that the Spirit was poured out (Acts ii. 1, &c.), and thousands were converted by the preaching of the apostles, and were presented to Christ, to be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

CHAP. XXIX

This chapter appoints the offerings that were to be made by fire unto the Lord in the three great solemnities of the seventh month. I. In the feast of trumpets on the first day of that month, ver. 1–6. II. In the day of atonement on the tenth day, ver. 7–11. III. In the feast of tabernacles on the fifteenth day and the seven days following, ver. 12–38. And then the conclusion of these ordinances, ver. 39, 40.

Verses 1–11

There were more sacred solemnities in the seventh month than in any other month of the year, not only because it had been the first month till the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, but because still it continued the first month in the civil reckonings of the jubilees and years of release, and also because it was the time of vacation between harvest and seedtime, when they had most leisure to attend the sanctuary. 1. We have here the appointment of the sacrifices that were to be offered on the first day of the month, the day of blowing the trumpets, which was a preparative for the two great solemnities of holy mourning on the day of atonement and of holy joy in the feast of tabernacles. On the day of atonement itself, besides all the services of that day, which we had the institution of, Lev. xvi., here are burnt-offerings ordered to be offered, v. 8–10.

Verses 12–40

Soon after the day of atonement, that day in which men were to afflict their souls, followed the feast of the tabernacles, in which they were to rejoice before the Lord; for, those that sow in tears shall soon reap in joy. To the former laws about this feast, which we had, Lev. xxiii. 34, &c., here are added directions about the offerings made by fire, which they were to offer unto the Lord during the seven days of that feast, Lev. xxiii. 36. Observe here, 1. Their days of rejoicing were to be days of sacrifices. 2. All the days of their dwelling in booths they must offer sacrifices. 3. The sacrifices for each of the seven days, though differing in nothing but the number of the bullocks, are severally and particularly appointed. 4. The number of the bullocks (which were the most costly part of the sacrifice) decreased every day. The multitude of their sacrifices should end in one great sacrifice, infinitely more worthy than all of them. It was on the last day of the feast, after all these sacrifices had been offered, that our Lord Jesus stood and cried to those who still thirsted after righteousness (being sensible of the insufficiency of these sacrifices to justify them) to come unto him and drink, John vii. 37. 5. The meat-offerings and drink-offerings attended all the sacrifices. 6. Every day there must be a sin-offering presented, as we observed in the other feasts. 7. Even when all these sacrifices were offered, yet the continual burnt-offering must not be omitted either morning or evening, but each day this must be offered first in the morning and last in the evening. No extraordinary services should jostle out our stated devotions. 8. Though all these sacrifices were required to be presented by the body of the congregation, at the common charge, yet, besides these, particular persons were to glorify God with their vows and their free-will offerings, v. 39.

CHAP. XXX

In this chapter we have a law concerning vows, which had been mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter. I. Here is a general rule laid down that all vows must be carefully performed, ver. 1, 2. II. Some particular exceptions to this rule. 1. That the vows of daughters should not be binding unless allowed by the father, ver. 3–5. Nor, 2. The vows of wives unless allowed by the husband, ver. 6, &c.

This law was delivered to the heads of the tribes that they might instruct those who were under their charge.

1. The case supposed is that a person vows a vow unto the Lord, making God a party to the promise. The matter of the vow is supposed to be something lawful: no man can be by his own promise bound to do that which he is already by the divine precept prohibited from doing. He that vows is here said to bind his soul with a bond. It is a vow to God, who is a Spirit, and to him the soul, with all its powers, must be bound. A promise to a man is a bond upon the estate, but a promise to God is a bond upon the soul. 2. The command given is that these vows be conscientiously performed.

Verses 3–16

It is here taken for granted that all such persons as are sui juris—at their own disposal, and are likewise of sound understanding and memory, are bound to perform whatever they vow that is lawful and possible; but, if the person vowing be under the dominion and at the disposal of another, the case is different. Two cases much alike are here put and determined:—

I. The case of a daughter in her father's house. The rule is general, If a man vow, he must pay. But for a daughter it is express: her vow is nugatory or in suspense till her father knows it, and (it is supposed) knows it from her; for, when it comes to his knowledge, it is in his power either to ratify or nullify it. But in favour of the vow, 1. Even his silence shall suffice to ratify it: If he hold his peace, her vows shall stand, v. 4. Qui tacet, consentire videtur—Silence gives consent. But, 2. His protestation against it shall perfectly disannul it, because it is possible that such vow may be prejudicial to the affairs of the family. She showed her good-will in making the vow, and, if her intentions therein were sincere, she shall be accepted, and to obey her father shall be accounted better than sacrifice.

II. The case of a wife is much the same. As for a woman that is a widow or divorced, she has neither father nor husband to control her, so that, whatever vows she binds her soul with, they shall stand against her (v. 9), it is at her peril if she run back.

CHAP. XXXI

This chapter belongs to "the book of the wars of the Lord," in which it is probable it was inserted. It is the history of a holy war, a war with Midian. Here is, I. A divine command for the war, ver. 1, 2. II. The undertaking of the war, ver. 3–6. III. The glorious success of it, ver. 7–12. IV. Their triumphant return from the war. 1. The respect Moses paid to the soldiers, ver. 13. 2. The rebuke he gave them for sparing the women, ver. 14–18. 3. The directions he gave them for the purifying of themselves and their effects, ver. 19–24. 4. The distribution of the spoil they had taken, one half to the soldiers, the other to the congregation, and a tribute to the Lord out of each, ver. 25–47. 5. The free-will offering of the officers, ver. 48, &c.

Verses 1–6

Here, I. The Lord of hosts gives orders to Moses to make war upon the Midianites. The Midianites were the posterity of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. Some of them settled south of Canaan, among whom Jethro lived, and they retained the worship of the true God; but these were settled east of Canaan, and had fallen into idolatry, neighbours to, and in confederacy with, the Moabites. They made themselves obnoxious by sending their bad women among them to draw them to whoredom and idolatry. This was the provocation, this was the quarrel. For this (says God) avenge Israel of the Midianites, v. 2. 1. God would have the Midianites chastised. Israel's quarrel with Amalek, that fought against them, was not avenged till long after: but their quarrel with Midian, that debauched them, was speedily avenged, for they were looked upon as much the more dangerous and malicious enemies. 2. God would have it done by Moses, in his life time, that he who had so deeply resented that injury might have the satisfaction of seeing it avenged.

II. Moses gives orders to the people to prepare for this expedition, v. 3.

III. A detachment is drawn out accordingly for this service, 1,000 out of every tribe, 12,000 in all, a small number in comparison with what they could have sent. But God would teach them that it is all one to him to save by many or by few, 1 Sam. xiv. 6.

IV. Phinehas the son of Eleazar is sent along with them. The war being a holy war, Phinehas was their common head. He therefore took with him the holy instruments or vessels, probably the breastplate of judgment, by which God might be consulted in any emergency.

Verses 7–12

Here is, 1. The descent which this little army of Israelites made upon the country of Midian. It is very probable that they first published their manifesto, showing the reasons of the war, and requiring them to give up the ringleaders of the mischief to justice; for such afterwards was the law (Deut. xx. 10), and such the practice, Judg. xx. 12, 13. 2. The execution (the military execution) they did in this descent. (1) They slew all the males (v. 7), that is, all they met with as far as they went; they put them all to the sword, and gave no quarter. (2) They slew the kings of Midian, the same that are called elders of Midian (ch. xxii. 4), and dukes of Sihon, Josh. xiii. 21. Five of these princes are here named, one of whom is Zur, probably the same Zur whose daughter Cozbi was, ch. xxv. 15. (3) They slew Balaam. Whatever was the occasion of his being there, God's overruling providence brought him thither, and there his just vengeance found him. (4) They took all the women and children captives, v. 9. (5) They burnt their cities and goodly castles (v. 10). (6) They plundered the country, and carried off all the cattle and valuable goods, and so returned to the camp of Israel laden with a very rich booty, v. 9, 11, 12.

Verses 13–24

The triumphant return to the army of Israel from the war with Midian, and here,

I. They were met with great respect, v. 13.

II. They were severely reproved for saving the women alive. The execution having reference to that crime, their drawing them in to the worship of Peor, it was easy to conclude that the women, who were the principal criminals, must not be spared. "It is dangerous to let them live; they will be still tempting the Israelites to uncleanness, and so your captives will be your conquerors and a second time your destroyers."

III. They were obliged to purify themselves, according to the ceremony of the law, and to abide without the camp seven days, till their purification was accomplished. Thus God would preserve in their minds a dread and detestation of murder.

IV. They must likewise purify the spoil they had taken, the captives (v. 19) and all the goods, v. 21–23. What would bear the fire must pass through the fire, and what would not must be washed with water.

The distribution of the spoil which was taken in this expedition against Midian.

I. The prey is ordered to be divided into two parts, one for the 12,000 men that undertook the war, and the other for the congregation. The prey that was divided seems to have been only the captives and the cattle; as for the plate, and jewels, and other goods, every man kept what he took, as is intimated, v. 50–53. That only was distributed which would be of use for the stocking of that good land into which they were going.

II. God was to have a tribute out of it, as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty over them in general, and that he was their king to whom tribute was due.

Verses 48–54

Here is a great example of piety and devotion in the officers of the army. They came to Moses as their general and commander-in-chief, and very humbly and respectfully addressed themselves to him, calling themselves his servants. 1. The pious notice they take of God's wonderful goodness to them in this late expedition, in preserving not only their own lives, but the lives of all the men of war that they had under their charge; so that, upon the review of their muster-roll, it appeared there was not one missing, v. 49. They looked upon it as a mercy to themselves that none of those under their charge miscarried. Instead of coming to Moses to demand a recompence for the good service they had done in avenging the Lord of Midian, or to set up trophies of their victory for the immortalizing of their own names, they bring an oblation to make atonement for their souls.

CHAP. XXXII

In this chapter we have, I. The humble request of the tribes of Reuben and Gad for an inheritance on that side Jordan where Israel now lay encamped, ver. 1–5. II. Moses's misinterpretation of their request, ver. 6–15. III. Their explication of it, and stating it aright, ver. 16–19. IV. The grant of their petition under the provisos and limitations which they themselves proposed, ver. 20, &c.

Verses 1–15

Israel's tents were now pitched in the plains of Moab. While they were at a pause, the disposal of the conquests they had already made was here settled, not by any particular order or appointment of God, but at the special instance and request of two of the tribes, to which Moses consented.

I. Here is a motion made by the Reubenites and Gadites, that the land which they had lately possessed themselves of, and which in the right of conquest belonged to Israel in common, might be assigned to them in particular for their inheritance. Two things common in the world induced these tribes to make this choice and this motion upon it, the lust of the eye and the pride of life, 1 John ii. 16. 1. The lust of the eye. This land which they coveted was not only beautiful for situation, and pleasant to the eye, but it was good for food, food for cattle; and they had a great multitude of cattle, above the rest of the tribes. Now they, having these large stocks, coveted land proportionable. 2. Perhaps there was something of the pride of life in it. Reuben was the first-born of Israel, but he had lost his birthright. He here catches at the first lot, though it was out of Canaan, and far off from the tabernacle. The tribe of Gad descended from the first-born of Zilpah, and were like pretenders with the Reubenites; and Manasseh too was a first-born, but knew he must be eclipsed by Ephraim his younger brother, and therefore he also coveted to get precedency.

II. Moses's dislike of this motion, and the severe rebuke he gives to it, as a faithful prince and prophet.

1. It must be confessed that, prima facie—at first sight, the thing looked ill, especially the closing words of their petition: Bring us not over Jordan, v. 5. It seemed to proceed from a bad principle, a contempt of the land of promise. There seemed also to be covetousness in it; for that which they insisted on was that it was convenient for their cattle. It argued likewise a neglect of their brethren, as if they cared not what became of Israel, while they themselves were well provided for.

2. Moses is therefore very warm upon them. (1) He shows them what he apprehended to be evil in this motion, that it would discourage the heart of their brethren, v. 6, 7. (2) He reminds them of the fatal consequences of the unbelief and faint-heartedness of their fathers, when they were just ready to enter Canaan, as they themselves now were. He recites the story very particularly (v. 8–13). (3) He gives them fair warning of the mischief that would be likely to follow upon this separation which they were about to make from the camp of Israel; they would be in danger of bringing wrath upon the whole congregation, and hurrying them all back again into the wilderness (v. 14, 15).

We have here the accommodating of the matter between Moses and the two tribes, about their settlement on this side Jordan. After some consultation, they return with this proposal, that their men of war should go and assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan, and they would leave their families and flocks behind them in this land: and thus they might have their request, and no harm would be done.

I. Their proposal is very fair and generous, and such as, instead of disheartening, would rather encourage their brethren. 1. That their men of war, who were fit for service, would go ready armed before the children of Israel into the land of Canaan. 2. That they would leave behind them their families and cattle (which would otherwise be but the incumbrance of their camp), and so they would be the more serviceable to their brethren, v. 16. 3. That they would not return to their possessions till the conquest of Canaan was completed, v. 18. 4. That yet they would not expect any share of the land that was yet to be conquered (v. 19).

II. Moses thereupon grants their request, upon consideration that they would adhere to their proposals. 1. He insists much upon it that they should never lay down their arms till their brethren laid down theirs. They promised to go armed before the children of Israel, v. 17. "Nay," says Moses, "you shall go armed before the Lord, v. 20, 21. It is God's cause more than your brethren's. 2. Upon this condition he grants them this land for their possession. But, 3. He warns them of the danger of breaking their word: "If you fail, you sin against the Lord (v. 23), and not against your brethren only, and be sure your sin will find you out." Note, Sin will, without doubt, find out the sinner sooner or later. It concerns us therefore to find our sins out, that we may repent of them and forsake them, lest our sins find us out to our ruin and confusion.

III. They unanimously agree to the provisos and conditions of the grant, and do, as it were, give bond for performance, by a solemn promise: Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth, v. 25.

Verses 28–42

1. Moses settles this matter with Eleazar, and with Joshua who was to be his successor, knowing that he himself must not live to see it perfected, v. 28–30. He gives them an estate upon condition, leaving it to Joshua, if they fulfilled the condition, to declare the estate absolute. Hereupon they repeat their promise to adhere to their brethren, v. 31, 32. 2. Moses settles them in the land they desired. Here is the first mention of the half tribe of Manasseh coming in with them for a share. Concerning the settlement of these tribes observe, (1) They built the cities, that is, repaired them. (2) They changed the names of them (v. 38). Nebo and Baal were names of their gods, which they were forbidden to make mention of (Exod. xxiii. 13), and which, by changing the names of these cities, they endeavoured to bury in oblivion.

CHAP. XXXIII

In this chapter we have, I. A particular account of the removals and encampments of the children of Israel, from their escape out of Egypt to their entrance into Canaan, forty-two in all, with some remarkable events that happened at some of those places, ver. 1–49. II. A strict command given them to drive out all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, which they were now going to conquer and take possession of, ver. 50–56. So that the former part of the chapter looks back upon their march through the wilderness, the latter looks forward to their settlement in Canaan.

This is a review and brief rehearsal of the travels of the children of Israel through the wilderness.

I. Now the account was kept: Moses wrote their goings out, v. 2. It may be of good use to private Christians, but especially to those in public stations, to preserve in writing an account of the providences of God concerning them, the constant series of mercies they have experienced, especially those turns and changes which have made some days of their lives more remarkable. Our memories are deceitful and need this help, that we may remember all the way which the Lord our God has led us in this wilderness, Deut. viii. 2.

II. What the account itself was. It began with their departure out of Egypt, continued with their march through the wilderness, and ended in the plains of Moab, where they now lay encamped.

1. Some things are observed here concerning their departure out of Egypt, which they are reminded of upon all occasions, as a work of wonder never to be forgotten. They went forth with their armies (v. 1), rank and file, as an army with banners. They did not steal away clandestinely (Isa. lii. 12), but in defiance of their enemies, to whom God had made them such a burdensome stone that they neither could, nor would, nor durst, oppose them.

2. Concerning their travels towards Canaan. Observe, (1) They were continually upon the remove.

Such is our state in this world; we have here no continuing city. (2) Most of their way lay through a wilderness, uninhabited, untracked, unfurnished even with the necessaries of human life, which magnifies the wisdom and power of God, by whose wonderful conduct and bounty the thousands of Israel not only subsisted for forty years in that desolate place, but came out at least as numerous and vigorous as they went in. At first they pitched in the edge of the wilderness (v. 6), but afterwards in the heart of it; by less difficulties God prepares his people for greater. (3) They were led to and fro, forward and backward, as in a maze or labyrinth, and yet were all the while under the direction of the pillar of cloud and fire. The way which God takes in bringing his people to himself is always the best way, though it does not always seem to us the nearest way.

Verses 50–56

While the children of Israel were in the wilderness their total separation from all other people kept them out of the way of temptation to idolatry. But now that they were to pass over Jordan they were entering again into that temptation, and therefore, 1. They are here strictly charged utterly to destroy all the remnants of idolatry. 2. They were assured that, if they did so, God would by degrees put them in full possession of the land of promise, v. 53, 54. 3. They were threatened that, if they spared either the idols or the idolaters, they should be beaten with their own rod and their sin would certainly be their punishment. If we do not drive sin out, sin will drive us out; if we be not the death of our lusts, our lusts will be the death of our souls.

CHAP. XXIV

In this chapter God directs Moses, and he is to direct Israel, I. Concerning the bounds and borders of the land of Canaan, ver. 1–15. II. Concerning the division and distribution of it to the tribes of Israel, ver. 16, &c.

Verses 1–15

We have here a particular draft of the line by which the land of Canaan was meted, and bounded, on all sides. There was a much larger possession promised them, which in due time they would have possessed if they had been obedient, reaching even to the river Euphrates, Deut. xi. 24. And even so far the dominion of Israel did extend in David's time and Solomon's, 2 Chron. ix. 26. But this which is here described is Canaan only, which was the lot of the nine tribes and a half, for the other two and a half were already settled, v. 14, 15. Now concerning the limits of Canaan observe,

I. That it was limited within certain bounds: 1. That they might know whom they were to dispossess, and how far the commission which was given them extended (ch. xxxiii. 53), that they should drive out the inhabitants. 2. That they might know what to expect the possession of themselves.

II. That it lay comparatively in a very little compass: as it is here bounded, it is reckoned to be but about 160 miles in length and about fifty in breadth; perhaps it did not contain more than half as much ground as England, and yet this is the country which was promised to the father of the faithful and was the possession of the seed of Israel. This was that little spot of ground in which alone, for many ages, God was known, and his name was great, Ps. lxxvi. 1. See here then, 1. How small a part of the world God has for himself. 2. How small a share of the world God often gives to his own people.

III. It is observable what the bounds and limits of it were. 1. Canaan was itself a pleasant land (so it is called Dan. viii. 9), and yet it bordered upon wilderness and seas, and was surrounded with divers melancholy prospects. 2. Many of its borders were its defences and natural fortifications. 3. The border reached to the river of Egypt (v. 5), that the sight of that country which they could look into out of their own might remind them of their bondage there, and their wonderful deliverance thence. 4. Their border is here made to begin at the Salt Sea (v. 3), and there it ends, v. 12. That pleasant fruitful vale in which these cities stood became a lake, which was never stirred by any wind, bore no vessels, was replenished with no fish, no living creature of any sort being found in it, therefore called the Dead Sea. 5. Their western border was the Great Sea (v. 6), which is now called the Mediterranean.

Verses 16–29

God here appoints commissioners for the dividing of the land to them. The conquest of it is taken for granted, though as yet there was never a stroke struck towards it. 1. The principal commissioners, who were of the quorum, were Eleazar and Joshua (v. 17). 2. Besides these, that there might be no suspicion of partiality, a prince of each tribe was appointed to inspect this matter, and to see that the tribe he served for was in no respect injured.

CHAP. XXXV

Orders having been given before for the dividing of the land of Canaan among the lay-tribes (as I may call them), care is here taken for a competent provision for the clergy, the tribe of Levi, which ministered in holy things. I. Forty-eight cities were to be assigned them, with their suburbs, some in every tribe, ver. 1–8. II. Six cities out of these were to be for cities of refuge, for any man that killed another unawares, ver. 9–15. In the law concerning these observe, 1. In what case sanctuary was not allowed, namely, that of wilful murder, ver. 16–21. 2. In what cases it was allowed, ver. 22–24. 3. What was the law concerning those that took shelter in these cities of refuge, ver. 25, &c.

Verses 1–8

The laws about the tithes and offerings had provided very plentifully for the maintenance of the Levites; but it was not to be thought, nor indeed was it for the public good, that when they came to Canaan they should all live about the tabernacle, as they had done in the wilderness, and therefore care must be taken to provide habitations for them, in which they might live comfortably and usefully. It is this which is here taken care of.

I. Cities were allotted them, with their suburbs, v. 2. They were not to have any ground for tillage. 1. Cities were allotted them, that they might live near together, and converse with one another about the law, and that in doubtful cases they might consult one another. 2. These cities had suburbs annexed to them for their cattle (v. 3), a thousand cubits from the wall was allowed them for out-houses to keep their cattle in, and then two thousand more for fields to graze their cattle in, v. 4, 5.

II. These cities were to be assigned them out of the possessions of each tribe, v. 8. 1. That each tribe might thus make a grateful acknowledgment to God. 2. That each tribe might have the benefit of the Levites dwelling among them, to teach them the good knowledge of the Lord.

III. The number allotted them was forty-eight in all, four out of each of the twelve tribes, one with another.

Verses 9–34

We have here the orders given concerning the cities of refuge. In this part of the constitution there is a great deal both of good law and pure gospel.

I. Here is a great deal of good law, in the case of murder and manslaughter.

1. That wilful murder should be punished with death, and in that case no sanctuary should be allowed, no ransom taken, nor any commutation of the punishment accepted. Where wrong has been done restitution must be made; and, since the murderer cannot restore the life he has wrongfully taken away, his own must be exacted from him in lieu of it, not (as some have fancied) to satisfy the manes or ghost of the person slain, but to satisfy the law and the justice of a nation, and to be a warning to all others not to do likewise. Not only the prosecution, but the execution, of the murderer, is committed to the next of kin, who, as he was to be the redeemer of his kinsman's estate if it were mortgaged, so he was to be the avenger of his blood if he were murdered (v. 19): The avenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer.

2. But if the homicide was not voluntary, nor done designedly, if it was without enmity, or lying in wait (v. 22), not seeing the person or not seeking his harm (v. 23), which our law calls chance-medley, or homicide per infortunium—through misfortune, in this case there were cities of refuge appointed for the manslayer to flee to. By our law this incurs a forfeiture of goods, but a pardon is granted of course upon the special matter found. Concerning the cities of refuge the law was, (1) That, if a man killed another, in these cities he was safe, and under the protection of the law, till he had his trial before the congregation, that is, before the judges in open court. (2) If, upon trial, it were found to be wilful murder, the city of refuge should no longer be a protection to him; it was already determined: Thou shalt take him from my altar, that he may die, Exod. xxi. 14. (3) But if it were found to be by error or accident, and that the stroke was given without any design upon the life of the person slain or any other, then the manslayer should continue safe in the city of refuge, and the avenger of blood might not meddle with him, v. 25. There he was to remain in banishment from his own house and patrimony till the death of the high priest. Now, [1] By the preservation of the life of the man-slayer God would teach us that men ought not to suffer for that which is rather their unhappiness than their crime. [2] By the banishment of the man-slayer from his own city, and his confinement to the city of refuge, God would teach us to conceive a dread and horror of the guilt of blood, and to be very careful of life. [3] By the limiting of the time of the offender's banishment to the death of the high priest, an honour was put upon that sacred office. The cities of refuge being all of them Levites' cities, and the high priest being the head of that tribe, those that were confined to them might properly be looked upon as his prisoners, and so his death must be their discharge.

II. Here is a great deal of good gospel couched under the type and figure of the cities of refuge; and to them the apostle seems to allude when he speaks of our fleeing for refuge to the hope set before us (Heb. vi. 18), and being found in Christ, Phil. iii. 9. 1. There were several cities of refuge, and they were so appointed in several parts of the country that the man-slayer, wherever he dwelt in the land of Israel, might in half a day reach one or other of them; so, though there is but one Christ appointed for our refuge, yet, wherever we are, he is a refuge at hand, a very present help, for the word is nigh us and Christ in the word. 2. The man-slayer was safe in any of these cities; so in Christ believers that flee to him, and rest in him, are protected from the wrath of God and the curse of the law. There is no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus, Rom. viii. 1. 3. They were all Levites' cities; it was a kindness to the poor prisoner that the Levites would comfort and encourage him, and bid him welcome; so it is the work of gospel ministers to bid poor sinners welcome to Christ, and to assist and counsel those that through grace are in him. 4. Even strangers and sojourners, though they were not native Israelites, might take the benefit of these cities of refuge, v. 15. So in Christ Jesus no difference is made between Greek and Jew. 5. Even the suburbs or borders of the city were a sufficient security to the offender, v. 26, 27. So there is virtue even in the hem of Christ's garment for the healing and saving of poor sinners.

CHAP. XXXVI

We have in this chapter the determination of another question that arose upon the case of the daughters of Zelophehad. God had appointed that they should inherit, ch. xxvii. 7. Now here, I. An inconvenience is suggested, in case they should marry into any other tribe, ver. 1–4. II. It is prevented by a divine appointment that they should marry in their own tribe and family (ver. 5–7), and this is settled for a rule in like cases (ver. 8, 9); and they did marry accordingly to some of their own relations (ver. 10–12), and with this the book concludes, ver. 13.

Verses 1–4

We have here the humble address which the heads of the tribe of Manasseh made to Moses and the princes, on occasion of the order lately made concerning the daughters of Zelophehad. 1. They fairly recite the former order made in this case, and do not move to have that set aside, but are very willing to acquiesce in it (v. 2). 2. They represent the inconvenience which might, possibly, follow hereupon, if the daughters of Zelophehad should see cause to marry into any other tribes, v. 3. Two things they aimed at in their representation:—(1) It would break in upon the divine appointment if such a considerable part of the lot of Manasseh should, by their marriage, be transferred to any other tribe. (2) To prevent contests and quarrels among posterity. If those of other tribes should come among them perhaps it might occasion some contests.

Verses 5–13

Here is, I. The matter settled by express order from God between the daughters of Zelophehad and the rest of the tribe of Manasseh. The petition is assented to, and care taken to prevent the inconvenience feared: The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well, v. 5. 1. They are not determined to any particular persons; there was choice enough in the family of their father: Let them marry to whom they think best. As children must preserve the authority of their parents, and not marry against their minds, so parents must consult the affections of their children in disposing of them, and not compel them to marry such as they cannot love. Forced marriages are not likely to prove blessings. 2. Yet they are confined to their own relations, that their inheritance may not go to another family.

II. The law, in this particular case, was made perpetual.

III. The submission of the daughters of Zelophehad to this appointment.

IV. The conclusion of this whole book, referring to the latter part of it. Whatever new condition God is by his providence bringing us into, we must beg of him to teach us the duty of it, and to enable us to do it, that we may do the work of the day in its day, of the place in its place.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

DEUTERONOMY

This book is a repetition of very much both of the history and of the laws contained in the three foregoing books. There is no new history in it but that of the death of Moses in the last chapter. But the former laws are repeated and commented upon, explained and enlarged, and some particular precepts added to them, with copious reasonings for the enforcing of them. The Greek interpreters call it Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, or a second edition of the law, not with amendments, for there needed none, but with additions, for the further direction of the people in divers cases not mentioned before. Now, I. It was much for the honour of the divine law that it should be thus repeated. II. There might be a particular reason for the repeating of it now; the men of that generation to which the law was first given were all dead, and a new generation had sprung up, to whom God would have it repeated by Moses himself, that, if possible, it might make a lasting impression upon them. Now that they were just going to take possession of the land of Canaan, Moses must read the articles of agreement to them, that they might know upon what terms and conditions they were to hold and enjoy that land. III. It would be of great use to the people to have those parts of the law thus gathered up and put together which did more immediately concern them and their practice; for the laws which concerned the priests and Levites, and the execution of their offices, are not repeated. The great and needful truths of the gospel should be often pressed upon people by the ministers of Christ. To write the same things (says Paul, Phil. iii. 1) to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe. What God has spoken once we have need to hear twice, to hear many times, and it is well if, after all, it be duly perceived and regarded. The gospel is a kind of Deuteronomy, a second law, a remedial law, a spiritual law, a law of faith.

This book of Deuteronomy begins with a brief rehearsal of the most remarkable events that had befallen the Israelites since they came from Mount Sinai. In the fourth chapter we have a most pathetic exhortation to obedience. In the twelfth chapter, and so on to the twenty-seventh, are repeated many particular laws, which are enforced (ch. xxvii. and xxviii.) with promises and threatenings, blessings and curses, formed into a covenant, ch. xxix. and xxx. Care is taken to perpetuate the remembrance of these things among them (ch. xxxi.), particularly by a song (ch. xxxii.), and so Moses concludes with a blessing, ch. xxxiii. All this was delivered by Moses to Israel in the last month of his life. When our Saviour would answer the devil's temptations with, It is written, he fetched all his quotations out of this book, Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10.

CHAP. I

The first part of Moses's farewell sermon to Israel begins with this chapter, and is continued to the latter end of the fourth chapter. In the first five verses of this chapter we have the date of the sermon, the place where it was preached (ver. 1, 2, 5), and the time when, ver. 3, 4. The narrative in this chapter reminds them, I. Of the promise God made them of the land of Canaan, ver. 6–8. II. Of the provision made of judges for them, ver. 9–18. III. Of their unbelief and murmuring upon the report of the spies, ver. 19–33. IV. Of the sentence passed upon them for it, and the ratification of that sentence, ver. 34, &c.

Verses 1–8

We have here, I. The date of this sermon which Moses preached to the people of Israel. 1. The place where they were now encamped was in the plain, in the land of Moab (v. 1, 5), where they were just ready to enter Canaan, and engage in a war with the Canaanites. Yet he discourses not to them concerning military affairs, but concerning their duty to God. 2. The time was near the end of the fortieth year since they came out of Egypt. Now that a new and more pleasant scene was to be introduced, as a token for good, Moses repeats the law to them.

II. The discourse itself. In general, Moses spoke unto them all that the Lord had given him in commandment (v. 3). He begins his narrative with their removal from Mount Sinai (v. 6), and relates here, 1. The orders which God gave them to decamp, and proceed in their march (v. 6, 7): You have dwelt long enough in this mount. Thither God brought them to humble them, and by the terrors of the law to prepare them for the land of promise. Though God brings his people into spiritual trouble and affliction of mind, he knows when they have dwelt long enough in it, and will certainly find a time, to advance them from the terrors of the spirit of bondage to the comforts of the spirit of adoption. See Rom. viii. 15. 2. The prospect which he gave them of a happy and early settlement in Canaan. When God commands us to go forward in our Christian course he sets the heavenly Canaan before us for our encouragement.

Verses 9–18

Moses here reminds them of the happy constitution of their government, which was such as might make them all safe and easy if it was not their own fault. In this part of his narrative he insinuates to them,

I. That he greatly rejoiced in the increase of their numbers. He owns the accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham (v. 10): You are as the stars of heaven for multitude (v. 11): God make you a thousand times more. We are not straitened in the power and goodness of God, why should we be straitened in our own faith and hope, which ought to be as large as the promise? larger they need not be. They might become a thousand times more than they were now when they were now ten thousand times more than they were when they went down into Egypt.

II. That he was not ambitious of monopolizing the honour of the government, and ruling them himself alone, as an absolute monarch, v. 9.

III. That he was not desirous to prefer his own creatures, or such as should have a dependence upon him; for he leaves it to the people to choose their own judges, to whom he would grant commissions. He directs them to take wise men and understanding, whose personal merit would recommend them.

IV. That he was in this matter very willing to please the people. And they agreed to the proposal. The government they quarrelled with was what they themselves had consented to.

V. That he aimed to edify them as well as to gratify them; for,

1. He appointed men of good characters (v. 15), wise men and men known, men that would be faithful to their trust and to the public interest.

2. He gave them a good charge, v. 16, 17. (1) He charges them to be diligent and patient. Hear both sides, hear them fully, hear them carefully; for nature has provided us with two ears. The ear of the learner is necessary to the tongue of the learned, Isa. l. 4. (2) To be just and impartial. No faces must be known in judgment, but unbribed unbiassed equity must always pass sentence. (3) To be resolute and courageous. You are God's vicegerents, you act for him, and therefore must act like him; you are his representatives, but, if you judge unrighteously, you misrepresent him.

3. He allowed them to bring all difficult cases to him, and he would always be ready to hear and determine, and to make both the judges and the people easy.

Moses here makes a large rehearsal of the fatal turn which was given to their affairs by their own sins. It was a memorable story; we read it Num. xiii. and xiv., but divers circumstances are found here which are not related there.

I. He reminds them of their march from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea (v. 19), through that great and terrible wilderness. This he takes notice of to make them sensible of the great goodness of God to them, in guiding them through so great a wilderness. The remembrance of our dangers should make us thankful for our deliverances.

II. He shows them how fair they stood for Canaan at that time, v. 20, 21. He lets them see how near they were to a happy settlement when they put a bar in their own door.

III. He lays the blame of sending the spies upon them, which did not appear in Numbers; there it is said (ch. xiii. 1, 2) that the Lord directed the sending of them, but here we find that the people first desired it, and God, in permitting it, gave them up to their counsels: You said, We will send men before us, v. 22. Moses had given them God's word (v. 20, 21), but they could not find in their hearts to rely upon that: human policy goes further with them than divine wisdom, and they will needs light a candle to the sun.

IV. He repeats the report which the spies brought of the goodness of the land which they were sent to survey, v. 24, 25. Yet they represented the difficulties of conquering it as insuperable (v. 28).

V. He tells them what pains he took with them to encourage them, when their brethren had said so much to discourage them (v. 29). He assured them that God was present with them. And for proof of his power over their enemies he refers them to what they had seen done in Egypt. And for proof of God's goodwill to them he refers them to what they had seen in the wilderness (v. 31, 33), through which they had been guided with as much care and tenderness as were ever shown to any child borne in the arms of a nursing father. And was there any room left to distrust this God?

VI. He charges them with the sin which they were guilty of upon this occasion. 1. Disobedience, and rebellion against God's law. 2. Invidious reflections upon God's goodness. 3. An unbelieving heart at the bottom of all this: You did not believe the Lord your God, v. 32.

VII. He repeats the sentence passed upon them. 1. They were all condemned to die in the wilderness, and none of them must be suffered to enter Canaan except Caleb and Joshua, v. 34–38. It was not the breach of any of the commands of the law that shut them out of Canaan, no, not the golden calf, but their disbelief of that promise which was typical of gospel grace, to signify that no sin will ruin us but unbelief, which is a sin against the remedy. 2. Moses himself afterwards fell under God's displeasure for a hasty word which they provoked him to speak: The Lord was angry with me for your sakes, v. 37. 3. Yet here is mercy mixed with wrath. (1) That, though Moses might not bring them into Canaan, Joshua should (v. 38): (2) That, though this generation should not enter into Canaan, the next should, v. 39.

VIII. He reminds them of their foolish and fruitless attempt to get this sentence reversed when it was too late. 1. They tried it by their reformation in this particular; whereas they had refused to go up against the Canaanites, now they would go up. But this, which looked like a reformation, proved but a further rebellion. They were chased and destroyed. 2. They tried by their prayers and tears to get the sentence reversed: They returned and wept before the Lord, v. 45. These were tears of repentance and humiliation before God. But their weeping was all to no purpose. The Lord would not hearken to your voice, because you would not hearken to his.

CHAP. II

Moses, in this chapter, proceeds in the rehearsal of God's providences concerning Israel in their way to Canaan, yet preserves not the record of any thing that happened during their tedious march back to the Red Sea, in which they wore out almost thirty-eight years, but makes his narrative to begin again when they faced about towards Canaan (ver. 1–3), and drew towards the countries that were inhabited, concerning which God here gives them direction, I. What nations they must not give any disturbance to. 1. Not to the Edomites, ver. 4–8. 2. Not to the Moabites (ver. 9), of the antiquities of whose country, with that of the Edomites, he gives some account, ver. 10–12. And here comes in an account of their passing the river Zered, ver. 13–16. 3. Not to the Ammonites, of whose country here is some account given, ver. 17–23. II. What nations they should attack and conquer. They must begin with Sihon, king of the Amorites, ver. 24, 25. And accordingly, 1. They had a fair occasion of quarrelling with him, ver. 26–32. 2. God gave them a complete victory over him, ver. 33, &c.

Verses 1–7

I. A short account of the long stay of Israel in the wilderness: We compassed Mount Seir many days, v. 1. Nearly thirty-eight years they wandered in the deserts of Seir; probably in some of their rests they stayed several years.

II. Orders given them to turn towards Canaan.

III. A charge given them not to annoy the Edomites.

1. They must not offer any hostility to them as enemies: Meddle not with them, v. 4, 5.

2. They must trade with them as neighbours, buy meat and water of them, and pay for what they bought, v. 6. Religion must never be made a cloak for injustice.

Verses 8–23

It is observable here that Moses, speaking of the Edomites (v. 8), calls them our brethren, the children of Esau. Though they had been unkind to Israel, in refusing them a peaceable passage through their country, yet he calls them brethren. Now in these verses we have,

I. The account which Moses gives of the origin of the Moabites, Edomites, and Ammonites. Here he tells us how they came to those countries in which Israel found them; they were not the aborigines, or first planters. But, 1. The Moabites dwelt in a country which had belonged to a numerous race of giants, called Emim (that is, terrible ones), as tall as the Anakim, and perhaps more fierce, v. 10, 11. 2. The Edomites in like manner dispossessed the Horim from Mount Seir, and took their country (v. 12 and again v. 22), of which we read, Gen. xxxvi. 20. 3. The Ammonites likewise got possession of a country that had formerly been inhabited by giants, called Zamzummim, crafty men, or wicked men (v. 20, 21), probably the same that are called Zuzim, Gen. xiv. 5. He illustrates these remarks by an instance older than any of these; the Caphtorim (who were akin to the Philistines, Gen. x. 14) drove the Avim out of their country, and took possession of it, v. 23. The learned bishop Patrick supposes these Avites, being expelled hence, to have settled in Assyria, and to be the same people we read of under that name, 2 Kings xvii. 31.

II. The advances which Israel made towards Canaan. They passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab (v. 8), and then went over the brook or vale of Zered (v. 13), and there Moses takes notice of the fulfilling of the word which God had spoken concerning them, that none of those that were numbered at Mount Sinai should see the land that God had promised, Num. xiv. 23.

III. The caution given them not to meddle with the Moabites or Ammonites, whom they must not disseize, nor so much as disturb in their possessions: Distress them not, nor contend with them, v. 9. But why must not the Moabites and Ammonites be meddled with? 1. Because they were the children of Lot (v. 9, 19), righteous Lot who kept his integrity in Sodom. 2. Because the land they were possessed of was what God had given them, and he did not design it for Israel.

God having tried the self-denial of his people in forbidding them to meddle with the Moabites and Ammonites, and they having quietly passed by those rich countries, and, though superior in number, not made any attack upon them, here he recompenses them for their obedience by giving them possession of the country of Sihon king of the Amorites.

I. God gives them commission to seize upon the country of Sihon king of Heshbon, v. 24, 25. This was then God's way of disposing of kingdoms, but such particular grants are not now either to be expected or pretended.

II. Moses sends to Sihon a message of peace, and only begs a passage through his land, with a promise to give his country no disturbance, but the advantage of trading for ready money with so great a body, v. 26–29.

III. Sihon began the war (v. 32).

IV. Israel was victorious. 1. They put all the Amorites to the sword, men, women, and children (v. 33, 34). They died, not as Israel's enemies, but as sacrifices to divine justice, in the offering of which sacrifices Israel was employed, as a kingdom of priests. 2. They took possession of all they had; their cities (v. 34), their goods (v. 35), and their land, v. 36.

CHAP. III

Moses, in this chapter, relates, I. The conquest of Og, king of Bashan, and the seizing of his country, ver. 1–11. II. The distribution of these new conquests to the two tribes and a half, ver. 12–17 under certain provisos and limitations, ver. 18–20. III. The encouragement given to Joshua to carry on the war which was so gloriously begun, ver. 21, 22. IV. Moses's request to go over into Canaan (ver. 23–25), with the denial of that request, but the grant of an equivalent, ver. 26, &c.

Verses 1–11

Another brave country delivered into the hand of Israel, that of Bashan.

I. How they got the mastery of Og, a very formidable prince, 1. He was very strong, for he was of the remnant of the giants (v. 11). When God pleads his people's cause he can deal with giants as with grasshoppers. No man's might can secure him against the Almighty. The army of Og was very powerful, for he had the command of sixty fortified cities, besides unwalled towns, v. 5. 2. He was very bold and daring. He trusted to his own strength, and so was hardened to his destruction. God bade Moses not fear him, v. 2. If Moses himself was so strong in faith as not to need the caution, yet it is probable that the people needed it, and for them these fresh assurances are designed: "I will deliver him into thy hand."

II. How they got possession of Bashan, a very desirable country. They took all the cities (v. 4), and all the spoil of them, v. 7. They made them all their own, v. 10. So that now they had in their hands all that fruitful country which lay east of Jordan, from the river Arnon unto Hermon, v. 8.

Verses 12–20

Having shown how this country which they were now in was conquered, in these verses he shows how it was settled upon the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh, which we had the story of before, Num. xxxii. 1. Moses specifies the particular parts of the country that were allotted to each tribe, especially the distribution of the lot to the half tribe of Manasseh, the subdividing of which tribe is observable. 2. He repeats the condition of the grant which they had already agreed to, v. 18–20. That they should send a strong detachment over Jordan to lead the van in the conquest of Canaan, who should not return to their families till they had seen their brethren in as full possession of their respective allotments as they themselves were now in of theirs. A good man cannot rejoice much in the comforts of his family unless withal he sees peace upon Israel, Ps. cxxviii. 6.

Verses 21–29

Here is, I. The encouragement which Moses gave to Joshua, who was to succeed him in the government, v. 21, 22. He commanded him not to fear. Two things he would have him consider for his encouragement:—1. What God had done. Joshua had seen what a total defeat God had given by the forces of Israel to these two kings. He must not only infer thence that thus the Lord can do with them all, for his arm is not shortened, but thus he will do, for his purpose is not changed; he that has begun will finish. 2. What God had promised. The Lord your God he shall fight for you; and that cause cannot but be victorious which the Lord of hosts fights for.

II. The prayer which Moses made for himself, and the answer which God gave to that prayer.

1. His prayer was that, if it were God's will, he might go before Israel over Jordan into Canaan. Let me go over and see the good land. Not, "Let me go over and be a prince and a ruler there"; he seeks not his own honour, is content to resign the government to Joshua; but, "Let me go to be a spectator of thy kindness to Israel, to see what I believe concerning the goodness of the land of promise."

2. God's answer to this prayer had in it a mixture of mercy and judgment, that he might sing unto God of both.

(1) There was judgment in the denial of his request, and that in something of anger too: The Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, v. 26. But how was he wroth with Moses for the sake of Israel? Either, [1] For that sin which they provoked him to; see Ps. cvi. 32, 33. Or, [2] The removal of Moses at that time, when he could so ill be spared, was a rebuke to all Israel, and a punishment of their sin. Though Moses, being one of the wrestling seed of Jacob, did not seek in vain, yet he had not the thing itself which he sought for. God may accept our prayers, and yet not grant us the very thing we pray for.

(2) Here is mercy mixed with this wrath in several things:—[1] God quieted the spirit of Moses, Let it suffice thee. With this word, no doubt, a divine power went to reconcile Moses to the will of God, and to bring him to acquiesce in it. If God does not by his providence give us what we desire, yet, if by his grace he makes us content without it, it comes to the same. [2] He put an honour upon his prayer in directing him not to insist upon this request: Speak no more to me of this matter. [3] He promised him a sight of Canaan from the top of Pisgah, v. 27. Though he should not have the possession of it, he should have the prospect of it; not to tantalize him, but such a sight of it as would yield him true satisfaction, and would enable him to form a very clear and pleasing idea of that promised land. [4] He provided him a successor, one who should support the honour of Moses and carry on and complete that glorious work which the heart of Moses was so much upon, the bringing of Israel to Canaan, and settling them there (v. 28).

CHAP. IV

In this chapter we have, I. A most earnest and pathetic exhortation to obedience, backed with arguments, repeated again and again, and set before them in the most moving and affectionate manner imaginable, ver. 1–40. II. The appointing of the cities of refuge on that side Jordan, ver. 41–43. III. The particular description of the place where Moses delivered the following repetition of the law, ver. 44, &c.

Verses 1–40

This most lively and excellent discourse is often repeated.

I. In general, it is the use and application of the foregoing history. This use we should make of the review of God's providences concerning us, we should by them be quickened and engaged to duty and obedience.

II. The scope and drift of his discourse is to persuade them to keep close to God and to his service, and not to forsake him for any other god.

1. See here how he charges and commands them, and shows them what the Lord requires of them.

(1) He demands their diligent attention to the word of God: Hearken, O Israel. He means, not only that they must now give him the hearing, but that whenever the book of the law was read to them, or read by them, they should be attentive to it.

(2) He charges them to preserve the divine law pure and entire among them, v. 2. Keep it pure, and do not add to it; keep it entire, and do not diminish from it.

(3) He charges them to keep God's commandments (v. 2), to do them (v. 5, 14), to keep and do them (v. 6), to perform the covenant, v. 13. Hearing must be in order to doing, knowledge in order to practice.

(4) He charges them to be very strict and careful in their observance of the law (v. 9): Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently; and (v. 15), Take you therefore good heed unto yourselves; and again (v. 23), Take heed to yourselves.

(5) He charges them particularly to take heed of the sin of idolatry. Two sorts of idolatry he cautions them against:—[1] The worship of images, however by them they might intend to worship the true God, as they had done in the golden calf, so changing the truth of God into a lie and his glory into shame. The second commandment is expressly directed against this, and is here enlarged upon, v. 15–18. To represent an infinite Spirit by an image, and the great Creator by the image of a creature, is the greatest affront we can put upon God and the greatest cheat we can put upon ourselves. As an argument against their making images of God, he urges it very much upon them that when God made himself known to them at Horeb he did it by a voice of words which sounded in their ears, to teach them that faith comes by hearing, and God in the word is nigh us; but no image was presented to their eye, for to see God as he is is reserved for our happiness in the other world, and to see him as he is not will do us hurt and no good in this world. You saw no similitude (v. 12), no manner of similitude, v. 15. [2] The worship of the sun, moon, and stars, is another sort of idolatry which they are here cautioned against, v. 19. This was the most ancient species of idolatry and the most plausible. And the plausibleness of it made it the more dangerous. When thou seest the sun, moon, and stars, thou wilt so admire their height and brightness, their regular motion and powerful influence, that thou wilt be strongly tempted to give that glory to them which is due to him that made them. It seems there was need of a great deal of resolution to arm them against this temptation, so weak was their faith in an invisible God and an invisible world. These pretended deities, the sun, moon, and stars, were only blessings which the Lord their God had imparted to all nations. It is absurd to worship them, for they are man's servants, were made and ordained to give light on earth.

(6) He charges them to teach their children to observe the laws of God: Teach them to thy sons, and thy sons' sons (v. 9), that they may teach their children, v. 10.

(7) He charges them never to forget their duty: Take heed lest you forget the covenant of the Lord your God, v. 23.

2. Let us see now what are the motives or arguments with which he backs these exhortations.

(1) He urges the greatness, glory, and goodness, of God. Did we consider what a God he is with whom we have to do, we should surely make conscience of our duty to him and not dare to sin against him. He reminds them here that the Lord Jehovah is the one only living and true God. All the deities of the heathen were counterfeits and usurpers; nor did any of them so much as pretend to be universal monarchs in heaven and earth, but only local deities. The Israelites, who worshipped no other than the supreme Numen—Divinity, were for ever inexcusable if they either changed their God or neglected him. Take heed of offending him, for he must have your entire affection and adoration, and will by no means endure a rival. Even in the New Testament we find the same argument urged upon us as a reason why we should serve God with reverence (Heb. xii. 28, 29), because though he is our God, and a rejoicing light to those that serve him faithfully, yet he is a consuming fire to those that trifle with him. Yet he is a merciful God, v. 31. It comes in here as an encouragement to repentance, but might serve as an inducement to obedience, and a consideration proper to prevent their apostasy.

(2) He urges their relation to this God, his authority over them and their obligations to him. He is the Lord God of your fathers (v. 1), so that you are his by inheritance: your fathers were his, and you were born in his house. "He is the Lord your God (v. 2), so that you are his by your own consent. He is the Lord my God (v. 5), so that I treat with you as his agent and ambassador."

(3) He urges the wisdom of being religious: For this is your wisdom in the sight of the nations, v. 6. Great things may justly be looked for from those who are guided by divine revelation, and unto whom are committed the oracles of God.

(4) He urges the singular advantages which they enjoyed by virtue of the happy establishment they were under, v. 7, 8. Our communion with God (which is the highest honour and happiness we are capable of in this world) is kept up by the word and prayer; in both these Israel were happy above any people under heaven. The law of God is far more excellent than the law of nations. No law so consonant to natural equity and the unprejudiced dictates of right reason, so consistent with itself in all the parts of it, and so conducive to the welfare and interest of mankind, as the scripture-law is, Ps. cxix. 128. Those that magnify the law shall be magnified by it.

(5) He urges God's glorious appearances to them at Mount Sinai, when he gave them this law. This he insists much upon. Take heed lest thou forget the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb, v. 10. By what we see of God sufficient ground is given us to believe him to be a Being of infinite power and perfection, but no occasion given us to suspect him to have a body such as we have. What they heard at Mount Sinai (v. 12): "The Lord spoke unto you with an intelligible voice, in your own language, and you heard it." God manifests himself to all the world in the works of creation, without speech or language, and yet their voice is heard (Ps. xix. 1–3); but to Israel he made himself known by speech and language, condescending to the weakness of the church's infant state.

(6) He urges God's gracious appearances for them, in bringing them out of Egypt, from the iron furnace, where they laboured in the fire, forming them into a people, and then taking them to be his own people, a people of inheritance (v. 20); this he mentions again, v. 34, 37, 38. They were designed for a happy settlement in Canaan, v. 38.

(7) He urges God's righteous appearance against them sometimes for their sins. He specifies particularly the matter of Peor, v. 3, 4. This had happened very lately: their eyes had seen but the other day the sudden destruction of those that joined themselves to Baal-peor and the preservation of those that clave to the Lord, from which they might easily infer the danger of apostasy from God and the benefit of adherence to him.

(8) He urges the certain advantage of obedience.

(9) He urges the fatal consequences of their apostasy from God, that it would undoubtedly be the ruin of their nation. This he enlarges upon, v. 25–31. Here observe, First, That whatever place we are in we may thence seek the Lord our God, though ever so remote from our own land or from his holy temple. There is no part of this earth that has a gulf fixed between it and heaven. Secondly, Those, and those only, shall find God to their comfort, who seek him with all their heart. Thirdly, Afflictions are sent to engage and quicken us to see God, and, by the grace of God working with them, many are thus reduced to their right mind.

Now let all these arguments be laid together, and then say whether religion has not reason on its side. None cast off the government of their God but those that have first abandoned the understanding of a man.

Verses 41–49

Here is, 1. The nomination of the cities of refuge on that side Jordan where Israel now lay encamped. Three cities were appointed for that purpose, one in the lot of Reuben, another in that of Gad, and another in that of the half tribe of Manasseh, v. 41–43. 2. The introduction to another sermon that Moses preached to Israel, which we have in the following chapters. Probably it was preached the next sabbath day after, when the congregation attended to receive instruction. He had in general exhorted them to obedience in the former chapter; here he comes to repeat the law which they were to observe, for he demands a universal but not an implicit obedience. How can we do our duty if we do not know it? Here therefore he sets the law before them as the rule they were to work by.

CHAP. V

In this chapter we have the second edition of the ten commandments. I. The general intent of them; they were in the nature of a covenant between God and Israel, ver. 1–5. II. The particular precepts are repeated (ver. 6–21), with the double delivery of them, both by word and writing, ver. 22. III. The settling of the correspondence thenceforward between God and Israel, by the mediation and ministry of Moses. 1. It was Israel's humble petition that it might be so, ver. 23–27. 2. It was God's gracious grant that it should be so, ver. 28–31. And hence he infers the obligation they were under to obedience, ver. 32, 33.

Verses 1–5

Here, 1. Moses summons the assembly. He called all Israel. 2. He demands attention. 3. He refers them to the covenant made with them in Horeb, as that which they must govern themselves by. See the wonderful condescension of divine grace in turning the command into a covenant. Observe, (1) The parties to this covenant. "The covenant was made with us, or our immediate parents that represented us, before Mount Sinai, and transacted for us." (2) The publication of this covenant. God himself did, as it were, read the articles to them (v. 4): He talked with you face to face; word to word, so the Chaldee. (3) The mediator of the covenant: Moses stood between God and them, at the foot of the mount (v. 5). Herein Moses was a type of Christ, who stands between God and man, to show us the word of the Lord, a blessed days-man, that has laid his hand upon us both, so that we may both hear from God and speak to him without trembling.

Verses 6–22

Here is the repetition of the ten commandments, in which observe, 1. Though they had been spoken before, and written, yet they are again rehearsed. 2. There is some variation here from that record (Exod. xx.). 3. The most considerable variation is in the fourth commandment. In Exod. xx. the reason annexed is taken from the creation of the world; here it is taken from their deliverance out of Egypt, because that was typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, in remembrance of which the Christian sabbath was to be observed: Remember that thou wast a servant, and God brought thee out, v. 15. And therefore, (1) "It is fit that thy servants should be favoured by the sabbath-rest; for thou knowest the heart of a servant, and how welcome one day's ease will be after six days' labour." (2) "It is fit that thy God should be honoured by the sabbath-work, and the religious services of the day, in consideration of the great things he has done for thee." In the resurrection of Christ we were brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm: therefore, by the gospel-edition of the law, we are directed to observe the first day of the week, in remembrance of that glorious work of power and grace. 4. It is added in the fifth commandment, That it may go well with thee, which addition the apostle quotes, and puts first (Eph. vi. 3), that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest live long. 5. The last five commandments are connected or coupled together, which they are not in Exodus: Neither shalt thou commit adultery, neither shalt thou steal, &c., which intimates that God's commands are all of a piece. 6. That these commandments were given with a great deal of awful solemnity, v. 22.

Verses 23–33

I. Moses reminds them of the agreement of both the parties that were now treating, in the mediation of Moses.

1. Here is the consternation that the people were put into by that extreme terror with which the law was given. They owned that they could not bear it any more: "This great fire will consume us; this dreadful voice will be fatal to us; we shall certainly die if we hear it any more," v. 25.

2. Their earnest request that God would henceforward speak to them by Moses, with a promise that they would hear what he said as from God himself, and do it, v. 27.

3. God's approbation of their request. He appoints

Moses to be his messenger to them, to receive the law from his mouth and to communicate it to them, v. 31. God should henceforward speak to us by men like ourselves, by Moses and the prophets, by the apostles and the evangelists, and, if we believe not these, neither should we be persuaded though God should speak to us as he did to Israel at Mount Sinai.

II. Hence he infers a charge to them to observe and do all that God had commanded them, v. 32, 33.

CHAP. VI

Moses, in this chapter, goes on with his charge to Israel, to be sure to keep up their religion in Canaan. It is much the same with ch. iv. I. His preface is a persuasive to obedience, ver. 1–3. II. He lays down the great principles of obedience. The first truth to be believed, That God is one, ver. 4. The first duty to be done, To love him with all our heart, ver. 5. III. He prescribes the means for keeping up religion, ver. 6–9. IV. He cautions them against those things which would be the ruin of religion—abuse of plenty (ver. 10–12), inclination to idolatry (ver. 14, 15), and gives them some general precepts, ver. 13, 16–18. V. He directs them what instructions to give their children, ver. 20, &c.

Verses 1–3

Observe here, 1. That Moses taught the people all that, and that only, which God commanded him to teach them, v. 1. Thus Christ's ministers are to teach his churches all that he has commanded, and neither more nor less, Matt. xxviii. 20. 2. That the end of their being taught was that they might do as they were taught (v. 1), might keep God's statutes (v. 2), and observe to do them, v. 3. That Moses carefully endeavoured to fix them for God and godliness, now that they were entering upon the land of Canaan.

Verses 4–16

Here is, I. A brief summary of religion, containing the first principles of faith and obedience, v. 4, 5. These two verses the Jews reckon one of the choicest portions of scripture: they write it in their phylacteries, and think themselves not only obliged to say it at least twice every day, but very happy in being so obliged, having this saying among them, Blessed are we, who every morning and evening say, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord.

1. What we are here taught to believe concerning God: That Jehovah our God is one Jehovah. (1) That the God whom we serve is Jehovah, a Being infinitely and eternally perfect, self-existent, and self-sufficient. (2) That he is the one only living and true God; he only is God, and he is but one. The firm belief of this self-evident truth would effectually arm them against all idolatry, which was introduced by that fundamental error, that there are gods many. Happy they that have this one Lord for their God; for they have but one master to please, but one benefactor to seek to. It is better to have one fountain than a thousand cisterns, one all-sufficient God than a thousand insufficient ones.

2. What we are here taught concerning the duty which God requires of man. It is all summed up in this as its principle, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. Did ever any prince make a law that his subjects should love him? Yet such is the condescension of the divine grace that this is made the first and great commandment of God's law, that we love him, and that we perform all other parts of our duty to him from a principle of love. With an intelligent love; for so it is explained, Mark xii. 33. To love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, we must know him, and therefore love him as those that see good cause to love him.

II. Means are here prescribed for the maintaining and keeping up of religion in our hearts and houses, that it might not wither and go to decay. And they are these:—1. Meditation: These words which I command thee shall be in thy heart, v. 6. 2. The religious education of children (v. 7): "Thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children; and by communicating thy knowledge thou wilt increase it." Take all occasions to discourse with those about thee of divine things; not of unrevealed mysteries, or matters of doubtful disputation, but of the plain truths and laws of God, and the things that belong to our peace. The more conversant we are with them the more we shall admire them and be affected with them, and may thereby be instrumental to communicate divine light and heat. God appointed them, at least for the present, to write some select sentences of the law, that were most weighty and comprehensive, upon their walls, or in scrolls of parchment to be worn about their wrists; and some think that hence the phylacteries so much used among the Jews took rise. Christ blames the Pharisees, not for wearing them, but for affecting to have them broader than other people's, Matt. xxiii. 5. It was prudently and piously provided by the first reformers of the English church that then, when Bibles were scarce, some select portions of scripture should be written on the walls and pillars of the churches, which the people might make familiar to them.

III. A caution is here given not to forget God in a day of prosperity and plenty, v. 10–12. He raises their expectations of the goodness of their God, taking it for granted that he would bring them into the good land that he had promised (v. 10), that they should no longer dwell in tents as shepherds and poor travellers, but should settle in great and goodly cities, should no longer wander in a barren wilderness, but should enjoy houses well furnished and gardens well planted (v. 11), Cities which thou buildest not, houses which thou filledst not, &c.

IV. Some special precepts and prohibitions are here given, 1. They must upon all occasions give honour to God (v. 13). Swear by his name in all treaties and covenants with the neighbouring nations, and do not compliment them so far as to swear by their gods. They must take heed of dishonouring God by tempting him (v. 16): "You shall not in any exigence distrust the power, presence, and providence of God."

I. Moses charges them to keep God's commandments themselves: You shall diligently keep God's commandments, v. 17–19.

II. He charges them to instruct their children in the commands of God, not only that they might in their tender years intelligently and affectionately join in religious services, but that afterwards they might in their day keep up religion, and convey it to those that should come after them. Now,

1. Here is a proper question which it is supposed the children would ask (v. 20): "What mean the testimonies and the statutes? What is the meaning of the feasts we observe, the sacrifices we offer, and the many peculiar customs we keep up?" Observe, (1) All divine institutions have a certain meaning, and there is something great designed in them. (2) It concerns us to know and understand the meaning of them, that we may perform a reasonable service, and may not offer the blind for sacrifice.

2. Here is a full answer put into the parents' mouths to be given to this good question. Did the children ask the meaning of God's laws? Let them be told that they were to be observed, (1) In a grateful remembrance of God's former favours to them, especially their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 21–23. (2) As the prescribed condition of his further favours (v. 24): The Lord commanded us all these statutes for our good. Could we perfectly fulfil but that one command of loving God with all our heart, soul, and might, and could we say, "We have never done otherwise," this would be so our righteousness as to entitle us to the benefits of the covenant of innocency; had we continued in every thing that is written in the book of the law to do it, the law would have justified us. But this we cannot pretend to, therefore our sincere obedience shall be accepted through a Mediator.

CHAP. VII

Moses in this chapter exhorts, Israel I. In general, to keep God's commandments, ver. 11, 12. II. In particular to keep themselves pure from all communion with idolaters. 1. They must utterly destroy the seven devoted nations, ver. 1, 2, 16, 24. 2. They must by no means marry with the remainders of them, ver. 3, 4. 3. They must deface and consume their altars and images, and not so much as take the silver and gold of them to their own use, ver. 5, 25, 26. To enforce this charge, he shows that they were bound to do so, (1) In duty. Considering [1] Their election to God, ver. 6. [2] The reason of that election, ver. 7, 8. [3] The terms they stood upon with God, ver, 9. 10. (2) In interest. It is here promised, [1] In general, that, if they would serve God, he would bless and prosper them, ver. 12–15. [2] In particular, that if they would drive out the nations, that they might not be a temptation to them, God would drive them out, that they should not be any vexation to them, ver. 17, &c.

Verses 1–11

I. A very strict caution against all friendship and fellowship with idols and idolaters.

1. These devoted nations are here named and numbered (v. 1). They are specified that Israel might know the bounds and limits of their commission. The confining of this commission to the nations here mentioned plainly intimates that after-ages were not to draw this into a precedent; this will not serve to justify those barbarous laws which give no quarter. If God cast them out, Israel must not take them in, no, not as tenants, nor tributaries, nor servants. The iniquity of the Amorites was now full, and the longer it had been in the filling the sorer was the vengeance when it came at last. The people of these abominations must not be mingled with the holy seed, lest they corrupt them. Thus we must deal with our lusts that war against our souls; God has delivered them into our hands by that promise, Sin shall not have dominion over you, unless it be your own faults; let not us then make covenants with them, nor show them any mercy, but mortify and crucify them, and utterly destroy them.

2. They must make no marriages with those of them that escaped the sword, v. 3, 4. There is more ground of fear in mixed marriages that the good will be perverted than of hope that the bad will be converted. One of the Chaldee paraphrases adds here, as a reason of this command (v. 3), For he that marries with idolaters does in effect marry with their idols.

3. They must destroy all the relics of their idolatry, v. 5. Their altars and pillars, their groves and graven images, all must be destroyed, both in a holy indignation against idolatry and to prevent infection.

II. Here are very good reasons to enforce this caution.

1. The choice which God had made of this people for his own, v. 6.

2. The freeness of that grace which made this choice. God fetched the reason of it purely from himself, v. 8. All that God loves he loves freely, Hos. xiv. 4.

3. The tenor of the covenant into which they were taken; it was in short this, That as they were to God so God would be to them.

Verses 12–26

I. The caution against idolatry is repeated, and against communion with idolaters. Here is also a repetition of the charge to destroy the images, v. 25, 26. The idols which the heathen had worshipped were an abomination to God, and therefore must be so to them: all that truly love God hate what he hates.

II. The promise of God's favour to them if they would be obedient is enlarged upon. All possible assurance is here given them. Let us be constant in our duty, and we cannot question the constancy of God's mercy. If they would keep themselves pure from the idolatries of Egypt, God would keep them clear from the diseases of Egypt, v. 15. It seems to refer not only to those plagues of Egypt by the force of which they were delivered, but to some other epidemical country disease (as we call it), which they remembered the prevalence of among the Egyptians, and by which God had chastised them for their national sins. Let them not be disheartened by the slow progress of their arms, nor think that the Canaanites would never be subdued if they were not expelled the first year; no, they must be put out by little and little, and not all at once, v. 22. Note, We must not think that, because the deliverance of the church and the destruction of its enemies are not effected immediately, therefore they will never be effected. God will do his own work in his own method and time, and we may be sure that they are always the best. Thus corruption is driven out of the hearts of believers by little and little. The work of sanctification is carried on gradually; but that judgment will at length be brought forth into a complete victory.

CHAP. VIII

Moses had charged parents in teaching their children to whet the word of God upon them (ch. vi. 7) by frequent repetition of the same things over and over again; and here he himself takes the same method of instructing the Israelites as his children, frequently inculcating the same precepts and cautions. In this chapter Moses gives them, I. General exhortations to obedience, ver. 1, 6. II. A review of the great things God had done for them in the wilderness, as a good argument for obedience, ver. 2–5, and ver. 15, 16. III. A prospect of the good land into which God would now bring them, ver. 7–9. IV. A necessary caution against the temptations of a prosperous condition, ver. 10–14, and 17, 18. V. A fair warning of the fatal consequences of apostasy from God, ver. 19, 20.

Verses 1–9

The charge here given them is the same as before, to keep and do all God's commandments. He directs them,

1. To look back upon the wilderness through which God had now brought them. Now that they had come of age, and were entering upon their inheritance, they must be reminded of the discipline they had been under during their minority and the method God had taken to train them up for himself. The wilderness was the school in which they had been for forty years boarded and taught, under tutors and governors; and this was a time to bring it all to remembrance. Here let us set up our Ebenezer.

1. They must remember the straits they were sometimes brought into, (1) For the mortifying of their pride. (2) For the manifesting of their perverseness. God thereby proved them whether they would trust his promises, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations, and, in dependence on his promises, obey his precepts.

2. They must remember the supplies which were always granted them. Though God has appointed bread for the strengthening of man's heart, and that is ordinarily made the staff of life, yet God can, when he pleases, command support and nourishment without it, and make something else, very unlikely, to answer the intention as well. We might live upon air if it were sanctified for that use by the word of God. Our Saviour quotes this scripture in answer to that temptation of Satan, Command that these stones be made bread. "What need of that?" says Christ; "my heavenly Father can keep me alive without bread," Matt. iv. 3, 4. It may be applied spiritually; the word of God, as it is the revelation of God's will and grace duly received and entertained by faith, is the food of the soul. The life which is supported by that is the life of the man, and not only that life which is supported by bread. The manna typified Christ, the bread of life. He is the Word of God; by him we live.

3. They must also remember the rebukes they had been under, v. 5. During these years of their education they had been kept under a strict discipline, and not without need. They were chastened that they might not be condemned, chastened with the rod of men. Not as a man wounds and slays his enemies whose destruction he aims at, but as a man chastens his son whose happiness and welfare he designs: so did their God chasten them; he chastened and taught them, Ps. xciv. 12.

II. He directs them to look forward to Canaan, into which God was now bringing them. Look which way we will, both our reviews and our prospects will furnish us with arguments for obedience.

Verses 10–20

Moses, having mentioned the great plenty they would find in the land of Canaan, finds it necessary to caution them against the abuse of that plenty, which was a sin they would be the more prone to now that they came into that vineyard of the Lord, immediately out of a barren desert.

I. He directs them to the duty of a prosperous condition, v. 10. Whatever they had the comfort of, God must have the glory of. As our Saviour has taught us to bless before we eat (Matt. xiv. 19, 20), so we are here taught to bless after meat. That is our Hosanna—God bless; this is our Hallelujah—Blessed be God. In every thing we must give thanks. From this law the religious Jews took up a laudable usage of blessing God, not only at their solemn meals, but upon other occasions; if they drank a cup of wine they lifted up their hands and said, Blessed be he that created the fruit of the vine to make glad the heart. If they did but smell at a flower, they said, Blessed be he that made this flower sweet.

II. He arms them against the temptations of a prosperous condition. 1. "Then take heed of pride." When the estate rises, the mind is apt to rise with it, in self-conceit, self-complacency, and self-confidence. 2. "Then take heed of forgetting God." When men grow rich they are tempted to think religion a needless thing. They are happy without it, think it a thing below them and too hard upon them. Their dignity forbids them to stoop, and their liberty forbids them to serve.

CHAP. IX

The design of Moses in this chapter is to convince the people of Israel of their utter unworthiness to receive from God those great favours that were now to be conferred upon them. I. He assures them of victory over their enemies, ver. 1–3. II. He cautions them not to attribute their successes to their own merit, but to God's justice, which was engaged against their enemies, and his faithfulness, which was engaged to their fathers, ver. 4–6. III. To make it evident that they had no reason to boast of their own righteousness, he mentions their faults. In general, they had been all along a provoking people, ver. 7–24. In particular, 1. In the matter of the golden calf, the story of which he largely relates, ver. 8–21. 2. He mentions some other instances of their rebellion, ver. 22, 23. And, 3. Returns, at ver. 25, to speak of the intercession he had made for them at Horeb, to prevent their being ruined for the golden calf.

Verses 1–6

The call to attention (v. 1), Hear, O Israel, intimates that this was a new discourse.

I. Moses represents to the people the formidable strength of the enemies which they were now to encounter, v. 1. This representation is much the same with that which the evil spies had made (Num. xiii. 28, 33), but made with a very different intention: that was designed to drive them from God and to discourage their hope in him; this to drive them to God and to engage their hope in him.

II. He assures them of victory, by the presence of God with them, notwithstanding the strength of the enemy, v. 3.

III. He cautions them not to entertain the least thought of their own righteousness, as if that had procured them this favour at God's hand. Note, Our gaining possession of the heavenly Canaan, as it must be attributed to God's power and not to our own might, so it must be ascribed to God's grace and not to our own merit.

IV. He intimates to them the true reasons why God would take this good land out of the hands of the Canaanites, and settle it upon Israel.

Verses 7–29

That they might have no pretence to think that God brought them to Canaan for their righteousness, Moses here shows them what a miracle of mercy it was that they had not long ere this been destroyed in the wilderness: "Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the Lord thy God (v. 7); so far from purchasing his favour, thou hast many a time laid thyself open to his displeasure." They had been a provoking people ever since they came out of Egypt, v. 7. Though the Mosaic history records little more than the occurrences of the first and last year of the forty, yet it seems by this general account that the rest of the years were not much better, but one continued provocation.

Now let them lay all this together, and it will appear that whatever favour God should hereafter show them, in subduing their enemies and putting them in possession of the land of Canaan, it was not for their righteousness. It is good for us often to remember against ourselves, with sorrow and shame, our former sins, and to review the records conscience keeps of them, that we may see how much we are indebted to free grace, and may humbly own that we never merited at God's hand any thing but wrath and the curse.

CHAP. X

Moses, in this chapter, sets before them God's great mercy to them, notwithstanding their provocations. I. He mentions divers tokens of God's favour and reconciliation to them, never to be forgotten (1) The renewing of the tables of the covenant, ver. 1–5. (2) Giving orders for their progress towards Canaan, ver. 6, 7. (3) Choosing the tribe of Levi for his own, ver. 8, 9. (4) And continuing the priesthood after the death of Aaron, ver. 6. (5) Owning and accepting the intercession of Moses for them, ver. 10, 11. II. Hence he infers what obligations they lay under to fear, and love, and serve God, ver. 12, &c.

Verses 1–11

There were four things in and by which God showed himself reconciled to Israel and made them truly great and happy.

I. He gave them his law, gave it to them in writing, as a standing pledge of his favour. Note, God's putting his law in our hearts, and writing it in our inward parts, furnish the surest evidence of our reconciliation to God and the best earnest of our happiness in him. God will send his law and gospel to those whose hearts are prepared as arks to receive them. Christ is the ark in which now our salvation is kept safely, that it may not be lost as it was in the first Adam, when he had it in his own hand. These two tables, thus engraven, were faithfully laid up in the ark. And there they be, said Moses, pointing it is probable towards the sanctuary, v. 5. That good thing which was committed to him, he transmitted to them, and left it pure and entire in their hands; now let them look to it at their peril. Thus we may say to the rising generation, "God has entrusted us with Bibles, sabbaths, sacraments, &c., as tokens of his presence and favour, and there they be; we lodge them with you," 2 Tim. i. 13, 14.

II. He led them forward towards Canaan, though they in their hearts turned back towards Egypt, and he might justly have chosen their delusions, v. 6, 7.

III. He appointed a standing ministry among them, to deal for them in holy things. Note, A settled ministry is a great blessing to a people, and a special token of God's favour. Under the law, a succession in the ministry was kept up, by an entail of the office on a certain tribe and family. But now, under the gospel, when the effusion of the Spirit is more plentiful and powerful, the succession is kept up by the Spirit's operation on men's hearts, qualifying men for, and inclining men to, that work, some in every age.

IV. He accepted Moses as an advocate or intercessor for them, and therefore constituted him their prince and leader (v. 10, 11): The Lord hearkened to me and said, Arise, go before the people. It was a mercy to them that they had such a friend, so faithful both to him that appointed him and to those for whom he was appointed.

A most pathetic exhortation to obedience.

I. We are here most plainly directed in our duty to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves.

1. We are here taught our duty to God. We must fear the Lord our God, v. 12, and again v. 20. Fear him as a great God, and Lord, and love him as a good God and Father and benefactor. We must serve him (v. 20), serve him with all our heart and soul (v. 12), and what we do for him we must do cheerfully and with a good will. We must keep his commandments and his statutes, v. 13.

2. We are here taught our duty to our neighbour (v. 19): Love the stranger; and, if the stranger, much more our brethren, as ourselves. Two arguments are here urged to enforce this duty:—(1) God's common providence, which extends itself to all nations of men, they being all made of one blood. God loveth the stranger (v. 18), that is, he gives to all life, and breath, and all things, even to those that are Gentiles, and strangers to the commonwealth of Israel and to Israel's God. (2) The afflicted condition which the Israelites themselves had been in, when they were strangers in Egypt. Those that have themselves been in distress, and have found mercy with God, should sympathize most feelingly with those that are in the like distress and be ready to show kindness to them. The people of the Jews conceived a rooted antipathy to the Gentiles, and this brought a final ruin upon themselves.

3. We are here taught our duty to ourselves (v. 16): Circumcise the foreskin of your hearts, that is, "Cast away from you all corrupt affections and inclinations, which hinder you from fearing and loving God. The circumcision of the heart makes it ready to yield to God, and draw in his yoke.

II. We are here most pathetically persuaded to our duty. Let but reason rule us, and religion will.

1. Consider the greatness and glory of God, and therefore fear him, and from that principle serve and obey him.

2. Consider the goodness and grace of God, and therefore love him, and from that principle serve and obey him. His goodness is his glory as much as his greatness.

CHAP. XI

With this chapter Moses concludes his preface to the repetition of the statutes and judgments which they must observe to do. He repeats the general charge (ver. 1), and, having in the close of the foregoing chapter begun to mention the great things God had done among them, in this, I. He specifies several of the great works God had done before their eyes, ver. 2–7. II. He sets before them, for the future, life and death, the blessing and the curse, according as they did, or did not, keep God's commandments. III. He directs them what means to use that they might keep in mind the law of God, ver. 18–21. Concludes all with solemnly charging them to choose which they would have, the blessing or the curse, ver. 26, &c.

Verses 1-7

Thou shalt keep his charge, that is, the oracles of his word and ordinances of his worship, with which they were entrusted and for which they were accountable. It is a phrase often used concerning the office of the priests and Levites, for all Israel was a kingdom of priests, a holy nation. Observe the connection of these two: Thou shalt love the Lord, and keep his charge, since love will work in obedience, and that only is acceptable obedience which flows from a principle of love. 1 John v. 3.

Verses 8-17

Still Moses urges the same subject, as loth to conclude till he had gained his point. "If thou wilt enter into life, if thou wilt enter into Canaan, a type of that life, and find it a good land indeed to thee, keep the commandments: Keep all the commandments which I command you this day; love God, and serve him with all your heart."

He does not go about to teach them the art of war, how to draw the bow, and use the sword, and keep ranks, that they might be strong, and go in and possess the land; no, but let them keep God's commandments, and their religion, while they are true to it, will be their strength and secure their success. Sin tends to the shortening of the days of particular persons and to the shortening of the days of a people's prosperity; but obedience will be a lengthening out of their tranquillity. Note, The better God has provided, by our outward condition, for our ease and convenience, the more we should abound in his service: the less we have to do for our bodies the more we should do for God and our souls. To awaken them to take heed, Moses here tells them plainly that if they should turn aside to other gods, 1. They would provoke the wrath of God against them. 2. Good things would be turned away from them; the heaven would withhold its rain, and then of course the earth would not yield its fruit.

I. Moses repeats the directions he had given for the guidance and assistance of the people in their obedience. Let us all be directed by the three rules here given:—1. Let our hearts be filled with the word of God: Lay up these words in your heart and in your soul. 2. Let our eyes be fixed upon the word of God. Bind these words for a sign upon your hand, which is always in view (Isa. xlix. 16), and as frontlets between your eyes. 3. Let our tongues be employed about the word of God. Let it be the subject of our familiar discourse, wherever we are; especially with our children.

II. He repeats the assurances he had before given them, in God's name, of prosperity and success if they were obedient. Nothing contributes more to the making of a nation considerable abroad, valuable to its friends and formidable to its enemies, than religion reigning in it; for who can be against those that have God for them? And he is certainly for those that are sincerely for him, Prov. xiv. 24.

Verses 26-32

Moses concludes his general exhortation to obedience.

I. He sums up all his arguments for obedience in two words, the blessing and the curse (v. 26), taking hold of hope and fear, those two handles of the soul, by which it is caught, held, and managed.

II. He appoints a public and solemn proclamation to be made of the blessing and curse which he had set before them, upon the two mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, v. 29, 30. We have more particular directions for this solemnity in ch. xxvii. 11, &c., and an account of the performance of it, Josh. viii. 33, &c. It was to be done, and was done, immediately upon their coming into Canaan, that when they first took possession of that land they might know upon what terms they stood.

CHAP. XII

Moses at this chapter comes to the particular statutes which he had to give in charge to Israel, and he begins with those which relate to the worship of God, and particularly those which explain the second commandment, about which God is in a special manner jealous. I. They must utterly destroy all relics and remains of idolatry, ver. 1–3. II. They must keep close to the tabernacle, ver. 4, 5. The former precept was intended to prevent all false worship, the latter to preserve the worship God had instituted.

Verses 1–4

From those great original truths, That there is a God, and that there is but one God, arise those great fundamental laws, That that God is to be worshipped, and he only, and that therefore we are to have no other God before him: this is the first commandment, and the second is a guard upon it, or a hedge about it. To prevent a revolt to false gods, we are forbidden to worship the true God in such a way and manner as the false gods were worshipped in, and are commanded to observe the instituted ordinances of worship that we may adhere to the proper object of worship. For this reason Moses is very large in his exposition of the second commandment. What is contained in this and the four following chapters mostly refers to that.

I. They are here charged to abolish and extirpate all those things that the Canaanites had served their idol-gods with, v. 2, 3. The places that had been used, and were now to be levelled, were enclosures for their worship on mountains and hills (as if the height of the ground would give advantage to the ascent of their devotions), and under green trees, either because pleasant or because awful. He begins the statutes that relate to divine worship with this, because there must first be an abhorrence of that which is evil before there can be a steady adherence to that which is good, Rom. xii. 9. The kingdom of God must be set up, both in persons and places, upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom; for they cannot stand together, nor can there be any communion between Christ and Belial.

II. They are charged not to transfer the rites and usages of idolaters into the worship of God; no, not under colour of beautifying and improving it (v. 4).

Verses 5–32

There is not any one particular precept (as I remember) in all the law of Moses, so largely pressed and inculcated as this, by which they are all tied to bring their sacrifices to that one altar which was set up in the court of the tabernacle, and there to perform all the rituals of their religion; for, as to moral services, then, no doubt, as now, men might pray everywhere, as they did in their synagogues. The command to do this, and the prohibition of the contrary, are here repeated. 1. Because of the strange proneness there was in the hearts of the people to idolatry and superstition. 2. Because of the great use which the observance of this appointment would be to preserve among them unity and brotherly love, that, meeting all in one place, they might continue both of one way and of one heart. 3. Because of the significance of this appointment. They must keep to one place, in token of their belief of those two great truths, which we find together (1 Tim. ii. 5), That there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man.

Let us now reduce this long charge to its proper heads.

I. It is here promised that when they were settled in Canaan, when they had rest from their enemies, and dwelt in safety, God would choose a certain place, which he would appoint to be the centre of their unity, to which they should bring all their offerings, v. 10, 11. He does not appoint the place now, as he had appointed Mounts Gerizim and Ebal, for the pronouncing of the blessings and curses (ch. xi. 29), but reserves the doing of it till hereafter, that hereby they might be made to expect further directions from heaven, and a divine conduct, after Moses should be removed. The ark was the token of God's presence, and where that was put there God put his name, and that was his habitation. The place which God first chose for the ark to reside in was Shiloh; and, after that place had sinned away its honours, we find the ark at Kirjath-jearim and other places; but at length, in David's time, it was fixed at Jerusalem, and God said concerning Solomon's temple, more expressly than ever he had said concerning any other place, This I have chosen for a house of sacrifice, 2 Chron. vii. 12. Compare 2 Chron. vi. 5. Now, under the gospel, we have no temple that sanctifies the gold, no altar that sanctifies the gift, but Christ only; and, as to the places of worship, the prophets foretold that in every place the spiritual incense should be offered, Mal. i. 11. And our Saviour has declared that those are accepted as true worshippers who worship God in sincerity and truth, without regard either to this mountain or Jerusalem, John iv. 23.

II. They are commanded to bring all their burnt-offerings and sacrifices to this place that God would choose (v. 6 and again v. 11).

III. They are commanded to feast upon their hallowed things before the Lord, with holy joy. If we glorify God, we edify ourselves, and cultivate our own minds, through the grace of God, by the increase of our knowledge and faith, the enlivening of devout affections, and the confirming of gracious habits and resolutions: thus is the soul nourished. Now while they were before the Lord they must rejoice, v. 12. It is the will of God that we should serve him with gladness; none displeased him more than those that covered his altar with tears, Mal. ii. 13. See what a good Master we serve, who has made it our duty to sing at our work.

It should seem that while they were in the wilderness they did not eat the flesh of any of those kinds of beasts that were used in sacrifice, but what was killed at the door of the tabernacle, and part of it presented to God as a peace-offering, Lev. xvii. 3, 4. But when they came to Canaan, where they must live at a great distance from the tabernacle, they might kill what they pleased for their own use of their flocks and herds, without bringing part to the altar. They must not eat blood (v. 16, and again, v. 23). When they could not bring the blood to the altar, to pour it out there before the Lord, as belonging to him, they must pour it out upon the earth, as not belonging to them, because it was the life, and therefore, as an acknowledgment, belonged to him who gives life, and, as an atonement, belonged to him to whom life is forfeited. Bishop Patrick thinks one reason why they were forbidden thus strictly the eating of blood was to prevent the superstitions of the old idolators about the blood of their sacrifices, which they thought their demons delighted in, and by eating of which they imagined that they had communion with them.

Never was there a better governor than Moses, and one would think never a better opportunity of keeping up good order and discipline than now among the people of Israel, when they lay so closely encamped under the eye of their governor; and yet it seems there was much amiss and many irregularities had crept in among them. But (says Moses) when you come to Canaan, you shall not do as we do here. Note, When the people of God are in an unsettled condition, that may be tolerated and dispensed with which would by no means be allowed at another time. Moses was now about to lay down his life and government, and it was a comfort to him to foresee that Israel would be better in the next reign than they had been in his.

CHAP. XIII

In this chapter he cautions them against the rise of idolatry from among themselves; they must take heed lest any should draw them to idolatry. I. By the pretence of prophecy, ver. 1–5. II. By the pretence of friendship and relation, ver. 6–11. III. By the pretence of numbers, ver. 12–18.

Verses 1–5

Here is, I. A very strange supposition, v. 1, 2. 1. It is strange that there should arise any among themselves, especially any pretending to vision and prophecy, who should instigate them to go and serve other gods. Could an Israelite ever be guilty of such impiety? We see it in our own day and therefore may think it the less strange; multitudes that profess both learning and religion yet exciting both themselves and others, not only to worship God by images, but to give divine honour to saints and angels. So here, 2. It is to fortify them against the danger of impostures and lying wonders (2 Thess. ii. 9).

II. A very necessary charge given,

1. Not to yield to the temptation: "Thou shalt not hearken to the words of that prophet, v. 3. Not only thou shalt not do the thing he tempts thee to, but thou shalt not so much as patiently hear the temptation, but reject it with the utmost disdain and detestation. Keep close to your duty, and you keep out of harm's way. God never leaves us till we leave him.

2. Not to spare the tempter, v. 5. The infection must be kept from spreading by cutting off the gangrened limb, and putting away the mischief-makers. Such dangerous diseases as these must be taken in time.

Verses 6–11

Further provision is made by this branch of the statute against receiving the infection of idolatry from those that are near and dear to us. Satan tempted Adam by Eve and Christ by Peter.

Verses 12–18

Here the case is put of a city revolting from its allegiance to the God of Israel, and serving other gods.

I. The crime is supposed to be committed, 1. By one of the cities of Israel, that lay within the jurisdiction of their courts. The city that is here supposed to have become idolatrous is one that formerly worshipped the true God, but had now withdrawn to other gods, which intimates how great the crime is. 2. It is supposed to be committed by the generality of the inhabitants of the city. 3. They are supposed to be drawn to idolatry by certain men, the children of Belial. Belial is put for the devil (2 Cor. vi. 15), and the children of Belial are his children.

II. The cause is ordered to be tried with a great deal of care (v. 14): Thou shalt enquire and make search.

III. If the crime were proved, and the criminals were incorrigible, the city was to be wholly destroyed. If there were a few righteous men in it, no doubt they would remove themselves and their families out of such a dangerous place. The faithful worshippers of the true God must take all occasions to show their just indignation against idolatry, much more against atheism, infidelity, and irreligion. They might think it impolitic, and against the interest of their nation, to ruin a whole city for a crime relating purely to religion, and that they should be more sparing of the blood of Israelites: "Fear not that" (says Moses), "God will multiply you the more; the body of your nation will lose nothing by the letting out of this corrupt blood." Though idolaters may escape punishment from men (nor is this law in the letter of it binding now, under the gospel), yet the Lord our God will not suffer them to escape his righteous judgments.

CHAP. XIV

Moses in this chapter teaches them, I. To distinguish themselves from their neighbours by a singularity, 1. In their mourning, ver. 1, 2. 2. In their meat, ver. 3–21. II. To devote themselves unto God, and, in token of that, to give him his dues out of their estates, the yearly tithe, and that every third year, for the maintenance of their religious feasts, the Levites, and the poor, ver. 22, &c.

Verses 1–21

Moses here tells the people of Israel,

I. How God had dignified them, as a peculiar people, with three distinguishing privileges. 1. Here is election: The Lord hath chosen thee, v. 2. He did not choose them because they were by their own dedication and subjection a peculiar people to him above other nations, but he chose them that they might be so by his grace. 2. Here is adoption (v. 1): "You are the children of the Lord your God, formed by him into a people, owned by him as his people, nay, his family, a people near unto him, nearer than any other." 3. Here is sanctification (v. 2): "Thou art a holy people, separated and set apart for God, devoted to his service, designed for his praise, governed by a holy law, graced by a holy tabernacle, and the holy ordinances relating to it."

II. How they ought to distinguish themselves by a sober singularity from all the nations that were about them. Be you the children of the Lord your God: so the Seventy read it, as a command, that is, "Carry yourselves as becomes the children of God, and do nothing to disgrace the honour and forfeit the privileges of the relation." In two things particularly they must distinguish themselves:—

1. In their mourning: You shall not cut yourselves, v. 1. This forbids (as some think), not only their cutting themselves at their funerals, either to express their grief or with their own blood to appease the infernal deities, but their wounding and mangling themselves in the worship of their gods, as Baal's prophets did (1 Kings xviii. 28). They are forbidden to disturb and afflict their own minds with inordinate grief for the loss of near and dear relations. We that have a God to hope in, and a heaven to hope for, must bear up ourselves with that hope under every burden of this kind.

2. They must be singular in their meat. Observe, (1) Many sorts of flesh which were wholesome enough, and which other people did commonly eat, they must religiously abstain from as unclean. [1] Concerning beasts, here is a more particular enumeration of those which they were allowed to eat than was in Leviticus. [2] Concerning fish there is only one general rule given, that whatsoever had not fins and scales (as shell-fish and eels, besides leeches and other animals in the water that are not proper food) was unclean and forbidden, v. 9, 10. [3] No general rule is given concerning fowl, but those are particularly mentioned that were to be unclean to them, and there are few or none of them which are here forbidden that are now commonly eaten.

[4] They are further forbidden, First, To eat the flesh of any creature that died of itself, because the blood was not separated from it, and, besides the ceremonial uncleanness which it lay under (from Lev. xi. 39), it is not wholesome food. Secondly, To seethe a kid in its mother's milk, either to gratify their own luxury, supposing it a dainty bit, or in conformity to some superstitious custom of the heathen.

(2) Now as to all these precepts concerning their food, [1] It is plain in the law itself that they belonged only to the Jews, and were not moral, nor of perpetual use, because not of universal obligation; for what they might not eat themselves they might give to a stranger, or they might sell it to an alien, a mere Gentile, that came into their country for trade, v. 21. [2] It is plain in the gospel that they are now antiquated and repealed. For every creature of God is good, and nothing now to be refused, or called common and unclean, 1 Tim. iv. 4.

Verses 22–29

We have here a part of the statute concerning tithes. The productions of the ground were twice tithed, so that, putting both together, a fifth part was devoted to God out of their increase, and only four parts of five were for their own common use. The first tithe was for the maintenance of their Levites. But it is the second tithe that is here spoken of, which was to be taken out of the remainder when the Levites had had theirs.

I. They are here charged to separate it, and set it apart for God: Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, v. 22.

II. They are here directed how to dispose of it when they had separated it. This second tithe may be disposed of,

1. In works of piety, for the first two years after the year of release.

2. Every third year this tithe must be disposed of at home in works of charity (v. 28, 29): Lay it up within thy own gates, and let it be given to the poor. "Thither let them come, and eat and be satisfied."

CHAP. XV

In this chapter Moses gives orders, I. Concerning the release of debts, every seventh year (ver. 1–6), with a caution that this should be no hindrance to charitable lending, ver. 7–11. II. Concerning the release of servants after seven years' service, ver. 12–18. III. Concerning the sanctification of the firstlings of cattle to God, ver. 19, &c.

Verses 1–11

Here is, I. A law for the relief of poor debtors. Every seventh year was a year of release, in which the ground rested from being tilled and servants were discharged from their services; and, among other acts of grace, this was one, that those who had borrowed money, and had not been able to pay it before, should this year be released from it; and though, if they were able, they were afterwards bound in conscience to repay it, yet thenceforth the creditor should never recover it by law. Many good expositors think it only forbids the exacting of the debt in the year of release, because, no harvest being gathered in that year, it could not be expected that men should pay their debts then, but that afterwards it might be sued for and recovered: so that the release did not extinguish the debt, but only stayed the process for a time. But others think it was a release of the debt for ever, and this seems more probable. The law is not that the creditor shall not receive the debt if the debtor, or his friends for him, can pay it; but he shall not exact it by a legal process. The reasons of this law are, 1. To put an honour upon the sabbatical year: Because it is called the Lord's release, v. 2. 2. It was to prevent the falling of any Israelite into extreme poverty: so the margin reads (v. 4), To the end there shall be no poor among you. 3. God's security is here given by a divine promise that, whatever they lost by their poor debtors, it should be made up to them in the blessing of God upon all they had and did, v. 4–6.

II. Here is a law in favour of poor borrowers, that they might not suffer damage by the former law. 1. It is taken for granted that there would be poor among them, who would have occasion to borrow (v. 7), and that there would never cease to be some such objects of charity (v. 11). 2. In such a case we are here commanded to lend or give, according to our ability and the necessity of the case: Thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand, v. 7. Thou shalt open thy hand wide unto him, to lend him sufficient, v. 8. Sometimes there is as much charity in prudent lending as in giving, as it obliges the borrower to industry and honesty and may put him into a way of helping himself. When we have an occasion of charitable lending, if we cannot trust the borrower, we must trust God, and lend, hoping for nothing again in this world, but expecting it will be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, Luke vi. 35; xiv. 14.

III. Here is a command to give cheerfully whatever we give in charity: Thy heart shall not be grieved when thou givest, v. 10.

Verses 12–18

Here is, I. A repetition of the law that had been given concerning Hebrew servants who had sold themselves for servants, or were sold by their parents through extreme poverty, or were sold by the court of judgment for some crime committed. The law was, 1. That they should serve but six years, and in the seventh should go out free, v. 12. Compare Exod. xxi. 2. And, if the year of jubilee happened before they served out their time, that would be their discharge. 2. That if, when their six years' service had expired, they had no mind to go out free, but would rather continue in service, they must lay themselves under an obligation to serve for ever, that is, for life, by having their ears bored to the door-posts, v. 16, 17.

II. Here is an addition to this law, requiring them to put some small stock into their servants' hands to set up with for themselves, when they sent them out of their service, v. 13, 14.

Verses 19–23

Here is, 1. A repetition of the law concerning the firstlings of their cattle. 2. An addition to that law, for the further explication of it, directing them what to do with the firstlings, (1) That were females: "Thou shalt do no work with the female firstlings of the cow, nor shear those of the sheep" (v. 19). (2) But what must they do with that which was blemished, ill-blemished? v. 21. Were it male or female, it must not be brought near the sanctuary, nor used either for sacrifice or for holy feasting, for it would not be fit to honour God with. What a mercy is it that we are not under this yoke! We are not dieted as they were; we make no difference between a first calf, or lamb, and the rest that follow. Let us therefore realize the gospel meaning of this law, devoting ourselves and the first of our time and strength to God, as a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

CHAP. XVI

In this chapter we have, I. A repetition of the laws concerning the three yearly feasts; in particular, that of the passover, ver. 1–8. That of pentecost, ver. 9–12. That of tabernacles, ver. 13–15. And the general law concerning the people's attendance on them, ver. 16, 17. II. The institution of an inferior magistracy, and general rules of justice given to those that were called into office, ver. 18–20. III. A caveat against groves and images, ver. 21, 22.

Verses 1–17

Much of the communion between God and his people Israel was kept up, and a face of religion preserved in the nation, by the three yearly feasts, the institution of which, and the laws concerning them, we have several times met with already; and here they are repeated.

I. The law of the passover, so great a solemnity that it made the whole month, in the midst of which it was placed, considerable: Observe the month Abib, v. 1. Though one week only of this month was to be kept as a festival, yet their preparations before must be so solemn, and their reflections upon it and improvements of it afterwards so serious, as to amount to an observance of the whole month. The laws concerning it are, 1. That they must be sure to sacrifice the passover in the place that God should choose (v. 2), and in no other place, v. 5–7. 2. That they must eat unleavened bread for seven days, and no leavened bread must be seen in all their coasts, v, 3, 4, 8. The gospel meaning of this feast of unleavened bread the apostle gives us, 1 Cor. v. 7. Christ our passover being sacrificed for us, and we having participated in the blessed fruits of that sacrifice to our comfort, let us keep the feast in a holy conversation, free from the leaven of malice towards our brethren and hypocrisy towards God, and with the unleavened bread of sincerity and love.

II. Seven weeks after the passover the feast of pentecost was to be observed. They must bring an offering unto God, v. 10. It is here called a tribute of a freewill-offering. The law did not determine the quantum, but it was left to every man's generosity to bring what he chose, and whatever he brought he must give cheerfully, it is therefore called a free-will offering.

III. They must keep the feast of tabernacles, v. 13–15. When we rejoice in God ourselves we should do what we can to assist others also to rejoice in him, by comforting the mourners and supplying the necessitous, that even the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow may rejoice with us. See Job xxix. 13. Those that make God their joy may rejoice in hope, for he is faithful that has promised.

IV. The laws concerning the three solemn feasts are summed up (v. 16, 17). The general commands concerning them are, 1. That all the males must then make their personal appearance before God. 2. That none must appear before God empty, but every man must bring some offering or other.

Here is, I. Care taken for the due administration of justice among them, that controversies might be determined, matters in variance adjusted, the injured redressed, and the injurious punished. While they were encamped in the wilderness, they had judges and officers according to their numbers, rulers of thousands and hundreds, Exod. xviii. 25. When they came to Canaan, they must have them according to their towns and cities, in all their gates; for the courts of judgment sat in the gates.

II. Care taken for the preventing of all conformity to the idolatrous customs of the heathen, v. 21, 22. They must not plant a grove, nor so much as a tree, near God's altar, lest they should make it look like the altars of the false gods. Nothing tends more to corrupt and debauch the minds of men, than representing and worshipping by an image that God who is an infinite and eternal Spirit.

CHAP. XVII

The charge of this chapter is, I. Concerning the purity and perfection of all those animals that were offered in sacrifice, ver. 1. II. Concerning the punishment of those that worshipped idols, ver. 2–7. III. Concerning appeals from the inferior courts to the great sanhedrin, ver. 8–13. IV. Concerning the choice and duty of a king, ver. 14, &c.

Verses 1–7

Here is, I. A law for preserving the honour of God's worship, by providing that no creature that had any blemish should be offered in sacrifice to him, v. 1. The Old Testament sacrifices in a special manner were types of Christ, who is a Lamb without blemish or spot (1 Pet. i. 19). In the latter times of the Jewish church, when by the captivity in Babylon they were cured of idolatry, yet they were charged with profaneness in the breach of this law, with offering the blind, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice, Mal. i. 8.

II. A law for the punishing of those that worshipped false gods. That which was the most ancient and plausible idolatry is specified, worshipping the sun, moon, and stars; and, if that was so detestable a thing, much more was it so to worship stocks and stones, or the representations of mean and contemptible animals. How heinous and dangerous soever the crime is, yet they must not punish any for it, unless there were good proof against them, by two witnesses at least. So great a punishment as death, so great a death as stoning, must be inflicted on the idolater, whether man or woman, for the infirmity of the weaker sex would be no excuse, v. 5. The hands of the witnesses, in this as in other cases, must be first upon him, that is, they must cast the first stone at him, thereby avowing their testimony, and solemnly imprecating the guilt of his blood upon themselves if their evidence were false. This custom might be of use to deter men from false-witness bearing.

Verses 8–13

Courts of judgment were ordered to be erected in every city (ch. xvi. 18), and they were empowered to hear and determine causes according to law, both those which we call pleas of the crown and those between party and party; and we may suppose that ordinarily they ended the matters that were brought before them, and their sentence was definitive; but, 1. It is here taken for granted that sometimes a case might come into their court too difficult for those inferior judges to determine. These difficult cases, which hitherto had been brought to Moses, according to Jethro's advice, were, after his death, to be brought to the supreme power, wherever it was lodged, whether in a judge (when there was such an extraordinary person raised up and qualified for that great service, as Othniel, Deborah, Gideon, &c.) or in the high-priest (when he was by the eminency of his gifts called of God to preside in public affairs, as Eli), or, if no single person were marked by heaven for this honour, then in the priests and Levites.

Verses 14–20

After the laws which concerned subjects fitly followed the laws which concern kings; for those that rule others must themselves remember that they are under command. Here are laws given,

I. To the electors of the empire, what rules they must go by in making their choice, v. 14, 15. 1. It is here supposed that the people would, in process of time, be desirous of a king, whose royal pomp and power would be thought to make their nation look great among their neighbours. 2. They are directed in their choice. If they will have a king over them, as God foresaw they would (though it does not appear that ever the motion was made till almost 400 years after), then they must, (1) Ask counsel at God's mouth, and make him king whom God shall choose. Accordingly, when the people desired a king, they applied to Samuel a prophet of the Lord; and afterwards David, Solomon, Jeroboam, Jehu, and others, were chosen by the prophets. (2) They must not choose a foreigner under pretence of strengthening their alliances, lest a strange king should introduce strange customs or usages.

II. Laws are here given to the prince that should be elected for the due administration of the government.

1. He must carefully avoid every thing that would divert him from God and religion. Riches, honours, and pleasures are the three great hindrances of godliness (the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life), especially to those in high stations: against these therefore the king is here warned.

2. He must carefully apply himself to the law of God, and make that his rule. This must be to him better than all riches, honours, and pleasures, than many horses or many wives, better than thousands of gold and silver.

(1) He must write himself a copy of the law out of the original, which was in the custody of the priests that attended the sanctuary, v. 18. Note, It is of great use for each of us to write down what we observe as most affecting and edifying to us, out of the scriptures and good books, and out of the sermons we hear. A prudent pen may go far towards making up the deficiencies of the memory, and the furnishing of the treasures of the good housholder with things new and old.

(2) His writing and reading were all nothing if he did not reduce to practice what he wrote and read, v. 19, 20. Let him know, what dominion his religion must have over him, and what influence it must have upon him. First, It must possess him with a very reverent and awful regard to the divine majesty and authority. Secondly, It must engage him to a constant observance of the law of God, and a conscientious obedience to it, as the effect of that fear. Thirdly, It must keep him humble. How much soever he is advanced, let him keep his spirit low, and let the fear of his God prevent the contempt of his brethren.

CHAP. XVIII

In this chapter, I. The rights and revenues of the church are settled, and rules given concerning the Levites' ministration and maintenance, ver. 1–8. II. The caution against the idolatrous abominable customs of the heathen is repeated, ver. 9–14. III. A promise is given them of the spirit of prophecy to continue among them, and to centre at last in Christ the great prophet, ver. 15–18. IV. Wrath threatened against those that despise prophecy (ver. 19) or counterfeit it (ver. 20), and a rule given for the trial of it, ver. 21, 22.

Verses 1–8

Magistracy and ministry are two divine institutions of admirable use for the support and advancement of the kingdom of God among men. Laws concerning the former we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, directions are in this given concerning the latter. Land marks are here set between the estates of the priests and those of the people.

I. Care is taken that the priests entangle not themselves with the affairs of this life, nor enrich themselves with the wealth of this world; they have better things to mind.

II. Care is likewise taken that they want not any of the comforts and conveniences of this life. Though God, who is a Spirit, is their inheritance, it does not therefore follow that they must live upon the air. The people must provide for them. They must have their due from the people, v. 3. Their maintenance must not depend upon the generosity of the people, but they must be by law entitled to it.

Verses 9–14

One would not think there had been so much need as it seems there was to arm the people of Israel against the infection of the idolatrous customs of the Canaanites. After many cautions, they are here charged not to do after the abominations of those nations, v. 9.

I. Some particulars are specified; as, 1. The consecrating of their children to Moloch, an idol that represented the sun, by making them to pass through the fire, and sometimes consuming them as sacrifices in the fire, v. 10. See the law against this before, Lev. xviii. 21. 2. Using arts of divination, to get the unnecessary knowledge of things to come, enchantments, witchcrafts, charms, &c.

II. Some reasons are given against their conformity to the customs of the Gentiles. 1. Because it would make them abominable to God. 2. Because these abominable practices had been the ruin of the Canaanites, of which ruin they were not only the witnesses but the instruments. 3. Because they were better taught, v. 13, 14. It is an argument like that of the apostle against Christians walking as the Gentiles walked (Eph. iv. 17, 18, 20): You have not so learned Christ.

I. The promise of the great prophet, with a command to receive him, and hearken to him.

1. Some think it is the promise of a succession of prophets, that should for many ages be kept up in Israel. Besides the priests and Levites, their ordinary ministers, whose office it was to teach Jacob God's law, they should have prophets, extraordinary ministers, to reprove them for their faults, remind them of their duty, and foretell things to come, judgments for warning and deliverances for their comfort.

2. Whether a succession of prophets be included in this promise or not, we are sure that it is primarily intended as a promise of Christ, and it is the clearest promise of him that is in all the law of Moses. It is expressly applied to our Lord Jesus as the Messiah promised (Acts iii. 22; vii. 37), and the people had an eye to this promise when they said concerning him, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world (John vi. 14); and it was his Spirit that spoke in all the other prophets, 1 Pet. i. 11. It is also a charge and command given to all people to hear and believe, hear and obey, this great prophet here promised: Unto him you shall hearken (v. 15); and whoever will not hearken to him shall be surely and severely reckoned with for his contempt (v. 19): I will require it of him.

II. Here is a caution against false prophets. Whatever is directly repugnant to sense, to the light and law of nature, and to the plain meaning of the written word, we may be sure is not that which the Lord has spoken; nor that which gives countenance and encouragement to sin, or has a manifest tendency to the destruction of piety or charity.

CHAP. XIX

The laws which Moses had hitherto been repeating and urging mostly concerned the acts of religion and devotion towards God; but here he comes more fully to press the duties of righteousness between man and man. This chapter relates, I. To the sixth commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," ver. 1–13. II. To the eighth commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," ver. 14. III. To the ninth commandment, "Thou shalt not bear false witness," ver. 15, &c.

Verses 1–13

It was one of the precepts given to the sons of Noah that whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed, that is, by the avenger of blood, Gen. ix. 6. Now here we have the law settled between blood and blood, between the blood of the murdered and the blood of the murderer, and effectual provision made,

I. That the cities of refuge should be a protection to him that slew another casually, so that he should not die for that as a crime which was not his voluntary act, but only his unhappiness.

1. The appointing of three cities in Canaan for this purpose. The country was to be divided into three districts, and a city of refuge in the centre of each, so that every corner of the land might have one within reach.

2. The use to be made of these cities, v. 4–6. (1) It is supposed that it might so happen that a man might be the death of his neighbour without any design upon him either from a sudden passion or malice prepense, but purely by accident, as by the flying off of an axe-head, which is the instance here given, with which every case of this kind was to be compared, and by it adjudged. (2) It is supposed that the relations of the person slain would be forward to avenge the blood. Though the law did not allow the avenging of any other affront or injury with death, yet the avenger of blood, the blood of a relation, shall have great allowances made for the heat of his heart upon such a provocation as that, and his killing the manslayer, though he was so by accident only, should not be accounted murder if he did it before he got to the city of refuge. (3) It is provided that, if an avenger of blood should be so unreasonable as to demand satisfaction for blood shed by accident only, then the city of refuge should protect the slayer.

3. The appointing of three cities more for this use in case God should hereafter enlarge their territories and the dominion of their religion, that all those places which came under the government of the law of Moses in other instances might enjoy the benefit of that law in this instance, v. 8–10.

II. It is provided that the cities of refuge should be no sanctuary or shelter to a wilful murderer, but even thence he should be fetched, and delivered to the avenger of blood, v. 11–13. Before the Reformation, there were some churches and religious houses (as they called them) that were made sanctuaries for the protection of all sorts of criminals that fled to them, wilful murderers not excepted, so that (as Stamford says, in his Pleas of the Crown, lib. II, c. xxxviii.) the government follows not Moses but Romulus, and it was not till about the latter end of Henry VIII's time that this privilege of sanctuary for wilful murder was taken away.

Here is a statute for the preventing of frauds and perjuries; for the divine law takes care of men's rights and properties, and has made a hedge about them.

I. A law against frauds, v. 14. 1. Here is an implicit direction given to the first planters of Canaan to fix land marks, according to the distribution of the land to the several tribes and families by lot. 2. An express law to posterity not to remove those landmarks. It forbids, (1) The invading of any man's right, and taking to ourselves that which is not our own, by any fraudulent arts or practices, as by forging, concealing, destroying, or altering deeds and writings (which are our land marks, to which appeals are made), or by shifting hedges, meer-stones, and boundaries. (2) It forbids the sowing of discord among neighbours, and doing any thing to occasion strife and law-suits.

II. A law against perjuries, which enacts two things:—1. That a single witness should never be admitted to give evidence in a criminal cause, so as that sentence should be passed upon his testimony, v. 15. 2. That a false witness should incur the same punishment which was to have been inflicted upon the person he accused, v. 16–21.

CHAP. XX

This chapter settles the militia, and establishes the laws and ordinances of war, I. Relating to the soldiers. 1. Those must be encouraged that were drawn up to battle, ver. 1–4. 2. Those mus be dismissed and sent back again whose private affairs called for their attendance at home (ver. 5–7), or whose weakness and timidity unfitted them for service in the field, ver. 8, 9. II. Relating to the enemies they made war with. 1. The treaties they must make with the cities that were far off, ver. 10–15. 2. The destruction they must make of the people into whose land they were going, ver. 16–18. 3. The care they must take, in besieging cities, not to destroy the fruit trees, ver. 19, 20.

Verses 1–9

Israel was at this time to be considered rather as a camp than as a kingdom, entering upon an enemy's country, and not yet settled in a country of their own; and, besides the war they were now entering upon in order to their settlement, even after their settlement they could neither protect nor enlarge their coast without hearing the alarms of war. It was therefore needful that they should have directions given them in their military affairs.

I. Those that were disposed to fight must be encouraged and animated against their fears. 1. The presence of God with them: "The Lord thy God is with thee, and therefore thou art not in danger, nor needest thou be afraid." See Isa. xli. 10. 2. The experience they and their fathers had had of God's power and goodness in bringing them out of the land of Egypt, in defiance of Pharaoh and all his hosts. Let not your hearts be tender (so the word is), to receive all the impressions of fear, but let a believing confidence in the power and promise of God harden them. Fear not, and do not make haste (so the word is), for he that believeth doth not make more haste than good speed. "Do not make haste either rashly to anticipate your advantages or basely to fly off upon every disadvantage." The giving of this encouragement by a priest, one of the Lord's ministers, intimates, (1) That it is very fit that armies should have chaplains, not only to pray for them, but to preach to them, both to reprove that which would hinder their success and to raise their hopes of it. (2) That it is the work of Christ's ministers to encourage his good soldiers in their spiritual conflicts with the world and the flesh, and to assure them of a conquest, yea, more than a conquest, through Christ that loved us.

II. Those that were indisposed to fight must be discharged. 1. The Jewish writers agree that this liberty to return was allowed only in those wars which they made voluntarily (as bishop Patrick expresses it), not those which were made by the divine command against Amalek and the Canaanites, in which every man was bound to fight.

2. If a man's indisposition to fight arose from the weakness and timidity of his own spirit, he had leave to return from the war, v. 8. It was partly in kindness to them that they had their discharge (for, though shamed, they were eased); but much more in kindness to the rest of the army, who were hereby freed from the incumbrance of such as were useless and unserviceable, while the danger of infection from their cowardice and flight was prevented.

III. It is here ordered that, when all the cowards were dismissed, then captains should be nominated (v. 9), for it was in a special manner necessary that the leaders and commanders should be men of courage.

Verses 10–20

They are here directed what method to take in dealing with the cities (these only are mentioned, v. 10, but doubtless the armies in the field, and the nations they had occasion to deal with, are likewise intended) upon which they made war. They must not make a descent upon any of their neighbours till they had first given them fair notice, by a public manifesto, or remonstrance, stating the ground of their quarrel with them.

I. Even to the proclamation of war must be subjoined a tender of peace, if they would accept of it upon reasonable terms. They must first proclaim peace to them. Let this show, 1. God's grace in dealing with sinners: though he might most justly and easily destroy them, yet, having no pleasure in their ruin, he proclaims peace, and beseeches them to be reconciled. 2. Let it show us our duty in dealing with our brethren: if any quarrel happen, let us not only be ready to hearken to the proposals of peace, but forward to make such proposals. We should never make use of the law till we have first tried to accommodate matters in variance amicably, and without expense and vexation. We must be for peace, whoever are for war.

II. If the offers of peace were not accepted, then they must proceed to push on the war.

III. The nations of Canaan are excepted from the merciful provisions made by this law. Remnants might be left of the cities that were very far off (v. 15), because by them they were not in so much danger of being infected with idolatry, but of the cities which were given to Israel for an inheritance no remnants must be left of their inhabitants (v. 16), because, since it could not be expected that they should be cured of their idolatry, if they were left with that plague-sore upon them they would be in danger of infecting God's Israel, who were too apt to take the infection.

IV. Care is here taken that in the besieging of cities there should not be any destruction made of fruit trees, v. 19, 20. The intent of many of the divine precepts is to restrain us from destroying that which is our life and food. Armies and their commanders are not allowed to make what desolation they please in the countries that are the seat of war. No fruit tree is to be destroyed unless it be barren, and cumber the ground. "Nay," they maintain, "whoso wilfully breaks vessels, tears clothes, stops wells, pulls down buildings, or destroys meat, transgresses this law: Thou shalt not destroy."

CHAP. XXI

In this chapter provision is made, I. For the putting away of the guilt of blood from the land, when he that shed it had fled from justice, ver. 1–9. II. For the preserving of the honour of a captive maid, ver. 10–14. III. For the securing of the right of a first-born son, though he were not a favourite, ver. 15–17. IV. For the restraining and punishing of a rebellious son, ver. 18–21. V. For the maintaining of the honour of human bodies, which must not be hanged in chains, but decently buried, even the bodies of the worst malefactors, ver. 22, 23.

Verses 1–9

Care had been taken by some preceding laws for the vigorous and effectual prosecution of a wilful murderer (ch. xix. 11, &c.), the putting of whom to death was the putting away of the guilt of blood from the land; but if this could not be done, the murderer not being discovered, they must not think that the land was in no danger of contracting any pollution because it was not through any neglect of theirs that the murderer was unpunished; no, a great solemnity is here provided for the putting away of the guilt, as an expression of their dread and detestation of that sin.

I. The case supposed is that one is found slain, and it is not known who slew him, v. 1.

II. Directions are given concerning what is to be done in this case. The priests were to pray to God for the country and nation, that God would be merciful to them, and not bring upon them the judgments which the connivance at the sin of murder would deserve.

Verses 10–14

By this law a soldier is allowed to marry his captive if he pleased. For the hardness of their hearts Moses gave them this permission, lest, if they had not had liberty given them to marry such, they should have taken liberty to defile themselves with them, and by such wickedness the camp would have been troubled. The man is supposed to have a wife already, and to take this wife for a secondary wife, as the Jews called them. This indulgence of men's inordinate desires, in which their hearts walked after their eyes, is by no means agreeable to the law of Christ, which therefore in this respect, among others, far exceeds in glory the law of Moses.

Verses 15–17

This law restrains men from disinheriting their eldest sons out of mere caprice, and without just provocation.

I. The case here put (v. 15) is very instructive. 1. It shows the great mischief of having more wives than one, which the law of Moses did not restrain. 2. It shows how Providence commonly sides with the weakest. For the first-born son is here supposed to be hers that was hated; it was so in Jacob's family: because the Lord saw that Leah was hated, Gen. xxix. 31.

II. The law in this case is still binding on parents; they must give their children their right without partiality. In the case supposed, the eldest son, though the son of the less-beloved wife, must have his birthright privilege, which was a double portion of the father's estate, because he was the beginning of his strength. No son should be abandoned by his father till he manifestly appear to be abandoned of God, which is hard to say of any while there is life.

Verses 18–23

Here is, I. A law for the punishing of a rebellious son. Having in the former law provided that parents should not deprive their children of their right, it was fit that it should next be provided that children withdraw not the honour and duty which are owing to their parents.

1. How the criminal is here described. He is a stubborn and rebellious son, v. 18. No child was to fare the worse for the weakness of his capacity, the slowness or dullness of his understanding, but for his wilfulness and obstinacy. He is particularly supposed (v. 20) to be a glutton or a drunkard. This intimates either, (1) That these were sins which his parents did in a particular manner warn him against. Or, (2 That his being a glutton and a drunkard was the cause of his insolence and obstinacy towards his parents. When men take to drink they forget the law, they forget all law (Prov. xxxi. 5), even that fundamental law of honouring parents.

2. How this criminal is to be proceeded against. His own father and mother are to be his prosecutors, v. 19, 20.

II. A law for the burying of the bodies of malefactors that were hanged, v. 22. Of such as were stoned to death, it was usual, by order of the judges, to hang up the dead bodies upon a post for some time, as a spectacle to the world, to express the ignominy of the crime. Now it is here provided that, whatever time of the day they were thus hanged up, at sun set they should be taken down and buried. Now, 1. God would thus preserve the honour of human bodies and tenderness towards the worst of criminals. 2. Yet it is plain there was something ceremonial in it; by the law of Moses the touch of a dead body was defiling, and therefore dead bodies must not be left hanging up in the country, because, by the same rule, this would defile the land. 3. He that is hanged is accursed of God, that is, it is the highest degree of disgrace and reproach that can be done to a man, and proclaims him under the curse of God as much as any external punishment can. Those that see him thus hang between heaven and earth will conclude him abandoned of both and unworthy of either; and therefore let him not hang all night, for that would carry it too far.

CHAP. XXII

The laws of this chapter provide, I. For the preservation of charity and good neighbourship, in the care of strayed or fallen cattle, ver. 1–4. II. For the preservation of order and distinction, that men and women should not wear one another's clothes (ver. 5), and that other needless mixtures should be avoided, ver. 9–11. III. For the preservation of birds, ver. 6, 7. IV. Of life, ver. 8. V. Of the commandments, ver. 12. VI. Of the reputation of a wife abused, if she were innocent (ver. 13–19), but for her punishment if guilty, ver. 20, 21. VII. For the preservation of the chastity of wives, ver. 22. Virgins betrothed (ver. 23–27), or not betrothed, ver. 28, 29. And, lastly, against incest, ver. 30.

Verses 1–4

The kindness that was commanded to be shown in reference to an enemy (Exod. xxiii. 4, &c.) is here required to be much more done for a neighbour, though he were not an Israelite. 1. That strayed cattle should be brought back, either to the owner or to the pasture out of which they had gone astray, v. 1, 2. If such care must be taken of a neighbour's ox or ass going astray, much more of himself going astray from God and his duty; we should do our utmost to convert him (Jam. v. 19), and restore him, considering ourselves, Gal. vi. 1. 2. That lost goods should be brought to the owner, v. 3. The Jews say, "He that found the lost goods was to give public notice of them three or four times."

Verses 5–12

Here are several laws in these verses which seem to stoop very low, and to take cognizance of things mean and minute.

I. The distinction of sexes by the apparel is to be kept up, for the preservation of our own and our neighbour's chastity, v. 5. 1. Some think it refers to the idolatrous custom of the Gentiles: in the worship of Venus, women appeared in armour, and men in women's clothes. 2. It forbids the confounding of the dispositions and affairs of the sexes. 3. Probably this confounding of garments had been used to gain opportunity of committing uncleanness, and is therefore forbidden.

II. In taking a bird's nest, the dam must be let go, v. 6, 7. But doth God take care for birds? 1 Cor. ix. 9. Yes, certainly; and perhaps to this law our Saviour alludes. Luke xii. 6, Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? This law, 1. Forbids us to be cruel to the brute creatures, or to take a pleasure in destroying them. 2. It teaches us compassion to those of our own kind, and to abhor the thought of everything that looks barbarous, and cruel, and ill-natured, especially towards those of the weaker and tender sex, who always ought to be treated with the utmost respect, in consideration of the sorrows wherein they bring forth children.

III. In building a house, care must be taken to make it safe, that none might receive mischief by falling from it, v. 8. The roofs of their houses were flat for people to walk on. They must compass them with battlements, which (the Jews say) must be three feet and a half high. See here, 1. How precious men's lives are to God, who protects them, not only by his providence, but by his law. 2. How precious, therefore, they ought to be to us, and what care we should take to fence, or remove, every thing by which life may be endangered, to cover draw-wells, keep bridges in repair, and the like.

IV. Odd mixtures are here forbidden, v. 9, 10. Much of this we met with before, Lev. xix. 19. There appears not any thing at all of moral evil in these things, and therefore we now make no conscience of sowing wheat and rye together, ploughing with horses and oxen together, and of wearing linsey-woolsey garments; but hereby is forbidden either, 1. A conformity to some idolatrous customs of the heathen. Or, 2. That which is contrary to the plainness and purity of an Israelite. They must not gratify their own vanity and curiosity by putting those things together which the Creator in infinite wisdom had made asunder.

V. The law concerning fringes upon their garments, and memorandums of the commandments, which we had before (Num. xv. 38, 39), is here repeated, v. 12. By these they were distinguished from other people, so that it might be said, upon the first sight, There goes an Israelite.

Verses 13–30

These laws relate to the seventh commandment, laying a restraint by laying a penalty upon those fleshly lusts which war against the soul.

I. If a man, lusting after another woman, to get rid of his wife slander her and falsely accuse her, upon the disproof of his slander he must be punished, v. 13–19. The nearer any are in relation to us the greater sin it is to belie them and blemish their reputation.

II. If the woman that was married as a virgin was not found to be one she was to be stoned to death at her father's door, v. 20, 21. Now, 1. This gave a powerful caution to young women to flee fornication, since, however concealed before, so as not to mar their marriage, it would very likely be discovered afterwards, to their perpetual infamy and utter ruin. 2. It is intimated to parents that they must by all means possible preserve their children's chastity, by giving them good advice and admonition, setting them good examples, keeping them from bad company, praying for them, and laying them under needful restraints.

III. If any man, single or married, lay with a married woman, they were both to be put to death, v. 22. This law we had before, Lev. xx. 10.

IV. If a damsel were betrothed and not married, she was from under the eye of her intended husband, and therefore she and her chastity were taken under the special protection of the law.

CHAP. XXIII

The laws of this chapter provide, I. For the preserving of the purity and honour of the families of Israel, by excluding such as would be a disgrace to them, ver. 1–8 II. For the preserving of the purity and honour of the camp of Israel when it was abroad, ver. 9–14. III. For the encouraging and entertaining of slaves who fled, to them, ver. 15, 16. IV. Against whoredom, ver. 17, 18. V. Against usury, ver. 19, 20. VI. Against the breach of vows, ver. 21–23. VII. What liberty a man might take in his neighbour's field and vineyard, and what not, ver. 24, 25.

Verses 1–8

Interpreters are not agreed what is here meant by entering into the congregation of the Lord, which is here forbidden to eunuchs and to bastards, Ammonites and Moabites, for ever, but to Edomites and Egyptians only till the third generation. 1. Some think they are hereby excluded from communicating with the people of God in their religious services. 2. Others think they are hereby excluded from bearing office in the congregation. 3. Others think they are excluded only from marrying with Israelites. With the daughters of these nations (though out of the nations of Canaan), it should seem, the men of Israel might marry, if they were completely proselyted to the Jewish religion; but with the men of these nations the daughters of Israel might not marry, nor could the men be naturalized, otherwise than as here provided.

Verses 9–14

Israel was now encamped, and this vast army was just entering upon action, which was likely to keep them together for a long time, and therefore it was fit to give them particular directions for the good ordering of their camp. And the charge is in one word to be clean. They must take care to keep their camp pure from moral, ceremonial, and natural pollution.

I. From moral pollution (v. 9): When the host goes forth against thy enemy then look upon thyself as in a special manner engaged to keep thyself from every evil thing. 1. The soldiers themselves must take heed of sin, for sin takes off the edge of valour; guilt makes men cowards. Soldiers must keep themselves from the idols, or accursed things, they found in the camps they plundered. 2. Even those that tarried at home must at that time especially keep from every wicked thing. Times of war should be times of reformation, else how can we expect God should hear and answer our prayers for success? Ps. lxvi. 18. See 1 Sam. vii. 3.

II. From ceremonial pollution. By this trouble and reproach, which even involuntary pollutions exposed men to, they were taught to keep up a very great dread of all fleshly lusts.

III. From natural pollution; the camp of the Lord must have nothing offensive in it, v. 12–14. If there must be this care taken to preserve the body clean and sweet, much more should we be solicitous to keep the mind so. This is the reason here given: For the Lord thy God walketh by his ark, the special token of his presence, in the midst of thy camp; with respect to that external symbol this external purity is required, which teaches us to preserve inward purity of soul, in consideration of the eye of God, which is always upon us.

Verses 15–25

Orders are here given about five several things which have no relation one to another:—

I. The land of Israel is here made a sanctuary, or city of refuge, for servants that were wronged and abused by their masters, and fled thither for shelter from the neighbouring countries, v. 15, 16. 1. It is an honourable thing to shelter and protect the weak, provided they be not wicked. The angel bid Hagar return to her mistress, and Paul sent Onesimus back to his master Philemon, because they had neither of them any cause to go away, nor was either of them exposed to any danger in returning. 2. If it appeared that the servant was abused, they must not only protect him, but, supposing him willing to embrace their religion, they must give him all the encouragement that might be to settle among them.

II. The land of Israel must be no shelter for the unclean; no whore, no Sodomite, must be suffered to live among them (v. 17, 18), neither a whore nor a whoremonger. No houses of uncleanness must be kept either by men or women.

III. The matter of usury is here settled, v. 19, 20. 1. They must not lend upon usury to an Israelite. It was seldom or never that they had occasion to borrow any great sums, only what was necessary for the subsistence of their families when the fruits of their ground had met with any disaster, or the like. Where the borrower gets, or hopes to get, it is just that the lender should share in the gain; but to him that borrows for his necessary food pity must be shown, and we must lend, hoping for nothing again, if we have wherewithal to do it, Luke vi. 35. 2. They might lend upon usury to a stranger, who was supposed to live by trade, and (as we say) by turning the penny, and therefore got by what he borrowed, and came among them in hopes to do so. By this it appears that usury is not in itself oppressive; for they must not oppress a stranger, and yet might exact usury from him.

IV. The performance of the vows wherewith we have bound our souls is here required. 1. We are here left at our liberty whether we will make vows or no. God had already signified his readiness to accept a free-will offering thus vowed, though it were but a little fine flour (Lev. ii. 4, &c.). But lest the priests, who had the largest share of those vows and voluntary offerings, should sponge upon the people, by pressing it upon them as their duty to make such vows, beyond their ability and inclination, they are here expressly told that it should not be reckoned a sin in them if they did not make any such vows. 2. We are here laid under the highest obligations, when we have made a vow, to perform it, and to perform it speedily.

V. Allowance is here given, when they passed through a cornfield or vineyard, to pluck and eat of the corn or grapes that grew by the road side. Now, 1. This law intimated to them what great plenty of corn and wine they should have in Canaan. 2. It provided for the support of poor travellers, to relieve the fatigue of their journey. 3. It teaches us not to insist upon property in a small matter, of which it is easy to say, What is that between me and thee? 4. It used them to hospitality.

CHAP. XXIV

In this chapter we have, I. The toleration of divorce, ver. 1–4. II. A discharge of new-married men from the war, ver. 5. III. Laws concerning pledges, ver. 6, 10–13, 17. IV. Against man-stealing, ver. 7. V. Concerning the leprosy, ver. 8, 9. VI. Against the injustice of masters towards their servants, ver. 14, 15. Judges in capital causes (ver. 16), and civil concerns, ver. 17, 18. VII. Of charity to the poor, ver. 19, &c.

Verses 1–4

This is that permission which the Pharisees erroneously referred to as a precept, Matt. xix. 7, Moses commanded to give a writing of divorcement. It was not so; our Saviour told them that he only suffered it lest, if they had not had liberty to divorce their wives, they should have ruled them with rigour, and, it may be, have been the death of them. It is probable that divorces were in use before (they are taken for granted, Lev. xxi. 14), and Moses thought it needful here to give some rules concerning them. 1. That a man might not divorce his wife unless he found some uncleanness in her, v. 1. It was not sufficient to say that he did not like her, or that he liked another better, but he must show cause for his dislike. 2. That it must be done, not by word of mouth, for that might be spoken hastily, but by writing, and that put in due form, and solemnly declared, before witnesses, to be his own act and deed, which was a work of time, and left room for consideration, that it might not be done rashly. 3. That the husband must give it into the hand of his wife, and send her away, which some think obliged him to endow her. 4. That being divorced it was lawful for her to marry another husband, v. 2. The divorce had dissolved the bond of marriage as effectually as death could dissolve it; so that she was free to marry again as if her first husband had been naturally dead. 5. That if her second husband died, or divorced her, then still she might marry a third, but her first husband should never take her again (v. 3, 4). The Jewish writers say that this was to prevent a most vile and wicked practice which the Egyptians had of changing wives.

Verses 5–13

Here is, I. Provision made for the preservation and confirmation of love between new-married people, v. 5. This fitly follows upon the laws concerning divorce, which would be prevented if their affection to each other were well settled at first. If the husband were much abroad from his wife the first year, his love to her would be in danger of cooling, and of being drawn aside to others whom he would meet with abroad; therefore his service to his country in war, embassies, or other public business that would call him from home, shall be dispensed with, that he may cheer up the wife that he has taken. 1. It is of great consequence that love be kept up between husband and wife. 2. One of the duties of that relation is to cheer up one another under the cares and crosses that happen, as helpers of each other's joy; for a cheerful heart does good like a medicine.

II. A law against man-stealing, v. 7. It was not death by the law of Moses to steal cattle or goods; but to steal a child, or a weak and simple man, or one that a man had in his power, and to make merchandize of him, this was a capital crime. It was taking away a man's liberty, the liberty of a free-born Israelite, which was next in value to his life.

III. A memorandum concerning the leprosy, v. 8, 9. The laws concerning it must be carefully observed. The laws concerning it we had, Lev. xiii. 14.

IV. Some necessary orders given about pledges for the security of money lent. 1. They must not take the millstone for a pledge (v. 6), for with that they ground the corn that was to be bread for their families, and so it forbids the taking of any thing for a pledge by the want of which a man was in danger of being undone. Consonant to this is the ancient common law of England, which provides that no man be distrained of the utensils or instruments of his trade or profession, as the axe of a carpenter, or the books of a scholar. That creditor who cares not though his debtor and his family starve so he may but get his money, goes contrary, not only to the law of Christ, but even to the law of Moses too. 2. They must not go into the borrower's house to fetch the pledge. It is provided that he shall take not what he pleases, but what the borrower can best spare. A poor man's bed-clothes should never be taken for a pledge, v. 12, 13. This we had before, Exod. xxii. 26, 27. If they were taken in the morning, they must be brought back again at night, which is in effect to say that they must not be taken at all.

Verses 14–22

I. Masters are commanded to be just to their poor servants, v. 14, 15. 1. They must not oppress them. "For thou wast a bondman in the land where thou wast a stranger (v. 18), and thou knowest what a grievous thing it is to be oppressed by a task-master, and therefore, thou shalt not oppress a servant." 2. They must be faithful and punctual in paying them their wages. He that works by day-wages is supposed to live from hand to mouth, and cannot have to-morrow's bread for his family till he is paid for this day's labour.

II. Magistrates and judges are commanded to be just in their administrations.

III. The rich are commanded to be kind and charitable to the poor. Many ways they are ordered to be so by the law of Moses. The particular instance of charity here prescribed is that they should not be greedy in gathering in their corn, and grapes, and olives, so as to be afraid of leaving any behind them, but be willing to overlook some, and let the poor have the gleanings, v. 19–22.

CHAP. XXV

Here is, I. A law to moderate the scourging of malefactors, ver. 1–3. II. A law in favour of the ox that treads out the corn, ver. 4. III. For the disgracing of him that refused to marry his brother's widow, ver. 5–10. IV. For the punishment of an immodest woman, ver. 11, 12. V. For just weights and measures, ver. 13–16. VI. For the destroying of Amalek, ver. 17, &c.

Verses 1–4

I. A direction to the judges in scourging malefactors, v. 1–3. A great many precepts we have met with which have not any particular penalty annexed to them, the violation of most of which, according to the constant practice of the Jews, was punished by scourging. The directions here given for the scourging of criminals are, 1. That it be done solemnly; not tumultuously through the streets, but in open court before the judges' face, and with so much deliberation as that the stripes might be numbered. The Jews say that while execution was in doing the chief justice of the court read with a loud voice Deut. xxviii. 58, 59, and xxix. 9, and concluded with those words (Ps. lxxviii. 38), But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity. Thus it was made a sort of religious act, and so much the more likely to reform the offender himself and to be a warning to others. 2. That it be done in proportion to the crime. 3. That how great soever the crime were the number of stripes should never exceed forty, v. 3. Forty save one was the common usage, as appears, 2 Cor. xi. 24. They abated one for fear of having miscounted or because they would never go to the utmost rigour, or because the execution was usually done with a whip of three lashes, so that thirteen stripes (each one being counted for three) made up thirty-nine, but one more by that reckoning would have been forty-two.

II. A charge to husbandmen not to hinder their cattle from eating when they were working, if meat were within their reach, v. 4.

Verses 5–12

Here is, I. The law settled concerning the marrying of a brother's widow. It appears from the story of Judah's family that this had been an ancient usage (Gen. xxxviii. 8). The case put is a case that often happens, of a man's dying without issue, while his brethren were yet so young as to be unmarried. Now in this case, 1. The widow was not to marry again into any other family, unless all the relations of her husband did refuse her, that the estate she was endowed with might not be alienated. 2. The husband's brother, or next of kin, must marry her, partly out of respect to her, who, having forgotten her own people and her father's house, should have all possible kindness shown her by the family into which she was married; and partly out of respect to the deceased husband, that though he was dead and gone he might not be forgotten, nor lost out of the genealogies of his tribe; for the first-born child, which the brother or next kinsman should have by the widow, should be denominated from him that was dead, and entered in the genealogy as his child, v. 5, 6. But, 3. If the brother, or next of kin, declined to do this good office to the memory of him that was gone, what must be done in that case? Why, (1) He shall not be compelled to do it, v. 7. (2) Yet he shall be publicly disgraced for not doing it.

II. A law for the punishing of an immodest woman, v. 11, 12.

Verses 13–19

Here is, I. A law against deceitful weights and measures: they must not only not use them, but they must not have them, for, if they had them, they would be strongly tempted to use them. They must not have a great weight and measure to buy by and a small one to sell by, for that was to cheat both ways. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, v. 15.

II. A law for the rooting out of Amalek.

1. The mischief Amalek did to Israel must be here remembered, v. 17, 18. They had no occasion at all to quarrel with Israel nor did they give them any notice, by a manifesto or declaration of war; but took them at an advantage, when they had just come out of the house of bondage, and, for aught that appeared to them, were only going to sacrifice to God in the wilderness.

2. This mischief must in due time be revenged, v. 19. It was nearly 400 years after this that Saul was ordered to put this sentence in execution (1 Sam. xv.), and was rejected of God because he did not do it effectually.

CHAP. XXVI

With this chapter Moses concludes the particular statutes which he thought fit to give Israel in charge at his parting with them; what follows is by way of sanction and ratification. In this chapter, I. Moses gives them a form of confessions to be made by him that offered the basket of his first-fruits, ver. 1–11. II. The protestation and prayer to be made after the disposal of the third year's tithe, ver. 12–15. III. He binds on all the precepts he had given them, 1. By the divine authority: "Not I, but the Lord thy God has commanded thee to do these statutes," ver. 16. 2. By the mutual covenant between God and them, ver. 17, &c.

Verses 1–11

Here is, I. A good work ordered to be done, and that is the presenting of a basket of their first-fruits to God every year, v. 1, 2. When a man went into the field or vineyard at the time when the fruits were ripening, he was to mark that which he observed most forward, and to lay it by for first-fruits, wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates, some of each sort must be put in the same basket, with leaves between them, and presented to God in the place which he should choose. Now from this law we may learn, 1. To acknowledge God as the giver of all those good things which are the support and comfort of our natural life. 2. To deny ourselves. What is first ripe we are most fond of; those that are nice and curious expect to be served with each fruit at its first coming in. 3. To give to God the first and best we have. Those that consecrate the days of their youth, and the prime of their time, to the service and honour of God, bring him their first-fruits.

II. Good words put into their mouths to be said in the doing of this good work. Two things they must own for this purpose:—1. The meanness of their common ancestor: A Syrian ready to perish was my father, v. 5. Jacob is here called an Aramite, or Syrian, because he lived twenty years in Padan-Aram. 2. The miserable condition of their nation in its infancy. They sojourned in Egypt as strangers, they served there as slaves (v. 6).

Concerning the disposal of their tithe the third year we had the law before, ch. xiv. 28, 29. The second tithe, which in the other two years was to be spent in extraordinaries at the feasts, was to be spent the third year at home, in entertaining the poor.

I. They must make a solemn protestation to this purport, v. 13, 14. 1. That no hallowed things were hoarded up: "I have brought them away out of my house, nothing now remains there but my own part." 2. That the poor, and particularly poor ministers, poor strangers, and poor widows, had had their part according to the commandment. 3. That none of this tithe had been misapplied to any common use, much less to any ill use. The Jews say that this protestation of their integrity was to be made with a low voice, because it looked like a self-condemnation, but that the foregoing confession of God's goodness was to be made with a loud voice to his glory. He that durst not make this protestation must bring his trespass-offering, Lev. v. 15.

II. To this solemn protestation they must add a solemn prayer (v. 15), not particularly for themselves, but for God's people Israel; for in the common peace and prosperity every particular person prospers and has peace.

Verses 16–19

Two things Moses here urges to enforce all these precepts:—1. That they were the commands of God, v. 16. They were not the dictates of his own wisdom, nor were they enacted by any authority of his own, but infinite wisdom framed them, and the power of the King of kings made them binding to them: The Lord thy God commands thee. 2. That their covenant with God obliged them to keep these commands.

CHAP. XXVII

Moses having very largely and fully set before the people their duty and having in the close of the foregoing chapter laid them under the obligation both of the command and the covenant, he comes in this chapter to prescribe outward means, I. For the helping of their memories. They must write all the words of this law upon stones, ver. 1–10. II. For the moving of their affections, that they might not be indifferent to the law as a light thing. When they came into Canaan, the blessings and curses which were the sanctions of the law, were to be solemnly pronounced in the hearing of all Israel, who were to say Amen to them, ver. 11–26.

Verses 1–10

Here is, I. A general charge to the people to keep God's commandments. This is pressed upon them, with all authority. Moses with the elders of Israel, the rulers of each tribe (v. 1), and again, Moses and the priests the Levites (v. 9), commanded their people to keep God's law.

II. A particular direction to them with great solemnity to register the words of this law, as soon as they came into Canaan. There was a solemn ratification of the covenant between God and Israel at Mount Sinai, when an altar was erected, with twelve pillars, and the book of the covenant was produced, Exod. xxiv. 4. That which is here appointed is a somewhat similar solemnity.

1. They must set up a monument on which they must write the words of this law.

2. They must also set up an altar. By the words of the law which were written upon the plaster, God spoke to them; by the altar, and the sacrifices offered upon it, they spoke to God; and thus was communion kept up between them and God.

Verses 11–26

There were, it seems, in Canaan, that part of it which afterwards fell to the lot of Ephraim (Joshua's tribe), two mountains that lay near together, with a valley between, one called Gerizim and the other Ebal. On the sides of these two mountains, which faced one another, all the tribes were to be drawn up, six on one side and six on the other. Then when silence was proclaimed, and attention commanded, one of the priests pronounced with a loud voice one of the curses here following, and all the people that stood on the side and foot of Mount Ebal said Amen; then the contrary blessing was pronounced, "Blessed is he that doth not so or so," and then those that stood on the side, and at the foot, of Mount Gerizim, said Amen.

I. Something is to be observed, in general, concerning this solemnity, which was to be done but once, but would be talked of to posterity. 1. God appointed which tribes should stand upon Mount Gerizim and which on Mount Ebal (v. 12, 13). The six tribes that were appointed for blessing were all the children of the free women, for to such the promise belongs, Gal. iv. 31. Levi is here put among the rest, to teach ministers to apply to themselves the blessing and curse which they preach to others, and by faith to set their own Amen to it. 2. Of those tribes that were to say Amen to the blessings it is said, They stood to bless the people, but of the other, They stood to curse, not mentioning the people, as loth to suppose that any of this people whom God had taken for his own should lay themselves under the curse. 3. The Levites or priests, such of them as were appointed for that purpose, were to pronounce the curses as well as the blessings. 4. The curses are here expressed, but not the blessings. In Christ's sermon upon the mount, which was the true Mount Gerizim, we have blessings only, Matt. v. 3, &c. 5. To each of the curses the people were to say Amen. The Jews have a saying to encourage people to say Amen to the public prayers, Whosoever answereth Amen, after him that blesseth, he is as he that blesseth. But how could they say Amen to the curses? When they said Amen, they did in effect say, not only, It is certain it shall be so, but, It is just it should be so.

II. Let us now observe what are the particular sins against which the curses are here denounced.

1. Sins against the second commandment. This flaming sword is set to keep that commandment first, v. 15. Those are here cursed, not only that worship images, but that make them or keep them, if they be such (or like such) as idolators used in the service of their gods.

2. Against the fifth commandment, v. 16. The contempt of parents is a sin so heinous that it is put next to the contempt of God himself.

3. Against the eighth commandment. The curse of God is here fastened, (1) Upon an unjust neighbour that removes the land marks, v. 17. See ch. xix. 14. (2) Upon an unjust counsellor. (3) Upon an unjust judge, that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow, whom he should protect and vindicate, v. 19.

4. Against the seventh commandment. Incest is a cursed sin, with a sister, a father's wife, or a mother-in-law, v. 20, 22, 23.

5. Against the sixth commandment. Two of the worst kinds of murder are here specified:—(1) Murder unseen, when a man does not set upon his neighbour as a fair adversary, giving him an opportunity to defend himself, but smites him secretly (v. 24), as by poison or otherwise, when he sees not who hurts him. See Ps. x. 8, 9. (2) Murder under colour of law. Cursed therefore is he that will be hired, or bribed, to accuse, or to convict, or to condemn, and so to slay, an innocent person, v. 25. See Ps. xv. 5.

6. The solemnity concludes with a general curse upon him that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them, v. 26. By our obedience to the law we set our seal to it, and so confirm it, as by our disobedience we do what lies in us to disannul it, Ps. cxix. 126.

CHAP. XXVIII

This chapter is a very large exposition of two words in the foregoing chapter, the blessing and the curse. I. He describes the blessings that should come upon them if they were obedient; personal, family, and especially national, for in that capacity especially they are here treated with, ver. 1–14. II. He more largely describes the curses which would come upon them if they were disobedient; such as would be, 1. Their extreme vexation, ver. 15–44. 2. Their utter ruin and destruction at last, ver. 45–68. This chapter is much to the same purport with Lev. xxvi, setting before them life and death, good and evil; and the promise, in the close of that chapter, of their restoration, upon their repentance, is here likewise more largely repeated, ch. xxx.

Verses 1–14

The blessings are here put before the curses, to intimate, 1. That God is slow to anger, but swift to show mercy: he has said it, and sworn, that he would much rather we would obey and live than sin and die. 2. That obedience pleases best which comes from a principle of delight in God's goodness.

The particulars of this blessing.

I. It is promised that the providence of God should prosper them in all their outward concerns. These blessings are said to overtake them, v. 2. Thus in the great day the blessing will overtake the righteous that say, Lord, when saw we thee hungry and fed thee? Matt. xxv. 37.

1. Several things are enumerated in which God by his providence would bless them:—(1) They should be safe and easy; a blessing should rest upon their persons wherever they were, in the city or in the field, v. 3. Their persons should be protected, and the affair they went about should succeed well. (2) Their families should be built up in a numerous issue. (3) They should be rich, and have an abundance of all the good things of this life. A blessing is promised, First, On all they had without doors, corn and cattle in the field (v. 4, 11), their cows and sheep particularly. Secondly, On all they had within doors, the basket and the store (v. 5), the store-houses or barns, v. 8. We depend upon God and his blessing, not only for our yearly corn out of the field, but for our daily bread out of our basket and store, and therefore are taught to pray for it every day. (4) They should have success in all their employments, God would own their industry, and bless the work of their hand (v. 12). (5) They should have honour among their neighbours (v. 1). Two things should help to make them great among the nations:—First, Their wealth (v. 12): "Thou shalt lend to many nations upon interest" (which they were allowed to take from the neighbouring nations), "but thou shalt not have occasion to borrow." Secondly, Their power (v. 13): "The Lord shall make thee the head, to give law to all about thee, to exact tribute, and to arbitrate all controversies." Religion among them, and the blessing of God upon them, would make them formidable to all their neighbours, terrible as an army with banners. (6) They should be victorious over their enemies, and prosper in all their wars.

2. From the whole we learn (though it were well if men would believe it) that religion and piety are the best friends to outward prosperity. Though temporal blessings do not take up so much room in the promises of the New Testament as they do in those of the Old, yet it is enough that our Lord Jesus has given us his word (and surely we may take his word) that if we seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, all other things shall be added to us, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good; and who can desire them further? Matt. vi. 33.

II. It is likewise promised that the grace of God should establish them a holy people, v. 9. This establishment of their religion would be the establishment of their reputation (v. 10).

Verses 15–44

Having viewed the bright side of the cloud, which is towards the obedient, we have now presented to us the dark side, which is towards the disobedient. If we do not keep God's commandments, we not only come short of the blessing promised, but we lay ourselves under the curse, which is as comprehensive of all misery as the blessing is of all happiness.

I. The equity of this curse. It is not a curse causeless, nor for some light cause; God seeks not occasion against us, nor is he apt to quarrel with us. That which is here mentioned as bringing the curse is, 1. Despising God, refusing to hearken to his voice (v. 15), which bespeaks the highest contempt imaginable. 2. Disobeying him, not doing his commandments. 3. Deserting him. God never casts us off till we first cast him off.

II. The extent and efficacy of this curse.

1. In general, it is declared, "All these curses shall come upon thee from above, and shall overtake thee; though thou endeavour to escape them." There is no running from God but by running to him, no fleeing from his justice but by fleeing to his mercy. See Ps. xxi. 7, 8. To those whose mind and conscience are defiled everything else is so, Tit. i. 15. This curse is just the reverse of the blessing in the former part of the chapter.

2. Many particular judgments are here enumerated, which would be the fruits of the curse. Note, God's judgments can reach the minds of men, to fill them with darkness and horror, as well as their bodies and estates; and those are the sorest of all judgments which make men a terror to themselves, and their own destroyers.

One would have thought that enough had been said to possess them with a dread of that wrath of God which is revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. But to show how deep the treasures of that wrath are, and that still there is more and worse behind, Moses, when one would have thought that he had concluded this dismal subject, begins again, and adds to this roll of curses many similar words; as Jeremiah did to his, Jer. xxxvi. 32. Here, in this latter part, he foretells their last destruction by the Romans and their dispersion thereupon. And the present deplorable state of the Jewish nation, and of all that have incorporated themselves with them, by embracing their religion, does so fully and exactly answer to the prediction in these verses that it serves for an incontestable proof of the truth of prophecy, and consequently of the divine authority of the scripture. And, this last destruction being here represented as more dreadful than the former, it shows that their sin, in rejecting Christ and his gospel, was more heinous. Under this last destruction now for above 1600 years they continue incurably averse to the Lord Jesus.

I. It is amazing to think that a people so long the favourites of Heaven should be so perfectly abandoned and cast off, that a people so closely incorporated should be so universally dispersed, and yet that a people so scattered in all nations should preserve themselves distinct and not mix with any, but like Cain be fugitives and vagabonds, and yet marked to be known.

II. The destruction threatened is described. Moses is here upon the same melancholy subject that our Saviour is discoursing of to his disciples in his farewell sermon (Matt. xxiv.), namely, The destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation.

1. Five things are here foretold as steps to their ruin:—

(1) That they should be invaded by a foreign enemy (v. 49, 50): A nation from far, namely, the Romans, as swift as the eagle hastening to the prey. Our Saviour makes use of this similitude, in foretelling this destruction, that where the carcase is there will the eagles be gathered together, Matt. xxiv. 28. And bishop Patrick observes that the ensign of the Roman armies was an eagle.

(2) That the country should be laid waste, and all the fruits of it eaten up by this army of foreigners, which is the natural consequence of an invasion, especially when it is made, as that by the Romans was, for the chastisement of rebels.

(3) That their cities should be besieged, and that such would be the obstinacy of the besieged, and such the vigour of the besiegers, that they would be reduced to the last extremity, and at length fall into the hands of the enemy, v. 52.

(4) That multitudes of them should perish, so that they should become few in number, v. 62.

(5) That the remnant should be scattered throughout the nations. This completes their woe: The Lord shall scatter thee among all people, v. 64.

2. Upon the whole matter, (1) The accomplishment of these predictions upon the Jewish nation shows that Moses spoke by the Spirit of God. (2) Let us all hence learn to stand in awe and not to sin. I have heard of a wicked man, who, upon reading the threatenings of this chapter, was so enraged that he tore the leaf out of the Bible, as Jehoiakim cut Jeremiah's roll; but to what purpose is it to deface a copy, while the original remains upon record in the divine counsels, by which it is unalterably determined that the wages of sin is death, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear?

CHAP. XXIX

The first words of this chapter are the contents of it, "These are the words of the covenant" (ver. 1), that is, these that follow Here is, I. A recital of God's dealings with them, in order to the bringing of them into this covenant, ver. 2–8. II. A solemn charge to them to keep the covenant, ver. 9. III. An abstract of the covenant itself, ver. 12, 13. IV. A specification of the persons taken into the covenant, ver. 10, 11, 14, 15. V. An intimation of the great design of this covenant against idolatry, in a parenthesis, ver. 16, 17. VI. A most solemn and dreadful denunciation of the wrath of God against such persons as promise themselves peace in a sinful way, ver. 18–28. VII. The conclusion of this treaty, with a distinction between things secret and things revealed, ver. 29.

Verses 1–9

Now that Moses had largely repeated the commands which the people were to observe as their part of the covenant, and the promises and threatenings which God would make good (according as they behaved themselves) as his part of the covenant, the whole is here summed up in a federal transaction. The covenant formerly made is here renewed, and Moses, who was before, is still, the mediator of it (v. 1): The Lord commanded Moses to make it. It is probable that some now living, though not of age to be mustered, were of age to consent for themselves to the covenant made at Horeb, and yet it is here renewed. But the far greater part were a new generation, and therefore the covenant must be made afresh with them, for it is fit that the covenant should be renewed to the children of the covenant.

I. It is usual for indentures to begin with a recital; this does so, with a rehearsal of the great things God had done for them, 1. As an encouragement to them to believe that God would indeed be to them a God, for he would not have done so much for them if he had not designed more, to which all he had hitherto done was but a preface. 2. As an engagement upon them to be to him an obedient people, in consideration of what he had done for them.

II. For the proof of what he here advances he appeals to their own eyes (v. 2): You have seen all that the Lord did. Their own senses were incontestable evidence of the matter of fact: Keep therefore the words of this covenant, v. 9.

III. These things he specifies, to show the power and goodness of God in his appearances for them. 1. Their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 2, 3. 2. Their conduct through the wilderness for forty years, v. 5, 6. There they were led, and clad, and fed, by miracles. By these miracles they were made to know that the Lord was God, and by these mercies that he was their God. 3. The victory they had lately obtained over Sihon and Og, and that good land which they had taken possession of, v. 7, 8.

IV. By way of inference from these memoirs, Moses laments their stupidity: Yet the Lord has not given you a heart to perceive, v. 4. Note, 1 The hearing ear, the seeing eye, and the understanding heart, are the gift of God. 2 God gives not only food and raiment, but wealth and large possessions, to many to whom he does not give grace. Many enjoy the gifts who have not hearts to perceive the giver, nor the true intention and use of the gifts. 3 God's readiness to do us good in other things is a plain evidence that if we have not grace, that best of gifts, it is our own fault and not his.

Verses 10–29

It appears by the length of the sentences here, and by the copiousness and pungency of the expressions, that Moses, now that he was drawing near to the close of his discourse, was very zealous, and very desirous to impress what he said upon the minds of this unthinking people. To bind them the faster to God and duty, he here concludes a bargain (as it were) between them and God, an everlasting covenant. He requires not their explicit consent, but lays the matter plainly before them, and then leaves it between God and their own consciences.

I. The parties to this covenant. 1. It is the Lord their God they are to covenant with, v. 12. 2. They are all to be taken into covenant with him. They were all summoned to attend (v. 2). (1) Even their great men, the captains of their tribes, their elders and officers, must not think it any disparagement to put their necks under the yoke of this covenant, and to draw in it. (2) Not the men only, but their wives and children, must come into this covenant, v. 11. (3) Not the men of Israel only, but the stranger that was in their camp, provided he was so far proselyted to their religion as to renounce all false gods. This was an early indication of favour to the Gentiles, and of the kindness God had in store for them. (4) Not the freemen only, but the hewers of wood and drawers of water, the meanest drudge they had among them. (5) Not only those that were now present before God in this solemn assembly, but those also that were not here with them were taken into covenant (v. 15). That is, [1] Those that tarried at home were included; though detained either by sickness or necessary business. [2] The generations to come are included. And so, taking this covenant as a typical dispensation of the covenant of grace, it is a noble testimony to the Mediator of that covenant, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

II. The summary of this covenant. All the precepts and all the promises of the covenant are included in the covenant-relation between God and them, v. 13.

III. The principal design of the renewing of this covenant at this time was to fortify them against temptations to idolatry. Idolaters were like drunkards, violently set upon their idols themselves and industrious to draw others in with them. Revellings commonly accompanied their idolatries (1 Pet. iv. 3), so that this speaks a woe to drunkards. Drunkenness is a sin that hardens the heart, and debauches the conscience, as much as any other, a sin to which men are strangely tempted themselves even when they have lately felt the mischiefs of it, and to which they are strangely fond of drawing others.

Idolatry would be the ruin of their nation; it would bring plagues upon the land that connived at this root of bitterness and received the infection; as far as the sin spread, the judgment should spread likewise. We are forbidden curiously to enquire into the secret counsels of God. A full answer is given to that question, Wherefore has the Lord done thus to this land? sufficient to justify God and admonish us. But if any ask further why God would be at such a vast expense of miracles to form such a people, whose apostasy and ruin he plainly foresaw, why he did not by his almighty grace prevent it, or what he intends yet to do with them, let such know that these are questions which cannot be answered. See Acts i. 7; John xxi. 22; Col. ii. 18. We are directed and encouraged diligently to enquire into that which God has made known: things revealed belong to us and to our children. Note, 1. Though God has kept much of his counsel secret, yet there is enough revealed to satisfy and save us. He has kept back nothing that is profitable for us. 2. We ought to acquaint ourselves, and our children too, with the things of God that are revealed. We are not only allowed to search into them, but are concerned to do so. They are things which we and ours are closely interested in. They are the rules we are to live by, the grants we are to live upon; and therefore we are to learn them diligently ourselves, and to teach them diligently to our children. 3. All our knowledge must be in order to practise, for this is the end of all divine revelation, not to furnish us with curious subjects of speculation and discourse, with which to entertain ourselves and our friends, but that we may do all the words of this law, and be blessed in our deed.

CHAP. XXX

One would have thought that the threatenings in the close of the foregoing chapter had made a full end of the people of Israel, and had left their case for ever desperate; but in this chapter we have a plain intimation of the mercy God had in store for them in the latter days, so that mercy at length rejoices against judgment, and has the last word. Here we have, I. Exceedingly great and precious promises made to them, upon their repentance and return to God, ver. 1–10. II. The righteousness of faith set before them in the plainness and easiness of the commandment that was now given them, ver. 11–14. III. A fair reference of the whole matter to their choice, ver. 15, &c.

Verses 1–10

These verses may be considered either as a conditional promise or as an absolute prediction.

I. They are chiefly to be considered as a conditional promise, and so they belong to all persons and all people, and not to Israel only; and the design of them is to assure us that the greatest sinners, if they repent and be converted, shall have their sins pardoned, and be restored to God's favour. This is the purport of the covenant of grace, it leaves room for repentance in case of misdemeanour, and promises pardon upon repentance. Now observe here,

1. How the repentance is described which is the condition of these promises. (1) It begins in serious consideration, v. 1. "Thou shalt call to mind that which thou hadst forgotten or not regarded." Note, Consideration is the first step towards conversion. Isa. xlvi. 8, Bring to mind, O you transgressors. The prodigal son came to himself first, and then to his father. That which they should call to mind is the blessing and the curse. If sinners would but seriously consider the happiness they have lost by sin and the misery they have brought themselves into, and that by repentance they may escape that misery and recover that happiness, they would not delay to return to the Lord their God. The prodigal called to mind the blessing and the curse when he considered his present poverty and the plenty of bread in his father's house, Luke xv. 17. (2) It consists in sincere conversion. The effect of the consideration cannot but be godly sorrow and shame, Ezek. vi. 9; vii. 16. But that which is the life and soul of repentance, and without which the most passionate expressions are but a jest, is returning to the Lord our God, v. 2. If thou turn (v. 10) with all thy heart and with all thy soul. (3) It is evidenced by a constant obedience to the holy will of God. [1] This obedience must be with an eye to God: Thou shalt obey his voice (v. 8), and hearken to it, v. 10. [2] It must be sincere, and cheerful, and entire: With all thy heart, and with all thy soul, v. 2. [3] It must be from a principle of love, and that love must be with all thy heart and with all thy soul, v. 6.

2. What the favour is which is promised upon this repentance. Though they are brought to God by their trouble and distress, in the nations whither they were driven (v. 1), yet God will graciously accept of them notwithstanding; for on this errand afflictions are sent, to bring us to repentance. Undique ad cælos tantundem est viæ—From every place there is the same way to heaven. It is here promised, (1) That God would have compassion upon them, as proper objects of his pity, v. 3. (2) That he would turn their captivity, and gather them from the nations whither they were scattered (v. 3), though ever so remote, v. 4. (3) That he would bring them into their land again, v. 5. Note, Penitent sinners are not only delivered out of their misery, but restored to true happiness in the favour of God.

II. This may also be considered as a prediction of the repentance and restoration of the Jews: When all these things shall have come upon thee (v. 1), the blessing first, and after that the curse, then the mercy in reserve shall take place. Though their hearts were wretchedly hardened, yet the grace of God could soften and change them; and then, though their case was deplorably miserable, the providence of God would redress all their grievances. Now, 1. It is certain that this was fulfilled in their return from their captivity in Babylon. It was a wonderful instance of their repentance and reformation that Ephraim, who had been joined to idols, renounced them, and said, What have I to do any more with idols? That captivity effectually cured them of idolatry; and then God planted them again in their own land and did them good. But, 2. Some think that it is yet further to be accomplished in the conversion of the Jews who are now dispersed, their repentance for the sin of their fathers in crucifying Christ, their return to God through him, and their accession to the Christian church.

Moses here urges them to obedience from the consideration of the plainness and easiness of the command.

I. This is true of the law of Moses. They could never plead in excuse of their disobedience that God had enjoined them that which was either unintelligible or impracticable, impossible to be known or to be done (v. 11): It is not hidden from thee. That is, 1. "It is not too high for thee; thou needest not send messengers to heaven (v. 12), to enquire what thou must do to please God; nor needest thou go beyond sea (v. 13), as the philosophers did, that travelled through many and distant regions in pursuit of learning." 2. "It is not too hard nor heavy for thee": so the Septuagint reads it, v. 11. "There is that in thee which consents to the law that it is good, Rom. vii. 16. Thou hast therefore no reason to complain of any insuperable difficulty in the observance of it."

II. This is true of the gospel of Christ, to which the apostle applies it, and makes it the language of the righteousness which is of faith, Rom. x. 6–8. This is God's commandment now under the gospel that we believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, 1 John iii. 23. But the word is nigh us, and Christ in that word; so that if we believe with the heart that the promises of the incarnation and resurrection of the Messiah are fulfilled in our Lord Jesus, and receive him accordingly, and confess him with our mouth, we have then Christ with us, and we shall be saved. He is near, very near, that justifies us. The law was plain and easy, but the gospel much more so.

Moses here concludes with a very bright light, and a very strong fire, that, if possible, what he had been preaching of might find entrance into the understanding and affections of this unthinking people.

I. He states the case very fairly. 1. Every man covets to obtain life and good, and to escape death and evil, desires happiness and dreads misery. "Well," says he, "I have shown you the way to obtain all the happiness you can desire and to avoid all misery. Be obedient, and all shall be well, and nothing amiss." 2. Every man is moved and governed in his actions by hope and fear, hope of good and fear of evil, real or apparent. "Now," says Moses, "I have tried both ways; if you will be either drawn to obedience by the certain prospect of advantage by it, or driven to obedience by the no less certain prospect of ruin in case you be disobedient—if you will be wrought upon either way, you will be kept close to God and your duty; but, if you will not, you are utterly inexcusable."

II. Having thus stated the case, he fairly puts them to their choice, with a direction to them to choose well.

III. In the last verse, He shows them, in short, what their duty is, to love God, and to love him as the Lord, a Being most amiable, and as their God, a God in covenant with them. He is thy life, and the length of thy days.

CHAP. XXXI

In this chapter Moses, having finished his sermon, I. Encourages both the people who were now to enter Canaan (ver. 1–6), and Joshua who was to lead them, ver. 7, 8, 23. And, II. He takes care for the keeping of these things always in their remembrance after his decease, 1. By the book of the law which was, (1) Written. (2) Delivered into the custody of the priests, ver. 9, and 24–27. (3) Ordered to be publicly read every seventh year, ver. 10–13. 2. By a song which God orders Moses to prepare for their instruction and admonition. (1) He calls Moses and Joshua to the door of the tabernacle, ver. 14, 15. (2) He foretells the apostasy of Israel in process of time, and the judgments they would thereby bring upon themselves, ver. 16–18. (3) He prescribes the following song to be a witness against them, ver. 19–21. (4) Moses wrote it, ver 22. And delivered it to Israel, with an intimation of the design of it, as he had received it from the Lord, ver. 28, &c.

Verses 1–8

Loth to part (we say) bids oft farewell. Moses does so to the children of Israel; not because he was loth to go to God, but because he was loth to leave them, fearing that when he had left them they would leave God. Here he calls them together to give them a word of encouragement. It was a discouragement to them that Moses was to be removed at a time when he could so ill be spared: though Joshua would continue to fight for them in the valley, they would want Moses to intercede for them on the hill, as he did, Exod. xvii. 10. 1. He is 120 years old, and it is time for him to think of resigning his honour and returning to his rest. 2. He is under a divine sentence: Thou shalt not go over Jordan.

I. He encourages the people; and never could any general animate his soldiers upon such good grounds as those on which Moses here encourages Israel. 1. He assures them of the constant presence of God with them (v. 3): The Lord thy God that has led thee and kept thee hitherto will go over before thee. This is applied by the apostle to all God's spiritual Israel, for the encouragement of their faith and hope; unto us is this gospel preached, as well as unto them. He will never fail thee, nor forsake thee, Heb. xiii. 5. 2. He commends Joshua to them for a leader, one whose conduct, and courage, and sincere affection to their interest, they had had long experience of; and one whom God had ordained and appointed to be their leader, and therefore, no doubt, would own and bless, and make a blessing to them. See Num. xxvii. 18. 3. He ensures their success. Two things might encourage their hopes of this:—(1) The victories they had already obtained over Sihon and Og (v. 4), from which they might infer both the power of God, that he could do what he had done, and the purpose of God, that he would finish what he had begun to do. (2) The command God had given them to destroy the Canaanites (ch. vii. 2; xii. 2), and from which they might infer that no doubt he would put it into the power of their hands to do it.

II. He encourages Joshua, v. 7, 8. Observe, 1. Joshua was an experienced general, and a man of approved gallantry and very well pleased to be admonished by Moses to be strong and of good courage. 2. He gives him this charge in the sight of all Israel, that they might be the more observant of him whom they saw thus solemnly inaugurated. 3. He gives him the same assurances of the divine presence, and consequently of a glorious success, that he had given the people.

Verses 9–13

The law was given by Moses; so it is said, John i. 17. He was not only entrusted to deliver it to that generation, but to transmit it to the generations to come; and here it appears that he was faithful to that trust.

I. Moses wrote this law, v. 9. 1. That those who had heard it might often review it themselves, and call it to mind. 2. That it might be the more safely handed down to posterity. Note, The church has received abundance of advantage from the writing, as well as from the preaching, of divine things; faith comes not only by hearing, but by reading. The same care that was taken of the law, thanks be to God, is taken of the gospel too; soon after it was preached it was written, that it might reach to those on whom the ends of the world shall come.

II. Having written it, he committed it to the care and custody of the priests and elders. He delivered one authentic copy to the priests, to be laid up by the ark (v. 26), there to remain as a standard by which all other copies must be tried.

III. He appointed the public reading of this law in a general assembly of all Israel every seventh year. The pious Jews (it is very probable) read the law daily in their families, and Moses of old time was read in the synagogue every sabbath day, Acts. xv. 21. But once in seven years, that the law might be the more magnified and made honourable, it must be read in a general assembly. Now here he gives direction,

1. When this solemn reading of the law must be, that the time might add to the solemnity; it must be done, (1) In the year of release. In that year the land rested, so that they could the better spare time to attend this service. Servants who were then discharged, and poor debtors who were then acquitted from their debts, must know that, having the benefit of the law, it was justly expected they should yield obedience to it, and therefore give up themselves to be God's servants, because he had loosed their bonds. The year of release was typical of gospel grace, which therefore is called the acceptable year of the Lord; for our remission and liberty by Christ engage us to keep his commandments, Luke i. 74, 75. (2) At the feast of tabernacles in that year. In that feast they were particularly required to rejoice before God, Lev. xxiii. 40.

2. To whom it must be read: To all Israel (v. 11), men, women, and children, and the strangers, v. 12. The women and children were not obliged to go up to the other feasts, but to this only in which the law was read.

3. By whom it must be read: Thou shalt read it (v. 11), "Thou, O Israel," by a proper person appointed for that purpose; or, "Thou, O Joshua," their chief ruler; accordingly we find that he did read the law himself, Josh. viii. 34, 35. So did Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30, and Ezra, Neh. viii. 3.

4. For what end it must be thus solemnly read. That the present generation might hereby keep up their acquaintance with the law of God, v. 12. They must hear, that they may learn, and fear God, and observe to do their duty. See here what we are to aim at in hearing the word; we must hear, that we may learn and grow in knowledge; and every time we read the scriptures we shall find that there is still more and more to be learned out of them.

Verses 14–21

Here, I. Moses and Joshua are summoned to attend the divine majesty at the door of the tabernacle, v. 14. Moses is told again that he must shortly die. He must also bring Joshua with him to be presented to God for a successor, and to receive his commission and charge.

II. God graciously gives them the meeting: He appeared in the tabernacle (as the shechinah used to appear) in a pillar of a cloud, v. 15.

III. He tells Moses that, after his death, the covenant which he had taken so much pains to make between Israel and their God would certainly be broken. 1. That Israel would forsake God, v. 16. Worshipping the gods of the Canaanites would undoubtedly be counted a violation of the covenant. Thus still those are revolters from Christ, who either make a god of their money by allowing covetousness to reign, or a god of their belly by allowing sensuality to reign. Those that turn to other gods (v. 18) forsake their own mercies. 2. That then God would forsake Israel; and justly does he cast those off who had so unjustly cast him off (v. 17). Those that have sinned away their God will find that thereby they pull all mischiefs upon their own heads.

IV. He directs Moses to deliver them a song, in the composing of which he should be divinely inspired, and which should remain a standing testimony for God as faithful to them in giving them warning. The wisdom of man has devised many ways of conveying the knowledge of good and evil, by laws, histories, prophecies, proverbs, and, among the rest, by songs; each has its advantages. And the wisdom of God has in the scripture made use of them all, that ignorant and careless men might be left inexcusable. 1. This song, if rightly improved, might be a means to prevent their apostasy. 2. If this song did not prevent their apostasy, yet it might help to bring them to repentance. When their troubles come upon them, this song shall not be forgotten, but may serve as a glass to show them their own faces, that they may humble themselves, and return to him from whom they have revolted. Note, Those for whom God has mercy in store he may leave to fall, yet he will provide means for their recovery. Medicines are prepared beforehand for their cure.

Verses 22–30

Here, I. The charge is given to Joshua, which God had said (v. 14) he would give him. Joshua had now heard from God so much of the wickedness of the people whom he was to have the conduct of as could not but be a discouragement to him: "Nay," says God, "how bad soever they are, thou shalt go through thy undertaking, for I will be with thee. Therefore be of good courage."

II. The solemn delivery of the book of the law to the Levites, to be deposited in the side of the ark, is here again related (v. 24–26). Only they are here directed where to treasure up this precious original, not in the ark (there only the two tables were preserved), but in another box by the side of the ark. It is probable that this was the very book that was found in the house of the Lord (having been somehow or other misplaced) in the days of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 14).

III. The song which follows in the next chapter is here delivered to Moses, and by him to the people. 1. He declares what little joy he had had of them while he was with them, v. 27. Their rebellions against himself he makes no mention of: these he had long since forgiven and forgotten; but they must be made to hear of their rebellions against God, that they may be ever repented of and never repeated. 2. What little hopes he had of them now that he was leaving them. I know that after my death you will utterly corrupt yourselves. Thus our Lord Jesus, a little before his death, foretold the rise of false Christs and false prophets (Matt. xxiv. 24), notwithstanding which, and all the apostasies of the latter times, we may be confident that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church, for the foundation of God stands sure.

CHAP. XXXII

In this chapter we have, I. The song which Moses, by the appointment of God, delivered to the children of Israel. 1. The preface, ver. 1, 2. 2. A high character of God, and, in opposition to that, a bad character of the people of Israel, ver. 3–6. 3. A rehearsal of the great things God had done for them, and in opposition to that an account of their ill carriage towards him, ver. 7–18. 4. A prediction of the wasting destroying judgments which God would bring upon them for their sins, ver. 19–33. 5. A promise of the destruction of their enemies and oppressors at last, and the glorious deliverance of a remnant of Israel, ver. 36–43. II. The exhortation with which Moses delivered this song to them, ver. 44–47. III. The orders God gives to Moses to go up to Mount Nebo and die, ver. 48, &c.

Verses 1–6

Here is, I. A commanding preface or introduction to this song of Moses, v. 1, 2. He begins, 1. With a solemn appeal to heaven and earth concerning the truth and importance of what he was about to say, and the justice of the divine proceedings against a rebellious and backsliding people. Heaven and earth will be witnesses against sinners, witnesses of the warning given them and of their refusal to take the warning (see Job xx. 27). 2. He begins with a solemn application of what he was about to say to the people (v. 2): My doctrine shall drop as the rain. "It shall be a beating sweeping rain to the rebellious"; so one of the Chaldee paraphrasts expounds the first clause. Rain is sometimes sent for judgment, and the word of God, while to some it is so refreshing —a savour of life unto life, is to others terrifying. It shall be as a sweet and comfortable dew to those who are rightly prepared to receive it. Observe, (1) The subject of this song is doctrine; he had given them a song of praise and thanksgiving (Exod. xv.), but this is a song of instruction, for in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, we are not only to give glory to God, but to teach and admonish one another, Col. iii. 16. Hence many of David's psalms are entitled Maschil—to give instruction. (2) This doctrine is fitly compared to rain and showers which come from above, to make the earth fruitful. (3) He promises that his doctrine shall drop and distil as the dew, and the small rain, which descend silently and without noise. The word preached is likely to profit when it comes gently, and sweetly insinuates itself into the hearts and affections of the hearers. (4) He bespeaks their acceptance and entertainment of it.

II. An awful declaration of the greatness and righteousness of God, v. 3, 4.

1. He begins with this, and lays it down as his first principle. To justify God in his dealings with them; we must abide by it, that God is righteous, even when his judgments are a great deep, Jer. xii. 1; Ps. xxxvi. 6.

2. Moses here sets himself to publish the name of the Lord (v. 3), that Israel might never be such fools as to exchange him for a false god. It will be of great use to us for the preventing of sin, and the preserving of us in the way of our duty, always to keep up high and honourable thoughts of God, and to take all occasions to express them: Ascribe greatness to our God. Now, when Moses would set forth the greatness of God, he does it, not by explaining his eternity and immensity, or describing the brightness of his glory in the upper world, but by showing the faithfulness of his word, the perfection of his works, and the wisdom and equity of all the administrations of his government; for in these his glory shines most clearly to us, and these are the things revealed concerning him, which belong to us and our children, v. 4. (1) He is the rock. God is the rock, for he is in himself immutable, immovable, and he is to all that seek him and fly to him an impenetrable shelter, and to all that trust in him an everlasting foundation. (2) His work is perfect. His work of creation was so, all very good; his works of providence are so, or will be so in due time, and when the mystery of God shall be finished the perfection of his works will appear to all the world. Nothing that God does can be mended, Eccl. iii. 14. God was now perfecting what he had promised and begun for his people Israel. (3) All his ways are judgment. The ends of his ways are all righteous, and he is wise in the choice of the means in order to those ends. Judgment signifies both prudence and justice. (4) He is a God of truth, whose word we may take and rely upon, for he cannot lie who is faithful to all his promises, nor shall his threatenings fall to the ground. (5) He is without iniquity, one who never cheated any that trusted in him, never wronged any that appealed to his justice, nor ever was hard upon any that cast themselves upon his mercy. (6) Just and right is he. As he will not wrong any by punishing them more than they deserve, so he will not fail to recompense all those that serve him or suffer for him.

III. A high charge exhibited against the Israel of God, whose character was in all respects the reverse of that of the God of Israel, v. 5. 1. They have corrupted themselves. 2. Their spot is not the spot of his children. Even God's children have their spots, while they are in this imperfect state; for if we say we have no sin, no spot, we deceive ourselves. But the sin of Israel was none of those; it was not an infirmity which they strove against, watched and prayed against, but an evil which their hearts were fully set in them to do. For, 3. They were a perverse and crooked generation, that were actuated by a spirit of contradiction, and therefore would do what was forbidden because it was forbidden.

IV. A pathetic expostulation with this provoking people for their ingratitude (v. 6): Do you thus requite the Lord? 1. He reminds them of the obligations God had laid upon them to serve him, and to cleave to him. He had been a Father to them. And are not our obligations, as baptized Christians, equally great and strong to our Creator that made us, our Redeemer that bought us, and our Sanctifier that has established us? 2. Hence he infers the evil of deserting him and rebelling against him. For, (1) It was base ingratitude. (2) It was prodigious madness.

Verses 7–14

Moses, having in general represented God to them as their great benefactor, in these verses gives particular instances of God's kindness to them and concern for them. 1. Some instances were ancient, and for proof of them he appeals to the records (v. 7): Remember the days of old. Note, The authentic histories of ancient times are of singular use, and especially the history of the church in its infancy, both the Old Testament and the New Testament church. 2. Others were more modern, and for proof of them he appeals to their fathers and elders that were now alive and with them.

Three things are here enlarged upon as instances of God's kindness to his people Israel.

I. The early designation of the land of Canaan for their inheritance; for herein it was a type and figure of our heavenly inheritance, that it was of old ordained and prepared in the divine counsels, v. 8. Observe,

1. When the earth was divided among the sons of men, God had Israel in his thoughts.

2. The reason given for the particular care God took for this people, so long before they were either born or thought of (as I may say), in our world, does yet more magnify the kindness, and make it obliging beyond expression (v. 9): For the Lord's portion is his people.

II. The forming of them into a people, that they might be fit to enter upon this inheritance, like an heir of age, at the time appointed of the Father. And herein also Canaan was a figure of the heavenly inheritance; for, as it was from eternity proposed and designed for all God's spiritual Israel, so they are, in time (and it is a work of time), fitted and made meet for it, Col. i. 12. A great deal was done to model this people, to cast them into some shape, and to fit them for the great things designed for them in the land of promise.

1. He found him in a desert land, v. 10. This refers, no doubt, to the wilderness through which God brought them to Canaan, and in which he took so much pains with them; it is called the church in the wilderness, Acts vii. 38. There it was born, and nursed, and educated. (1) Their condition was forlorn. Egypt was to them a desert land, and a waste howling wilderness, for they were bond-slaves in it. (2) Their disposition was very unpromising. So ignorant were the generality of them in divine things, so stupid and unapt to receive the impressions of them, so peevish and humoursome, that they might well be said to be found in a desert land.

2. He led him about and instructed him. When God had them in the wilderness he did not bring them directly to Canaan, but made them go a great way about, and so he instructed them. Learners must have time to learn. By this means he tried their faith, and patience, and dependence upon God, and inured them to the hardships of the wilderness, and so instructed them. Every stage had something in it that was instructive. We may well imagine how unfit that people would have been for Canaan had they not first gone through the discipline of the wilderness.

3. He kept him as the apple of his eye, with all the care and tenderness that could be, from the malignant influences of an open sky and air, and all the perils of an inhospitable desert. The pillar of cloud and fire was both a guide and a guard to them.

4. He did that for them which the eagle does for her nest of young, v. 11, 12. The similitude was touched upon, Exod. xix. 4, I bore you on eagles' wings; here it is enlarged upon. The eagle is observed to have a strong affection for her young, by protecting them and making provision for them, by educating them and teaching them to fly. For this purpose she stirs them out of the nest where they lie dozing, flutters over them, to show them how they must use their wings, and then accustoms them to fly upon her wings till they have learnt to fly upon their own. This, by the way, is an example to parents to train up their children to business, and not to indulge them in idleness and the love of ease. God did thus by Israel; when they were in love with their slavery, and loth to leave it, God, by Moses, stirred them up to aspire after liberty. He carried them out of Egypt, led them into the wilderness, and now at length had led them through it.

III. The settling of them in a good land. This was done in part already, in the happy planting of the two tribes and a half, an earnest of what would speedily and certainly be done for the rest of the tribes, with great plenty of all good things. Honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock. Ainsworth makes the plenty of good things in Canaan to be a figure of the fruitfulness of Christ's kingdom, and the heavenly comforts of his word and Spirit: for the children of his kingdom he has butter and milk, the sincere milk of the word; and strong meat for strong men, with the wine that makes glad the heart.

Verses 15–18

We have here a description of the apostasy of Israel from God, which would shortly come to pass, and to which already they had a disposition. Here are two great instances of their wickedness.

I. Security and sensuality, pride and insolence, and the other common abuses of plenty and prosperity, v. 15. They kicked; they grew proud and insolent, and lifted up the heel even against God himself. They kicked against the goad, as an untamed heifer, or a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, and in their rage persecuted the prophets, and flew in the face of providence itself.

II. Idolatry was the great instance of their apostasy, and which the former led them to, as it made them sick of their religion, self-willed, and fond of changes. Observe,

1. What sort of gods they chose and offered sacrifice to, when they forsook the God that made them, v. 16, 17. Those very services which they should have done to the true God they did, (1) To strange gods, that could not pretend to have done them any kindness. (2) To new gods, that came newly up. A new god! can there be a more monstrous absurdity? (3) They were such as were no gods at all, their names the invention of men's fancies, and their images the work of men's hands. Nay, (4) They were devils. So far from being gods, they really were destroyers (so the word signifies), such as aimed to do mischief.

2. What a great affront this was to Jehovah their God. (1) It was justly interpreted a forgetting of him (v. 18): Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful. (2) It was justly resented as an inexcusable offence.

Verses 19–25

The method of this song follows the method of the predictions in the foregoing chapter.

I. He had delighted in them, but now he would reject them. Note, The nearer any are to God in profession the more noisome are they to him if they are defiled in a sinful way, Ps. cvi. 39, 40.

II. He had given them the tokens of his presence with them and his favour to them; but now he would withdraw and hide his face from them, v. 20. His hiding his face signifies his great displeasure, but here it denotes also the slowness of God's proceedings against them in a way of judgment. 1. They were froward. 2. They were faithless, and a people that could not be trusted.

III. He had done every thing to make them easy, but now the punishment here answers the sin, v. 21. 1. They had provoked God with despicable deities which were not gods at all. 2. God would therefore plague them with despicable enemies. The more base the people were that tyrannised over them the more barbarous they would be (none so insolent as a beggar on horseback).

IV. He had planted them in a good land, and replenished them with all good things; but now he would strip them of all their comforts, and bring them to ruin. The particular judgments here threatened are, 1. Famine. 2. Pestilence. 3. The insults of the inferior creatures: the teeth of beasts and the poison of serpents, v. 24. 4. War and the fatal consequences of it, v. 25.

Verses 26–38

After many terrible threatenings of deserved wrath and vengeance, we have here surprising intimations of mercy, undeserved mercy, which rejoices against judgment, and by which it appears that God has no pleasure in the death of sinners, but would rather they should turn and live.

I. In jealousy for his own honour, he will not make a full end of them, v. 26–28. Mercy prevails for the sparing of a remnant and the saving of that unworthy people from utter ruin: I feared the wrath of the enemy. It is an expression after the manner of men; it is certain that God fears no man's wrath, but he acted in this matter as if he had feared it. He needed not Moses to plead it with him, but reminded himself of it: What will the Egyptians say? How much soever we deserve to be disgraced, God will never disgrace the throne of his glory.

II. In concern for their welfare, he earnestly desires their conversion. God delights not to see sinners ruin themselves, but desires they will help themselves; and, if they will, he is ready to help them. It will contribute much to the return of sinners to God, seriously to consider the latter end, or the future state. It is here meant particularly of that which God by Moses had foretold concerning this people in the latter days: but it may be applied more generally.

III. He calls to mind the great things he had done for them formerly, as a reason why he should not quite cast them off. This seems to be the meaning of (v. 30, 31), "How should one Israelite have been too hard for a thousand Canaanites, as they have been many a time, but that God, who is greater than all gods, fought for them!" And so it corresponds with, Isa. lxiii. 10, 11. When he was turned to be their enemy, as here, and fought against them for their sins, then he remembered the days of old, saying, Where is he that brought them out of the sea? God would soon have subdued their enemies (Ps. lxxxi. 14), but that the wickedness of Israel delivered them into their hands.

IV. He resolves upon the destruction of those at last that had been their persecutors and oppressors. God will in due time bring down the church's enemies.

1. In displeasure against their wickedness, which he takes notice of, and keeps an account of, v. 34, 35. Some understand it of the sin of Israel, especially their persecuting the prophets, which was laid up in store against them from the blood of righteous Abel, Matt. xxiii. 35. However, it teaches us that the wickedness of the wicked is all laid up in store with God.

2. He will do it in compassion to his own people, who, though they had greatly provoked him, yet stood in relation to him, and their misery appealed to his mercy (v. 36). This plainly points at the deliverances God wrought for Israel by the judges out of the hands of those to whom he had sold them for their sins (see Judges ii. 11–18), and how his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel (Judges x. 16), and this when they were reduced to the last extremity. God helped them when they could not help themselves.

3. He will do it in contempt and to the reproach of the idol-gods, v. 37, 38. Where are their gods? Two ways it may be understood:—(1) That God would do that for his people which the idols they had served could not do for them. Or, (2) That God would do that against his enemies which the idols they had served could not save them from. Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar boldly challenged the God of Israel to deliver his worshippers (Isa. xxxvii. 10; Dan. iii. 15), and he did deliver them, to the confusion of their enemies. But the God of Israel challenged Bel and Nebo to deliver their worshippers, to rise up and help them, and to be their protection (Isa. xlvii. 12, 13); but they were so far from helping them that they themselves, that is, their images, which was all that was of them, went into captivity, Isa. xlvi. 1, 2.

This conclusion of the song speaks three things:—

I. Glory to God, v. 39. The great God here demands the glory, 1. Of a self-existence: I, even I, am he. Thus Moses concludes with the name of God by which he was first made to know him (Exod. iii. 14), "I am that I am. I am he that I have been, that I will be, that I have promised to be, that I have threatened to be; all shall find me true to my word." The Targum of Uzzielides paraphrases it thus: When the Word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, See that I now am what I am, and have been, and I am what I will be, which we know very well how to apply to him who said to John, I am he who is, and was, and is to come, Rev. i. 8. These words, I, even, I, am he, we meet with often in those chapters of Isaiah where God is encouraging his people to hope for their deliverance out of Babylon, Isa. xli. 4; xliii. 11, 13, 25; xlvi. 4. 2. Of a sole supremacy. "There is no god with me. None to help with me, none to cope with me." See Isa. xliii. 10, 11. 3. Of an absolute sovereignty, a universal agency: I kill, and I make alive. 4. Of an irresistible power.

II. Terror to his enemies, v. 40–42. Terror indeed to those that hate him, as all those do that serve other gods, that persist in wilful disobedience to the divine law, and that malign and persecute his faithful servants. In order to alarm such in time to repent. 1. The divine sentence is ratified with an oath (v. 40): He lifts up his hand to heaven, the habitation of his holiness; this was an ancient and very significant sign used in swearing, Gen. xiv. 22. The sin of sinners shall be their ruin if they go on in it. 2. Preparation is made for the execution: The glittering sword is whet. See Ps. vii. 12. 3. The execution itself will be very terrible.

III. Comfort to his own people (v. 43): Rejoice, O you nations, with his people. He concludes the song with words of joy; for in God's Israel there is a remnant whose end will be peace. God's people will rejoice at last, will rejoice everlastingly. Three things are here mentioned as matter of joy:—1. The enlarging of the church's bounds. The apostle applies the first words of this verse to the conversion of the Gentiles. Rom. xv. 10, Rejoice you Gentiles with his people. 2. The avenging of the church's controversies upon her adversaries. 3. The mercy God has in store for his church, and for all that belong to it: He will be merciful to his land, and to his people, that is, to all everywhere that fear and serve him.

Verses 44–52

Here is, I. The solemn delivery of this song to the children of Israel, v. 44, 45. Moses spoke it to as many as could hear him, while Joshua, in another assembly at the same time, delivered it to as many as his voice would reach. Though they changed their commander, there was no change in the divine command; Joshua, as well as Moses, would be a witness against them if ever they forsook God.

II. An earnest charge to them to mind these and all the rest of the good words that Moses had said to them.

1. The duties he charges upon them are, (1) Carefully to attend to these themselves: "Set your hearts both to the laws, and to the promises and threatenings, the blessings and curses, and now at last to this song." (2) Faithfully to transmit these things to those that should come after them. Those that are good themselves cannot but desire that their children may be so likewise.

2. The arguments he uses to persuade them to make religion their business and to persevere in it are, (1) The vast importance of the things themselves which he had charged upon them (v. 47): "It is not a vain thing, because it is your life. It is not an indifferent thing, but of absolute necessity. (2) The vast advantage it would be of to them: Through this thing you shall prolong your days in Canaan, which is a typical promise of that eternal life which Christ has assured us those shall enter into that keep the commandments of God, Matt. xix. 17.

III. Orders given to Moses concerning his death. Now that this renowned witness for God had finished his testimony, he must go up to Mount Nebo and die. Orders were given to Moses that self-same day, v. 48. Now that he had done his work, why should he desire to live a day longer? He had indeed formerly prayed that he might go over Jordan, but now he is entirely satisfied, and, as God had bidden him, saith no more of that matter. 1. God here reminds him of the sin he had been guilty of, for which he was excluded Canaan (v. 51). 2. He reminds him of the death of his brother Aaron (v. 50), to make his own the more familiar and the less formidable. 3. He sends him up to a high hill, thence to take a view of the land of Canaan and then die, v. 49, 50. The remembrance of his sin might make death terrible, but the sight God gave him of Canaan took off the terror of it, as it was a token of God's being reconciled to him, and a plain indication to him that though his sin shut him out of the earthly Canaan, yet it should not deprive him of that better country which in this world can only be seen, and that with an eye of faith.

CHAP. XXXIII

Yet Moses has not done with the children of Israel. He had preached them a farewell sermon. After sermon he had given out a psalm, and now nothing remains but to dismiss them with a blessing; that blessing he pronounces in this chapter in the name of the Lord, and so leaves them. I. He pronounces them all blessed in what God had done for them already, especially in giving them his law, ver. 2–5. II. He pronounces a blessing upon each tribe, which is both a prayer for and a prophecy of their felicity. 1. Reuben, ver. 6. 2 Judah, ver. 7. 3. Levi, ver. 8–11. 4. Benjamin, ver. 12. 5. Joseph, ver. 13–17. 6. Zebulun and Issachar, ver. 18, 19. 7. Gad, ver. 20, 21. 8. Dan, ver. 22. 9. Naphtali, ver. 23. 10. Asher, ver. 24, 25 III. He pronounces them all in general blessed if they were obedient, ver 26, &c.

Verses 1–5

The first verse is the title of the chapter: it is a blessing. In the foregoing chapter he had thundered out the terrors of the Lord against Israel for their sin. Now that he might not seem to part in anger, he here subjoins a blessing. Thus Christ's last work on earth was to bless his disciples (Luke xxiv. 50), like Moses here, in token of parting as friends. Moses blessed them, 1. As a prophet—a man of God. 2. As a parent to Israel; for so good princes are to their subjects. Jacob upon his death-bed blessed his sons (Gen. xlix. 1), in conformity to whose example Moses here blesses the tribes that were descended from them. He desired their happiness, though he must die and not share in it.

He begins his blessing with a lofty description of the glorious appearances of God to them in giving them the law, and the great advantage they had by it.

I. There was a visible and illustrious discovery of the divine majesty, enough to convince and for ever silence atheists and infidels, to awaken and affect those that were most stupid and careless, and to put to shame all secret inclinations to other gods, v. 2. His retinue was glorious; he came with his holy myriads, as Enoch had long since foretold he should come in the last day to judge the world, Jude 14. Hence the law is said to be given by the disposition of angels, Acts vii. 53; Heb. ii. 2.

II. He gave them his law, which is, 1. Called a fiery law, because it was given them out of the midst of the fire (Deut. iv. 33), and because it works like fire; if it be received, it is melting, warming, purifying, and burns up the dross of corruption; if it be rejected, it hardens, sears, torments, and destroys. The Spirit descended in cloven tongues as of fire; for the gospel also is a fiery law. 2. It is said to go from his right hand, to denote the power and energy of the law and the divine strength that goes along with it, that it may not return void. It came as a gift to them, and a precious gift it was, a righthand blessing. 3. It was an instance of the special kindness he had for them: Yea, he loved the people (v. 3), and therefore, though it was a fiery law, yet it is said to go for them (v. 2), that is, in favour to them. Note, The law of God written in the heart is a certain evidence of the love of God shed abroad there: we must reckon God's law one of the gifts of his grace. All his saints are in his hand. They were in his hand to be covered and protected, used and disposed of, as the seven stars were in the hand of Christ, Rev. i. 16.

III. He disposed them to receive the law which he gave them: They sat down at thy feet, as scholars at the feet of their master, in token of reverence, in attendance and humble submission to what is taught; so Israel sat at the foot of Mount Sinai, and promised to hear and do whatever God should say. Every one then stood ready to receive God's words, and did so again when the law was publicly read to them, as Josh. viii. 34.

1. They are taught to speak with great respect of the law, and to call it the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob.

2. They are taught to speak with great respect of Moses; and they were the more obliged to keep up his name because he had not provided for the keeping of it up in his family; his posterity were never called the sons of Moses, as the priests were the sons of Aaron.

Verses 6–7

Here is, I. The blessing of Reuben. Though Reuben had lost the honour of his birthright, yet Moses begins with him; for we should not insult over those that are disgraced, nor desire to perpetuate marks of infamy upon any, v. 6. Moses desires and foretells, 1. The preserving of this tribe. Though a frontier tribe on the other side Jordan, yet, "Let it live, and not be either ruined by its neighbours or lost among them." And perhaps he refers to those chosen men of that tribe who, having had their lot assigned them already, left their families in it, and were now ready to go over armed before their brethren, Num. xxxii. 27. 2. The increase of this tribe: Let not his men be few; or, Let his men be a number. Let Reuben live and not die, though his men be few; so bishop Patrick thinks it may be rendered. All the Chaldee paraphrasts refer this to the other world: Let Reuben live in life eternal, and not die the second death, so Onkelos. Let Reuben live in this world, and not die that death which the wicked die in the world to come, so Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum.

II. The blessing of Judah, which is put before Levi because our Lord sprang out of Judah. The blessing (v. 7) may refer either, 1. To the whole tribe in general. Moses prays for, and prophesies, the great prosperity of that tribe. It is taken for granted that the tribe of Judah would be both a praying tribe and an active tribe. Or, 2. It may refer in particular to David, as a type of Christ, that God would hear his prayers, as that he would give him victory over his enemies, and success in his great undertakings. And that prayer that God would bring him to his people seems to refer to Jacob's prophecy concerning Shiloh, That to him should the gathering of the people be, Gen. xlix. 10. The tribe of Simeon is omitted in the blessing, because Jacob had left it under a brand, and it had never done any thing, as Levi had done, to retrieve its honour. It was lessened in the wilderness more than any other of the tribes; and Zimri, who was so notoriously guilty in the matter of Peor was of that tribe. Or, because the lot of Simeon was an appendage to that of Judah, that tribe is included in the blessing of Judah.

Verses 8–11

In blessing the tribe of Levi, Moses expresses himself more at large, not so much because it was his own tribe (for he takes no notice of his relation to it) as because it was God's tribe. The blessing of Levi has reference,

I. To the high priest, here called God's holy one (v. 8), because his office was holy, in token of which, Holiness to the Lord was written upon his forehead. 1. He seems to acknowledge that God might justly have displaced Aaron and his seed, for his sin at Meribah, Num. xx. 12. So many understand it. It seems rather probable to me that, on the contrary, he pleads with God the zeal and faithfulness of Aaron, and his boldness in stemming the tide of the people's murmurings at the other Meribah (Exod. xvii. 7). All the Chaldee paraphrasts agree that it was a trial in which he was found perfect and faithful. 2. He prays that the office of the high priest might ever remain: Let thy thummim and thy urim be with him. It was given him for some eminent piece of service, as appears, Mal. ii. 5. "Lord, let it never be taken from him." Notwithstanding this blessing, the urim and thummim were lost in the captivity, and never restored under the second temple. Thummim signifies integrity, and Urim illumination: Let these be with thy holy one, that is, "Lord, let the high priest ever be both an upright man and an understanding man." A good prayer to be put up for the ministers of the gospel, that they may have clear heads and honest hearts; light and sincerity make a complete minister.

II. To the inferior priests and Levites, v. 9–11.

1. He commends the zeal of this tribe for God when they sided with Moses (and so with God) against the worshippers of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 26, &c.). And those who not only keep themselves pure from the common iniquities of the times and places in which they live, but, as they are capable, bear testimony against them, and stand up for God against the evil-doers, shall have special marks of honour put upon them. Perhaps Moses may have an eye to the sons of Korah, who refused to join with their father in his gainsaying, Num. xxvi. 11. Also to Phinehas, who executed judgment, and stayed the plague.

2. He confirms the commission granted to this tribe to minister in holy things, which was the recompense of their zeal and fidelity, v. 10. (1) They were to deal for God with the people: "They shall teach Jacob thy judgments and Israel thy laws, both as preachers in thy religious assemblies, reading and expounding the law (Neh. viii. 7, 8), and as judges, determining doubtful and difficult cases that were brought before them," 2 Chron. xvii. 8, 9. (2) They were to deal for the people with God, in burning incense to the praise and glory of God, and offering sacrifices to make atonement for sin and to obtain the divine favour. This was the work of the priests, but the Levites attended and assisted in it.

3. He prays for them, v. 11. (1) That God would prosper them in their estates. Bless, Lord, his substance. Bless, Lord, his virtue; so some read it. "Lord, increase thy graces in them, and make them more and more fit for their work." (2) That he would accept them in their services: "Accept the work of his hands, both for himself and for the people for whom he ministers." (3) That he would take his part against all his enemies.

Verses 12–17

Here is, I. The blessing of Benjamin, v. 12. Benjamin is put next to Levi, because the temple, where the priests' work lay, was just upon the edge of the lot of this tribe; and it is put before Joseph because of the dignity of Jerusalem (part of which was in this tribe) above Samaria, which was in the tribe of Ephraim, and because Benjamin adhered to the house of David, and to the temple of the Lord, when the rest of the tribes deserted both with Jeroboam. 1. Benjamin is here called the beloved of the lord, as the father of this tribe was Jacob's beloved son, the son of his right hand. Saul the first king, and Paul the great apostle, were both of this tribe. 2. He is here assured of the divine protection: he shall dwell safely. 3. It is here intimated that the temple in which God would dwell should be built in the borders of this tribe. Jerusalem the holy city was in the lot of this tribe (Josh. xviii. 28); and though Zion, the city of David, is supposed to belong to Judah, yet Mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, was in Benjamin's lot. God is therefore said to dwell between his shoulders, because the temple stood on that mount, as the head of a man upon his shoulders.

II. The blessing of Joseph, including both Manasseh and Ephraim. In Jacob's blessing (Gen. xlix.) that of Joseph is the largest, and so it is here; and thence Moses here borrows the title he gives to Joseph (v. 16), that he was separated from his brethren. His brethren separated him from them by making him a slave, but God distinguished him from them by making him a prince.

1. Great plenty, v. 13–16. In general: Blessed of the Lord be his land. Those were very fruitful countries that fell into the lot of Ephraim and Manasseh, yet Moses prays they might be watered with the blessing of God.

(1) He enumerates many particulars which he prays may contribute to the wealth and abundance of those two tribes. He prays, [1] For seasonable rains and dews, the precious things of heaven; and so precious they are, though but pure water, that without them the fruits of the earth would all fail and be cut off. [2] For plentiful springs, which help to make the earth fruitful, called here the deep that coucheth beneath. [3] For the benign influences of the heavenly bodies (v. 14), for the precious fruits put forth by the quickening heart of the sun, and the cooling moisture of the moon. [4] For the fruitfulness even of their hills and mountains, which in other countries used to be barren (v. 15). [5] For the productions of the lower grounds (v. 16): For the precious things of the earth. Though the earth itself seems a useless worthless lump of matter, yet there are precious things produced out of it, for the support and comfort of human life. Some make these precious things here prayed for to be figures of spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ, the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Spirit.

(2) He crowns all with the goodwill, or favourable acceptance, of him that dwelt in the bush (v. 16), that is, of God, that God who appeared to Moses in the bush that burned and was not consumed (Exod. iii. 2), to give him his commission for the bringing of Israel out of Egypt. Though God's glory appeared there but for a while, yet it is said to dwell there: the goodwill of the shechinah in the bush; so it might be read, for shechinah signifies that which dwelleth. Many a time God had appeared to Moses, but now that he is just dying he seems to have the most pleasing remembrance of that which was the first time, when his acquaintance with the visions of the Almighty first began: that was a time of love never to be forgotten. So that, when he prays for the goodwill of him that dwelt in the bush, he has an eye to the covenant then and there renewed, on which all our hopes of God's favour must be bottomed.

2. Great power Joseph is here blessed with, v. 17. Here are three instances of his power foretold:— (1) His authority among his brethren: His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, or young bull, which is a stately creature, and therefore was formerly used as an emblem of royal majesty. (2) His force against his enemies and victory over them: His horns are like the horn of a unicorn, that is, "The forces he shall bring into the field shall be very strong and formidable, and with them he shall push the people." (3) The numbers of his people, in which Ephraim, though the younger house, exceeded, Jacob having, in the foresight of the same thing, crossed hands, Gen. xlviii. 18. They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and the thousands of Manasseh.

Verses 18–21

Here we have, I. The blessings of Zebulun and Issachar put together, for they were both the sons of Jacob by Leah, and by their lot in Canaan they were neighbours; it is foretold,

1. That they should both have a comfortable settlement and employment, v. 18. Zebulun must rejoice, for he shall have cause to rejoice; and Moses prays that he may have cause in his going out, either to war or to sea, for Zebulun was a haven of ships, Gen. xlix. 13. And Issachar must rejoice in his tents, that is, in his business at home, his husbandry, to which the men of that tribe generally confined themselves. Observe here, (1) That the providence of God, as it variously appoints the bounds of men's habitation, some in the city and some in the country, some in the seaports and some in the inland towns, so it wisely disposes men's inclinations to different employments. The genius of some men leads them to a book, of others to the sea, of others to the sword; some are inclined to rural affairs, others to trade, and some have a turn for mechanics; and it is well it is so. If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? 1 Cor. xii. 17. It was for the common good of Israel that the men of Zebulun were merchants and that the men of Issachar were husbandmen. (2) That whatever our place and business are it is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to them, and it is a great happiness to be well pleased with them.

2. That they should both be serviceable in their places to the honour of God and the interests of religion in the nation (v. 19). It has been often observed that though those that with Zebulun dwell in the haven of ships, which are places of concourse, have commonly more of the light of religion, those that with Issachar dwell in tents in the country have more of the life and heat of it. (1) It is here foretold that both these tribes should grow rich. Zebulun that goes abroad shall suck of the abundance of the seas, which are full breasts to the merchants, while Issachar, that tarries at home, shall enrich himself with treasures hid in the sands, either the fruits of the earth or the underground treasures of metals and minerals, or (because the word for sand here signifies properly the sand of the sea) the rich things thrown up by the sea, for the lot of Issachar reached to the sea-side. (2) It is foretold, that these tribes, being thus enriched, should consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth, Mic. iv. 13.

II. The blessing of the tribe of Gad comes next, v. 20, 21. This was one of the tribes that was already seated on that side Jordan where Moses now was.

1. He foretells what this tribe would be, v. 20. (1) That it would be enlarged, as at present it had a spacious allotment. We find how this tribe was enlarged by their success in a war which it seems they carried on very religiously against the Hagarites, 1 Chron. v. 19, 20, 22. (2) That it would be a valiant and victorious tribe, would, if let alone, dwell secure and fearless as a lion; but, if provoked, would, like a lion, tear the arm with the crown of the head; that is, would pull in pieces all that stood in his way, both the arm (that is, the strength) and the crown of the head (that is, the policy and authority) of his enemies.

2. He commends this tribe for what they had done and were now doing, v. 21.

Here is, I. The blessing of Dan, v. 22. Jacob in his blessing had compared him to a serpent for subtlety; Moses compares him to a lion for courage and resolution: and what could stand before those that had the head of a serpent and the heart of a lion? He is compared to the lions that leaped from Bashan, a mountain noted for fierce lions, whence they came down to leap upon their prey in the plains. A party of them, upon information brought them of the security of Laish, which lay in the furthest part of the land of Canaan from them, surprised it, and soon made themselves masters of it. See Judges xviii. 27. And, the mountains of Bashan lying not far from that city, probably thence they made their descent upon it; and therefore are here said to leap from Bashan.

II. The blessing of Naphtali, v. 23. He looks upon this tribe with wonder, and applauds it: "O Naphtali, thou art happy, thou shalt be so, mayest thou be ever so!" Jacob had described this tribe to be, generally, courteous obliging people, giving goodly words, as the loving hind, Gen. xlix. 21. Now what should they get by being so? Moses here tells them they should have an interest in the affections of their neighbours, and be satisfied with favour. "The portion of the tribe of Naphtali" (the Jews say) "was so fruitful, and the productions so forward, though it lay north, that those of that tribe were generally the first that brought their first-fruits to the temple; and so they had first the blessing from the priest, which was the blessing of the Lord." Capernaum, in which Christ chiefly resided, lay in this tribe. Be thou in possession of the sea and the south; so it may be read, that is, of that sea which shall lie south of thy lot, that was the sea of Galilee, which we so often read of in the gospels, directly north of which the lot of this tribe lay, and which was of great advantage to this tribe, witness the wealth of Capernaum and Bethsaida.

III. The blessing of Asher, v. 24, 25. Four things he prays for and prophecies concerning this tribe, which carries blessedness in its name; for Leah called the father of it Asher, saying Happy am I, Gen. xxx. 13. 1. The increase of their numbers. 2. Their interest in their neighbours: Let him be acceptable to his brethren. 3. The richness of their land. (1) Above ground: Let him dip his foot in oil, that is, "Let him have such plenty of it in his lot that he may not only anoint his head with it, but, if he please, wash his feet in it." (2) Under ground: Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, that is, "Thou shalt have great plenty of these metals (mines of them) in thy own ground. The Chaldee paraphrasts understand this figuratively: "Thou shalt be strong and bright, as iron and brass." 4. The continuance of their strength and vigour: As thy days, so shall thy strength be. Many paraphrase it thus, "The strength of thy old age shall be like that of thy youth; thou shalt not feel a decay, nor be the worse for the wearing, but shalt renew thy youth; as if not thy shoes only, but thy bones, were iron and brass." Have they work appointed them? They shall have strength to do it. Have they burdens appointed them? They shall have strength to bear them; and never be tempted above that they are able.

Verses 26–29

Moses, the man of God, with his last breath magnifies both the God of Israel and the Israel of God.

I. No God like the God of Israel. None of the gods of the nations were capable of doing that for their worshippers which Jehovah did for his: There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, v. 26. 1. His sovereign power and authority: He rides upon the heavens. When he has any thing to do for his people he rides upon the heavens to do it; for he does it swiftly and strongly: no enemy can either anticipate or obstruct the progress of him that rides on the heavens. 2. His boundless eternity; he is the eternal God, and his arms are everlasting, v. 27. The gods of the heathen were but lately invented, and would shortly perish; but the God of Jeshurun is eternal: he was before all worlds, and will be when time and days shall be no more. See Hab. i. 12.

II. No people like the Israel of God. Having pronounced each tribe happy, in the close he pronounces all together very happy, so happy in all respects that there was no nation under the sun comparable to them (v. 29). If Israel honour God as a non-such God, he will favour them so as to make them a non-such people. What is here said of the church of Israel is certainly to be applied to the church of the first-born, that are written in heaven. The Christian church is the Israel of God, as the apostle calls it (Gal. vi. 16).

1. Never were people so well seated and sheltered (v. 27): The eternal God is thy refuge. Or, as the word signifies, "thy habitation, or mansion-house, in which thou art safe, and easy, and at rest, as a man in his own house." Every Israelite indeed is at home in God; the soul returns to him, and reposes in him as its resting-place (Ps. cxvi. 7), its hiding-place, Ps. xxxii. 7.

2. Never were people so well supported and borne up: Underneath are the everlasting arms; that is, the almighty power of God. The everlasting covenant, and the everlasting consolations that flow from it, are indeed everlasting arms, with which believers have been wonderfully sustained, and kept cheerful in the worst of times; divine grace is sufficient for them, 2 Cor. xii. 9.

3. Never were people so well commanded and led on to battle: "He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee by his almighty power, which will make room for thee. Thus believers are more than conquerors over their spiritual enemies, through Christ that loved them. The captain of our salvation thrust out the enemy from before us when he overcame the world and spoiled principalities and powers on the cross.

4. Never were people so well secured and protected (v. 28): Israel shall then dwell in safety alone. Those that dwell in God, and make his name their strong tower, dwell in safety; the place of their defence is the munitions of rocks, Isa. xxxiii. 16. They shall dwell in safety alone. (1) Though alone. Though they contract no alliances with their neighbours. (2) Because alone. They shall dwell in safety as long as they continue pure, and unmixed with the heathen.

5. Never were people so well provided for: The fountain of Jacob (that is, the present generation of that people, which is as the fountain to all the streams that shall hereafter descend and be derived from it) shall now presently be fixed upon a good land. The eye of Jacob (so it might be read, for the same word signifies a fountain and an eye) is upon the land of corn and wine, just before their faces, on the other side the river.

6. Never were people so well helped. If they were in any strait, God himself rode upon the heavens for their help, v. 26. And they were a people saved by the Lord, v. 29.

7. Never were people so well armed. God himself was the shield of their help by whom they were armed defensively, and he was the sword of their excellency, by whom they were armed offensively, and made formidable.

8. Never were people so well assured of victory over their enemies: They shall be found liars unto thee; that is, "shall be forced to submit to thee sorely against their will, so that it will be but a counterfeit submission. If thy enemies be found liars to thee (so some read it), thou shalt tread upon their high places.

CHAP. XXXIV

Having read how Moses finished his testimony, we are told here how he immediately after finished his life. We have had an account of his dying words, here we have an account of his dying work, and that is work we must all do shortly, and it had need be well done. Here is, I. The view Moses had of the land of Canaan just before he died, ver. 1–4. II. His death and burial, ver. 5, 6. III. His age, ver. 7. IV. Israel's mourning for him, ver. 8. V. His successor, ver. 9. VI. His character, ver. 10, &c.

Verses 1–4

I. Moses climbing upwards towards heaven, as high as the top of Pisgah, there to die; for that was the place appointed, ch. xxxii. 49, 50. Israel lay encamped upon the flat grounds in the plains of Moab, and thence he went up, according to order, to the mountain of Nebo, to the highest point or ridge of that mountain, which was called Pisgah, v. 1. Pisgah is an appellative name for all such eminences. It should seem Moses went up alone to the top of Pisgah, alone without help. When he had made an end of blessing Israel, we may suppose, he solemnly took leave of Joshua, and Eleazar, and the rest of his friends, who probably brought him to the foot of the hill; but then he gave them such a charge as Abraham gave to his servants at the foot of another hill: Tarry you here while I go yonder and die. 1. To show that he was willing to die. When he knew the place of his death, he was so far from avoiding it that he cheerfully mounted a steep hill to come at it. 2. To show that he looked upon death as his ascension. The soul of a man, of a good man, when it leaves the body, goes upwards (Eccles. iii. 21). When God's servants are sent for out of the world, the summons runs thus, Go up and die.

II. Moses looking downward again towards this earth, to see the earthly Canaan into which he must never enter, but therein by faith looking forwards to the heavenly Canaan into which he should now immediately enter. 1. If he went up alone to the top of Pisgah, yet he was not alone, for the Father was with him, John xvi. 32. 2. Note, All the pleasant prospects we have of the better country we are beholden to the grace of God for; it is he that gives the spirit of wisdom as well as the spirit of revelation, the eye as well as the object. 3. He saw it at a distance. Such a sight believers now have, through grace, of the bliss and glory of their future state. The word and ordinances are to them what Mount Pisgah was to Moses. 4. He saw it, but must never enjoy it. Glorious things are spoken of the kingdom of Christ in the latter days, its advancement, enlargement, and flourishing state; we foresee it, but we are not likely to live to see it. Those that shall come after us, we hope, will enter that promised land, which is a comfort to us. 5. Canaan was Immanuel's land (Isa. viii. 8), so that in viewing it he had a view of the blessings we enjoy by Christ.

Verses 5–8

Here is, I. The death of Moses (v. 5): Moses the servant of the Lord died. It bore hard upon Moses himself, when he had gone through all the fatigues of the wilderness, to be prevented from enjoying the pleasures of Canaan. But the man Moses was very meek; God will have it so, and he cheerfully submits. 1. He is here called the servant of the Lord, not only as a good man (all the saints are God's servants), but as a useful man, eminently useful, who had served God's counsels in bringing Israel out of Egypt, and leading them through the wilderness. 2. Yet he dies. Neither his piety nor his usefulness would exempt him from the stroke of death. God's servants must die that they may rest from their labours, receive their recompense, and make room for others. When God's servants are removed, and must serve him no longer on earth, they go to serve him better, to serve him day and night in his temple. He dies according to the word of the Lord. At the mouth of the Lord; so the word is. The Jews say, "with a kiss from the mouth of God." Note, The servants of the Lord, when they have done all their other work, must die at last, in obedience to their Master, and be freely willing to go home whenever he sends for them, Acts xxi. 13.

II. His burial, v. 6. God takes care of the dead bodies of his servants; as their death is precious, so is their dust, but the covenant with it shall be remembered. He was buried in a valley over against Beth-peor. If the soul be at rest with God, the matter is not great where the body rests. The particular place was not known, lest the children of Israel, who were so very prone to idolatry, should have enshrined and worshipped the dead body of Moses, that great founder and benefactor of their nation.

III. His age, v. 7. His life was prolonged, 1. To old age. He was 120 years old, which, though far short of the years of the patriarchs, yet much exceeded the years of most of his contemporaries. The years of the life of Moses were three forties. The first forty he lived a courtier, at ease and in honour in Pharaoh's court; the second forty he lived a poor desolate shepherd in Midian; the third forty he lived a king in Jeshurun, in honour and power, but encumbered with a great deal of care and toil. 2. To a good old age: His eye was not dim (as Isaac's, Gen. xxvii. 1, and Jacob's, Gen. xlviii. 10), nor was his natural force abated.

IV. The solemn mourning that there was for him, v. 8. Observe, 1. Who the mourners were: The children of Israel. 2. How long they mourned: Thirty days. Yet the ending of the days of weeping and mourning for Moses is an intimation that, how great soever our losses have been, we must not abandon ourselves to perpetual grief; we must suffer the wound at least to heal up in time. If we hope to go to heaven rejoicing, why should we resolve to go to the grave mourning?

Verses 9–12

A very honourable encomium passed both on Moses and Joshua; each has his praise, and should have. Let God be glorified in both.

I. Joshua is praised as a man admirably qualified for the work to which he was called, v. 9. Moses brought Israel to the borders of Canaan and then died and left them, to signify that the law made nothing perfect, Heb. vii. 19. It brings men into a wilderness of conviction, but not into the Canaan of rest and settled peace. It is an honour reserved for Joshua (our Lord Jesus, of whom Joshua was a type) to do that for us which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, Rom. viii. 3. Through him we enter into rest, the spiritual rest of conscience and eternal rest in heaven. Two things concurred to clear Joshua's call to this great undertaking:— 1. God fitted him for it: He was full of the spirit of wisdom. Conduct is as requisite in a general as courage. 2. Moses, by the divine appointment, had ordained him to it: He had laid his hands upon him, so substituting him to be his successor, and praying to God to qualify him for the service to which he had called him.

II. Moses is praised (v. 10–12), and with good reason.

1. He was indeed a very great man, especially upon two accounts:—(1) His intimacy with the God of nature: God knew him face to face, and so he knew God. See Num. xii. 8. (2) His interest and power in the kingdom of nature. The miracles of judgment he wrought in Egypt before Pharaoh, and his miracles of mercy he wrought in the wilderness before Israel, served to demonstrate that he was a particular favourite of Heaven, and had an extraordinary commission to act as he did on this earth. Never was there any man whom Israel had more reason to love, or whom the enemies of Israel had more reason to fear.

2. He was greater than any other of the prophets of the Old Testament. Though they were men of great interest in heaven and great influence upon earth, yet they were none of them to be compared with this great man; none of them either so evidenced or executed a commission from heaven as Moses did. This encomium of Moses seems to have been written long after his death, yet then there had not arisen any prophet like unto Moses. By Moses God gave the law, and moulded and formed the Jewish church; by the other prophets he only sent particular reproofs, directions, and predictions. The last of the prophets concludes with a charge to remember the law of Moses, Mal. iv. 4. Christ himself often appealed to the writings of Moses, and vouched him for a witness, as one that saw his day at a distance and spoke of him. Moses was faithful as a servant, but Christ as a Son. The history of Moses leaves him buried in the plains of Moab, and concludes with the period of his government; but the history of our Saviour leaves him sitting at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and we are assured that of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end.

AN EXPOSITION OF

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA

I. We have now before us the history of the Jewish nation in this book and those that follow it to the end of the book of Esther. They were part of the oracles of God, which were committed to the Jews, and were so received and referred to by our Saviour and the apostles.

In the five books of Moses we had a very full account of the rise, advance, and constitution, of the Old-Testament church, the family out of which it was raised, the promise, that great charter by which it was incorporated, the miracles by which it was built up, and the laws and ordinances by which it was to be governed. A nation that had statutes and judgments so righteous, one would think, should have been very holy; and very happy. But, alas! a great part of the history is a melancholy representation of their sins and miseries; if we compare the history of the Christian church with its constitution, we shall find the same cause for wonder, so many have been its errors and corruptions; for neither does the gospel make any thing perfect in this world, but leaves us still in expectation of a better hope in the future state.

II. We have next before us the book of Joshua, so called, perhaps, not because it was written by him, for that is uncertain. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that Phinehas wrote it. Bishop Patrick is clear that Joshua wrote it himself. However that be, it is written concerning him, and, if any other wrote it, it was collected out of his journals or memoirs. It contains the history of Israel under the command and government of Joshua, how he presided as general of their armies, 1. In their entrance into Canaan, ch. i–v. 2. In their conquest of Canaan, ch. vi.–xii. 3. In the distribution of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel, ch. xiii.–xxi. 4. In the settlement and establishment of religion among them, ch. xxii.–xxiv. We may see in it, 1. Much of God and his providence—his power, his justice, his faithfulness, and his kindness to his people Israel, notwithstanding their provocations. 2. Much of Christ and his grace. Though Joshua is not expressly mentioned in the New Testament as a type of Christ, yet all agree that he was a very eminent one. He bore our Saviour's name, as did also another type of him, Joshua the high priest, Zech. vi. 11, 12. The LXX, giving the name of Joshua a Greek termination, calls him all along Ἰησοῦς, Jesus, and so he is called Acts vii. 45, and Heb. iv. 8. It signifies, He shall save. Joshua saves God's people from the Canaanites; our Lord Jesus saves them from their sins. Christ, as Joshua, is the captain of our salvation, a leader and commander of the people, to tread Satan under their feet, to put them in possession of the heavenly Canaan, and to give them rest, which (it is said, Heb. iv. 8) Joshua did not.

CHAP. I

In this chapter, I. God appoints him to the government in the stead of Moses, gives him an ample commission, full instructions, and great encouragements, ver. 1–9. II. He accepts the government, and addresses himself immediately to the business of it, giving orders to the officers of the people in general, ver. 10, 11, and particularly to the two tribes and a half, ver. 12–15. III. The people agree to it, and take an oath of fealty to him, ver. 16–18.

Verses 1–9

Honour is here put upon Joshua, and great power lodged in his hand, by him that is the fountain of honour and power, and by whom kings reign. God speaks to him (v. 1), probably as he spoke to Moses (Lev. i. 1) out of the tabernacle of the congregation, for his greater encouragement, God here speaks to him immediately, some think in a dream or vision (as Job xxxiii. 15). Concerning Joshua's call observe here,

I. The time when it was given him: After the death of Moses. As soon as ever Moses was dead, Joshua took upon him the administration, by virtue of his solemn ordination in Moses's life-time. God did not speak to him to go forward towards Canaan till after the thirty days of mourning for Moses were ended; God would give time to the people not only to lament their loss of him, but to repent of their miscarriages towards him.

II. The place Joshua had been in before he was thus preferred. He was Moses's minister, that is, an assistant in business. The LXX translate it ὑποσύργος, a workman under his direction. Observe, 1. He had been long bred to business. 2. He was trained up in subjection and under command. Those are fittest to rule that have learnt to obey. 3. He that was to succeed Moses was intimately acquainted with him, that he might take the same measures, walk in the same spirit, having to carry on the same work. 4. He was herein a type of Christ, who might therefore be called Moses's minister, because he was made under the law and fulfilled all the righteousness of it.

III. The call itself that God gave him,

1. The consideration upon which he was called to the government: Moses my servant is dead, v. 2. Moses, when he has done his work as a servant, dies and goes to rest from his labours, and enters into the joy of his Lord.

2. The call itself. Now therefore arise. (1) "Though Moses is dead, the work must go on; therefore arise, and go about it." When God has work to do, he will either find or make instruments fit to carry it on. Moses the servant is dead, but God the Master is not: he lives for ever. (2) "Because Moses is dead, therefore the work devolves upon thee as his successor." Joshua must arise to finish what Moses began. Thus the latter generations enter into the labours of the former. And thus Christ, our Joshua, does that for us which could never be done by the law of Moses, —justifies (Acts xiii. 39), and sanctifies, Romans viii. 3. The life of Moses made way for Joshua, and prepared the people for what was to be done by him. Thus the law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ.

3. The particular service he was now called out to: "Arise, go over this Jordan, this river which you have in view, and on the banks of which you lie encamped." This was a trial to the faith of Joshua. He had no pontoons or bridge of boats by which to convey them over, and yet he must believe that God, who had ordered them over, would open a way for them. Going over Jordan was going into Canaan.

4. The grant of the land of Canaan to the children of Israel is here repeated (v. 2–4): I do give it them. To the patriarchs it was promised, I will give it; but, now that the fourth generation had expired, the time had come for the performance of the promise (v. 3), I have given it; though it be yet unconquered, it is as sure to you as if it were in your hands." Observe, (1) The persons to whom the conveyance is made: To them, even to the children of Israel (v. 2), because they are the seed of Jacob, who was called

Israel at the time when this promise was made to him, Gen. xxxv. 10, 12. (2) The land itself that is conveyed: From the river Euphrates eastward, to the Mediterranean Sea westward, v. 4. Had they been obedient, God would have given them this and much more. Out of all these countries, and many others, there were in process of time proselytes to the Jewish religion, as appears, Acts ii. 5, &c. (3) The condition is here implied upon which this grant is made, in those words, as I said unto Moses, that is, "upon the terms that Moses told you of many a time, if you will keep my statutes, you shall go in and possess that good land. Take it under those provisos and limitations, and not otherwise." (4) "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon (within the following bounds) shall be your own. Do but set your foot upon it and you have it."

5. The promises God here makes to Joshua for his encouragement. (1) That he should be sure of the presence of God (v. 5): "As I was with Moses, in bringing Israel out of Egypt and leading them through the wilderness, so I will be with thee to enable thee to settle them in Canaan." What Moses did was done by virtue of the presence of God with him, and, though Joshua had not always the same presence of mind that Moses had, yet, if he had always the same presence of God, he would do well enough. Note, It is a great comfort to the rising generation of ministers and Christians that the same grace which was sufficient for those that went before them shall not be wanting to them if they be not wanting to themselves in the improvement of it. It is repeated here again (v. 9). Note, Those that go where God sends them shall have him with them wherever they go. (2) That the presence of God should never be withdrawn from him: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, v. 5. Moses had assured him of this (Deut. xxxi. 8), that, though he must now leave him, God never would: of this we may be sure, that the Lord is with us while we are with him. This promise here made to Joshua is applied to all believers. (3) That he should have victory over all the enemies of Israel (v. 5): There shall not any man that comes against thee be able to stand before thee. Note, There is no standing before those that have God on their side. If he be for us, who can be against us? (4) That he should himself have the dividing of this land among the people of Israel, v. 6. He should be of good courage, because of the bad character of the people whom he must cause to inherit that land. He knew well what a froward discontented people they were, and how unmanageable they had been in his predecessor's time.

6. The charge or command he gives to Joshua, which is,

(1) That he conform himself in every thing to the law of God, and make this his rule, v. 7, 8. God does, as it were, put the book of the law into Joshua's hand; And he is charged, [1] To meditate therein day and night. If ever any man's business might have excused him from meditation, and other acts of devotion, one would think Joshua's might at this time. It was a great trust that was lodged in his hands; the care of it was enough to fill him, if he had had ten souls, and yet he must find time and thoughts for meditation. [2] Not to let it depart out of his mouth; that is, all his orders to the people, must be consonant to the law of God; upon all occasions he must speak according to this rule, Isa. viii. 20. There was no occasion to make new laws; but that good thing which was committed to him, he must carefully and faithfully keep, 2 Tim. i. 14. [3] He must observe to do according to all this law. Joshua was a man of great power and authority, yet he must himself be under command and do as he is bidden. No man's dignity or dominion, how great soever, sets him above the law of God. First, He must do what was written. Secondly, He must do according to what was written, exactly observing the law as his copy. Thirdly, He must do according to all that was written, without exception or reserve. Fourthly, He must observe the checks of conscience, the hints of providence, and all the advantages of opportunity. Fifthly, He must not turn from it, either in his own practice or in any act of government, for virtue is in the mean. Sixthly, He must be strong and courageous. And, lastly, he assures him that then he shall do wisely (as it is in the margin) and make his way prosperous, v. 7, 8.

(2) That he encourage himself herein with the promise and presence of God, and make these his stay (v. 6, 7, 9). Joshua had long since signalized his valour, in the war with Amalek, and in his dissent from the report of the evil spies. Joshua was humble not distrustful of God, but diffident of himself, and of his sufficiency for the work, and therefore God repeats this so often, "Be strong and of a good courage; Have not I commanded thee? [1] "I have commanded the work to be done, and therefore it shall be done." It will help very much to animate and embolden us if we keep our eye upon the divine warrant, and hear God saying, "Have not I commanded thee? I will therefore help thee, succeed thee, accept thee, reward thee."

Joshua, being settled in the government, immediately applies himself to further the work of God among the people over whom God had set him.

I. He issues out orders to the people to provide for a march. The officers of the people that commanded under Joshua in their respective tribes and families attended him for orders, which they were to transmit to the people. What could Joshua have done without officers? We are required to be subject, not only to the king as supreme, but to governors as to those that are sent by him, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. By these officers, 1. Joshua gives public notice that they were to pass over Jordan within three days. Observe with what assurance Joshua says to the people, because God had said it to him, You shall pass over Jordan, and shall possess the land. We greatly honour the truth of God when we stagger not at the promise of God. 2. He gives them directions to prepare victuals, not to prepare transport vessels. He that bore them out of Egypt would in like manner bear them into Canaan, Exod. xix. 4. But those that were desirous to have other victuals besides the manna, which had not yet ceased, must prepare it, and have it ready against the time appointed. Perhaps, though the manna did not quite cease till they came into Canaan (ch. v. 12), yet since they had come into a land inhabited (Exod. xvi. 35), where they might be furnished in part with other provisions, it did not fall so plentifully. See Exod. xix. 10, 11.

II. He reminds the two tribes and a half of the obligations they were under to go over Jordan with their brethren, though they left their possessions and families on this side. It was an act of self-denial, and against the grain; therefore it was needful to produce the argeement which Moses had made with them (v. 13): Remember the word which Moses commanded you. Though Moses was dead, his commands and their promises were still in full force. He reminds them. 1, Of the advantages they had received in being first settled: "The Lord your God hath given you rest. He has given your minds rest; you are not as the rest of the tribes waiting the issue of the war first and then of the lot. He has also given your families rest, giving you this land, this good land." Note, When God by his providence has given us rest we ought to consider what service we may do to our brethren who are unsettled. When God had given David rest (2 Sam. vii. 1), see how restless he was till he had found out a habitation for the ark, Ps. cxxxii. 4, 5. 2. He reminds them of their agreement to help their brethren in the wars of Canaan till God had in like manner given them rest, v. 14, 15. This was, (1) Reasonable in itself. (2) It was enjoined them by Moses, the servant of the Lord; (3) It was the only expedient they had to save themselves from the guilt of a great sin in settling on that side Jordan, a sin which would one time or other find them out, Num. xxxii. 23. (4) It was the condition of the grant Moses had made them, of the land of their possession, as it is here called (v. 15). (5) They themselves had covenanted and agreed thereunto (Num. xxxii. 25): Thy servants will do as my Lord commandeth.

Verses 16–18

This answer was given by the officers of all the people (v. 10), as their representatives.

I. They promise him obedience (v. 16), as subjects to their prince, as soldiers to their general. Thus the people of Israel here engage themselves to Joshua: "All that thou commandest us we will readily do, without murmuring or disputing." We must thus swear allegiance to our Lord Jesus, as the captain of our salvation, and bind ourselves to do what he commands us by his word, and to go where he sends us by his providence. The people had no reason to boast of their obedience to Moses; he had found them a stiff-necked people, Deut. ix. 13. But they meant that they would be as observant of Joshua as they should have been of Moses. Note, We must not so magnify those that are gone as to be wanting in the honour and duty we owe to those that succeed them. Obedience for conscience's sake will continue, though Providence change the hands by which it rules and acts.

II. They pray for the presence of God with him (v. 17): "Only the Lord thy God be with thee, to bless and prosper thee, and give thee success, as he was with Moses." The best thing we can ask of God for our magistrates is that they may have the presence of God with them. Those that we have reason to think have favour from God should have honour and respect from us. Some understand it as a limitation of their obedience: "We will obey only as far as we perceive the Lord is with thee, but no further. While thou keepest close to God we will keep close to thee; hitherto shall our obedience come, but no further."

III. They pass an act to make it death for any Israelite to disobey Joshua's orders, or rebel against his commandments, v. 18. There was a special reason for the making of this law now that they were entering upon the wars of Canaan; for in times of war the severity of military discipline is more necessary than at other times.

IV. It very much heartens those that lead in a good work to see those that follow with a good will. Joshua, though of approved valour, did not take it as an affront, but as a great kindness, for the people to bid him be strong and of a good courage.

CHAP. II

In this chapter we have an account of the scouts that were employed to bring an account to Joshua of the posture of the city of Jericho. Observe here, 1. How Joshua sent them, ver. 1. II. How Rahab received them, and protected them. III. The account she gave them of the present posture of Jericho, and the panic-fear they were struck with upon the approach of Israel, ver. 8–11. IV. The bargain she made with them for the security of herself and her relations, ver. 12–21. V. Their safe return to Joshua, and the account they gave him of their expedition, ver. 22–24. Rahab is twice celebrated in the New Testament as a great believer (Heb. xi. 31) and as one whose faith proved itself by good works, James ii. 25.

Verses 1–7

In these verses we have,

I. The prudence of Joshua, in sending spies to observe this important pass, which was likely to be disputed at the entrance of Israel into Canaan (v. 1). Go view the land, even Jericho. Moses had sent spies (Num. xiii.); Joshua himself was one of them. Joshua now sent spies, not, as the former were sent, to survey the whole land, but Jericho only. Joshua was particularly careful to take the first step well and not to stumble at the threshold. Observe, 1. Great men must see with other people's eyes, which makes it very necessary that they be cautious in the choice of those they employ. 2. Faith in God's promise ought not to supersede but encourage our diligence in the use of proper means. We do not trust God, but tempt him, if our expectations slacken our endeavours. 3. See how ready these men were to go upon this hazardous enterprise. In obedience to Joshua their general, in zeal for the service of the camp, and in dependence upon the power of God.

II. The providence of God directing the spies to the house of Rahab. How they got over Jordan, we are not told; but into Jericho they came, which was about seven or eight miles from the river, and there seeking for a convenient inn were directed to the house of Rahab, here called a harlot, a woman that had formerly been of ill fame, the reproach of which stuck to her name, though of late she had repented and reformed. Rahab the harlot is so called in the New Testament, where both her faith and her good works are praised, to teach us, 1. That the greatness of sin is no bar to pardoning mercy if it be truly repented of in time. We read of publicans and harlots entering into the kingdom of the Messiah, and being welcomed to all the privileges of that kingdom, Matt. xxi. 31. 2. That there are many who before their conversion were very wicked and vile, and yet afterwards come to great eminence in faith and holiness. 3. Even those that through grace have repented of the sins of their youth must expect to bear the reproach of them. God's Israel, for aught that appears, had but one well-wisher in all Jericho, and that was Rahab a harlot. God has often served his own purposes and his church's interests by men of indifferent morals. Had these scouts gone to any other house than this they would certainly have been betrayed. But God knew where they had a friend, though they did not, and directed them thither. Those that faithfully acknowledge God in their ways he will guide with his eye. See Jer. xxxvi. 19, 26.

III. The piety of Rahab in receiving and protecting these Israelites. Rahab showed her guests more than common civility; it was by faith that she received those with peace against whom her king and country had denounced war, Heb. xi. 31. 1. She bade them welcome to her house; they lodged there, though she knew both whence they came and what their business was. 2. She hid them upon the roof of the house, which was flat, and covered them with stalks of flax (v. 6). By these stalks of flax, which she herself had lain in order upon the roof to dry in the sun, in order to the beating of it and making it ready for the wheel, it appears she had one of the good characters of the virtuous woman, Prov. xxxi. 13. 3. When she was examined concerning them, she denied they were in her house. Nor marvel that the king of Jericho sent to enquire after them (v. 2, 3). Rahab not only disowned that she knew them, but, that no further search might be made for them in the city, told the pursuers they had gone away again, and in all probability might be overtaken, v. 4, 5. Now, (1) We are sure this was a good work: it is canonized by the apostle (James ii. 25), where she is said to be justified by works, and this is specified, that she received the messengers, and sent them out another way, and she did it by faith, above the fear of man, even of the wrath of the king. She believed, upon the report she had heard of the wonders wrought for Israel, that their God was the only true God, and that therefore their declared design upon Canaan would undoubtedly take effect. Note, Those that by faith take the Lord for their God take his people for their people, and cast in their lot among them. Those that have God for their refuge must shelter his people when there is occasion. Let my outcasts dwell with thee, Isa. xvi. 3, 4. And we must be glad of an opportunity of testifying the sincerity and zeal of our love to God by hazardous services to his church and kingdom among men. But, (2) There is that in it which it is not easy to justify, [1] It is plain that she betrayed her country by harbouring the enemies of it. That which justifies her in this is that she knew the Lord had given Israel this land (v. 9), knew it by the incontestable miracles God had wrought for them, which confirmed that grant; and her obligations to God were higher than her obligations to any other. If she knew God had given them this land, it would have been a sin to join with those that hindered them from possessing it. [2] It is plain that she deceived the officers that examined her with an untruth. What shall we say to this? If she had either told the truth or been silent, she would have betrayed the spies, and it does not appear that she had any other way of concealing them than by this ironical direction to the officers to pursue them another way. This case was altogether extraordinary, and therefore cannot be drawn into a precedent. Yet divines generally conceive that it was a sin, which however admitted of this extenuation, that being a Canaanite she was not better taught the evil of lying. However it was in this case, we are sure it is our duty to speak every man the truth to his neighbour, to dread and detest lying, and never to do evil, that good may come of it, Rom. iii. 8. But God accepts what is sincerely and honestly intended, though there be a mixture of frailty and folly in it, and is not extreme to mark what we do amiss.

Verses 8–21

The matter is here settled between Rahab and the spies respecting the service she was now to do for them, and the favour they were afterwards to show to her.

I. Having got clear of the officers, she comes up to them to the roof of the house where they lay hid. 1. She lets them know that the report of the great things God had done for them had come to Jericho (v. 10), to the amazement of everybody. 2. She tells them what impressions the tidings of these things had made upon the Canaanites: Your terror has fallen upon us (v. 9); our hearts did melt, v. 11. If she kept a public house, this would give her an opportunity of understanding the sense of various companies and of travellers from other parts of the country. It would put courage into the most cowardly Israelite to hear how their enemies were dispirited, and it was easy to conclude that those who now fainted before them would infallibly fall before them, it would be an earnest of the accomplishment of all the other promises God had made to them. Let not God's Israel be afraid of their most powerful enemies. 3. She hereupon makes profession of her faith in God and his promise. (1) She believes God's power and dominion over all the world (v. 11): "Jehovah your God, whom you worship and call upon, is so far above all gods that he is the only true God; for he is God in heaven above and in earth beneath, and is served by all the hosts of both." (2) She believes his promise to his people Israel (v. 9): I know that the Lord hath given you the land. The most powerful means of conviction will not of themselves attain the end without divine grace, and by that grace Rahab the harlot, who had only heard of the wonders God had wrought, speaks with more assurance of the truth of the promise made to the fathers than all the elders of Israel had done who were eye-witnesses of those wonders, many of whom perished through unbelief of this promise.

II. She engaged them to take her and her relations under their protection, v. 12, 13. Now, 1. It was an evidence of the sincerity and strength of her faith. Those who truly believe the divine revelation concerning the ruin of sinners, and the grant of the heavenly land to God's Israel, will give diligence to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on eternal life, by joining themselves to God and to his people. 2. The provision she made for the safety of her relations, as well as for her own, is a laudable instance of natural affection, and an intimation to us to do all we can for the salvation of the souls of those that are dear to us. 3. Her request that they would swear unto her by Jehovah is an instance of her acquaintance with the only true God, and her faith in him. 4. Her petition is very just and reasonable, that since she had protected them, they should protect her. Note, Those that show mercy may expect to find mercy. Rahab was afterwards advanced to be a princess in Israel, the wife of Salmon, and one of the ancestors of Christ, Matt. i. 5.

III. They solemnly engaged for her preservation in the common destruction (v. 14): "Our life for yours." She had pawned her life for theirs, and now they in requital pawn their lives for hers, and (as public persons) with them they pawn the public faith and the credit of their nation. The law of gratitude is one of the laws of nature. Now observe here, 1. The promises they made her. In general, "We will deal kindly and truly with thee, v. 14. We will not only be kind in promising now, but kind in outdoing thy demands and expectations." 2. The provisos and limitations of their promises. Though they were in haste, yet we find them very cautious in settling this agreement, not to bind themselves to more than was fit for them to perform. Note, Covenants must be made with care. Those that will be conscientious in keeping their promises will be cautious in making them. Their promise is here accompanied with three provisos. They will protect Rahab, and all her relations always, provided, (1) That she tie the scarlet cord with which she was now about to let them down in the window of her house, v. 18. That no soldier might offer any violence to the house that was thus distinguished. This was like the blood sprinkled upon the door-post, which secured the first-born from the destroying angel. The same cord that she made use of for the preservation of these Israelites was to be made use of for her preservation. What we serve and honour God with we may expect he will bless and make comfortable to us. (2) That she should have all those whose safety she had desired in the house with her and keep them there, and that, at the time of taking the town, none of them should dare to stir out of doors, v. 18, 19. It was a reasonable proviso that, since they were saved purely for Rahab's sake, her house should have the honour of being their castle. It was likewise a significant proviso, intimating to us that those who are added to the church that they may be saved must keep close to the society of the faithful. (3) That she should keep counsel (v. 14, 20): If thou utter this our business, that is, "If thou betray us when we are gone, we will be clear of thy oath." Those are unworthy of the secret of the Lord that know not how to keep it to themselves when there is occasion.

IV. She then took effectual care to secure her new friends, and sent them out another way, James ii. 25

(v. 15), the situation of her house befriending them herein: thus Paul made his escape out of Damascus, 2 Cor. xi. 33. She also directed them which way to go for their own safety, v. 16. She directs them to leave the high road, and abscond in the mountains till the pursuers returned. Those that are in the way of God may expect that Providence will protect them, but this will not excuse them from taking all prudent methods for their own safety. Providence must be trusted, but not tempted.

Verses 22–24

We have here the safe return of the spies Joshua had sent, and the great encouragement they brought with them to Israel to proceed in their descent upon Canaan. They might have told them what they had observed of the height and strength of the walls of Jericho, but they were of another spirit, and, depending themselves upon the divine promise, they animated Joshua likewise. 1. Their return in safety was itself an encouragement to Joshua, and a token for good. That they had come back in peace, was such an instance of God's great care concerning them for Israel's sake as might assure the people of the divine guidance and care. He that so wonderfully protected their scouts would preserve their men of war. 2. The report they brought was much more encouraging (v. 24): "All the inhabitants of the country, though resolved to stand it out, yet do faint because of us, they have neither wisdom to yield nor courage to fight," whence they conclude, "Truly the Lord has delivered into our hands all the land." Sinners' frights are sometimes sure presages of their fall. If we resist our spiritual enemies they will flee before us.

CHAP. III

This chapter, and that which follows it, give us the history of Israel's passing through Jordan into Canaan. By Joshua's order they marched up to the river's side (ver. 1), and then almighty power led them through it. They passed through the Red Sea unexpectedly, and in their flight by night, but they have notice some time before of their passing through Jordan, and their expectations raised. I. The people are directed to follow the ark, ver. 2–4. II. They are commanded to sanctify themselves, ver. 5. III. The priests with the ark are ordered to lead the van, ver. 6. IV. Joshua is magnified and made commander in chief, ver. 7, 8. V. Public notice is given of what God is about to do for them, ver. 9–13. VI. The thing is done, Jordan is divided, and Israel brought safely through it, ver. 14–17. This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.

Verses 1–6

Rahab, in mentioning to the spies the drying up of the Red Sea (ch. ii. 10), intimates that those on that side the water expected that Jordan, that great defence of their country, would in like manner give way to them. God often did things for them which they looked not for, Isa. lxiv. 3. Now here we are told,

I. That they came to Jordan and lodged there, v. 1. Though they were not yet told how they should pass the river, they went forward in faith, having been told (ch. i. 11) that they should pass it. Let us proceed as far as we can, and depend on divine sufficiency. In this march Joshua led them, and particular notice is taken of his early rising (ch. vi. 12; vii. 16; viii. 10), which intimates how little he loved his ease. Those that would bring great things to pass must rise early.

II. That the people were directed to follow the ark.

1. They might depend upon the ark to lead them; that is, upon God himself, of whose presence the ark was an instituted sign and token. It is called here the ark of the covenant of the Lord their God. What greater encouragement could they have than this, that the Lord was their God, a God in covenant with them? Here was the ark of the covenant. Formerly the ark was carried in the midst of the camp, but now it went before them to search out a resting-place for them (Num. x. 33), and, as it were, to give them livery and seisin of the promised land, and put them in possession of it. In the ark the tables of the law were, and over it the mercy-seat; for the divine law and grace reigning in the heart are the surest pledges of God's presence and favour.

2. They might depend upon the priests and Levites, appointed to carry the ark before them. The work of ministers is to hold forth the word of life, and to take care of the administration of those ordinances which are the tokens of God's presence and the instruments of his power and grace.

3. The people must follow the ark: Remove from your place and go after it. (1) Wherever God's ordinances are, there we must be: if they flit, we must remove and go after them. (2) Thus must we walk after the rule of the word and the direction of the Spirit in everything, so shall peace be upon us, as it now was upon the Israel of God. They must follow the priests as far as they carried the ark, but no further; so we must follow our ministers only as they follow Christ.

4. In following the ark, they must keep their distance, v. 4. They must none of them come within a thousand yards of the ark. (1) They must thus express reverent regard lest its familiarity with them should breed contempt. This charge was agreeable to that dispensation of darkness, bondage, and terror: but we now through Christ have access with boldness. (2) The ark was able to protect itself, and needed not to be guarded by the men of war, but was itself a guard to them. (3) Thus it was the better seen by those that were to be led by it: That you may know the way by which you must go. They would all have the satisfaction of seeing it, and would be animated by the sight. For you have not passed this way heretofore. It was an untrodden path, especially through Jordan. Our way through the valley of the shadow of death is a way we have not gone before. But, if we have the assurance of God's presence, we need not fear.

III. They were commanded to sanctify themselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you, v. 5. Joshua could tell beforehand what God would do, and when. See what preparation we must make to receive the discoveries of God's glory and the communications of his grace: we must sanctify ourselves; we must separate ourselves from all other cares, devote ourselves to God's honour, and cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

IV. The priests were ordered to take up the ark and carry it before the people, v. 6. It was the Levites' work ordinarily to carry the ark, Num. iv. 15. And now we may suppose that prayer of Moses used, when the ark set forward (Num. x. 35), Rise up, Lord, and let thy enemies be scattered. Magistrates are here instructed to stir up ministers to their work. Ministers must likewise learn to go before in the way of God. They must expect to be most struck at, but they know whom they have trusted.

Verses 7–13

God honours Joshua and Joshua honours God. Thus those that honour God he will honour.

I. v. 7, 8. 1. It was a great honour God did him that he spoke to him, as he had done to Moses from off the mercy-seat. 2. That he designed to magnify him in the sight of all Israel. He had told him before that he would be with him (ch. i. 5), but now all Israel shall see it. Those are truly great with whom God is and whom he employs and owns in his service. Pious magistrates are to be highly honoured and esteemed as public blessings, and the more we see of God with them the more we should honour them. By the dividing of Jordan, they shall be convinced that God is in like manner with Joshua in bringing them into Canaan. It was at the banks of Jordan that God began to magnify Joshua, and at the same place he began to magnify our Lord Jesus as Mediator; for John was baptizing at Bethabara, the house of passage, and there it was that when our Saviour was baptized it was proclaimed, This is my beloved Son. 3. That by him he gave orders to the priests themselves, to stand still at the brink of Jordan while the waters part, at the presence of the Lord, Ps. cxiv. 5, 7. God could have divided the river without the priests, but they could not without him.

II. Joshua speaks to the people, and therein honours God.

1. He had commanded them to sanctify themselves, and therefore calls them to hear the word of God, for that is the ordinary means of sanctification, John xvii. 17.

2. He now tells them, at length, by what way they should pass over Jordan, by the stopping of its streams (v. 13): The waters of Jordan shall be cut off. The dividing of the Red Sea is here repeated, to show that God has the same power to finish the salvation of his people that he had to begin it, and that the word of the Lord was as truly with Joshua as it was with Moses. The God whom they worshipped was the same God that made the world and it was the same power that was engaged and employed for them.

3. The people having been directed before to follow the ark are here told that it should pass before them into Jordan, v. 11. Observe, (1) The ark of the covenant must be their guide. Divine grace under the Mosaic dispensation was wrapt up as in a cloud and covered with a veil, while by Christ, our Joshua, it is revealed in the ark of the covenant unveiled. (2) It is called the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth. "It is your honour and happiness to have him in covenant with you: if he be yours, all the creatures are at your service, and when he pleases shall be employed for you." (3) They are told that the ark should pass before them into Jordan. They might safely venture, even into Jordan itself, if the ark of the covenant led them. Isa. xliii. 2, When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee.

4. From what God was now about to do for them he infers an assurance of what he would yet further do. The dividing of Jordan was intended to be to them, (1) A sure token of God's presence with them. (2) A sure pledge of the conquest of Canaan. If the living God is among you, expelling he will expel (so the Hebrew phrase is) from before you the Canaanites. The forcing of the lines was a certain presage of the ruin of all their hosts. This assurance which Joshua here gives them was so well grounded that it would enable one Israelite to chase a thousand Canaanites. Note, God's glorious appearances for his church and people ought to be improved by us for the encouragement of our faith and hope for the future. As for God, his work is perfect. If Jordan's flood cannot keep them out, Canaan's force cannot turn them out again.

5. He directs them to get twelve men ready, one of each tribe, who must be within call, to receive orders.

Verses 14 17

Here we have a short and plain account of the dividing of the river Jordan.

1. This river was now broader and deeper than usually it was at other times of the year, v. 15. The melting of the snow on the mountains of Lebanon, near which this river had its rise, was the occasion that at the time of harvest, barley-harvest, which was the spring of the year, Jordan overflowed all his banks. This great flood magnified the power of God and his kindness to Israel. Let the banks of Jordan be filled to the brink, it is as easy to Omnipotence to divide them, and dry them up, as if they were ever so narrow, ever so shallow.

II. As soon as ever the feet of the priests dipped in the brim of the water the stream stopped immediately, v. 15, 16. The waters above swelled, stood on a heap, and ran back, and yet did not spread. The waters on the other side this invisible dam ran down and left the bottom of the river dry. When they passed through the Red Sea, the waters were a wall on either hand, here only on the right-hand. What cannot God do? What will he not do for the perfecting of his people's salvation? When we have finished our pilgrimage through this wilderness, death will be like this Jordan between us and the heavenly Canaan, but the ark of the covenant has prepared us a way through it; it is the last enemy that shall be destroyed.

III. The people passed over right against Jericho, which was, 1. An instance of their boldness, and a noble defiance of their enemies. 2. It was an encouragement to them to venture through Jordan, for Jericho was a goodly city and the country about it extremely pleasant. 3. It would increase the confusion and terror of their enemies.

IV. The priests stood still in the midst of Jordan while all the people passed over, v. 17. There the ark was appointed to be, to show that the same power that parted the waters kept them parted as long as there was occasion. There the priests were appointed to stand still. 1. To try their faith. As they made a bold step when they set the first foot into Jordan, so now they made a bold stand when they tarried longest in Jordan; but they knew they carried their own protection with them. 2. It was to encourage the faith of the people, that they might go triumphantly into Canaan, and fear no evil, no, not in this valley of the shadow of death, being assured of God's presence, which interposed between them and the proud waters, which otherwise had gone over their souls.

CHAP. IV

This chapter gives a further account of the miraculous passage of Israel through Jordan. I. Twelve stones set up in Jordan (ver. 9) and other twelve stones taken up out of Jordan, ver. 1–8. II. The march of the people through Jordan's channel, ver. 10–14. III. The closing of the waters again, ver. 15–19. IV. The erecting of the monument in Gilgal, ver. 20–24.

Verses 1–9

How busy Joshua and all the men of war were while they were passing over Jordan, marching into an enemy's country. They had their wives, and children, cattle, and tents, bag and baggage, to convey by this strange and untrodden path, yet care must be taken to perpetuate the memorial of this wondrous work of God. Note, How much soever we have to do of business we must not omit what we have to do for the glory of God, for that is our best business. Now,

I. God gave orders for the preparing of this memorial. Had Joshua done it without divine direction, it might have looked like a design to perpetuate his own name. Note, God's works of wonder ought to be kept in everlasting remembrance. Some of the Israelites perhaps felt no concern to have it remembered; while others, it may be, had such deep impressions made upon them by it, that they thought there needed no memorial of it to be erected. But God, knowing how apt they had been soon to forget his works, ordered an expedient for the keeping of this in remembrance to all generations. 1. Joshua, as chief captain, must give direction about it (v. 1): When all the people had clean passed over Jordan God spoke unto Joshua to provide materials for this monument. 2. One man out of each tribe must be employed to prepare materials that each tribe might have the story told them by one of themselves, and each tribe might contribute something to the glory of God thereby (v. 2, 4): Out of every tribe a man. 3. The stones that must be set up for this memorial are ordered to be taken out of the midst of the channel and as near as might be from the very place where the priests stood with the ark, v. 3, 5. Let posterity know by this that Jordan was driven back, for these very stones were then fetched out of it. 4. The use of these stones is here appointed for a sign (v. 6), a memorial, v. 7. They would give occasion to the children to ask their parents in time to come, How came these stones hither?

II. According to these orders the thing was done. 1. Twelve stones were taken up out of the midst of Jordan. By these stones which they were ordered to take up God did, as it were, give them livery and seisin of this good land; it is all their own, let them enter and take possession; therefore what these twelve did the children of Israel are said to do (v. 8), because they were the representatives of their respective tribes. When the Lord Jesus, our Joshua, having overcome the sharpness of death and dried up that Jordan, had opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers, he appointed his twelve apostles by the memorial of the gospel to transmit the knowledge of this to remote places and future ages. 2. Other twelve stones were set up in the midst of Jordan (v. 9), to notify the very place where the ark stood.

Verses 10–19

Joshua pursued the orders God gave him, and did nothing without divine direction, finishing all that the Lord had commanded him (v. 10).

I. The people hasted and passed over, v. 10. 1. Some hasted because they were not able to trust God. 2. Others because they were not willing to tempt God to continue the miracle longer than needs must. 3. Others because they were eager to be in Canaan. 4. Those that considered least, yet hasted because others did. He that believeth doth not make haste to anticipate God's counsels, but he makes haste to attend them, Isa. xxviii. 16.

II. The two tribes and a half led the van, v. 12, 13. They were all chosen men, and fit for service, ready armed. And the two tribes had no reason to complain: the post of danger is the post of honour.

III. When all the people had got clear to the other side, the priests with the ark came up out of Jordan. Joshua did not order them out of Jordan till God directed him to do so, v. 15–17. How low a condition soever God may at any time bring his priests or people to, let them patiently wait, till by his providence he shall call them up out of it, and let them not be weary of waiting, while they have the tokens of God's presence with them, in the depth of their adversity.

IV. As soon as ever the priests and the ark had come up out of Jordan, the waters of the river, which had stood on a heap, gradually flowed down according to their nature and usual course, v. 18. When Israel's turn was served, and the token of God's presence was removed, immediately the water went forward again.

V. Notice is taken of the honour put upon Joshua by all this (v. 14): On that day the Lord magnified Joshua, both by the fellowship he admitted him to with himself, and by the authority he confirmed him in over both priests and people. The best and surest way to command the respect of inferiors is not by blustering and threatening, but by holiness and love, and a constant regard to their welfare, and to God's will and honour. Those that are sanctified are truly magnified, and are worthy of double honour.

VI. An account is kept of the time of this great event (v. 19): it was on the tenth day of the first month, just forty years since they came out of Egypt, wanting five days. God had said in his wrath that they should wander forty years in the wilderness, and at last he brought them into Canaan five days before the forty years were ended, to show how little pleasure God takes in punishing, how swift he is to show mercy. God ordered it so that they should enter Canaan four days before the annual solemnity of the passover, and on the very day when the preparation for it was to begin (Exod. xii. 3), because he would have them then to be reminded of their deliverance out of Egypt.

The twelve stones which were laid down in Gilgal (v. 8) are here set up either one upon another, or one by another in rows; for after they were fixed they are not called a heap of stones, but these stones.

I. Posterity would enquire into the meaning of them: Your children shall ask their fathers, What mean these stones? Note, Those that will be wise when they are old must be inquisitive when they are young. Our Lord Jesus, though he had in himself the fulness of knowledge, has by his example taught children and young people to hear and ask questions, Luke ii. 46.

II. The parents are here directed what answer to give to this enquiry (v. 22): "You shall let your children know that which you have yourselves learned from the written word and from your fathers." Note, It is the duty of parents to acquaint their children betimes with the word and works of God.

1. They must let their children know that Jordan was driven back before Israel, who went through it upon dry land, and that this was the very place where they passed over. Note, God's mercies to our ancestors were mercies to us; and we should revive the remembrance of the great things God did for our fathers in the days of old.

2. They must take that occasion to tell their children of the drying up of the Red Sea forty years before: As the Lord your God did to the Red Sea. Note, (i) By making the comparison, it appears that God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. (ii) Later mercies should bring to remembrance former mercies, and revive our thankfulness for them.

(1) The power of God was hereby magnified. The deliverances of God's people are instructions to all people, and fair warnings not to contend with Omnipotence. (2) The remembrance of this wonderful work should effectually restrain them from the worship of other gods, and constrain them to abide and abound in the service of their own God.

CHAP. V

Israel have now got over Jordan. They have now got footing in Canaan, and must apply themselves to the conquest of it, in order to which this chapter tells us, 1. How their enemies were dispirited, ver. 1. II. What was done at their first landing to assist and encourage them. 1. The covenant of circumcision was renewed, ver. 2–9. 2. The feast of the passover was celebrated, ver. 10. 3. Their camp was victualled with the corn of the land, whereupon the manna ceased, ver. 11, 12. 4. The captain of the Lord's host himself appeared to Joshua to animate and direct him, ver. 13–15.

Verses 1–9

A vast show, no doubt, the numerous camp of Israel made in the plains of Jericho, where now they had pitched their tents. The church in the wilderness has now come up from the wilderness. How terrible she was in the eyes of her enemies we are here told, v. 1. How fair and clear she was made in the eyes of her friends, by the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt, we are told in the following verses.

I. Here are impressions the tidings made upon the kings of this land: Their heart melted like wax before the fire, neither was there spirit in them any more. The kings have till now kept up their spirits pretty well, being in possession, their country populous, and their cities fortified, they should be able to make their part good against the invaders; but when they heard not only that they had come over Jordan, but that they had come over by a miracle, the God of nature manifestly fighting for them, their hearts failed them too, and they were now at their wits' end. And, 1. They had reason enough to be afraid; Israel itself was a formidable body, and much more so when God was its head, a God of almighty power. 2. God impressed these fears upon them, and dispirited them, as he had promised (Exod. xxiii. 27).

II. At that time (v. 2), when the country about them was in that great consternation, God ordered Joshua to circumcise the children of Israel.

1. The occasion there was for this general circumcision. All that came out of Egypt were circumcised, v. 5. But when the edict was made for the destruction of their male infants, the administration of this ordinance was interrupted; many of them were uncircumcised, of whom there was a general circumcision. It is with reference to that general circumcision that this is called a second, v. 2. Under the government of Moses himself, to have all their children that were born for thirty-eight years together left uncircumcised is unaccountable. Now, (1) Some think circumcision was omitted because it was needless: it was appointed to be a mark of distinction between the Israelites and other nations, and therefore in the wilderness there was no occasion for it. (2) Others think that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision as obligatory till they came to settle in Canaan. (3) Others think that God favourably dispensed with the observance of this ordinance in consideration of the unsettledness of their state. (4) To me it seems to have been a continued token of God's displeasure against them for their unbelief and murmuring. And this was such a significant indication of God's wrath as the breaking of the tables of the covenant was when Israel had broken the covenant by making the golden calf. Whatever the reason was, it seems that this great ordinance was omitted in Israel for almost forty years together, which is a plain indication that it was not of absolute necessity, nor was to be of perpetual obligation.

2. The orders given to Joshua for this general circumcision (v. 2). Why was this ordered to be done now? (1) Because now the promise of which circumcision was instituted to be the seal was performed. The seed of Israel was brought safely into the land of Canaan. (2) Because now the threatening was fully executed by the expiring of the forty years, therefore now the seal of the covenant is revived again. [1] God would hereby show that the camp of Israel was not governed by the ordinary rules and measures of war, but by immediate direction from God. [2] God would hereby animate his people Israel against the difficulties they were now to encounter, by confirming his covenant with them, which gave them unquestionable assurance of victory and success, and the full possession of the land of promise. [3] God would hereby teach them, and us with them, in all great undertakings to begin with God, to make sure of his favour, by offering ourselves to him a living sacrifice (for that was signified by the blood of circumcision). [4] The reviving of circumcision, after it had been so long disused, was designed to revive the observance of other institutions. [5] This second circumcision, as it is here called, was typical of the spiritual circumcision with which the Israel of God, when they enter into the gospel rest, are circumcised; it points to Jesus as the true circumciser, the author of another circumcision than that of the flesh, commanded by the law, even the circumcision of the heart (Rom. ii. 29), called the circumcision of Christ, Col. ii. 11.

3. The people's obedience to these orders. Joshua circumcised the children of Israel (v. 3), and here they gave an instance of their dutifulness by submitting to this painful institution.

4. (1) Their circumcision rolled away the reproach of Egypt. They were tainted with the idolatry of Egypt, and that was their reproach; but now that they were circumcised it was to be hoped they would be so entirely devoted to God that the reproach would be rolled away. (2) Their coming safely to Canaan rolled away the reproach of Egypt, for it silenced that spiteful suggestion of the Egyptians, that for mischief they were brought out, the wilderness had shut them in, Exod. xiv. 3.

Verses 10–12

We may well imagine that the people of Canaan were astonished. Joshua opens the campaign with one act of devotion after another. That is likely to end well which begins with God.

I. A solemn passover kept, at the time appointed by the law, the fourteenth day of the first month, and in the same place where they were circumcised, v. 10. While they were wandering in the wilderness they were denied the benefit and comfort of this ordinance, but now God comforted them again, and therefore that joyful ordinance is revived. The solemn passover followed immediately after the solemn circumcision; thus, when those that received the word were baptized, immediately we find them breaking bread, Acts ii. 41, 42. They kept this passover in the plains of Jericho, as it were in defiance of the Canaanites. He now prepared a table before them in the presence of their enemies, Ps. xxiii. 5.

II. Provision made for their camp of the corn of the land, and the ceasing of the manna thereupon, v. 11, 12. Manna was a wonderful mercy to them when they needed it. But it was the mark of a wilderness state; more acceptable to them to eat of the corn of the land, and this they are now furnished with.

1. The country people, having retired for safety into Jericho, had left their barns and fields, and all that was in them. And the supply came very seasonably, for, (1) After the passover they were to keep the feast of unleavened bread, which they could not do according to the appointment when they had nothing but manna to live upon; now they found old corn enough in the barns of the Canaanites to supply them plentifully for that occasion. (2) On the morrow after the passover-sabbath they were to wave the sheaf of first-fruits before the Lord, Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. And this they were particularly ordered to do when they came into the land which God would give them: and they were furnished for this with the fruit of the land that year (v. 12), which was then growing and beginning to be ripe.

2. Notice is taken of the ceasing of the manna as soon as ever they had eaten the old corn of the land, (1) It came just when they needed it, so it continued as long as they had occasion for it and no longer. (2) To teach us not to expect extraordinary supplies when supplies may be had in an ordinary way. Now that they needed it not God withdrew it. He is a wise Father, who knows the necessities of his children, and accommodates his gifts to them, not to their humours. The word and ordinances of God are spiritual manna, with which God nourishes his people in this wilderness, but when we come to the heavenly Canaan this manna will cease, for we shall no longer have need of it.

We have hitherto found God often speaking to Joshua, but we read not till now of any appearance of God's glory to him; now that his difficulties increased his encouragements were increased in proportion.

I. The time when he was favoured with this vision. It was immediately after he had performed the great solemnities of circumcision and the passover. Note, We may then expect the discoveries of the divine grace when we are found in the way of our duty.

II. The place where he had this vision. It was by Jericho. There, it should seem, he was all alone, fearless of danger, because sure of the divine protection. There he was (some think) meditating and praying. Or perhaps to take a view of the city, and contrive how to attack it; when God came and directed him. Note, God will help those that help themselves. Vigilantibus non dormientibus succurrit lex—The law succours those who watch, not those who sleep. Joshua was in his post as a general, when God came and made himself known as Generalissimo.

III. The appearance itself. Joshua, as is usual with those that are full of thought and care, was looking downwards, his eyes fixed on the ground, when of a sudden he was surprised with the appearance of a man who stood before him at some little distance, which obliged him to lift up his eyes. Now, 1. We have reason to think that this man was the Son of God, the eternal Word, who, before he assumed the human nature for a perpetuity, frequently appeared in a human shape. 2. He here appeared as a soldier, with his sword drawn in his hand. To Abraham in his tent he appeared as a traveller; to Joshua in the field as a man of war. Christ will be to his people what their faith expects and desires. He came to encourage him to carry it on with vigour; for Christ's sword drawn in his hand denotes how ready he is for the defence and salvation of his people, who through him shall do valiantly.

IV. The bold question with which Joshua accosted him. This shows, 1. His great courage and resolution. He was not ruffled by the suddenness of the appearance. 2. His great concern for the people and their cause. It should seem, he suspected him for an enemy. Thus apt are we to look upon that as against us which is most for us. The cause between the Israelites and the Canaanites, between Christ and Beelzebub, will not admit of a neutrality. He that is not with us is against us.

V. The account he gave of himself, v. 14. "Nay, not for your adversaries, you may be sure, but as captain of the host of the Lord have I now come, not only for you as a friend, but over you as commander in chief." He, as captain of both, conducts the host of Israel and commands the host of angels to their assistance. Perhaps in allusion to this Christ is called the captain of our salvation (Heb. ii. 10), and a leader and commander to the people, Isa lv. 4.

VI. He perceived that he was a divine person, and not a man. 1. Joshua paid homage to him: He fell on his face to the earth and did worship. Joshua was himself general of the forces of Israel, and yet cheerfully submitted to him as his commander. 2. He begged to receive commands and directions from him: What saith my Lord unto his servant? His former question was not more bold and soldier-like than this was pious and saint-like; nor was it any disparagement to the greatness of Joshua's spirit: even crowned heads cannot bow too low before the throne of the Lord Jesus, who is King of kings, Ps. ii. 10, 11; lxxii. 10, 11; Rev. xix. 16. Observe, (1) The relation he owns between himself and Christ, that Christ was his Lord and himself his servant and under his command, Christ his Captain and himself a soldier under him, to do as he is bidden, Matt. viii. 9. (2) The enquiry he makes pursuant to this relation: What saith my Lord? which implies an earnest desire to know the will of Christ, and a cheerful readiness and resolution to do it. This temper of mind shows him fit for the post he was in; for those know best how to command that know how to obey.

VII. The further expressions of reverence which this divine captain required from Joshua (v. 15): Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, in token of reverence and respect (which with us are signified by uncovering the head). We are accustomed to say of a person for whom we have a great affection that we love the very ground he treads upon. Outward expressions of inward reverence well become us, and are required of us. Bishop Patrick well observes here that the very same orders that God gave to Moses at the bush (Exod. iii. 5), he here gives to Joshua; as he had been with Moses so he would be with him, ch. i. 5.

CHAP. VI

Joshua opened the campaign with the siege of Jericho, a city which trusted so much to the strength of its walls as to stand upon its defence. Now here we have the story of the taking of it. I. The directions and assurances which the captain of the Lord's host gave concerning it, ver. 1–5. II. The trial of the people's patient obedience in walking round the city six days, ver. 6–14. III. The wonderful delivery of it into their hands the seventh day, with a solemn charge to them to use it as a devoted thing, ver. 15–21, and ver. 24. IV. The preservation of Rahab and her relations, ver. 22, 23, 25. V. A curse pronounced upon the man that should dare to rebuild this city, ver. 26, 27. An abstract of this story we find among the trophies of faith, Heb. xi. 30.

Verses 1–5

We have here a contest between God and the men of Jericho.

I. Jericho resolves Israel shall not be its master, v. 1. None went out as deserters or to treat of peace, nor were any admitted in to offer peace.

II. God resolves Israel shall be its master, and that quickly. 1. The captain of the Lord's host gives directions how the city should be besieged. No trenches are to be opened, nor any military preparations made; but the ark of God must be carried by the priests round the city once a day for six days together, and seven times the seventh day, attended by the men of war in silence, the priests all the while blowing with trumpets of rams' horns, v. 3, 4. This was all they were to do. 2. He assures them that on the seventh day before night they should, without fail, be masters of the town. Upon a signal given, they must all shout, and immediately the wall should fall down, v. 5. God appointed this way, (1) To magnify his own power, that he might be exalted in his own strength (Ps. xxi. 13), not in the strength of instruments. (2) To put an honour upon his ark, the instituted token of his presence, and to give a reason for the laws by which the people were obliged to look upon it with the most profound veneration and respect. (3) It was likewise to put honour upon the priests, who were appointed upon this occasion to carry the ark and sound the trumpets. (4) It was to try the faith, obedience, and patience, of the people, to try whether they would observe a precept which to human policy seemed foolish to obey and believe a promise which in human probability seemed impossible to be performed. Thus by faith, not by force, the walls of Jericho fell down. (5) It was to encourage the hope of Israel with reference to the remaining difficulties that were before them. The strongest and highest walls cannot hold out against Omnipotence.

Verses 6–16

We have here an account of the cavalcade which Israel made about Jericho, the orders Joshua gave concerning it, as he had received them from the Lord and their punctual observance of those orders.

I. Wherever the ark went the people attended it, v. 9. The armed men went before it to clear the way, pioneers to the ark of God. It is an honour to the greatest men to do any good office to the ark and to serve the interests of religion in their country. The rereward, either another body of armed men, or Dan's squadron, which marched last through the wilderness, or, as some think, the multitude of the people who were not armed, followed the ark.

II. Seven priests went immediately before the ark, having trumpets in their hands, with which they were continually sounding, v. 4, 5, 9, 13. 1. They proclaimed war with the Canaanites, and so struck a terror upon them. Thus God's ministers, by the solemn declarations of his wrath against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, must blow the trumpet in Zion, that the sinners in Zion may be afraid. 2. They proclaimed God's gracious presence with Israel, and so put life and courage into them.

III. The trumpets they used were not silver trumpets, but trumpets of rams' horns, bored hollow for the purpose. These trumpets were of the basest matter, dullest sound, and least show, that the excellency of the power might be of God. Thus by the foolishness of preaching, fitly compared to the sounding of these rams' horns, the devil's kingdom is thrown down; and the weapons of our warfare, though they are not carnal, are yet mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5.

IV. All the people were commanded to be silent, not to speak a word, nor make any noise (v. 10), that they might the more carefully attend to the sound of the sacred trumpets, which they were now to look upon as the voice of God among them; and it does not become us to speak when God is speaking.

V. They were to do this once a day for six days together and seven times the seventh day, and they did so, v. 14, 15. As promised deliverances must be expected in God's way, so they must be expected in his time.

VI. One of these days must needs be a sabbath day, and the Jews say that it was the last, but this is not certain; however, if he that appointed them to rest on the other sabbath days appointed them to walk on this, that was sufficient to justify them in it; he never intended to bind himself by his own laws, but that when he pleased he might dispense with them. And, besides, the law of the sabbath forbids our own work, which is servile and secular, but this which they did was a religious act. It is certainly no breach of the sabbath rest to do the sabbath work.

VII. They continued to do this during the time appointed, and seven times the seventh day, though they saw not any effect of it. We may suppose the oddness of the thing did at first amuse the besieged. Probably they bantered the besiegers, as those mentioned in Neh. vi. 2, "What do these feeble Jews?"

VIII. At last they were to give a shout, and did so, and immediately the walls fell, v. 16. This was a triumphant shout; a shout of prayer, an echo to the sound of the trumpets which proclaimed the promise that God would remember them. And at the end of time, when our Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the sound of a trumpet, Satan's kingdom shall be completely ruined, and not till then, when all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be effectually and eternally put down.

Verses 17–27

The people had religiously observed the orders given them concerning the besieging of Jericho, and now at length Joshua had told them (v. 16), "The Lord hath given you the city, enter and take possession."

I. The rules they were to observe in taking possession. 1. The city shall be a cherem, a devoted thing, it and all therein, to the Lord. No life in it might be ransomed upon any terms. Only, when this severity is ordered, Rahab and her family are excepted: She shall live and all that are with her. She had distinguished herself from her neighbours by the kindness she showed to Israel. 2. All the treasure of it, the money and plate and valuable goods, must be consecrated to the service of the tabernacle. God had promised them a land flowing with milk and honey, not a land abounding with silver and gold. He would have them to reckon themselves enriched in the enriching of the tabernacle. 3. A particular caution is given them to take heed of meddling with the forbidding spoil; "In any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing; check yourselves, and frighten yourselves from having anything to do with it." He speaks as if he foresaw the sin of Achan, which we have an account of in the next chapter.

II. The entrance that was opened to them into the city by the sudden fall of the walls. That which the inhabitants trusted to for defence proved their destruction. The sudden fall of the wall, no doubt, put the inhabitants into such a consternation that they had no strength nor spirit to make any resistance, but they became an easy prey to the sword of Israel. Thus shall Satan's kingdom fall, nor shall any prosper that harden themselves against God.

III. The execution of the orders given concerning this devoted city. 1. All that breathed were put to the sword. If they had not had a divine warrant under the seal of miracles for this execution, it could not have been justified, nor can it justify the like now, when we are sure no such warrant can be produced. The spirit of the gospel is very different, for Christ came not to destroy men's lives but to save them, Luke ix. 56. Christ's victories were of another nature. 2. The city was burnt with fire, and all that was in it, v. 24. 3. All the silver and gold, and all those vessels which were capable of being purified by fire, were brought into the treasury of the house of the Lord.

IV. The preservation of Rahab the harlot, or innkeeper, who perished not with those that believed not, Heb. xi. 31. The public faith was engaged for her safety by the two spies. The same persons that she had secured were employed to secure her, v. 22, 23. All her kindred were saved with her. Now being preserved alive, 1. She was left for some time without the camp to be purified from the Gentile superstition, which she was to renounce, and to be prepared for her admission as a proselyte. 2. She was in due time incorporated with the church of Israel, and she and her posterity dwelt in Israel, and her family was remarkable long after. We find her the wife of Salmon, prince of Judah, mother of Boaz, and named among the ancestors of our Saviour, Matt. i. 5.

V. Jericho is condemned to a perpetual desolation, and a curse pronounced upon the man that at any time hereafter should offer to rebuild it (v. 26). The situation of the city was very pleasant, and probably its nearness to Jordan was an advantage to it, which would tempt men to build upon the same spot; but they are here told it is at their peril if they do it. Men build for their posterity, but he that builds Jericho shall have no posterity to enjoy what he builds. This curse did come upon that man who long after rebuilded Jericho (1 Kings xvi. 34), but we are not to think it made the place ever the worse when it was built, or brought any hurt to those that inhabited it. We find Jericho afterwards graced with the presence, not only of those two great prophets Elijah and Elisha, but of our blessed Saviour himself, Luke xviii. 35; xix. 1; Matt. xx. 29.

CHAP. VII

More than once we have found the affairs of Israel, even when they were in the happiest posture and gave the most hopeful prospects, perplexed and embarrassed by sin, and in this chapter we have another instance of the interruption given to the progress of their arms by sin. But it being only the sin of one person or family, and soon expiated, the consequences were not so mischievous. We have here, I. The sin of Achan in meddling with the accursed thing, ver. 1. II. The defeat of Israel before Ai thereupon, ver. 2–5. III. Joshua's humiliation and prayer on occasion of that sad disaster, ver. 6–9. IV. The directions God gave him for the putting away of the guilt, ver. 10–15. V. The discovery, trial, conviction, condemnation, and execution, of the criminal, ver. 16–26. And by this story it appears that, as the laws, so Canaan itself, "made nothing perfect," the perfection both of holiness and peace to God's Israel is to be expected in the heavenly Canaan only.

Verses 1–5

The story of this chapter begins with a but. The Lord was with Joshua, and his fame was noised through all that country, so the foregoing chapter ends. But the children of Israel committed a trespass, and so set God against them. If we lose our God, we lose our friends, who cannot help us unless God be for us.

I. Achan sinning, v. 1. The sin is here said to be taking of the accursed thing, in disobedience to the command and in defiance of the threatening, ch. vi. 18. In the sacking of Jericho compassion was put off and yielded to the law, but covetousness was indulged. The love of the world is that root of bitterness which of all others is most hardly rooted up. Yet the history of Achan is a plain intimation that he of all the thousands of Israel was the only delinquent in this matter. And yet, though it was a single person that sinned, the children of Israel are said to commit the trespass, because one of their body did it, and he was not as yet separated from them, nor disowned by them. They did it, that is, by what Achan did guilt was brought upon the whole society of which he was a member. This should be a warning to us to take heed of sin ourselves, lest by it many be defiled or disquieted (Heb. xii. 15). Many a careful tradesman has been broken by a careless partner. And it concerns us to watch over one another for the preventing of sin.

II. The camp of Israel suffering for the same: The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel; he saw the offence, though they did not, and takes a course to make them see it. 1. Joshua sends a detachment to seize upon the next city that was in their way, and that was Ai. Only 3000 men were sent, advice being brought him by his spies that the place was inconsiderable, and needed no greater force for the reduction of it, v. 2, 3. They are but few (say the spies), but, as few as they were, they were too many for them. It will awaken our care and diligence in our Christian warfare to consider that we wrestle with principalities and powers. 2. The party he sent, in their first attack upon the town, were repulsed with some loss (v. 4, 5). It served, (1) To humble God's Israel. (2) To harden the Canaanites, and to make them the more secure. (3) To be an evidence of God's displeasure against Israel, and a call to them to purge out the old leaven. And this was principally intended in their defeat. 3. The retreat of this party in disorder put the whole camp of Israel into a fright: The hearts of the people melted, not so much for the loss as for the disappointment. To every thinking man among them it appeared an indication of God's displeasure.

Verses 6–9

An account of the deep concern Joshua was in upon this sad occasion.

I. How he grieved: He rent his clothes (v. 6), in token of great sorrow for this public disaster, and especially a dread of God's displeasure, which was certainly the cause of it. One of the bravest soldiers that ever was owned that his flesh trembled for fear of God, Ps. cxix. 120. As one humbling himself under the mighty hand of God, he fell to the earth upon his face. The elders of Israel, being interested in the cause and influenced by his example, prostrated themselves with him, and, in token of deep humiliation, put dust upon their heads, not only as mourners, but as penitents. His eye is upon God as displeased, and that troubles him.

II. How he prayed, or pleaded rather, humbly expostulating the case with God, not sullen, as David when the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah, but much affected; his spirit seemed to be somewhat ruffled and discomposed, yet not so as to be put out of frame for prayer; but, by giving vent to his trouble in a humble address to God, he keeps his temper and it ends well. 1. Now he wishes they had all taken up with the lot of the two tribes on the other side Jordan, v. 7. Those words, wherefore hast thou brought us over Jordan to destroy us? are too like what the murmurers often said (Exod. xiv. 11, 12; xvi. 3; xvii. 3; Num. xiv. 2, 3); but he that searches the heart knew they came from another spirit, and therefore was not extreme to mark what he said amiss. 2. He speaks as one quite at a loss concerning the meaning of this event (v. 8). Is the Lord's arm shortened? Note, The methods of Providence are often intricate and perplexing, and such as the wisest and best of men know not what to say to; but they shall know hereafter, John xiii. 7. 3. He pleads the danger Israel was now in of being ruined. Thus even good men, when things go against them a little, are too apt to fear the worst. But this comes in here as a plea: "Lord, let not Israel's name, which has been so dear to thee and so great in the world, be cut off." 4. He pleads the reproach that would be cast on God, and that if Israel were ruined his glory would suffer by it. He feared it would reflect on God, his wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness; what would the Egyptians say? Note, Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul than dishonour done to God's name. We cannot urge a better plea than this, Lord, What wilt thou do for thy great name? Let God in all be glorified, and then welcome his whole will.

Verses 10–15

God's answer to Joshua's address. And let those that find themselves under the tokens of God's displeasure never complain of him, but complain to him, and they shall receive an answer of peace. The answer came immediately.

I. God encourages Joshua against his present despondencies: "Get thee up, suffer not thy spirits to droop and sink thus; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?" Now God told him it was enough, he would not have him continue any longer in that melancholy posture, for God delights not in the grief of penitents when they afflict their souls further than as it qualifies them for pardon and peace. Joshua continued his mourning till eventide (v. 6). It is time for him to lay aside his mourning weeds, and put on his judge's robes, and clothe himself with zeal as a cloak. Weeping must not hinder sowing, nor one duty of religion jostle out another.

II. He informs him of the true and only cause of this disaster (v. 11): Israel hath sinned. The sinner is not named, though the sin is described, but it is spoken of as the act of Israel in general. Observe how the sin is here made to appear exceedingly sinful. 1. They have transgressed my covenant, an express precept with a penalty annexed to it. It was agreed that God should have all the spoil of Jericho, and they should have the spoil of the rest of the cities of Canaan; but, in robbing God of his part, they transgressed this covenant. 2. They have even taken of the devoted thing. 3. They have also stolen; they did it clandestinely, as if they could conceal it from the divine omniscience. 4. They have dissembled also. Achan joined with the rest in a general protestation of innocency, and kept his countenance, like the adulterous woman that eats and wipes her mouth, and says, I have done no wickedness. Nay, 5. They have put the accursed thing among their own goods, as if they had as good a title to that as to anything they have. God could at this time have told him who the person was that had done this thing, but he does not, (1) To exercise the zeal of Joshua and Israel, in searching out the criminal. (2) To give the sinner himself space to repent and make confession. But Achan never discovering himself till the lot discovered him evidenced the hardness of his heart, and therefore he found no mercy.

III. He awakens him to enquire further into it, by telling him, 1. That this was the only ground for the controversy so that when this accursed thing was put away he needed not fear. 2. That if this accursed thing were not destroyed they could not expect the return of God's gracious presence. By personal repentance and reformation, we destroy the accursed thing in our own hearts, and, unless we do this, we must never expect the favour of the blessed God.

IV. He directs him in what method to make this enquiry and prosecution. 1. He must sanctify the people, now over-night, that is, as it is explained, he must command them to sanctify themselves, v. 13. And what can either magistrates or ministers do more towards sanctification? They must put themselves into a suitable frame to appear before God and submit to the divine scrutiny. 2. He must bring them all under the scrutiny of the lot (v. 14); the tribe which the guilty person was of should first be discovered by lot, then the family, then the household, and last of all the person. The conviction came upon him thus gradually that he might have some space given him to come in and surrender himself; for God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. 3. When the criminal was found out he must be put to death without mercy (Heb. x. 28). It was sacrilege; this was the crime to be thus severely punished, for warning to all people in all ages to take heed how they rob God.

Verses 16–26

I. The discovery of Achan by the lot. In the scrutiny observe, 1. That the guilty tribe was that of Judah, which was, and was to be, of all the tribes, the most honourable and illustrious. The Jews' tradition is that when the tribe of Judah was taken the valiant men of that tribe drew their swords, and professed they would not sheathe them again till they saw the criminal punished and themselves cleared who knew their own innocency. 2. That the guilty person was at length fastened upon, and the language of the lot was, Thou art the man, v. 18. It was strange that Achan, being conscious to himself of guilt, when he saw the lot come nearer and nearer to him, had not either the wit to make an escape or the grace to make a confession. See here, (1) The folly of those that promise themselves secrecy in sin: the righteous God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness. (2) How much it is our concern, when God is contending with us, to find out what the particular sin is, and pray earnestly with holy Job, Lord, show me wherefore thou contendest with me.

II. His arraignment and examination, v. 19. Joshua sits judge, and urges him to make a penitent confession, that his soul might be saved by it in the other world. Observe, 1. How he accosts him with the greatest tenderness. He might justly have called him "thief", and "rebel", "Raca", and "thou fool", but he calls him "son"; he might have adjured him to confess, as the high priest did our blessed Saviour, or threatened him with the torture to extort a confession, but for love's sake he rather beseeches him: I pray thee make confession. This is an example to all not to insult over those that are in misery, though they have brought themselves into it by their own wickedness. It is likewise an example to magistrates never to be transported into any indecencies of behaviour or language towards those that have given the greatest provocations. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. 2. What he wishes him to do, to confess the fact. Joshua was to him in God's stead, so that in confessing to him he confessed to God. Note, In confessing sin, as we take shame to ourselves, so we give glory to God as a righteous God, owning him justly displeased with us, and as a good God, who will not improve our confessions as evidences against us, but is faithful and just to forgive when we are brought to own that he would be faithful and just if he should punish. By sin we have injured God in his honour. Christ by his death has made satisfaction for the injury; but it is required that we by repentance show our good will to his honour, and, as far as in us lies, give glory to him.

III. His confession, which now at last, when he saw it was to no purpose to conceal his crime, was free and ingenuous enough, v. 20, 21. Here is, 1. A penitent acknowledgment of the fault. 2. A particular narrative of the fact: Thus and thus have I done. Note, It becomes penitents, in the confession of their sins to God, to be very particular; not only, "I have sinned," but, "In this and that instance I have sinned." He confesses, (1) To the things taken. In plundering a house in Jericho he found a goodly Babylonish garment; the word signifies a robe, such as princes wore when they appeared in state. "A thousand pities" (thinks Achan) "that it should be burnt; it will serve me many a year for my best garment." Under these pretences he makes bold with this first, but, his hand being thus in, he proceeds to take a bag of money, two hundred shekels, that is, one hundred ounces of silver, and a wedge of gold which weighed fifty shekels, that is, twenty-five ounces. He could not plead that, in taking these, he saved them from the fire, but those that make a slight excuse to serve in daring to commit one sin will venture upon the next without such an excuse; for the way of sin is downhill. See what a poor prize it was for which Achan ran this desperate hazard. See Matt. xvi. 26. (2) He confesses the manner of taking them. [1] The sin began in the eye. He saw these fine things, as Eve saw the forbidden fruit, and was strangely charmed with the sight. See what comes of suffering the heart to walk after the eyes, and what need we have to make this covenant with our eyes, that if they wander they shall be sure to weep for it. Look not thou upon the wine that is red, upon the woman that is fair. [2] It proceeded out of the heart. He owns, I coveted them. Thus lust conceived and brought forth this sin. Those that would be kept from sinful actions must mortify and check in themselves sinful desires. It was not the looking, but the lusting that ruined him. [3] When he had committed it he was very industrious to conceal it. See the deceitfulness of sin; that which is pleasing in the commission is bitter in the reflection; at the last it bites like a serpent.

IV. His conviction. God had convicted him by the lot; he had convicted himself by his own confession. Joshua has him further convicted by the searching of his tent, in which the goods were found which he confessed to.

V. His condemnation. Joshua passes sentence upon him (v. 25): Why hast thou troubled us? Note, Sin is a very troublesome thing, not only to the sinner himself, but to all about him. Now (says Joshua) God shall trouble thee. See why Achan was so severely dealt with, not only because he had robbed God, but because he had troubled Israel; over his head he had (as it were) this accusation written, "Achan, the troubler of Israel," as Ahab, 1 Kings xviii. 18. Some of the Jewish doctors, from that word which determines the troubling of him to this day, infer that therefore he should not be troubled in the world to come; the flesh was destroyed that the spirit might be saved, and, if so, the dispensation was really less severe than it seemed.

VI. His execution.

1. The place of execution. The execution was at a distance, that the camp which was disturbed by Achan's sin might not be defiled by his death.

2. The persons employed in his execution. It was the act of all Israel, v. 24, 25.

3. The partakers with him in the punishment; for he perished not alone in his iniquity, ch. xxii. 20. (1) The stolen goods were destroyed with him. (2) All his other goods were destroyed likewise, not only his tent, and the furniture of that, but his oxen, asses, and sheep. Those lose their own that grasp at more than their own. (3) His sons and daughters were put to death with him. Some indeed think that they were brought out (v. 24) only to be the spectators of their father's punishment. Perhaps his sons and daughters were aiders and abettors in the villainy, had helped to carry off the accursed thing. It is very probable that they assisted in the concealment.

4. The punishment itself that was inflicted on him. He was stoned (some think as a sabbath breaker, supposing that the sacrilege was committed on the sabbath day), and then his dead body was burnt.

5. The pacifying of God's wrath hereby (v. 26): The Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

VII. The record of his conviction and execution. Care was taken to preserve the remembrance of it, for warning and instruction to posterity. 1. A heap of stones was raised on the place where Achan was executed, every one perhaps of the congregation throwing a stone to the heap, in token of his detestation of the crime. 2. A new name was given to the place; it was called the Valley of Achor, or trouble. The Valley of Achor is said to be given for a door of hope, because when we put away the accursed thing then there begins to be hope in Israel, Hos. ii. 15; Ezra x. 2.

CHAP. VIII

Here is, I. The glorious progress of their arms in the taking of Ai, before which they had lately suffered disgrace. 1. God encourages Joshua to attack it, with the assurance of success, ver. 1, 2. 2. Joshua gives orders accordingly to the men of war, ver. 3–8. 3. The stratagem succeeds, ver. 9–22. 4. Joshua becomes master of this city, puts all the inhabitants to the sword, burns it, hangs the king, but gives the plunder to the soldiers, ver. 23–29. II. The great solemnity of writing and reading the law before a general assembly of all Israel, drawn up for that purpose upon the two mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, ver. 30–35.

Verses 1–2

It should seem, Joshua was now at a stand and could not think, without fear and trembling, of pushing forward, lest there should be in the camp another Achan; then God spoke to him, either by vision, as before (ch. v), as a man of war with his sword drawn, or by the breastplate of judgment. Note, When we have faithfully put away sin, that accursed thing, we may expect to hear from God to our comfort; and God's directing us how to go on in our Christian work and warfare is a good evidence of his being reconciled to us.

I. The encouragement God gives to Joshua to proceed: Fear not, neither be thou dismayed, v. 1. Corruptions within the church weaken the hands, and damp the spirits, of her guides and helpers, more than oppositions from without; treacherous Israelites are to be dreaded more than malicious Canaanites. But God bids Joshua not be dismayed; the same power that keeps Israel from being ruined by their enemies shall keep them from ruining themselves. To animate him, 1. He assures him of success against Ai, tells him it is all his own; but he must take it as God's gift. 2. He allows the people to take the spoil to themselves. Here the spoil was not consecrated to God as that of Jericho.

II. The direction he gives him in attacking Ai. It must not be such a work of time as the taking of Jericho was. Nor was it, as that, to be taken by miracle, but now their own conduct and courage must be exercised; having seen God work for them, they must now bestir themselves. God directs him, 1. To take all the people. 2. To lay an ambush behind the city.

We have here an account of the taking of Ai by stratagem. Nothing was dissembled, nothing counterfeited, but a retreat. The enemy ought to have been upon their guard, and to have kept within the defence of their own walls. Common prudence, had they been governed by it, would have directed them not to venture on the pursuit of an army which they saw was so far superior to them in numbers, and leave their city unguarded; but si populus vult decipi, decipiatur—if the people will be deceived, let them.

I. There is some difficulty in adjusting the numbers that were employed to effect it. Mention is made (v. 3) of 30,000 that were chosen and sent away by night, to whom the charge was given to surprise the city as soon as ever they perceived it was evacuated, v. 4, 7, 8. And yet afterwards (v. 12) it is said, Joshua took 5000 men and set them to lie in ambush behind the city, and that ambush entered the city, and set it on fire, v. 19. Now, 1. Some think there were two parties sent out to lie in ambush, and that Joshua made his open attack upon the city with all the thousands of Israel. But, 2. Others think that all the people were taken only to encamp before the city, and that out of them Joshua chose out 30,000 men to be employed in the action, out of which he sent out 5000 to lie in ambush, which were as many as could be supposed to march incognito—without being discovered.

II. Yet the principal parts of the story are plain enough, that a detachment being secretly marched behind the city, on the other side to that on which the main body of the army lay, Joshua, and the forces with him, faced the city; the garrison made a vigorous sally out upon them, whereupon they withdrew, gave ground, and retreated in some seeming disorder towards the wilderness, which being perceived by the men of Ai, they drew out all the force they had to pursue them. This gave a fair opportunity for those that lay in ambush to make themselves masters of the city, whereof when they had given notice by a smoke to Joshua, he, with all his force, returned upon the pursuers, who now, when it was too late, were aware of the snare they were drawn into, and, their retreat being intercepted, they were every man of them cut off.

1. What a brave commander Joshua was. Though an army of Israelites had been repulsed before Ai, yet he resolves to lead them on in person the second time, v. 5. He went that night into the midst of the valley, to make the necessary dispositions for an attack. It is the pious conjecture of the learned bishop Patrick that he went into the valley alone, to pray to God. When he had stretched out his spear towards the city (v. 18, a spear almost as fatal and formidable to the enemies of Israel as the rod of Moses was) he never drew back his hand till the work was done. Those that have stretched out their hands against their spiritual enemies must never draw them back. Joshua conquered by yielding, as if he had himself been conquered; so our Lord Jesus, when he bowed his head and gave up the ghost, seemed as if death had triumphed over him, and as if he and all his interests had been routed and ruined; but in his resurrection he rallied again and gave the powers of darkness a total defeat; he broke the serpent's head, by suffering him to bruise his heel. A glorious stratagem!

2. What an obedient people Israel was. What Joshua commanded them to do, according to the commandment of the Lord (v. 8), they did it without murmuring or disputing.

3. What an infatuated enemy the king of Ai was! He did not by his scouts discover those that lay in ambush behind the city, v. 14. From the killing of thirty-six men out of 3000, when Israel made the former attack upon his city, he inferred the total routing of so great an army as now he had to deal with (v. 6): They flee before us as at the first. See how the prosperity of fools destroys them and hardens them to their ruin.

4. What a complete victory Israel obtained over them by the favour and blessing of God. Each did his part.

Verses 23 29

We have here an account of the improvement which the Israelites made of their victory over Ai. 1. They put all to the sword. Here it is said (v. 26) that Joshua drew not his hand back wherewith he stretched out the spear (v. 18). Some think the spear he stretched out was not to slay the enemies, but to animate and encourage his own soldiers. He kept the inferior post of a standard-bearer, and did not quit it till the work was done. By the spear stretched out, he directed the people to expect their help from God, and to him to give the praise. 2. They plundered the city and took all the spoil to themselves, v. 27. 3. They laid the city in ashes, and left it to remain so, v. 28. Israel must yet dwell in tents, and therefore this city, as well as Jericho, must be burnt. 4. The king of Ai was taken prisoner and hanged, and his dead body thrown at the gate of his own city, under a heap of stones, v. 23, 29. It is likely he had been notoriously wicked and vile, and a blasphemer of the God of Israel, perhaps upon occasion of the repulse he had given to the forces of Israel in their first onset.

Verses 30–35

This religious solemnity of which we have here an account comes in somewhat surprisingly in the midst of the history of the wars of Canaan. Here a scene opens of quite another nature; the camp of Israel is drawn out into the field, not to engage the enemy, but to offer sacrifice, to hear the law read, and to say Amen to the blessings and the curses. It is a remarkable instance, 1. Of the zeal of Israel for the service of God and for his honour. The business of the war shall stand still, while they make a long march to the place appointed, and there attend this solemnity. The way to prosper is to begin with God, Matt. vi. 33. 2. It is an instance of the care of God concerning his faithful servants and worshippers. Though they were in an enemy's country, as yet unconquered, yet in the service of God they were safe. It was a federal transaction: the covenant was now renewed between God and Israel upon their taking possession of the land of promise, that they might be encouraged in the conquest of it, and might know upon what terms they held it, and come under fresh obligations to obedience. In token of the covenant,

I. They built an altar, and offered sacrifice to God (v. 30, 31), in token of their dedication of themselves to God, as living sacrifices to his honour, in and by a Mediator, who is the altar that sanctifies this gift. This altar was erected on Mount Ebal. The curses pronounced on Mount Ebal would immediately have been executed if atonement had not been made by sacrifice. By the sacrifices offered on this altar they did likewise give God the glory of the victories they had already obtained, as Exod. xvii. 15. The altar they built was of rough unhewn stone, according to the law (Exod. xx. 25), for that which is most plain and natural, and least artful and affected, in the worship of God, he is best pleased with.

II. They received the law from God; and this those must do that would find favour with him, and expect to have their offerings accepted. Now here,

1. The law of the ten commandments was written upon stones in the presence of all Israel, as an abridgement of the whole, v. 32. But the stones were plastered, and it was written upon the plaster, Deut. xxvii. 4, 8. It was written, that all might see what it was that they consented to.

2. The blessings and the curses, the sanctions of the law, were publicly read, and the people (we may suppose), according to Moses's appointment, said Amen to them, v. 33, 34.

(1) The auditory was very large. [1] The greatest prince was not excused. [2] The poorest stranger was not excluded. This was an encouragement to proselytes, and a happy presage of the kindnesses intended for the poor Gentiles in the latter days.

(2) The tribes were posted, as Moses directed, six towards Gerizim and six towards Ebal. And the ark in the midst of the valley was between them, for it was the ark of the covenant; and in it were shut up the close rolls of that law which was copied out and shown openly upon the stones. The covenant was commanded, and the command covenanted. The priests that attended the ark, or some of the Levites that attended them, after the people had all taken their places, and silence was proclaimed, pronounced distinctly the blessings and the curses, as Moses had drawn them up, to which the tribes said Amen; and yet it is here only said that they should bless the people, for the blessing was that which was first and chiefly intended, and which God designed in giving the law. If they fell under the curse, that was their own fault.

3. The law itself also containing the precepts and prohibitions was read (v. 35), it should seem by Joshua himself.

CHAP. IX

Here is in this chapter, I. The impolitic confederacy of the kings of Canaan against Israel, ver. 1, 2. II. The politic confederacy of the inhabitants of Gideon with Israel. 1. How it was subtly proposed and petitioned for by the Gibeonites pretending to come from a far country, ver. 3–13. 2. How it was unwarily consented to by Joshua and the Israelites, to the disgust of the congregation when the fraud was discovered, ver. 14–18. 3. How the matter was adjusted to the satisfaction of all sides, by giving these Gibeonites their lives because they had covenanted with them, yet depriving them of their liberties because the covenant was not fairly obtained, ver. 19–27.

Verses 1–2

Hitherto the Canaanites had acted defensively; the Israelites were the aggressors upon Jericho and Ai. But here the kings of Canaan are in consultation to attack Israel, and concert matters for a vigorous effort of their united forces to check the progress of their victorious arms. When they heard thereof (v. 1), not only of the conquest of Jericho and Ai, but of the convention of the states of Mount Ebal—when they heard that Joshua, as if he thought himself already completely master of the country, had had all his people together, and had read the laws to them by which they must be governed, and taken their promises to submit to those laws—then they perceived the Israelites were in good earnest, and thought it was high time for them to bestir themselves. Though they were many kings of different nations, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, &c., doubtless of different interests, and that had often been at variance one with another, yet they determined, nemine contradicente—unanimously, to unite against Israel.

I. The Gibeonites desire to make peace with Israel, being alarmed by the tidings they heard of the destruction of Jericho, v. 3. Other people heard those tidings, and were irritated thereby to make war upon Israel; but the Gibeonites heard them and were induced to make peace with them. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. These four united cities (mentioned v. 17) seem to have been governed by elders, or senators (v. 11), who consulted the common safety more than their own personal dignity. The inhabitants of Gibeon did well for themselves.

II. The method they took to compass it. They knew that all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan were to be cut off, and therefore there was no way of saving their lives from the sword of Israel unless they could, by disguising themselves, make Joshua believe that they came from some very far country, which the Israelites were not commanded to make war upon nor forbidden to make peace with, but were particularly appointed to offer peace to, Deut. xx. 10, 15. This therefore is the only game they have to play, and observe,

1. They play it very artfully and successfully. Never was any such thing more craftily managed.

(1) They come under the character of ambassadors from a foreign state, which they thought would please the princes of Israel, and make them proud of the honour of being courted by distant countries.

(2) They pretended to have undergone the fatigues of a very long journey, and produced what passed for an ocular demonstration of it. Now they here pretended that their provision, when they brought it from home, was fresh and new, but now it appeared to be old and dry. Their shoes and clothes were worse than those of the Israelites in forty years, and their bread was mouldy, v. 4, 5, and again, v. 12, 13.

(3) When they were suspected, and more strictly examined as to whence they came, they industriously declined telling the name of their country, till the agreement was settled. [1] The men of Israel suspected a fraud (v. 7): "Peradventure you dwell among us, and then we may not, we must not, make any league with you." [2] Joshua put the questions to them, Who are you? and whence come you? [3] They would not tell whence they came; but still repeat the same thing: We have come from a very far country, v. 9.

(4) They profess a respect for the God of Israel, the more to ingratiate themselves with Joshua, and we charitably believe they were sincere in this profession: We have come because of the name of the Lord thy God (v. 9).

(5) They fetch their inducements from what had been done some time before in Moses's reign, the plagues of Egypt and the destruction of Sihon and Og (v. 9, 10), but prudently say nothing of the destruction of Jericho and Ai because they will have it supposed that they came from home long before those conquests were made.

(6) They make a general submission—We are your servants; and humbly sue for a general agreement—Make a league with us, v. 11. But,

2. There is a mixture of good and evil in their conduct. (1) Their falsehood cannot be justified, nor ought it to be drawn into a precedent. It is observable that when they had once said, We have come from a far country (v. 6), they found themselves necessitated to say it again (v. 9), and to say what was utterly false concerning their bread, their bottles, and their clothes (v. 12, 13), for one lie is an inlet to another, and that to a third, and so on. But, (2) Their faith and prudence are to be greatly commended. Our Lord commended even the unjust steward, because he had done wisely and well for himself, Luke xvi. 8. In submitting to Israel, they submitted to the God of Israel, which implied a renunciation of the god they had served. They did not stay till Israel had besieged their cities; then it would have been too late to capitulate; but when they were at some distance they desired conditions of peace. The way to avoid a judgment is to meet it by repentance. Let us imitate these Gibeonites, and make our peace with God in the rags of humiliation, godly sorrow, and mortification, so our iniquity shall not be our ruin. Let us be servants to Jesus, our blessed Joshua, and make a league with him and the Israel of God, and we shall live.

Verses 15–21

Here is, I. The treaty soon concluded with the Gibeonites, v. 15. The thing was not done with much formality, but in short, 1. They agreed to let them live, and more the Gibeonites did not ask. 2. This agreement was made not by Joshua only, but by the princes of the congregation in conjunction with him. 3. It was ratified by an oath; they swore unto them, not by any of the gods of Canaan, but by the God of Israel only, v. 19. 4. Nothing appears to have been culpable in all this but that it was done rashly. Making use of their senses only, but not their reason, they received the men (as the margin reads it) because of their victuals, upon the view and taste of their bread. But they asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord. Joshua himself was not altogether without blame herein. Note, We make more haste than good speed in any business when we stay not to take God along with us, and by the word and prayer to consult him.

II. The fraud soon discovered, by which this league was procured. A lying tongue is but for a moment, and truth will be the daughter of time. Within three days they found, to their great surprise, that the cities which these ambassadors had treated for were very near them, but one night's footmarch from the camp at Gilgal, ch. x. 9.

III. The disgust of the congregation at this. They did indeed submit to the restraints which this league laid upon them, and smote not the cities of the Gibeonites, neither slew the persons nor seized the prey; but it vexed them to have their hands thus tied, and they murmured against the princes (v. 18).

IV. The prudent endeavour of the princes to pacify the discontented congregation doubtless disposed the people to acquiesce.

1. They resolved to spare the lives of the Gibeonites, for so they had expressly sworn to do (v. 15), to let them live. (1) The oath was lawful. (2) The oath being lawful, both the princes and the people for whom they transacted were bound by it, bound in conscience, bound in honour to the God of Israel, by whom they had sworn, and whose name would have been blasphemed by the Canaanites if they had violated this oath. The princes would keep their word, [1] Though they lost by it. A citizen of Zion swears to his own hurt and changes not, Ps. xv. 4. [2] Though the people were uneasy at it, and their discontent might have ended in a mutiny, yet the princes would not violate their engagement to the Gibeonites; we must never be overawed, either by majesty or multitude, to do a sinful thing, and go against our consciences. [3] Though they were drawn into this league by a wile, and might have had a very plausible pretence to declare it null and void, yet they adhered to it. Let this convince us all how religiously we ought to perform our promises, and make good our bargains; and what conscience we ought to make of our words when they are once given. If a covenant obtained by so many lies and deceits might not be broken, shall we think to evade the obligation of those that have been made with all possible honesty and fairness?

2. Though they spared their lives, yet they seized their liberties, and sentenced them to be hewers of wood and drawers of water to the congregation, v. 21. By this proposal the discontented congregation was pacified.

Verses 22–27

The matter is here settled between Joshua and the Gibeonites.

I. Joshua reproves them for their fraud, v. 22. And they excuse it as well as they can, v. 24. 1. Joshua gives the reproof very mildly: Wherefore have you beguiled us? 2. They make the best excuse for themselves, that the thing would bear, v. 24. They considered that God's sovereignty is incontestable, his justice inflexible, his power irresistible, and therefore resolved to try what his mercy was, and found it was not in vain to cast themselves upon it. They do not go about to justify their lie, but in effect beg pardon for it, pleading it was purely to save their lives that they did it.

II. Joshua condemns them to servitude, as a punishment of their fraud (v. 23), and they submit to the sentence (v. 25), and for aught that appears both sides are pleased.

1. Joshua pronounces them perpetual bondmen. Observe how the judgment is given against them. (1) Their servitude is made a curse to them. (2) Yet this curse is turned into a blessing; they must be servants, but it shall be for the house of my God. The princes would have them slaves unto all the congregation (v. 21), but Joshua mitigates the sentence, both in honour to God and in favour to the Gibeonites. Even servile work becomes honourable when it is done for the house of our God and the offices thereof. [1] They were hereby excluded from the liberties and privileges of true-born Israelites. [2] They were hereby employed in such services as required their personal attendance upon the altar of God in the place which he should choose (v. 27), which would bring them to the knowledge of the law of God. [3] This would be a great advantage to the priests and Levites to have so many, and those mighty men, constant attendants upon them, and engaged by office to do all the drudgery of the tabernacle. A great deal of wood must be hewed for fuel for God's house. And a great deal of water must be drawn for the divers washings which the law prescribed. [4] They were herein servants to the congregation too; for whatever promotes and helps forward the worship of God is real service to the commonwealth. Gibeonites were afterwards called Nethinim, men given to the Levites, as the Levites were to the priests (Num. iii. 9), to minister to them in the service of God. [5] This may be looked upon as typifying the admission of the Gentiles into the gospel church.

2. They submit to this condition, v. 25. Do as it seemeth right unto thee. Accordingly the matter was determined. And thus Israel's bondmen became the Lord's freemen, for his service in the meanest office is liberty, and his work is its own wages. Let us, in like manner, submit to our Lord Jesus, and refer our lives to him. If he appoint us to bear his cross, and draw in his yoke, and serve at his altar, this shall be afterwards neither shame nor grief to us.

CHAP. X

We have in this chapter an account of the conquest of the kings and kingdoms of the southern part of the land of Canaan, as, in the next chapter, of the reduction of the northern parts. In this chapter we have an account, I. Of the routing of their forces in the field, in which observe, 1. Their confederacy against the Gibeonites, ver. 1–5. 2. The Gibeonites' request to Joshua to assist them, ver. 6. 3. Joshua's speedy march under divine encouragement for their relief, ver. 7–9. 4. The defeat of the armies of these confederate kings, ver. 10, 11. 5. The miraculous prolonging of the day by the standing still of the sun, in favour of the conquerors, ver. 12–14. II. Of the execution of the kings that escaped out of the battle, ver. 15–27. III. Of the taking of the particular cities, and the total destruction of all that were found in them. Makkedah, ver. 28. Libnah, ver. 29, 30. Lachish, ver. 31, 32, and the king of Gezer that attempted its rescue, ver. 33. Eglon, ver. 34, 35. Hebron, ver. 36, 37. Debir, ver. 38, 39. And the bringing of all that country into the hands of Israel, ver. 40–42. And, lastly, the return of the army to their headquarters, ver. 43.

Verses 1–6

Joshua and the hosts of Israel were made masters of Jericho by a miracle, of Ai by stratagem, and of Gibeon by surrender, and that was all. Those among them that were impatient of delays, it is probable, complained of Joshua's slowness, and asked why they did not immediately penetrate into the heart of the country, before the enemy could rally their forces. Thus Joshua's prudence, perhaps, was censured as slothfulness, cowardice, and want of spirit. But, 1. Canaan was not to be conquered in a day. God had said that by little and little he would drive out the Canaanites, Exod. xxiii. 30. 2. Joshua waited for the Canaanites to be the aggressors.

After Israel had waited awhile for an occasion to make war upon the Canaanites, a fair one offers itself. 1. Five kings combine against the Gibeonites. Adonizedec king of Jerusalem was the first mover and ringleader of this confederacy. It seems he was a bad man, and an implacable enemy to the posterity of that Abraham to whom his predecessor, Melchizedek, was such a faithful friend. Come, says he, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon. This he resolves to do, either, (1) In policy, that he might retake the city, because it was a strong city, and of great consequence to his country in whose hands it was; or, (2) In passion, that he might chastise the citizens for making peace with Joshua, pretending that they had perfidiously betrayed their country. 2. The Gibeonites send notice to Joshua of the distress and danger they are in, v. 6. They think Joshua obliged to help them, (1) In conscience, because they were his servants. (2) In honour, because the ground of their enemies' quarrel with them was the respect they had shown to Israel. When our spiritual enemies set themselves in array against us, and threaten to swallow us up, let us, by faith and prayer, apply to Christ, our Joshua, for strength and succour, as Paul did, and we shall receive the same answer of peace, My grace is sufficient for thee, 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9.

Verses 7–14

Here, I. Joshua resolves to assist the Gibeonites, and God encourages him in this resolve. 1. He ascended from Gigal (v. 7), determined to relieve Gibeon. He knew that when they embraced the faith and worship of the God of Israel they came to trust under the shadow of his wings (Ruth ii. 12), and therefore, as his servants, he was bound to protect them. 2. God animated him for his undertaking, (v. 8): Fear not, that is, (1) "Doubt not of the goodness of thy cause and the clearness of thy call." (2) "Dread not the power of the enemy; I have delivered them into thy hand."

II. Joshua applies himself to execute this resolve, and God assists him in the execution. Here we have,

1. The great industry of Joshua, and the power of God working with it for the defeat of the enemy. In this action, Joshua showed his goodwill in the haste he made for the relief of Gibeon (v. 9). Now that things were ripe for execution no man more expeditious than Joshua, who before had seemed slow. He marched all night, resolving not to give sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eye-lids, till he had accomplished this enterprise. Let the good soldiers of Jesus Christ learn hence to endure hardness, in following the Lamb whithersoever he goes, and not think themselves undone if their religion lose them now and then a night's sleep; it will be enough to rest when we come to heaven. But why needed Joshua to put himself and his men so much to the stretch? Had not God promised him that without fail he would deliver the enemies into his hand? It is true he had; but God's promises are intended, not to slacken and supersede, but to quicken and encourage our endeavours. The Lord discomfited them before Israel. Israel did what they could, and yet God did all.

2. The great faith of Joshua, and the power of God crowning it with the miraculous arrest of the sun, that the day of Israel's victories might be prolonged, and so the enemy totally defeated. The hailstones had their rise no higher than the clouds, but, to show that Israel's help came from above the clouds, the sun itself, who by his constant motion serves the whole earth, by halting when there was occasion served the Israelites, and did them a kindness. The sun and moon stood still in their habitation, at the light of thy arrows which gave the signal, Hab. iii. 11.

(1) Now, First, It looked great for Joshua to say, Sun, stand thou still. His ancestor Joseph had indeed dreamed that the sun and moon did homage to him; but who would have thought that, after it had been fulfilled in the figure, it should be again fulfilled in the letter to one of his posterity? He bids the sun stand still upon Gibeon, the place of action and the seat of war, intimating that what he designed in this request was the advantage of Israel against their enemies; it is probable that the sun was now declining, and here he mentions the valley of Ajalon, which was near to Gibeon, because there he was at that time. Secondly, It was bold indeed to say so before Israel, and argues a very strong assurance of faith.

(2) The wonderful answer to this prayer. No sooner said than done (v. 13): The sun stood still, and the moon staid. The same God that rules in heaven above rules at the same time on this earth, and, when he pleases, even the heavens shall hear the earth, as here. Concerning this great miracle it is here said, [1] That it continued a whole day, that is, the sun continued as long again above the horizon as otherwise it would have done. [2] That hereby the people had full time to avenge themselves of their enemies, and to give them a total defeat. Note, Sometimes God completes a great salvation in a little time, and makes but one day's work of it. This is said to be written in the book of Jasher, a collection of state-poems, in which the poem made upon this occasion was preserved among the rest. Those words, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Ajalon, sounding metrical, are supposed to be taken from the narrative of this event as it was found in the book of Jasher. The sun, the eye of the world, must be fixed for some hours upon Gibeon and the valley of Ajalon, as if to contemplate the great works of God there for Israel, and so to engage the children of men to look that way, and to enquire of this wonder done in the land, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. He would hereby convince and confound those idolaters that worshipped the sun and moon and gave divine honours to them, by demonstrating that they were subject to the command of the God of Israel. This miracle signified that in the latter days, when the light of the world was tending towards a night of darkness, the Sun of righteousness, even our Joshua, should arise (Mal. iv. 2), give check to the approaching night, and be the true light.

Verses 15–27

The five kings were all routed. And now Joshua thought, his work being done, he might go with his army into quarters, but he soon finds he has more work cut out for him. The victory must be pursued, that the spoils might be divided.

I. The forces that had dispersed themselves must be followed. He directs his men to pursue the common soldiers, as much as might be, to prevent their escaping to the garrisons. The result of this vigorous pursuit was, 1. That a very great slaughter was made of the enemies of God and Israel. And, 2. The field was cleared of them, so that none remained but such as got into fenced cities. 3. None moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel, v. 21. This expression intimates, (1) Their perfect safety and tranquillity. They were not threatened by any danger at all after their victory, no, not so much as the barking of a dog. (2) Their honour and reputation; no man had any reproach to cast upon them, nor an ill word to give them.

II. The kings that had hidden themselves must now be called to an account, as rebels against the Israel of God.

1. How they were secured. The cave which they fled to, and trusted in for a refuge, became their prison, in which they were clapped up, till Joshua sat in judgment on them, v. 18.

2. How they were triumphed over. Joshua ordered them to be brought forth out of the cave, set before him as at the bar, and their names called over, v. 22, 23. And when they either were bound and cast upon the ground, unable to help themselves, or threw themselves upon the ground, humbly to beg for their lives, he called for the general officers and great men, and commanded them to trample upon these kings, and set their feet upon their necks. The thing does indeed look barbarous, thus to insult over men in misery, who had suddenly fallen from the highest pitch of honour into this disgrace. Certainly it ought not to be drawn into a precedent, for the case was extraordinary. (1) God would hereby, by this public act of justice done upon these ringleaders of the Canaanites in sin, possess his people with the greater dread and detestation of those sins of the nations that God cast out from before them, which they would be tempted to imitate. (2) He would hereby have the promise by Moses made good (Deut. xxxiii. 29), Thou shalt tread upon their high places. (3) He would hereby encourage the faith and hope of his people Israel in reference to the wars that were yet before them. Therefore Joshua said (v. 25): Fear not, nor be dismayed. [1] "Fear not these things, nor any of theirs." [2] "Fear not any other kings, who may at any time be in confederacy against you, for you see these brought down, whom you thought formidable." (4) He would hereby give a type and figure of Christ's victories over the powers of darkness, and believers' victories through him. All the enemies of the Redeemer shall be made his footstool, Ps. cx. 1. Sooner or later we shall see all things put under him (Heb. ii. 8), and principalities and powers made a show of, Col. ii. 15.

3. How they were put to death. Joshua smote them with the sword, and then hanged up their bodies till evening, when they were taken down, and thrown into the cave in which they had hidden themselves, v. 26, 27. If these five kings had humbled themselves in time, and had begged peace instead of waging war, they might have saved their lives.

I. Here is a particular account of the several cities which he immediately made himself master of. 1. The cities of three of the kings whom he had conquered in the field he went and took possession of, Lachish (v. 31, 32), Eglon (v. 34, 35), and Hebron, v. 36, 37. The other two, Jerusalem and Jarmuth, were not taken at this time. 2. Three other cities, and royal cities too, he took: Makkedah (v. 28), Libnah (v. 29, 30) and Debir, v. 38, 39. 3. One king that brought in his forces for the relief of Lachish, Horam king of Gezer, was cut off with all his forces, v. 33.

II. The country which was hereby reduced and brought into Israel's hands (v. 40–42) lay south of Jerusalem, and afterwards fell, for the most part, to the lot of the tribe of Judah. Observe in his narrative,

1. The great speed Joshua made in taking these cities.

2. The great severity Joshua used towards those he conquered. He gave no quarter to man, woman, nor child, put to the sword all the souls (v. 28, 30, 32, 35, &c.), utterly destroyed all that breathed (v. 40), and left none remaining. God would hereby, (1) Manifest his hatred of the idolatries and other abominations which the Canaanites had been guilty of. (2) He would hereby magnify his love to his people Israel.

3. The great success of this expedition. The Lord fought for Israel, v. 42. They could not have gotten the victory if God had not undertaken the battle.

CHAP. XI

This chapter continues and concludes the history of the conquest of Canaan; of the reduction of the southern parts we had an account in the foregoing chapter, after which we may suppose Joshua allowed his forces some breathing-time; now here we have the story of the war in the north, and the happy success of that war. I. The confederacy of the northern crowns against Israel, ver. 1–5. II. The encouragement which God gave to Joshua to engage them, ver. 6. III. His victory over them, ver. 7–9. IV. The taking of their cities, ver. 10–15. V. The destruction of the Anakim, ver. 21, 22. VI. The general conclusion of the story of this war, ver. 16–20, 23.

Verses 1–9

We are here entering upon the story of another campaign that Joshua made. In respect of miracles it was inferior to it in glory. The wonders God then wrought for them were to animate and encourage them to act vigorously themselves. Thus the war carried on by the preaching of the gospel against Satan's kingdom was at first forwarded by miracles; but, the war being by them sufficiently proved to be of God, the managers of it are now left to the ordinary assistance of divine grace in the use of the sword of the Spirit, and must not expect hailstones nor the standing still of the sun. In this story we have,

I. The Canaanites taking the field against Israel. They were the aggressors. Note, Sinners bring ruin upon their own heads, so that God will be justified when he speaks, and they alone shall bear the blame for ever. Now, 1. Several nations joined in this confederacy, some in the mountains and some in the plains, v. 2. They here unite against Israel as against a common enemy. Thus are the children of this world more unanimous, and therein wiser, than the children of light. The oneness of the church's enemies should shame the church's friends out of their discords and divisions and engage them to be one. 2. The head of this confederacy was Jabin king of Hazor (v. 1). When they had all drawn up their forces together, they were a very great army; they had horses and chariots very many, which we do not find the southern kings had.

II. The encouragement God gave to Joshua to give them the meeting, even upon the ground of their own choosing (v. 6): Be not afraid because of them. Joshua was remarkable for his courage—it was his master grace, and yet it seems he had need to be again and again cautioned not to be afraid. For his encouragement, 1. God assures him of success, and fixes the hour: To-morrow about this time. 2. He appoints him to hough their horses, hamstring them, lame them, and burn their chariots, not only that Israel might not use them hereafter, but they might not fear them now. Let Israel look upon their chariots but as rotten wood designed for the fire, and their horses of war as disabled things, scarcely good enough for the cart.

III. Joshua's march against these confederate forces, v. 7. He came upon them suddenly, and surprised them in their quarters.

IV. His success, v. 8. He obtained the honour and advantage of a complete victory; he smote them and chased them, in the several ways they took in their flight.

V. His obedience to the orders given him, in destroying the horses and chariots (v. 9), which was an instance, of his care to keep up in the people the like confidence in God, by taking that from them which they would be tempted to trust too much to. This was cutting off a right hand.

Verses 10 14

We have here the same improvement made of this victory as was made of that in the foregoing chapter. 1. The destruction of Hazor is particularly recorded, because in it, and by the king thereof, this daring design against Israel was laid, v. 10, 11. 2. The rest of the cities of that part of the country are spoken of only in general, that Joshua got them all into his hands, but did not burn them as he did Hazor, for Israel was to dwell in great and goodly cities which they builded not (Deut. vi. 10) and in these among the rest.

Verses 15–23

We have here the conclusion of this whole matter.

I. A short account is here given of what was done in four things:—1. The obstinacy of the Canaanites in their opposition to the Israelites. It is intimated that other cities might have made as good terms for themselves, without ragged clothes and clouted shoes, if they would have humbled themselves, but they never so much as desired conditions of peace. To punish them for all their other follies, God left them to this, to make those their enemies whom they might have made their friends. 2. The constancy of the Israelites in prosecuting this war (v. 18): Joshua made war a long time; some reckon it five years, others seven, that were spent in subduing this land. 3. The conquest of the Anakim at last, v. 21, 22. Either this was done as they met with them where they were dispersed, as some think, or rather it should seem the Anakim had retired to their fastnesses, and so were hunted out and cut off at last, after all the rest of Israel's enemies. The mountains of Judah and Israel were the habitations of those mountains of men; but not their height, nor the strength of their caves, nor the difficulty of the passes to them, could secure, no, not these mighty men, from the sword of Joshua. The cutting off of the sons of Anak is particularly mentioned because these had been such a terror to the spies forty years before, and their bulk and strength had been thought an insuperable difficulty in the way of the reducing of Canaan, Num. xiii. 28, 33. Giants are dwarfs to Omnipotence; yet this struggle with the Anakim was reserved for the latter end of the war, when the Israelites had become more expert in the arts of war, and had had more experience of the power and goodness of God. Note, God sometimes reserves the sharpest trials of his people by affliction and temptation for the latter end of their days. Death, that tremendous son of Anak, is the last enemy that is to be encountered; but it is to be destroyed, 1 Cor. xv. 26. 4. The end and issue of this long war. The Canaanites were rooted out: Joshua took all that land, v. 16, 17. And we may suppose the people dispersed themselves and their families into the countries they had conquered, at least those that lay nearest to the headquarters at Gilgal.

II. That which was now done is here compared with that which had been said to Moses. It is here observed in the close, 1. That all the precepts God had given to Moses relating to the conquest of Canaan were obeyed on the people's part, at least while Joshua lived. Joshua was himself a great commander, and yet nothing was more his praise than his obedience. Joshua, in his zeal for the Lord of hosts, spared neither the idols nor the idolaters. Saul's disobedience, or rather his partial obedience, to the command of God, for the utter destruction of the Amalekites, cost him his kingdom. 2. That all the promises God had given to Moses relating to his conquest were accomplished on his part, v. 23. God had promised to drive out the nations before them (Exod. xxxiii. 2; xxxiv. 11), and to bring them down, Deut. ix. 3. And now it was done.

CHAP. XII

This chapter is a summary of Israel's conquests. I. Their conquests under Moses, on the other side Jordan. And here the abridgement of that history, ver. 1–6. II. Their conquests under Joshua, on this side Jordan, westward. 1. The country they reduced, ver. 7, 8. 2. The kings they subdued, thirty-one in all, ver. 9–24. And this comes in here as a preface to the history of the dividing of Canaan, that all that might be put together which they were now to make a distribution of.

Verses 1–6

Joshua, or whoever else is the historian, before he comes to sum up the new conquests Israel had made, in these verses recites their former conquests in Moses's time, under whom they became masters of the great and potent kingdoms of Sihon and Og. Joshua's services and achievements are confessedly great, but let not those under Moses be overlooked and forgotten. Here is, 1. A description of this conquered country (v. 1): From the river Arnon in the south, to Mount Hermon in the north. In particular, here is a description of the kingdom of Sihon (v. 2, 3), and that of Og, v. 4, 5. Moses had described this country very particularly (Deut. ii. 36; iii. 4, &c.), and this description here agrees with his. King Og is said to dwell at Ashtaroth and Edrei (v. 4), probably because they were both his royal cities; he had palaces in both. But Israel took both from him, and made one grave to serve him that could not be content with one palace. 2. The distribution of this country. Moses assigned it to the two tribes and a half, at their request, and divided it among them (v. 6), of which we had the story at large, Num. xxxii. The dividing of it when it was conquered by Moses is here mentioned as an example to Joshua what he must do now that he had conquered the country on this side Jordan. Moses, in his time, gave to one part of Israel a very rich and fruitful country, but it was on the outside of Jordan; but Joshua gave to all Israel the holy land, the mountain of God's sanctuary, within Jordan.

Verses 7–24

We have here a breviate of Joshua's conquests.

I. The limits of the country he conquered. It lay between Jordan on the east and the Mediterranean Sea on the west, and extended from Baal-gad near Lebanon in the north to Halak, which lay upon the country of Edom in the south, v. 7. The boundaries are more largely described, Num. xxxiv. 2, &c. God had been as good as his word, and had given them possession of all he had promised them by Moses.

II. The various kinds of land that were found in this country, which contributed both to its pleasantness and to its fruitfulness, v. 8. There were mountains, not craggy, and rocky, and barren, but fruitful hills, such as put forth precious things (Deut. xxxiii. 15). And valleys, not mossy and boggy, but covered with corn, Ps. lxv. 13. There were plains, and springs to water them; and even in that rich land there were wildernesses too, or forests.

III. The several nations that had been in possession of this country—Hittites, Amorites, Canaanites, &c., all of them descended from Canaan, the accursed son of Ham, Gen. x. 15–18. Seven nations they are called (Deut. vii. 1), and so many are there reckoned up, but here six only are mentioned, the Girgashites being either lost or left out, though we find them, Gen. x. 16 and xv. 21. Either they were incorporated with some other of these nations, or, as the tradition of the Jews is, upon the approach of Israel under Joshua they all withdrew and went into Africa.

IV. A list of the kings that were conquered and subdued by the sword of Israel, the kings of Jericho and Ai, the king of Jerusalem and the princes of the south that were in confederacy with him, and then those of the northern association. This shows what a very fruitful country Canaan then was, which could support so many kingdoms.

CHAP. XIII

At this chapter begins the account of the dividing of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel by lot. The preserving of this distribution would be of great use to the Jewish nation, who were obliged by the law to keep up this first distribution, and not to transfer inheritances from tribe to tribe, Num. xxxvi. 9. It is likewise of use to us for the explaining of other scriptures: the learned know how much light the geographical description of a country gives to the history of it. In this chapter, I. God informs Joshua what parts of the country that were intended in the grant to Israel yet remained unconquered, ver. 1–6. II. He appoints him, notwithstanding, to make a distribution of what was conquered, ver. 7. III. To complete this account, here is a repetition of the distribution Moses had made of the land on the other side Jordan; in general (ver. 8–14), in particular, the lot of Reuben (ver. 15–23), of Gad (ver. 24–28), of the half tribe of Manasseh, ver. 29–33.

Verses 1–6

I. God puts Joshua in mind of his old age, v. 1. 1. It is said that Joshua was old and stricken in years, and he and Caleb were at this time the only old men among the thousands of Israel, none except them of all those who were numbered at Mount Sinai being now alive. Joshua had not the same strength and vigour in his old age that Moses had; all that come to old age do not find it alike good. 2. God takes notice of it to him: God said to him, Thou art old. (1) As a reason why he should now lay by the thoughts of pursuing the war. As he had entered into the labours of Moses, so let others enter into his, and bring forth the top-stone, the doing of which was reserved for David long after. (2) As a reason why he should speedily apply himself to the dividing of that which he had conquered. That work must be done, and done quickly; he being old and stricken in years, and not likely to continue long, let him make this his concluding piece of service to God and Israel.

II. He gives him a particular account of the land that yet remained unconquered, which was intended for Israel, and which, in due time, they should be masters of if they did not put a bar in their own door. Divers places are here mentioned, some in the south, as the country of the Philistines, governed by five lords, and the land that lay towards Egypt (v. 2, 3), some westward, as that which lay towards the Sidonians (v. 4), some eastward, as all Lebanon (v. 5), some towards the north, as that in the entering in of Hamath, v. 5.

III. He promises that he would make the Israelites masters of all those countries that were yet unsubdued, though Joshua was old. God will do his own work in his own time (v. 6): I will drive them out. This promise that he would drive them out from before the children of Israel plainly supposes it as the condition of the promise that the children of Israel must themselves attempt their extirpation, else they could not be said to be driven out before them; if afterwards Israel, through sloth, or cowardice, sit still and let them alone, they must blame themselves, and not God, if they be not driven out. We must work out our salvation, and then God will work in us and work with us.

Verses 7–33

I. Orders given to Joshua to assign to each tribe its portion of this land, including that which was yet unsubdued.

1. The land must be divided among the several tribes, and they must not always live in common, as now they did.

2. That it must be divided for an inheritance, though they got it by conquest. (1) The promise of it came to them as an inheritance from their fathers; the land of promise pertained to the children of promise. (2) The possession of it was to be transmitted by them, as an inheritance to their children.

3. That Joshua must not divide it by his own will. Though he was a very wise, just, and good man, it must not be left to him to give what he pleased to each tribe; but he must do it by lot, which referred the matter wholly to God, and to his determination. Joshua must have the honour of dividing the land, (1) Because he had undergone the fatigue of conquering it. (2) That he might be herein a type of Christ, who has not only conquered for us the gates of hell, but has opened to us the gates of heaven, and, having purchased the eternal inheritance for all believers, will in due time put them all in possession of it.

II. An account is here given of the distribution of the land on the other side Jordan among the Reubenites, and Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

1. How this account is introduced. It comes in, (1) As the reason why this land within Jordan must be divided only to the nine tribes and a half, because the other two and a half were already provided for. (2) As a pattern to Joshua in the work he had now to do. (3) As an inducement to Joshua to hasten the dividing of this land, that the nine tribes and a half might not be kept any longer than was necessary out of their possession, since their brethren of the two tribes and a half were so well settled in theirs.

2. The particulars of this account.

(1) Here is a general description of the country that was given to the two tribes and a half, which Moses gave them, even as Moses gave them, v. 8. The repetition implies a ratification of the grant by Joshua. Here we have, [1] The fixing of the boundaries of this country, by which they were divided from the neighbouring nations, v. 9, &c. Israel must know their own and keep to it. [2] An exception of one part of this country from Israel's possession, though it was in their grant, namely, the Geshurites and the Maachathites, v. 13.

(2) A very particular account of the inheritances of these two tribes and a half. This is very fully and exactly set down in order that posterity might, in reading this history, be the more affected with the goodness of God to their ancestors, and also that the limits of every tribe being punctually set down in this authentic record disputes might be prevented.

[1] We have here the lot of the tribe of Reuben, Jacob's first-born, who, though he had lost the dignity and power which pertained to the birthright, yet, it seems, had the advantage of being first served. The separation of this tribe from the rest, by the river Jordan, was that which Deborah lamented; and the preference they gave to their private interests was what she censured, Judges v. 15, 16. In this tribe lay Heshbon and Sibmah, famed for their fruitful fields and vineyards. This tribe, with that of Gad, was sorely shaken by Hazael king of Syria (2 Kings x. 33), and afterwards dislodged and carried into captivity, twenty years before the general captivity of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, 1 Chron. v. 26.

[2] The lot of the tribe of Gad, v. 24–28. This lay north of Reuben's lot; the country of Gilead lay in this tribe, so famous for its balm and the cities of Jabesh-Gilead and Ramoth-Gilead which we often read of in scripture. Succoth and Penuel, which we read of in the story of Gideon, were in this tribe. Sharon, famous for roses, was in this tribe. And within the limits of this tribe lived those Gadarenes that loved their swine better than their Saviour, fitter to be called Girgashites than Israelites.

[3] The lot of the half-tribe of Manasseh, v. 29–31. Bashan, the kingdom of Og, was in this allotment, famous for the best timber, witness the oaks of Bashan—and the best breed of cattle, witness the bulls and rams of Bashan. This tribe lay north of Gad, reached to Mount Hermon, and had in it part of Gilead. Mizpeh was in this half-tribe, and Jephthah was one of its ornaments; so was Elijah, for in this tribe was Thisbe, whence he is called the Tishbite; and Jair was another. In the edge of the tribe stood Chorazin, honoured with Christ's wondrous works, but ruined by his righteous woe for not improving them.

[4] To the tribe of Levi Moses gave no inheritance (v. 14, 33), for so God had appointed, Num. xviii. 20. Their habitations must be scattered in all the tribes, and their maintenance brought out of all the tribes, Deut. x. 9; xviii. 2.

CHAP. XIV

Here is, I. The general method that was taken in dividing the land, ver. 1–5. II. The demand Caleb made of Hebron, as his by promise, and therefore not to be put into the lot with the rest, ver. 6–12. And Joshua's grant of that demand, ver. 13–15. This was done at Gilgal, which was as yet their headquarters.

Verses 1–5

The historian now comes to tell us what they did with the countries in the land of Canaan. They were not conquered to be left desert. Canaan would have been subdued in vain if it had not been inhabited. Yet every man might not go and settle where he pleased. God had given Moses directions how this distribution should be made. See Num. xxvi. 53, &c.

I. The managers of this great affair were Joshua the chief magistrate, Eleazar the chief priest, and ten princes, one of each of the tribes, that were now to have their inheritance, whom God himself had nominated (Num. xxxiv. 17, &c.).

II. The tribes among whom this dividend was to be made were nine and a half. Not the tribe of Levi; this was to be otherwise provided for. Joseph made two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim, pursuant to Jacob's adoption of Joseph's two sons, and so the number of the tribes was kept up to twelve, though Levi was taken out, which is intimated here (v. 4).

III. The rule by which they went was the lot, v. 2. The disposal of that is of the Lord, Prov. xvi. 33. It was here used in an affair of weight, and which could not otherwise be accommodated to universal satisfaction, and it was used in a solemn religious manner as an appeal to God, by consent of parties.

Verses 6–15

Before the lot was cast into the lap for the determining of the portions of the respective tribes, the particular portion of Caleb was assigned to him. He was now, except Joshua, not only the oldest man in all Israel, but was twenty years older than any of them, for all that were above twenty years old when he was forty were dead in the wilderness; it was fit therefore that this phoenix of his age should have some particular marks of honour put upon him in the dividing of the land.

1. Caleb here presents his petition, or rather makes his demand, to have Hebron given him for a possession (this mountain he calls it, v. 12), and not to have that put into the lot with the other parts of the country. To justify his demand, he shows that God had long since, by Moses, promised him that very mountain.

1. To enforce his petition, (1) He brings the children of Judah, that is, the heads and great men of that tribe, along with him, to present it. (2) He appeals to Joshua himself concerning the truth of the allegations upon which he grounded his petition: Thou knowest the thing, v. 6.

2. In his petition he sets forth,

(1) The testimony of his conscience concerning the spying out of the land. [1] That he made his report as it was in his heart, as we find he did, Num. xiii. 30; xiv. 7–9. He did not do it merely to please Moses, or to keep the people quiet, much less from a spirit of contradiction to his fellows, but from a full conviction of the truth of what he said and a firm belief of the divine promise. [2] That herein he wholly followed the Lord his God, and therefore it was not vain-glory in him to speak of it, any more than it is for those who have God's Spirit witnessing with their spirits that they are the children of God humbly and thankfully to tell others for their encouragement what God has done for their souls. [3] That he did this when all his brethren and companions in that service, except Joshua, did otherwise.

(2) The experience he had had of God's goodness to him ever since to this day. [1] That he was kept alive in the wilderness, not only notwithstanding the common perils and fatigues of that tedious march, but though all that generation of Israelites, except himself and Joshua, were one way or other cut off by death. With what a grateful sense of God's goodness to him does he speak it! (v. 10). Now behold (behold and wonder) the Lord hath kept me alive these forty and five years, thirty-eight years in the wilderness, through the plagues of the desert, and seven years in Canaan through the perils of war! Note, The longer we live the more sensible we should be of God's goodness to us in keeping us alive, his care in prolonging our frail lives, his patience in prolonging our forfeited lives. [2] That he was fit for business, now that he was in Canaan. Though eighty-five years old, yet as hearty and lively as when he was forty (v. 11): As my strength was then, so is it now. This was the fruit of the promise, and out-did what was said; for God not only gives what he promises, but he gives more: life by promise shall be life, and health, and strength, and all that which will make the promised life a blessing and comfort.

(3) The promise Moses had made him in God's name that he should have this mountain, v. 9. This was the place from which, more than any other, the spies took their report, for here they met with the sons of Anak (Num. xiii. 22), the sight of whom made such an impression upon them, v. 33. We may suppose that Caleb, observing what stress they laid upon the difficulty of conquering Hebron, a city garrisoned by the giants, bravely desired to have that city which they called invincible assigned to himself for his own portion: "I will undertake to deal with that, and, if I cannot get it for my inheritance, I will be without." He chose this place only because it was the most difficult to be conquered. And, to show that his soul did not decay any more than his body, now forty-five years after he adheres to his choice and is still of the same mind.

(4) The hopes he had of being master of it, though the sons of Anak were in possession of it (v. 12): If the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out. The city of Hebron Joshua had already reduced (ch. x. 37), but the mountain which belonged to it, and which was inhabited by the sons of Anak, was yet unconquered. Here, [1] He seems to speak doubtfully of God's being with him from a humble sense of his own unworthiness. [2] But he expresses without the least doubt his assurance that if God were with him he should be able to dispossess the sons of Anak. Herein Caleb answered his name, which signifies all heart.

II. Joshua grants his petition (v. 13): Joshua blessed him, commended his bravery, applauded his request, and gave him what he asked. Hebron was settled on Caleb and his heirs (v. 14), because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel. Hebron had been the city of Arba, a great man among the Anakim (v. 15); we find it called Kirjatharba (Gen. xxiii. 2), as the place where Sarah died. Hereabouts Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob lived most of their time in Canaan, and near to it was the cave of Machpelah, where they were buried, which perhaps had led Caleb hither when he went to spy out the land, and had made him covet this rather than any other part for his inheritance. It was one of the cities belonging to the priests (Josh. xxi. 13), and a city of refuge, Josh. xx. 7. When Caleb had it, he contented himself with the country about it, and cheerfully gave the city to the priests, the Lord's ministers. It was a royal city, and, in the beginning of David's reign, the metropolis of the kingdom of Judah; thither the people resorted to him, and there he reigned seven years.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter we have the lot of the tribe of Judah, which in this, as in other things, had the precedency. I. The borders or bounds of the inheritance of Judah, ver. 1–12. II The particular assignment of Hebron and the country thereabout to Caleb and his family, ver. 13–19. III. The names of the several cities that fell within Judah's lot, ver. 20–63.

Verses 1-12

Judah and Joseph were the two sons of Jacob on whom Reuben's forfeited birthright devolved. Judah had the dominion entailed on him, and Joseph the double portion, and therefore these two tribes were first seated, Judah in the southern part of the land of Canaan and Joseph in the northern part.

In these verses, we have the borders of the lot of Judah, which, as the rest, is said to be by their families, that is, with an eye to the number of their families. And it intimates that Joshua and Eleazar, and the rest of the commissioners, when they had by lot given each tribe its portion, did afterwards subdivide those larger portions, and assign to each family its inheritance, and then to each household. 1. The eastern border was all, and only, the Salt Sea, v. 5. 2. The southern border was that of the land of Canaan in general, as will appear by comparing v. 1–4 with Num. xxxiv. 3–5. So that this powerful and warlike tribe of Judah guarded the frontiers of the whole land, on that side which lay towards their old sworn enemies the Edomites. 3. The northern border divided it from the lot of Benjamin. In this, mention is made of the stone of Bohan a Reubenite (v. 6), who died in the camp at Gilgal, and was buried not far off under this stone. The valley of Achor likewise lies upon this border (v. 7), to remind the men of Judah of the trouble which Achan, one of their tribe, gave to the congregation of Israel. This northern line touched closely upon Jerusalem (v. 8), so closely as to include in the lot of this tribe Mount Zion and Mount Moriah, though the greater part of the city lay in the lot of Benjamin. 4. The west border went near to the great sea at first (v. 12), but afterwards the lot of the tribe of Dan took off a good part of Judah's lot on that side. Judah's inheritance had its boundaries determined.

Verses 13–19

The historian seems pleased with every occasion to make mention of Caleb because he had honoured God.

I. The grant Joshua made him of the mountain of Hebron for his inheritance is here repeated (v. 13).

II. Caleb having obtained this grant, we are told,

1. How he signalized his own valour in the conquest of Hebron (v. 14): He drove thence the three sons of Anak, he and those that he engaged to assist him in this service.

2. How he encouraged the valour of those about him in the conquest of Debir, v. 15, &c. It seems, though Joshua had once made himself master of Debir (ch. x. 39), yet the Canaanites had regained the possession in the absence of the army, so that the work had to be done a second time; and when Caleb had completed the reduction of Hebron, which was for himself and his own family, to show his zeal for the public good, as much as for his own private interest, he pushes on his conquest to Debir.

The proffer that Caleb made of his daughter, and a good portion with her, to any one that would undertake to reduce that city. Caleb's family was not only honourable and wealthy, but religious. The place was bravely taken by Othniel, a nephew of Caleb, whom probably Caleb had thoughts of when he made the proffer, v. 17. Othniel married his cousin-german Achsah, Caleb's daughter. The historian gives us an account of Achsah's portion. Some land she obtained by Caleb's free grant. He gave her a south land, v. 19. Land indeed, but a south land, dry, and apt to be parched. She obtained more upon her request. When her father brought her home to the house of her husband, she lighted off her ass, in token of respect and reverence to her father. She was sure that, since she married not only with her father's consent, but in obedience to his command, he would not deny her his blessing. She asks only for the water, without which the ground she had would be of little use either for tillage or pasture, but she means the field in which the springs of water were. Achsah gained her point; her father gave her what she asked, and perhaps more, for he gave her the upper springs and the nether springs, two fields so called from the springs that were in them, as we commonly distinguish between the higher field and the lower field.

From this story we learn it is no breach of the tenth commandment moderately to desire those comforts and conveniences of this life which we see attainable in a fair and regular way. Husbands and wives should mutually advise, and jointly agree, about that which is for the common good of their family. Parents must never think that lost which is bestowed upon their children for their real advantage.

We have here a list of the several cities that fell within the lot of the tribe of Judah.

I. The cities are here named, and numbered in several classes. Here are, 1. Some that are said to be the uttermost cities towards the coast of Edom, v. 21–32. Here are thirty-eight named, and yet said to be twenty-nine (v. 32), because nine of these were afterwards transferred to the lot of Simeon. 2. Others that are said to be in the valley (v. 33) are counted to be fourteen, yet fifteen are named; but it is probable that Gederah and Gederathaim were two parts of one and the same city. 3. Then sixteen are named without any head of distinction, v. 37–41, and nine more, v. 42–44. 4. Then the three Philistine-cities, Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza, v. 45–47. 5. Cities in the mountains.

II. Now here, 1. We do not find Bethlehem, which was afterwards the city of David, and was ennobled by the birth of our Lord Jesus in it. But that city was but little among the thousands of Judah (Mic. v. 2), except that it was thus dignified. Christ came to give honour to the places he was related to, not to receive honour from them. 2. Jerusalem is said to continue in the hands of the Jebusites (v. 63), for the children of Judah could not drive them out, through their sluggishness, stupidity, and unbelief. 3. Among the cities of Judah (in all 114) we meet with Libnah, which in Joram's days revolted, and probably set up for a free independent state (2 Kings viii. 22), and Lachish, where king Amaziah was slain (2 Kings xiv. 19); it led the dance in idolatry (Mic. i. 13); it was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion. Many of the cities of this tribe occur in the history of David's troubles. Adullam, Ziph, Keilah, Maon, Engedi, Ziklag, here reckoned in this tribe, were places near which David had most of his haunts.

CHAP. XVI

It is a pity that this and the following chapter should be separated, for both of them give us the lot of the children of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, who, next to Judah, were to have the post of honour, and therefore had the first and best portion in the northern part of Canaan, as Judah now had in the southern part. In this chapter we have, I. A general account of the lot of these two tribes together, ver. 1–4. II. The borders of the lot of Ephraim in particular, ver. 5–10. That of Manasseh following in the next chapter.

Verses 1–4

Though Joseph was one of the younger sons of Jacob, yet he was his eldest by his most just and best beloved wife Rachel, was himself his best beloved son. His posterity were very much favoured by the lot. Their portion lay in the very heart of the land of Canaan. It extended from Jordan in the east (v. 1) to the sea, the Mediterranean Sea, in the west, and the fruitfulness of the soil answered the blessings both of Jacob and Moses, Gen. xlix. 25, 26, and Deut. xxxiii. 13, &c. The portions allotted to Ephraim and Manasseh are not so particularly described as those of the other tribes; we have only the limits and boundaries of them, not the particular cities in them.

Verses 5–10

Here, 1. The border of the lot of Ephraim is set down, by which it was divided on the south from Benjamin and Dan, who lay between it and Judah, and on the north from Manasseh; for east and west it reached from Jordan to the great sea. 2. Some separate cities are spoken of, that lay not within these borders, at least not if the line was drawn direct, but lay within the lot of Manasseh (v. 9), which might better be read, and there were separate cities for the children of Ephraim among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh. 3. A brand is put upon the Ephraimites, that they did not drive out the Canaanites from Gezer (v. 10), putting them under tribute. It shows that they spared them out of covetousness, that they might be profited by their labours, and by dealing with them for their tribute they were in danger of being infected with their idolatry; yet some think that, when they brought them under tribute, they obliged them to renounce their idols. Samaria, built by Omri after the burning of the royal palace of Tirzah, was in this tribe, and was long the royal city of the kingdom of the ten tribes; not far from it were Shechem, and the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, and Sychar, near which was Jacob's well, where Christ talked with the woman of Samaria. We read much of Mount Ephraim in the story of the Judges, and of a city called Ephraim, it is probable in this tribe, to which Christ retired, John xi. 54. The whole kingdom of the ten tribes is often, in the prophets, especially in Hosea, called Ephraim.

CHAP. XVII

The half tribe of Manasseh comes next to be provided for; and here we have, I. The families of that tribe that were to be portioned, ver. 1–6. II. The country that fell to their lot, ver. 7–13. III. The joint request of the two tribes that descended from Joseph, for the enlargement of their lot, and Joshua's answer to that request, ver. 14–18.

Verses 1–6

Manasseh was itself but one half of the tribe of Joseph, and yet was divided and subdivided. 1. It was divided into two parts, one already settled on the other side Jordan, consisting of those who were the posterity of Machir, v. 1. This Machir was born to Manasseh in Egypt; there he had signalized himself as a man of war, probably in the contests between the Ephraimites and the men of Gath, 1 Chron. vii. 21. 2. That part on this side Jordan was subdivided into ten families, v. 5. Here is, (1) The claim which the daughters of Zelophehad made, grounded upon the command God gave to Moses concerning them, v. 4. They had themselves, when they were young, pleaded their own cause before Moses, and obtained the grant of an inheritance with their brethren, and now they would not lose the benefit of that grant for want of speaking to Joshua. (2) The assignment of their portions according to their claim. Joshua knew very well what God had ordered in their case, and did not object that they having not served in the wars of Canaan there was no reason why they should share in the possessions of Canaan, but readily gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father.

Verses 7–13

We have here a short account of the lot of this half tribe. It reached from Jordan on the east to the great sea on the west; on the south it lay all along contiguous to Ephraim, but on the north it abutted upon Asher and Issachar. Some things are particularly observed concerning this lot:—1. That there was great communication between this tribe and that of Ephraim. The city of Tappuah belonged to Ephraim, but the country adjoining to Manasseh (v. 8); there were likewise many cities of Ephraim that lay within the border of Manasseh (v. 9), of which before, ch. xvi. 9. 2. That Manasseh likewise had cities with their appurtenances in the tribes of Issachar and Asher (v. 11), God so ordering it, that though every tribe had its peculiar inheritance, which might not be alienated from it, yet they should thus intermix one with another, as became those who, though of different tribes, were all one Israel. 3. That they suffered the Canaanites to live among them, contrary to the command of God, serving their own ends by conniving at them, for they made them tributaries, v. 12, 13. The most remarkable person of this half tribe in after-time was Gideon, whose great actions were done within this lot.

Verses 14–18

I. The children of Joseph quarrel with their lot. Joshua makes them know that in the discharge of his office, as a public person, he had no more regard to his own tribe than to any other. Two things they suggest, 1. That they were very numerous, through the blessing of God upon them (v. 14): I am a great people, for the Lord has blessed me; and we have reason to hope that he that hath sent mouths will send meat. 2. That a good part of that country which had now fallen to their lot was in the hands of the Canaanites, and that they were formidable enemies, who brought into the field of battle chariots of iron (v. 16), that is, chariots with long scythes fastened to the sides of them, or the axle-tree, which made great destruction of all that came in their way, mowing them down like corn.

II. Joshua endeavours to reconcile them to their lot. He owns they were a great people, and being two tribes ought to have more than one lot only (v. 17), but tells them that what had fallen to their share would be a sufficient lot for them both, if they would but work and fight. "If thou hast many mouths to be filled, thou hast twice as many hands to be employed; earn, and then eat." 1. He bids them work for more (v. 15): "Get thee up to the wood-country, which is within thy own border, and let all hands be set to work to cut down the trees, rid the rough lands, and make them, with art and industry, good arable ground." Note, Many wish for larger possessions who do not cultivate and make the best of what they have. 2. He bids them fight for more (v. 17, 18), when they pleaded that they could not come at the woodlands he spoke of because in the valley between them and it there were Canaanites whom they durst not enter the lists with.

CHAP. XVIII

In this chapter we have, I. The setting up of the tabernacle at Shiloh, ver. 1. II. The stirring up of the seven tribes that were yet unsettled to look after their lot, and the putting of them in a method for it, by Joshua, ver. 2–7. III. The distributing of the land into seven lots, by certain men employed for that purpose, ver. 8, 9. IV. The determining of these seven portions to the seven tribes yet unprovided for by lot, ver. 10. V. The particular lot of the tribe of Benjamin, the borders of it, ver. 11–20. And the cities contained in it, ver. 21–28. The other six tribes we shall find well provided for in the next chapter.

Verse 1

In the midst of the story of the dividing of the land comes in this account of the setting up of the tabernacle, which had hitherto continued in its old place in the centre of their camp; but now that three of the four squadrons that used to surround it in the wilderness were broken and diminished, it was time to think of removing the tabernacle itself into a city. Many a time the priests and Levites had taken it down, carried it, and set it up again in the wilderness, according to the directions given them (Num. iv. 5, &c.); but now they must do it for good and all.

I. The place to which the tabernacle was removed, and in which it was set up. It was Shiloh, a city in the lot of Ephraim, but lying close upon the lot of Benjamin. This place was pitched upon, 1. Because it was in the heart of the country. It had been in the midst of their camp in the wilderness, and therefore must now be in the midst of their nation. 2. The setting up of the tabernacle in Shiloh gave them a hint that in that Shiloh which Jacob spoke of all the ordinances of this worldly sanctuary should have their accomplishment in a greater and more perfect tabernacle, Heb. ix. 1, 11.

II. The solemn manner of doing it: The whole congregation assembled together to attend the solemnity, to do honour to the ark of God, as the token of his presence. It was a good presage of a comfortable settlement to themselves in Canaan, when their first care was to see the ark well settled as soon as they had a safe place ready to settle it in. Here the ark continued about 300 years, till the sins of Eli's house forfeited the ark, lost it and ruined Shiloh, and its ruins were long after made use of as warnings to Jerusalem. Go, see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 60.

Verses 2–10

I. Joshua reproves those tribes which were yet unsettled that they did not bestir themselves to gain a settlement in the land which God had given them. Joshua reasons (v. 3): How long are you slack? 1. They were too well pleased with their present condition. The spoil of the cities they had taken served them to live plentifully upon for the present, and they banished the thoughts of time to come. 2. They were slothful and dilatory. Note, Many are diverted from real duties, and debarred from real comforts, by seeming difficulties. God by his grace has given us a title to a good land, the heavenly Canaan, but we are slack to take possession; we enter not into that rest, as we might by faith, and hope, and holy joy; we live not in heaven, as we might by setting our affections on things above and having our conversation there.

II. He puts them in a way to settle themselves.

1. The land that remained must be surveyed, an account taken of the cities, and the territories belonging to them, v. 4. These must be divided into seven equal parts. The Levites were to have no temporal estate. Gad and Reuben, with half of the tribe of Manasseh, were already fixed, and needed not to have any further care taken of them. Now, (1) The surveyors were three men out of each of the seven tribes that were to be provided for (v. 4). (2) The survey was accordingly made, and brought in to Joshua, v. 8, 9. [1] The faith and courage of the persons employed: abundance of Canaanites remained in the land, and all raging against Israel, as a bear robbed of her whelps. [2] The good providence of God in protecting them from the many deaths they were exposed to, and bringing them all safely again to the host at Shiloh.

2. When it was surveyed, and reduced to seven lots, then Joshua would, by appeal to God, and direction from him, determine which of these lots should belong to each tribe (v. 6). That I may cast lots for you here at the tabernacle (because it was a sacred transaction) before the Lord our God.

Verses 11–28

We have here the lot of the tribe of Benjamin, which Providence cast next to Joseph on the one hand, because Benjamin was own and only brother to Joseph, and was little Benjamin (Ps. lxviii. 27), that needed the protection of great Joseph. And it was next to Judah on the other hand, that this tribe might hereafter unite with Judah in an adherence to the throne of David and the temple at Jerusalem. Here we have, 1. The exact borders and limits of this tribe. The western border is said to compass the corner of the sea southward (v. 14). Bishop Patrick thinks the meaning is that it ran along in a parallel line to the great sea, though at a distance. 2. The particular cities in this tribe, not all, but the most considerable. Twenty-six are here named. Jericho is put first, though dismantled, and forbidden to be rebuilt as a city with gates and walls. Gilgal, where Israel first encamped when Saul was made king (1 Sam. xi. 15), was in this tribe. It was afterwards a very profane place. Hos. ix. 15, All their wickedness is in Gilgal. Beth-el was in this tribe, a famous place.

CHAP. XIX

In the description of the lots of Judah and Benjamin we have an account both of the borders that surrounded them and of the cities contained in them. In that of Ephraim and Manasseh we have the borders, but not the cities; in this chapter Simeon and Dan are described by their cities only, and not their borders, because they lay very much within Judah, especially the former; the rest have both their borders described and their cities named, especially frontiers. Here is, I. The lot of Simeon, ver. 1–9. II. Of Zebulun, ver. 10–16. III. Of Issachar, ver. 17–23. IV. Of Asher, ver. 24–31. V. Of Naphtali, ver. 32–39. VI. Of Dan, ver. 40–48. Lastly, The inheritance assigned to Joshua himself and his own family, ver. 49–51.

Verses 1–9

Simeon's lot was drawn after Judah's, Joseph's, and Benjamin's, because Jacob had put that tribe under disgrace. Not one person of note, neither judge nor prophet, was of this tribe, that we know of. I. The situation of their lot was within that of Judah (v. 1) and was taken from it, v. 9. 1. The men of Judah did not oppose the taking away of the cities again, which by the first distribution fell within their border, when they were convinced that they had more than their proportion. 2. That which was thus taken off from Judah to be put into a new lot Providence directed to the tribe of Simeon. The cities of Simeon were scattered in Judah. This brought them into a confederacy with the tribe of Judah (Judg. i. 3), and afterwards was a happy occasion of the adherence of many of this tribe to the house of David, at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes to Jeroboam.

II. The cities within their lot are here named. Beersheba, or Sheba, for these names seem to refer to the same place, is put first. Ziklag, which we read of in David's story, is one of them.

Verses 10–16

This is the lot of Zebulun, who, though born of Leah after Issachar, yet was blessed by Jacob and Moses before him. 1. The lot of this tribe was washed by the great sea on the west, and by the sea of Tiberias on the east, answering Jacob's prophecy (Gen. xlix. 13), Zebulun shall be a haven of ships, trading ships on the great sea and fishing ships on the sea of Galilee. 2. Though there were some places in this tribe which were made famous in the Old Testament, especially Mount Carmel, yet it was made much more illustrious in the New Testament; for within the lot of this tribe was Nazareth, where our blessed Saviour spent so much of his time on earth, and that coast of the sea of Galilee on which Christ preached so many sermons and wrought so many miracles.

Verses 17–23

The lot of Issachar ran from Jordan in the east to the great sea in the west, Manasseh on the south, and Zebulun on the north. Places in this tribe were, 1. Jezreel, in which was Ahab's palace, and near it Naboth's vineyard. 2. Shunem, where lived the good Shunamite that entertained Elisha. 3. The river Kishon, on the banks of which, in this tribe, Sisera was beaten by Deborah and Barak. 4. The mountains of Gilboa, on which Saul and Jonathan were slain, which were not far from Endor, where Saul consulted the witch. 5. The valley of Megiddo, where Josiah was slain near Hadad-rimmon, 2 Kings xxiii. 29; Zech. xii. 11.

Verses 24–31

The lot of Asher lay upon the coast of the great sea. We read not of any famous person of this tribe but Anna the prophetess, who was a constant resident in the temple at the time of our Saviour's birth, Luke ii. 36. But close adjoining to this tribe were the celebrated seaport towns of Tyre and Sidon.

Verses 32–39

Naphtali lay furthest north of all the tribes, bordering on Mount Libanus. The city of Leshem, or Laish, lay on the utmost edge of it to the north, and therefore when the Danites had made themselves masters of it, and called it Dan, the length of Canaan from north to south was reckoned from Dan to Beersheba. It was in the lot of this tribe, near the waters of Merom, that Joshua fought and routed Jabin, ch. xi. 1, &c. In this tribe stood Capernaum and Bethsaida, on the north end of the sea of Tiberias, in which Christ did so many mighty works.

Verses 40–48

Dan, though commander of one of the four squadrons of the camp of Israel, in the wilderness, that which brought up the rear, yet was last provided for in Canaan, and his lot fell in the southern part of Canaan, between Judah on the east and the land of the Philistines on the west, Ephraim on the north and Simeon on the south. Providence ordered this numerous and powerful tribe into a post of danger, as best able to deal with those vexatious neighbours the Philistines, and so it was found in Samson. Japho, or Joppa was in this lot.

Verses 49–51

Here is an account of the particular inheritance assigned to Joshua. 1. He was last served, though the eldest and greatest man of all Israel. In all he did he sought the good of his country, and not any private interest of his own. He was content to be unfixed till he saw them all settled. 2. He had his lot according to the word of the Lord. It is probable that, when God by Moses told Caleb what inheritance he should have (ch. xiv. 9), he gave the like promise to Joshua. 3. He chose it in Mount Ephraim, which belonged to his own tribe. 4. The children of Israel are said to give it to him (v. 49), which bespeaks his humility, that he would not take it to himself without the people's consent and approbation. 5. It was a city that must be built before it was fit to be dwelt in.

CHAP. XX

This short chapter is concerning the cities of refuge, which we often read of in the writings of Moses; but this is the last time that we find mention of them, for now that matter was thoroughly settled. Here is, I. The law God gave concerning them, ver. 1–6. II. The people's designation of the particular cities for that use, ver. 7–9. And this remedial law was a figure of good things to come.

Verses 1–6

Many things were by the law of Moses ordered to be done when they came to Canaan and this among the rest, the appointing of sanctuaries for the protecting of those that were guilty of casual murder. It was for the interest of the land that the blood of an innocent person, whose hand only was guilty but not his heart, should not be shed, no, not by the avenger of blood: of this law, which was so much for their advantage, God here reminds them. 1. Orders are given for the appointing of these cities (v. 2), Deut. xix. 3. Yet it is probable that it was not done till after the Levites had their portion assigned them, because the cities of refuge were all to be Levites' cities. As soon as ever God had given them cities of rest, he bade them appoint cities of refuge, to which none of them knew but they might be glad to escape. And it intimates what God's spiritual Israel have and shall have, in Christ and heaven, not only rest to repose themselves in, but refuge to secure themselves in. 2. Instructions are given for the using of these cities. The laws in this matter we had before, Num. xxxv. 10, &c., where they were opened at large. It is provided that if upon trial it appeared that the murder was done purely by accident, and not by design, either upon an old grudge or a sudden passion, then the slayer should be sheltered from the avenger of blood in any one of these cities, v. 4–6. By this law he was entitled to a dwelling in that city, but was confined to it, as a prisoner at large.

Verses 7–9

We have here the nomination of the cities of refuge in the land of Canaan. 1. They are said to sanctify these cities, that is the original word for appointed, v. 7. Not that any ceremony was used to signify the consecration of them, only they did by a public act of court solemnly declare them cities of refuge, and as such sacred to the honour of God, as the protector of exposed innocency. 2. These cities (as those also on the other side Jordan) stood in the three several parts of the country, so conveniently that a man might (they say) in half a day reach some one of them from any corner of the country. 3. They were all Levites' cities, which put an honour upon God's tribe, making them judges in those cases wherein divine Providence was so nearly concerned, and protectors to oppressed innocency. If he must be confined, it shall be to a Levite-city, where he may, if he will, improve his time. 4. These cities were upon hills to be seen afar off, for though therefore his way at last was uphill, yet this would comfort him, that he would be in his place of safety quickly. 5. Some observe a significancy in the names of these cities with application to Christ our refuge. Kedesh signifies holy, and our refuge is the holy Jesus. Shechem, a shoulder, and the government is upon his shoulder. Hebron, fellowship, and believers are called into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. Bezer, a fortification, for he is a stronghold to all those that trust in him. Ramoth, high or exalted, for him hath God exalted with his own right hand. Golan, joy or exultation, for in him all the saints are justified, and shall glory. Lastly, Besides all these, the horns of the altar, wherever it was, were a refuge to those who took hold of them, if the crime were such as that sanctuary allowed. This is implied in that law (Exod. xxi. 14), that a wilful murderer shall be taken from God's altar to be put to death.

CHAP. XXI

It had been often said that the tribe of Levi should have "not inheritance with their brethren," no particular part of the country assigned them, as the other tribes had, but it appears, by the provision made for them in this chapter, that they were no losers, by their being dispersed. We have here, I. The motion they made to have their cities assigned them, according to God's appointment, ver. 1, 2. II. The nomination of the cities accordingly out of the several tribes, and the distribution of them to the respective families of this tribe, ver. 3–8. III. A catalogue of the cities, forty-eight in all, ver. 9–42. IV. A receipt entered in full of all that God had promised to his people Israel, ver. 43–45.

Verses 1–8

Here is, I. The Levites' petition presented to this general convention of the states, now sitting at Shiloh, v. 1, 2. Observe, 1. They had not their lot assigned them till they made their claim. They build their claim upon a very good foundation, not their own merits nor services, but the divine precept: "The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities, commanded you to grant them, which implied a command to us to ask them." Note, The maintenance of ministers is not an arbitrary thing, left purely to the good-will of the people, who may let them starve if they please; no, as the God of Israel commanded that the Levites should be well provided for, so has the Lord Jesus, the King of the Christian church, ordained that those who preach the gospel should live of the gospel (1 Cor. ix. 14). 2. They did not make their claim till all the rest of the tribes were provided for, and then they did it immediately. They were willing to be served last, and they fared never the worse for it. Let not God's ministers complain if at any time they find themselves postponed in men's thoughts and cares, but let them make sure of the favour of God and the honour that comes from him, and then they may well enough afford to bear the slights and neglects of men.

II. The Levites' petition granted immediately, without any dispute. 1. The children of Israel are said to give the cities for the Levites. God had appointed how many they should be in all, forty-eight. God had appointed, Num. xxxv. 8, Every one shall give of his cities to the Levites. It appears by the following catalogue that the cities they gave to the Levites were generally some of the best and most considerable in each tribe. 2. They gave them at the commandment of the Lord. 3. When the forty-eight cities were pitched upon, they were divided into four lots, as they lay next together, and then by lot were determined to the four several families of the tribe of Levi. (1) The family of Aaron, who were the only priests, had for their share the thirteen cities that were given by the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, v. 4. (2) The Kohathite-Levites (among whom were the posterity of Moses, though never distinguished from them) had the cities that lay in the lot of Dan, which lay next to Judah, and in that of Ephraim, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, which lay next to Benjamin. So those who descended from Aaron's father joined nearest to Aaron's sons. (3) Gershon was the eldest son of Levi, and therefore, though the younger house of the Kohathites was preferred before his, yet his children had the precedency of the other family of Merari, v. 6. (4) The Merarites, the youngest house, had their lot last, and it lay furthest off, v. 7.

Verses 9–42

Several things may be observed in this account, besides what was observed in the law concerning it, Num. xxxv.

I. That the Levites were dispersed into all the tribes, and not suffered to live all together in any one part of the country. Christ left his twelve disciples together in a body, but left orders that they should in due time disperse themselves, that they might preach the gospel to every creature.

II. That every tribe of Israel was adorned and enriched with its share of Levites' cities in proportion to its compass, even those that lay most remote. 1. To show kindness to, as God appointed them, Deut. xii. 19; xiv. 29. 2. To receive advice and instruction from; when they could not go up to the tabernacle, to consult those who attended there, they might go to a Levites' city, and be taught the good knowledge of the Lord. Thus God set up a candle in every room of his house, to give light to all his family.

III. That there were thirteen cities, and those some of the best, appointed for the priests, the sons of Aaron, v. 19. Aaron left but two sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, yet his family was now so much increased, and it was foreseen that it would in process of time grow so numerous, as to replenish all these cities. We read in both Testaments of such numbers of priests that we may suppose none of all the families of Israel that came out of Egypt increased afterwards so much as that of Aaron did; and the promise afterwards to the house of Aaron is, God shall increase you more and more, you and your children, Ps. cxv. 12, 14.

IV. That some of the Levites' cities were afterwards famous upon other accounts. Hebron was the city in which David began his reign, and in Mahanaim, another Levites' city (v. 38), he lay, and had his headquarters when he fled from Absalom. The first Israelite that ever wore the title of king (namely, Abimelech, the son of Gideon) reigned in Shechem, another Levites' city, v. 21.

Verses 43–45

We have here the foregoing history summed up.

I. God had promised to give the seed of Abraham the land of Canaan for a possession, and now at last he performed this promise (v. 43): They possessed it, and dwelt therein.

II. God had promised to give them rest in that land, and now they had rest round about, rest from their travel through the wilderness, rest from their wars in Canaan. They now dwelt, not only in habitations of their own, but those quiet and peaceable ones. This rest continued till they by their own sin and folly put thorns into their own beds and their own eyes.

III. God had promised to give them victory and success in their wars, and this promise likewise was fulfilled: There stood not a man before them, v. 44. Israel's experience of God's fidelity is here upon record, and is an acquittance under their hands to the honour of God, the vindication of his promise which had been so often distrusted, and the encouragement of all believers to the end of the world: There failed not any good thing, no, nor aught of any good thing (so full is it expressed), which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel, but in due time all came to pass, v. 45.

CHAP. XXII

Many particular things we have read concerning the two tribes and a half, though nothing separated them from the rest of the tribes except the river Jordan, and this chapter is wholly concerning them. I. Joshua's dismission of the militia of those tribes from the camp of Israel, in which they had served as auxiliaries, during all the wars of Canaan, and their return thereupon to their own country, ver. 1–9. II. The altar they built on the borders of Jordan, in token of their communion with the land of Israel, ver. 10. III. The offence which the rest of the tribes took at this altar, and the message they sent thereupon, ver. 11–20. IV. The apology which the two tribes and a half made for what they had done, ver. 21–29. V. The satisfaction which their apology gave to the rest of the tribes, ver. 30–34.

Verses 1–9

The war being ended, and ended gloriously, Joshua, as a prudent general, disbands his army, who never designed to make war their trade, and sends them home, to enjoy what they had conquered, and to beat their swords into plough-shares and their spears into pruning-hooks; and particularly the forces of these separate tribes, who had received their inheritance on the other side Jordan. Joshua publicly and solemnly in Shiloh gives them their discharge. It was not done till after Shiloh was made the headquarters (v. 2), and the land was begun to be divided before they removed from Gilgal, ch. xiv. 6.

It is probable that this army of Reubenites and Gadites, which had led the van in all the wars of Canaan, had sometimes made a step over Jordan, for it was not far, to visit their families, but still these two tribes and a half had their quota of troops ready, 40,000 in all, which, whenever there was occasion, presented themselves at their respective posts, and now attended in a body to receive their discharge. So must we stay on earth till our warfare be accomplished, wait for a due discharge, and not anticipate the time of our removal.

I. Joshua dismisses them to the land of their possession, v. 4. Those that were first in the assignment of their lot were last in the enjoyment of it.

II. He dismisses them with their pay; for who goes a warfare at his own charge? Return with much riches unto your tents, v. 8. "Go," says Joshua, "go home to your tents," that is, "your houses," which he calls tents, because they had been so much used to tents in the wilderness. "Go home with much riches, not only cattle, the spoil of the country, but silver and gold, the plunder of the cities, and let your brethren whom you go to, who abode by the stuff, have some share of the spoil: Divide the spoil with your brethren."

III. He dismisses them with a very honourable character. 1. For the readiness of their obedience to their commanders, v. 2. 2. For the constancy of their affection and adherence to their brethren: You have not left them these many days. 3. For the faithfulness of their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God: You have kept the charge, or, as the word is, You have kept the keeping, that is, "You have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God, not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in general, you have kept up religion in your part of the camp, a rare and excellent thing among soldiers, and where it is worthy to be praised."

IV. He dismisses them with good counsel, not to cultivate their ground, fortify their cities, and, now that their hands were inured to war and victory, to invade their neighbours, and so enlarge their own territories, but to keep up serious godliness among them in the power of it.

V. He dismisses them with a blessing (v. 6), particularly the half tribe of Manasseh, to which Joshua, as an Ephraimite, was somewhat nearer akin than to the other two, and who perhaps were the more loth to depart because they left one half of their own tribe behind them, and therefore, bidding often farewell, and lingering behind, had a second dismission and blessing, v. 7. Joshua not only prayed for them as a friend, but blessed them as a father in the name of the Lord, recommending them, their families, and affairs, to the grace of God.

Verses 10–20

I. The pious care of the separated tribes to keep their hold of Canaan's religion. In order to this, they built a great altar on the borders of Jordan, to be a witness for them that they were Israelites, and as such partakers of the altar of the Lord, 1 Cor. x. 18. When they came to Jordan (v. 10) their relation to the church of God, together with their interest in the communion of saints, is that which they are solicitous to preserve, and therefore without delay, immediately they erected this altar, which served as a bridge to keep up their fellowship with the other tribes in the things of God. This altar was very innocently and honestly designed, but it would have been well if, since it had in it an appearance of evil, and might be an occasion of offence to their brethren, they had consulted the oracle of God about it before they did it, or at least acquainted their brethren with their purpose, and given them the same explication of their altar before, to prevent their jealousy, which they did afterwards, to remove it.

II. The holy jealousy of the other tribes for the honour of God and his altar at Shiloh. Notice was immediately brought to the princes of Israel of the setting up of this altar, v. 11. And they were soon apprehensive that the setting up of another altar was an affront to the choice which God had lately made of a place to put his name in, and had a direct tendency to the worship of some other God. Now,

1. Their suspicion was very excusable, for it must be confessed the thing, prima facie—at first sight, looked ill, and seemed to imply a design to set up and maintain a competitor with the altar at Shiloh.

2. Their zeal, upon this suspicion, was very commendable, v. 12. They all gathered together, and Shiloh was the place of their rendezvous, because it was in defence of the divine charter lately granted to that place that they now appeared; their resolution was as became a kingdom of priests, who, being devoted to God and his service, did not acknowledge their brethren nor know their own children, Deut. xxxiii. 9. They would immediately go up to war against them if it appeared they had revolted from God, and were in rebellion against him.

3. Their prudence in the prosecution of this zealous resolution is no less commendable. They resolve here not to send forth their armies, to wage war, till they had first sent their ambassadors to enquire into the merits of the cause, and these men of the first rank, one out of each tribe, and Phinehas at the head of them to be their spokesman, v. 13, 14.

4. The ambassadors' management of this matter bespeaks much both of zeal and prudence.

(1) The charge they draw up against their brethren is indeed very high, and admits no other excuse than that it was in their zeal for the honour of God, and was now intended to justify the resentments of the congregation at Shiloh and to awaken the supposed delinquents to clear themselves.

(2) The aggravation of the crime charged upon their brethren is somewhat far-fetched: Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us? v. 17. The building of this altar seemed but a small matter, but it might lead to an iniquity as bad as that of Peor, and therefore must be crushed in its first rise.

(3) The reason they give for their concerning themselves so warmly in this matter is very sufficient. They were obliged to it, in their own necessary defence, by the law of self-preservation: "For, if you revolt from God to-day, who knows but to-morrow his judgments may break in upon the whole congregation (v. 18), as in the case of Achan? v. 20. He sinned, and we all smarted for it.

(4) The offer they make is very fair and kind (v. 19), that if they thought the land of their possession unclean, for want of an altar, and therefore could not be easy without one, rather than they should set up another in competition with that at Shiloh they should be welcome to come back to the land where the Lord's tabernacle was, and settle there, and they would very willingly straiten themselves to make room for them.

Verses 21–29

Their reply to the warm remonstrance of the ten tribes is very fair and ingenuous. They do not retort their charge, nor reproach them for their rash and hasty censures, but give them a soft answer which turns away wrath. They demur not to their jurisdiction, nor plead that they were not accountable to them for what they had done, nor bid them mind their own business, but, by a free and open declaration of their sincere intention in what they did, free themselves from the imputation they were under, and set themselves right in the opinion of their brethren.

I. They solemnly protest against any design to use this altar for sacrifice or offering, and therefore were far from setting it up in competition with the altar at Shiloh, or from entertaining the least thought of deserting that. They had indeed set up that which had the shape and fashion of an altar, but they had not dedicated it to a religious use. To gain credit to this protestation here is,

1. A solemn appeal to God concerning it, with which they begin their defence, intending thereby to give glory to God first, and then to give satisfaction to their brethren, v. 22. (1) A profound awe and reverence of God are expressed in the form of their appeal: The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, he knows. This brief confession of their faith would help to obviate and remove their brethren's suspicion of them, as if they intended to desert the God of Israel, and worship other gods. (2) It is a great confidence of their own integrity which they express in the matter of their appeal. Nothing but a clear conscience would have thus imprecated divine justice to avenge the rebellion if there had been any.

2. A sober apology presented to their brethren: Israel, he shall know.

3. A serious abjuration or renunciation of the design which they were suspected to be guilty of. With this they conclude their defence (v. 29): "God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord. We have as great a value and veneration for the altar of the Lord at Shiloh as any of the tribes of Israel have, and are as firmly resolved to adhere to it and constantly to attend it; we have the same concern that you have for the purity of God's worship and the unity of his church; far be it, far be it from us, to think of turning away from following God."

II. They fully explain their true intent and meaning in building this altar. In their vindication, they make it out that the building of this altar was so far from being a step towards a separation from their brethren, and from the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, that, on the contrary, it was really designed for a pledge and preservative of their communion with their brethren and with the altar of God, and a token of their resolution to do the service of the Lord before him (v. 27), and to continue to do so.

1. They gave an account of the fears they had lest, in process of time, their posterity, being seated at such a distance from the tabernacle, should be looked upon and treated as strangers to the commonwealth of Israel (v. 24). Those that are cut off from public ordinances are likely to lose all religion, and will by degrees cease from fearing the Lord. Though the form and profession of godliness are kept up by many without the life and power of it, yet the life and power of it will not long be kept up without the form and profession. You take away grace if you take away the means of grace.

2. The project they had to prevent this, v. 26–28. "Therefore, to secure an interest in the altar of God to those who shall come after us, and to prove their title to it, we said, Let us build an altar, to be a witness between us and you," that, having this copy of the altar in their custody, it might be produced as an evidence of their right to the privileges of the original.

We have here the good issue of this controversy, which, if there had not been on both sides a disposition to peace, as there was on both sides a zeal for God, might have been of ill consequence; for quarrels about religion, for want of wisdom and love, often prove the most fierce and most difficult to be accommodated.

I. The ambassadors were exceedingly pleased when the separate tribes had given in a protestation of the innocency of their intentions in building this altar. 1. The ambassadors did not call in question their sincerity in that protestation. 2. They did not upbraid them with the rashness and unadvisedness of this action. 3. Much less did they go about to fish for evidence to make out their charge, because they had once exhibited it, but were glad to have their mistake rectified, and were not at all ashamed to own it. Proud and peevish spirits, when they have passed an unjust censure upon their brethren, though ever so much convincing evidence be brought of the injustice of it, will stand to it, and can by no means be persuaded to retract it.

II. The congregation was abundantly satisfied when their ambassadors reported to them their brethren's apology for what they had done.

III. The separate tribes were gratified, and, since they had a mind to preserve among them this pattern of the altar of God, though there was not likely to be that occasion for it which they fancied, yet Joshua and the princes let them have their humour, and did not give orders for the demolishing of it. Only care was taken that they having explained the meaning of their altar, that it was intended for no more than a testimony of their communion with the altar at Shiloh, this explanation should be recorded, by giving a name to it signifying so much (v. 34); they called it Ed, a witness to that, and no more, a witness of the relation they stood in to God and Israel.

CHAP. XXIII

In this and the following chapter we have two farewell sermons, which Joshua preached to the people of Israel a little before his death. Had he designed to gratify the curiosity of succeeding ages, he would rather have recorded the method of Israel's settlement in their new conquests, but that which he intended in the registers of this book was to entail on posterity a sense of religion and their duty to God; and therefore, he here transmits to his reader the methods he took to persuade Israel to be faithful to their covenant with their God. In this chapter we have, I. A convention of the states called (ver. 1, 2). II. Joshua's speech to them at the opening, or perhaps at the concluding, of the sessions, to hear which was the principal design of their coming together. In it, 1. Joshua reminds them of what God had done for them (ver. 3, 4, 9, 14), and what he was ready to do yet further, ver. 5, 10. 2. He exhorts them carefully and resolutely to persevere in their duty to God, ver. 6, 8, 11. III. He cautions them against all familiarity with their idolatrous neighbours, ver. 7. IV. He gives them fair warning of the fatal consequences of it, if they should revolt from God and turn to idols, ver. 12, 13, 15, 16.

Verses 1–10

As to the date of this edict of Joshua,

I. No mention at all is made of the place where this general assembly was held: some think it was at Timnath-serah, Joshua's own city, where he lived, and whence, being old, he could not well remove. It is more probable this meeting was at Shiloh, where the tabernacle of meeting was.

II. There is only a general mention of the time when this was done. It was long after the Lord had given them rest, but it is not said how long, v. 1. It was, 1. So long as that Israel had time to feel the comforts of their rest and possessions in Canaan, and to enjoy the advantages of that good land. 2. So long as that Joshua had time to observe which way their danger lay of being corrupted, namely, by their intimacy with the Canaanites that remained, against which he is therefore careful to arm them.

III. The persons to whom Joshua made this speech: To all Israel, even their elders, &c. So it might be read, v. 2.

IV. Joshua's circumstances when he gave them this charge: He was old and stricken in age (v. 1), probably it was in the last year of his life, and he lived to be 110 years old, ch. xxiv. 29. I am old and stricken in age. He uses it, 1. As an argument with himself to give them this charge, because being old he could expect to be but a little while with them, to advise and instruct them. 2. As an argument with them to give heed to what he said. He was old and experienced, and he had grown old in their service, and had spent himself for their good, and therefore was to be the more regarded by them.

V. The discourse itself.

1. He puts them in mind of the great things God had done for them, now in his days. For the proof of this he appeals to their own eyes (v. 3): "You have seen all that the Lord your God has done; not what I have done, or what you have done but what God himself has done by me and for you." (1) Many great and mighty nations (as the rate of nations then went) were driven out from as fine a country as any was at that time upon the face of the earth, to make room for Israel. (2) They were not only driven out, they were subdued before them, which made the possessing of their land so much the more glorious. (3) They had not only conquered the Canaanites, but were put in full possession of their land (v. 4).

2. He assures them of God's readiness to carry on and complete this glorious work in due time. He tells them what little need they had to be in care about the numbers of their forces (v. 10): One man of you shall chase a thousand, as Jonathan did, 1 Sam. xiv. 13. "The Lord your God, he it is that fighteth for you; and how many do you reckon him for?"

3. He hereupon most earnestly charges them to adhere to their duty, to go on and persevere in the good ways of the Lord wherein they had so well set out. He exhorts them,

(1) To be very courageous (v. 6): "God fighteth for you against your enemies, do you therefore behave yourselves valiantly for him."

(2) To be very cautious. [1] They must not acquaint themselves with idolaters, nor come among them to visit them or be present at any of their feasts or entertainments, for they could not contract any intimacy nor keep up any conversation with them, without danger of infection. [2] They must not show the least respect to any idol, nor make mention of the name of their gods, but endeavour to bury the remembrance of them in perpetual oblivion, that the worship of them may never be revived. [3] They must not countenance others in showing respect to them. They must not only not swear by them themselves, but they must not cause others to swear by them, which supposes that they must not make any covenants with idolaters, because they, in the confirming of their covenants, would swear by their idols; never let Israelites admit such an oath.

(3) To be very constant (v. 8): Cleave unto the Lord your God, that is, "delight in him, depend upon him, devote yourselves to his glory, and continue to do so to the end."

Verses 11–16

Here, I. Joshua directs them what to do, that they might persevere in religion, v. 11. Would we cleave to the Lord, and not forsake him, 1. We must always stand upon our guard, for many a precious soul is lost and ruined through carelessness: "Take heed therefore, take good heed to yourselves, to your souls (so the word is). 2. What we do in religion we must do from a principle of love, not by constraint or from a slavish fear of God, but of choice and with delight. "Love the Lord your God, and you will not leave him."

II. He urges God's fidelity to them as an argument why they should be faithful to him (v. 14): "I am going the way of all the earth, I am old and dying. Now that I am near my end it is proper to look back upon the years that are past; you know that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord spoke concerning you" (and he spoke a great many); see ch. xxi. 45.

III. He gives them fair warning what would be the fatal consequences of apostasy (v. 12, 13, 15, 16): "If you go back, know for a certainty it will be your ruin."

1. How he describes the apostasy which he warns them against. The first step would be (v. 12) growing intimate with idolaters. The next step would be intermarrying with them. And the consequence of that would be (v. 16) serving other gods (which were pretended to be the ancient deities of the country) and bowing down to them.

2. How he describes the destruction which he warns them of. He tells them, (1) That these remainders of the Canaanites would be snares and traps to them, both to draw them to sin and also to draw them into foolish bargains, unprofitable projects, and all manner of inconveniences. (2) That the anger of the Lord would be kindled against them. Their making leagues with the Canaanites would not only give those idolaters the opportunity of doing them a mischief, and be the fostering of snakes in their bosoms, but it would likewise provoke God to become their enemy, and would kindle the fire of his displeasure against them. (3) That all the threatenings of the word would be fulfilled, as the promise had been, for the God of eternal truth is faithful to both (v. 15): "As all good things have come upon you according to the promise, so long as you have kept close to God, so all evil things will come upon you according to the threatening, if you forsake him."

CHAP. XXIV

This chapter concludes the life and reign of Joshua, in which we have, I. The great care and pains he took to confirm the people of Israel in the true faith and worship of God, that they might, after his death, persevere therein. In order to this he called another general assembly of the heads of the congregation of Israel (ver. 1) and dealt with them. 1, By way of narrative, recounting the great things God had done for them and their fathers, ver. 2–13. 2. By way of charge to them, in consideration thereof, to serve God, ver. 14. 3. By way of treaty with them, wherein he aims to bring them, (1) To make religion their deliberate choice; and they did so, with reasons for their choice, ver. 15–18. (2) To make it their determinate choice, and to resolve to adhere to it, ver. 19–24. 4. By way of covenant upon that treaty, ver. 25–28. II. The conclusion of this history, with, 1. The death and burial of Joshua (ver. 29, 30) and Eleazar (ver. 33), and the mention of the burial of Joseph's bones upon that occasion, ver. 32. 2. A general account of the state of Israel at that time, ver. 31.

Verses 1–14

Joshua thought he had taken his last farewell of Israel in the solemn charge he gave them in the foregoing chapter, when he said, I go the way of all the earth; but God graciously continuing his life longer than expected, he was desirous to improve it for the good of Israel. He summons them together again, that he might try what more he could do to engage them for God.

I. The place appointed for their meeting is Shechem, not only because that lay nearer to Joshua than Shiloh, and therefore more convenient now that he was infirm and unfit for travelling, but because it was the place where Abraham, the first trustee of God's covenant with this people, settled at his coming to Canaan, and where God appeared to him (Gen. xii. 6, 7), and near which stood Mounts Gerizim and Ebal, where the people had renewed their covenant with God at their first coming into Canaan, Josh. viii. 30.

II. They presented themselves not only before Joshua, but before God, in this assembly. Joshua ordered the ark of God to be brought by the priests to Shechem, which, they say, was about ten miles from Shiloh, and to be set down in the place of their meeting, which is therefore called (v. 26) the sanctuary of the Lord, the presence of the ark making it so at that time. We have not now any such sensible tokens of the divine presence, but are to believe that where two or three are gathered together in Christ's name he is as really in the midst of them as God was where the ark was, and they are indeed presenting themselves before him.

III. Joshua spoke to them in God's name, and as from him, in the language of a prophet (v. 2): "Thus saith the Lord." Note, The word of God is to be received by us as his, whoever is the messenger that brings it, whose greatness cannot add to it, nor his meanness diminish from it.

1. The doctrinal part is a history of the great things God had done for his people, and for their fathers before them. (1) He brought Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, v. 2, 3. Abraham, who afterwards was the friend of God and the great favourite of heaven, was bred up in idolatry, and lived long in it, till God by his grace snatched him as a brand out of that burning. Hence Abraham's justification is made by the apostle an instance of God's justifying the ungodly, Rom. iv. 5. (2) He brought him to Canaan, and built up his family, led him through the land to Shechem, where they now were, multiplied his seed by Ishmael, who begat twelve princes, but at last gave him Isaac the promised son, and in him multiplied his seed. When Isaac had two sons, Jacob and Esau, God provided an inheritance for Esau elsewhere in Mount Seir, that the land of Canaan might be reserved entire for the seed of Jacob, and the posterity of Esau might not pretend to a share in it. (3) He delivered the seed of Jacob out of Egypt with a high hand (v. 5, 6), and rescued them out of the hands of Pharaoh and his host at the Red Sea, v. 6, 7. The same waters were the Israelites' guard and the Egyptians' grave, and this in answer to prayer; for, though we find in the story that they in that distress murmured against God (Exod. xiv. 11, 12), notice is here taken of their crying to God; he graciously accepted those that prayed to him, and overlooked the folly of those that quarrelled with him. (4) He protected them in the wilderness, where they are here said, not to wander, but to dwell for a long season, v. 7. (5) He gave them the land of the Amorites, on the other side Jordan (v. 8), and there defeated the plot of Balak and Balaam against them, so that Balaam could not curse them as he desired, and therefore Balak durst not fight them as he designed, and as, because he designed it, he is here said to have done it. (6) He brought them safely and triumphantly into Canaan, delivered the Canaanites into their hand (v. 11), sent hornets before them, when they were actually engaged in battle with the enemy, which with their stings tormented them and with their noise terrified them, so that they became a very easy prey to Israel. Lastly, They were now in the peaceable possession of a good land, and lived comfortably upon the fruit of other people's labours, v. 13.

2. The application of this history of God's mercies to them is by way of exhortation to fear and serve God, in gratitude for his favour, and that it might be continued to them, v. 14. It should seem by this charge, which is repeated (v. 23), that there were some among them that privately kept in their closets the images or pictures of these dunghill-deities, which came to their hands from their ancestors, as heir-looms of their families, though, it may be, they did not worship them; these Joshua earnestly urges them to throw away: "Deface them, destroy them, lest you be tempted to serve them."

Verses 15–28

Never was any treaty carried on with better management, nor brought to a better issue, than this of Joshua with the people, to engage them to serve God.

I. Would it be any obligation upon them if they made the service of God their choice?—he here puts them to their choice, because it would have a great influence upon their perseverance in religion if they embraced it with the reason of men and with the resolution of men. These two things he here brings them to.

1. He brings them to embrace their religion rationally and intelligently, for it is a reasonable service. Accordingly,

(1) Joshua fairly puts the matter to their choice, v. 15. Here, [1] He proposes the candidates that stand for the election. The Lord, Jehovah, on one side, and on the other side either the gods of their ancestors, or the gods of their neighbours, the Amorites, in whose land they dwelt, which would insinuate themselves into the affections of those that were complaisant and fond of good fellowship. [2] He supposes there were those to whom, upon some account or other, it would seem evil to serve the Lord. There are prejudices and objections which some people raise against religion. It seems evil to them, hard and unreasonable, to be obliged to deny themselves, mortify the flesh, take up their cross, &c. [3] He refers it to themselves: "Choose you whom you will serve, choose this day, now that the matter is laid thus plainly before you, speedily bring it to a head, and do not stand hesitating." Elijah, long after this, referred the decision of the controversy between Jehovah and Baal to the consciences of those with whom he was treating, 1 Kings xviii. 21. Joshua's putting the matter here to this issue plainly intimates two things:—First, That it is the will of God we should every one of us make religion our serious and deliberate choice. Secondly, That religion has so much self-evident reason and righteousness on its side that it may safely be referred to every man that allows himself a free thought either to choose or refuse it; for the merits of the cause are so plain that no considerate man can do otherwise but choose it. [4] He directs their choice in this matter by an open declaration of his own resolutions: "But as for me and my house, whatever you do, we will serve the Lord, and I hope you will all be of the same mind."

(2) The matter being thus put to their choice, they immediately determine it by a free, rational, and intelligent declaration, for the God of Israel, against all competitors whatsoever, v. 16–18. We will also serve the Lord (v. 18). They give very substantial reasons for their choice, to show that they did not make it purely in compliance to Joshua, but from a full conviction of the reasonableness and equity of it.

2. He brings them to embrace their religion resolutely, and to express a full purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord. Now that he has them in a good mind he follows his blow, and drives the nail to the head, that it might, if possible, be a nail in a sure place. Fast bind, fast find.

(1) In order to this he sets before them the difficulties of religion, and that in it which might be thought discouraging (v. 19, 20): You cannot serve the Lord, for he is a holy God. He will not forgive, And, if you forsake him, he will do you hurt. Certainly Joshua does not intend hereby to deter them from the service of God as impracticable and dangerous. But, [1] He perhaps intends to represent here the suggestions of seducers, who tempted Israel from their God, with insinuations that he was a hard master, his work impossible to be done, and he not to be pleased. It is probable that this was then commonly objected against the Jewish religion. Or, [2] He thus expresses his godly jealousy over them, and his fear concerning them, that, notwithstanding the profession they now made of zeal for God and his service, they would afterwards draw back Or, [3] He resolves to let them know the worst of it. "You cannot serve the Lord, except you put away all other gods." Thus, though our Master has assured us that his yoke is easy, yet lest we should grow remiss and careless, he has also told us that the gate is strait, and the way narrow, that leads to life, that we may therefore strive to enter, and not seek only. Or, [4] Joshua thus urges on them the seeming discouragements which lay in their way, that he might sharpen their resolutions.

(2) Notwithstanding this statement of the difficulties of religion, they declare a firm and fixed resolution to continue and persevere therein (v. 21): "Nay, but we will serve the Lord."

II. The service of God being thus made their deliberate choice, Joshua binds them to it by a solemn covenant, v. 25. Moses had twice publicly ratified this covenant between God and Israel, at Mount Sinai (Exod. xxiv.) and in the plains of Moab, Deut. xxix. 1. Joshua had likewise done it once (ch. viii. 31, &c.) and now the second time. Now to give it the formalities of a covenant, 1. He calls witnesses, no other than themselves (v. 22): You are witnesses that you have chosen the Lord. 2. He put it in writing, and inserted it, as we find it here, in the sacred canon: He wrote it in the book of the law (v. 26). He set up a great stone under an oak, as a monument of this covenant, and perhaps wrote an inscription upon it (by which stones are made to speak) signifying the intention of it.

Verses 29–33

We have here, 1. The burial of Joseph, v. 32. He died about 200 years before in Egypt, but gave commandment concerning his bones, that they should not rest in their grave until Israel had rest in the land of promise; now therefore the children of Israel, who had brought this coffin full of bones with them out of Egypt, carried it along with them in all their marches through the wilderness and kept it in their camp till Canaan was perfectly reduced. Now at last they deposited his bones in that piece of ground which his father gave him near Shechem, Gen. xlviii. 22. Probably the sermon in this chapter served both for Joseph's funeral sermon and his own farewell sermon. 2. The death and burial of Joshua, v. 29, 30. He is here called the servant of the Lord, the same title that was given to Moses (ch. i. 1) when mention was made of his death. Joshua's burying-place is here said to be on the north side of the hill Gaash, or the quaking hill; the Jews say it was so called because it trembled at the burial of Joshua, to upbraid the people of Israel with their stupidity in that they did not lament the death of that great and good man as they ought to have done. 3. The death and burial of Eleazar the chief priest, who, it is probable, died about the same time that Joshua did, as Aaron in the same year with Moses, v. 33. He was buried in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son. 4. A general idea given us of the state of Israel at this time, v. 31. While Joshua lived, religion was kept up among them under his care and influence; but soon after he and his contemporaries died it went to decay. How well is it for the gospel church that Christ, our Joshua, is still with it, by his Spirit, and will be always, even unto the end of the world!

AN EXPOSITION OF THE BOOK OF JUDGES

This is called in the Hebrew Shepher Shoptim, the Book of Judges, which the Syriac and Arabic versions enlarge upon, and call it, The Book of the Judges of the Children of Israel. The LXX. entitles it only Κριται, Judges. It is the history of the commonwealth of Israel, during the government of the judges from Othniel to Eli. It contains the history (according to Dr. Lightfoot's computation) of 299 years, reckoning to Othniel of Judah forty years, to Ehud of Benjamin eighty years, to Barak of Naphtali forty years, to Gideon of Manasseh forty years, to Abimelech his son three years, to Tola of Issachar twenty-three, to Jair of Manasseh twenty-two, to Jephtha of Manasseh six, to Ibzan of Judah seven, to Elon of Zebulun ten, to Abdon of Ephraim eight, to Samson of Dan twenty, in all 299. The judges here appear to have been of eight several tribes; that honour was thus diffused, until at last it centred in Judah. Eli and Samuel, the two judges that fall not within this book, were of Levi. It seems, there was no judge of Reuben or Simeon, Gad or Asher. The history of these judges in their order we have in this book to the end of ch. xvi. And then in the last five chapters we have an account of some particular memorable events which happened, as the story of Ruth did (Ruth i. 1) in the days when the Judges ruled, but it is not certain in which judge's days. Now as to the state of the commonwealth of Israel during this period, I. They do not appear here either so great or so good as one might have expected the character of such a peculiar people would be, that were governed by such laws and enriched by such promises. We find them wretchedly corrupted, and wretchedly oppressed by their neighbours about them. Yet, II. We may hope that though the historian in this book enlarges most upon their provocations and grievances, yet there was a face of religion upon the land; and, however there were those among them that were drawn aside to idolatry, yet the tabernacle-service, according to the law of Moses, was kept up, and there were many that attended it. III. It should seem that in these times each tribe had very much its government in ordinary within itself, and acted separately, without one common head, or council, which occasioned many differences among themselves, and kept them from being or doing anything considerable. IV. The government of the judges was not constant, but occasional when it is said that after Ehud's victory the land rested eighty years, and after Barak's forty, it is not certain that they lived, much less that they governed, so long; but they and the rest were raised up and animated by the Spirit of God to do particular service to the public when there was occasion, to avenge Israel of their enemies and to purge Israel of their idolatries, which are the two things principally meant by their judging Israel. Yet Deborah, as a prophetess, was attended for judgment by all Israel, before there was occasion for her agency in war, ch. iv. 4. V. During the government of the judges, God was in a more especial manner Israel's king; so Samuel tells them when they were resolved to throw off this form of government, 1 Sam. xii. 12. Four of the judges of Israel are canonized (Heb. xi. 32), Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephtha. The learned bishop Patrick thinks the prophet Samuel was the penman of this Book.

CHAP. I

This chapter gives us a particular account what sort of progress the several tribes of Israel made in the reducing of Canaan after the death of Joshua. He did (as we say) break the neck of that great work, and put it into such a posture that they might easily have perfected it in due time, if they had not been wanting to themselves; wherein they came short, we are told. I. The united tribes of Judah and Simeon did bravely. 1. God appointed Judah to begin, ver. 1, 2. 2. Judah took Simeon to act in conjunction with him, ver. 3. 3. They succeeded in their enterprises against Bezek (ver. 4–7), Jerusalem (ver. 8), Hebron and Debir (ver. 9–15), Hormah, Gaza, and other places, ver. 17–19. 4. Yet where there were chariots of iron their hearts failed them, ver 19. Mention is made of the Kenites settling among them, ver. 16. II. The other tribes, in comparison with these, acted a cowardly part. 1. Benjamin failed, ver. 21. 2. The house of Joseph did well against Beth-el (ver. 22–26), but in other places did not improve their advantages, nor Manasseh (ver. 27, 28), nor Ephraim, ver. 29. 3. Zebulun spared the Canaanites, ver. 30. 4 Asher truckled worse than any of them to the Canaanites, ver. 31, 32. 5. Naphtali was kept out of the full possession of several of his cities, ver. 33. 6. Dan was straitened by the Amorites, ver. 34–36. No account is given of Issachar, nor of the two tribes and a half on the other side of Jordan.

Verses 1–8

I. The children of Israel consult the oracle of God for direction which of all the tribes should first attempt to clear their country of the Canaanites. The question they ask is, Who shall go up first? v. 1. By this time, we may suppose, they were so multiplied that the places they were in possession of began to be too strait for them. Whether each tribe was ambitious of being first, and so strove for the honour of it, or whether each was afraid of being first, and so strove to decline it, does not appear.

II. God appointed that Judah should go up first, and promised him success (v. 2): "I have delivered the land into his hand, to be possessed, and therefore will deliver the enemy that keeps him out of possession, into his hand, to be destroyed." And why must Judah be first in this undertaking? 1. Judah was the most numerous and powerful tribe. 2. Judah was first in dignity, and therefore must be first in duty. Judah was the tribe out of which our Lord was to spring: so that in Judah, Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, went before them. Christ engaged the powers of darkness first, and foiled them, which animates us for our conflicts; and it is in him that we are more than conquerors.

III. Judah hereupon prepares to go up, but courts his brother and neighbour the tribe of Simeon to join forces with him, v. 3. The strongest should not despise but desire the assistance even of those that are weaker. Judah was the most considerable of all the tribes, and Simeon the least considerable, and yet Judah begs Simeon's friendship, and prays an aid from him; the head cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, for we are members one of another.

IV. The confederate forces of Judah and Simeon take the field: Judah went up (v. 4), and Simeon with him, v. 3. Caleb, it is probable, was commander-in-chief of this expedition. It should seem by what follows (v. 10, 11), that he was not yet in possession of his own allotment. It was happy for them that they had such a general as, according to his name, was all heart.

V. God gave them great success. Whether they invaded the enemy, or the enemy first gave them the alarm, the Lord delivered them into their hand, v. 4. Now, 1. We are told how the army of the Canaanites was routed in the field, in or near Bezek, the place where they drew up, which afterwards Saul made the place of a general rendezvous (1 Sam. xi. 8); they slew 10,000 men, which blow, if followed, could not but be a very great weakening to those that were already brought so very low. 2. How their king was taken and mortified. His name was Adoni-bezek, which signifies, lord of Bezek. He was taken prisoner after the battle, and we are here told how they used him; they cut off his thumbs, to disfit him for fighting, and his great toes, that he might not be able to run away, v. 6. It had been barbarous thus to triumph over a man in misery, and that lay at their mercy, but that he was a devoted Canaanite, and one that had in like manner abused others. Here observe, (1) What a great man this Adoni-bezek had been, yet now himself a prisoner and reduced to the extremity of meanness and disgrace. (2) What desolations he had made among his neighbours: he had wholly subdued seventy kings. "Judah," says Dr. Lightfoot, "in conquering Adoni-bezek, did, in effect, conquer seventy kings." (3) How justly he was treated as he had treated others. (4) How honestly he owned the righteousness of God herein: As I have done, so God has requited me.

VI. Particular notice is taken of the conquest of Jerusalem, v. 8.

Verses 9–20

A further account of that glorious and successful campaign which Judah and Simeon made. 1. The lot of Judah was pretty well cleared of the Canaanites, yet not thoroughly. Those that dwelt in the mountain (the mountains that were round about Jerusalem) were driven out (v. 9, 19), but those in the valley kept their ground against them, having chariots of iron, such as we read of, Josh. xvii. 16. They had iron chariots, and therefore it was thought not safe to attack them: but had not Israel God on their side, whose chariots are thousands of angels (Ps. lxviii. 17). Yet they suffered their fears to prevail against their faith, they could not trust God under any disadvantages, but meanly withdrew their forces, when with one bold stroke they might have completed their victories. 2. Caleb was put in possession of Hebron, which, though given him by Joshua ten or twelve years before, yet being employed in public service, for the settling of the tribes, which he preferred before his own private interests, it seems he did not till now make himself master of; so well content was that good man to serve others, while he left himself to be served last. Yet now the men of Judah all came in to his assistance for the reducing of Hebron (v. 10), slew the sons of Anak, and put him in possession of it, v. 20. They gave Hebron unto Caleb. And now Caleb, that he might return the kindness of his countrymen, is impatient to see Debir reduced and put into the hands of the men of Judah, to expedite which he proffers his daughter to the person that will undertake to command in the siege of that important place, v. 11, 12. Othniel bravely undertakes it, and wins the town and the lady (v. 13). 3. Simeon got ground of the Canaanites in his border, v. 17, 18. In the eastern part of Simeon's lot, they destroyed the Canaanites in Zephath, and called it Hormah—destruction. In the western part they took Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, cities of the Philistines; they gained present possession of the cities, but, not destroying the inhabitants, the Philistines in process of time recovered the cities, and proved inveterate enemies to the Israel of God, and no better could come of doing their work by the halves. 4. The Kenites gained a settlement in the tribe of Judah, choosing it there rather than in any other tribe, because it was the strongest, and there they hoped to be safe and quiet, v. 16. These were the posterity of Jethro. They had at first seated themselves in the city of palm-trees, that is, Jericho, a city which never was to be rebuilt, and therefore the fitter for those who dwelt in tents, and did not mind building. But afterwards they removed into the wilderness of Judah. This respect Israel showed them, to let them fix where they pleased, being a quiet people, who, wherever they were, were content with a little. Those that molested none were molested by none. Blessed are the meek, for thus they shall inherit the earth.

Verses 21–36

We are here told upon what terms the rest of the tribes stood with the Canaanites that remained.

I. Benjamin neglected to drive the Jebusites out of that part of the city of Jerusalem which fell to their lot, v. 21. Judah had set them a good example, and gained them great advantages by what they did (v. 9), but they did not follow the blow for want of resolution.

II. 1. The house of Joseph bestirred themselves a little to get possession of Beth-el, v. 22. That city is mentioned in the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 22. Yet it is spoken of there (v. 13), as a city in the borders of that tribe, and, it should seem, the line went through it, so that one half of it only belonged to Benjamin, the other half to Ephraim. In this account of the expedition of the Ephraimites against Beth-el observe,

(1) Their interest in the divine favour: The Lord was with them, and would have been with the other tribes if they would have exerted their strength.

(2) The prudent measures they took to gain the city. They sent spies to observe what part of the city was weakest, v. 23. These spies got very good information from a man who showed them a private way into the town. It seems, he would not join himself to the people of Israel, and therefore he removed after a colony of the Hittites, which had gone into Arabia and settled there upon Joshua's invasion of the country; with them this man chose to dwell, and built a city, and in the name of it preserved the ancient name of his native city, Luz, an almond-tree, preferring this before its new name, which carried religion in it, Bethel—the house of God.

(3) Their success. The spies brought or sent notice of the intelligence they had gained to the army, which improved their advantages, surprised the city, and put them all to the sword, v. 25.

2. Besides this achievement, it seems, the children of Joseph did nothing remarkable.

III. Zebulun, perhaps inclining to the sea-trade, for it was foretold that it should be a haven for ships, neglected to reduce Kitron and Nahalol (v. 30), and only made the inhabitants of those places tributaries to them.

IV. Asher quitted itself worse than any of the tribes (v. 31, 32), not only in leaving more towns than any of them in the hands of the Canaanites, but in submitting to the Canaanites instead of making them tributaries.

V. Naphtali also permitted the Canaanites to live among them (v. 33), only by degrees they got them so far under as to exact contributions from them.

VI. Dan was so far from extending his conquests where his lot lay that, wanting spirit to make head against the Amorites, he was forced by them to retire into the mountains and inhabit the cities there, but durst not venture into the valley, where, it is probable, the chariots of iron were, v. 34. In Jacob's blessing Judah is compared to a lion, Dan to a serpent; now observe how Judah with his lion-like courage prospered and prevailed, but Dan with all his serpentine subtlety could get no ground; craft and artful management do not always effect the wonders they pretend to.

Upon the whole matter it appears that the people of Israel were generally very careless both of their duty and interest in this thing; they did not what they might have done to expel the Canaanites and make room for themselves. The same thing that kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan kept them now out of the full possession of it, and that was unbelief. Distrust of the power and promise of God lost them their advantages, and ran them into a thousand mischiefs.

CHAP. II

I. A particular message which God sent to Israel by an angel, and the impression it made upon them, ver. 1–5. II. A general idea of the state of Israel during the government of the judges. 1. Their adherence to God while Joshua and the elders lived, ver. 6–10. 2. Their revolt afterwards to idolatry, ver. 11–13. 3. God's displeasure against them, and his judgments upon them for it, ver. 14, 15. 4. His pity towards them, shown in raising them up deliverers, ver. 16–18. 5. Their relapse into idolatry after the judgment was over, ver. 17–19. 6. The full stop God in anger put to their successes, ver. 20–23.

Verses 1–5

It was the privilege of Israel that they had particular messages sent them from heaven, as there was occasion, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction. Besides the written word which they had before them to read, they often heard a word behind them, saying, This is the way, Isa. xxx. 21. Here begins that way of God's dealing with them. In these verses we have a very awakening sermon that was preached to them when they began to cool in their religion.

I. The preacher was an angel of the Lord (v. 1). Such extraordinary messengers we sometimes find in this book employed in the raising up of the judges that delivered Israel, as Gideon and Samson; and now, to show how various are the good offices they do for God's Israel, here is one sent to preach to them, to prevent their falling into sin and trouble.

II. The persons to whom this sermon was preached were all the children of Israel, v. 4. A great congregation for a great preacher! The place is called Bochim (v. 1), because it gained that name upon this occasion. All Israel needed the reproof and warning here given.

III. The sermon itself is short, but very close. God here tells them plainly, 1. What he had done for them, v. 1. He had brought them out of Egypt, a land of slavery and toil, into Canaan, a land of rest, liberty, and plenty. 2. What he had promised them: I said, I will never break my covenant with you. 3. What were his just and reasonable expectations from them (v. 2): that being taken into covenant with God they should make no league with the Canaanites, who were both his enemies and theirs,—that having set up his altar they should throw down their altars, lest they should be a temptation to them to serve their gods. 4. How they had in this very thing, which he had most insisted on, disobeyed him: "But you have not in so small a matter obeyed my voice." 5. How they must expect to smart by and by for this their folly, v. 3. Those deceive themselves who expect advantage by friendship with those that are enemies to God.

IV. The good success of this sermon is very remarkable: The people lifted up their voice and wept, v. 4. But this was not enough; they wept, but we do not find that they reformed, that they went home and destroyed all the remains of idolatry and idolaters among them. Many are melted under the word that harden again before they are cast into a new mould. However, this general weeping, 1. Gave a new name to the place (v. 5): they called it Bochim, Weepers. 2. It gave occasion for a solemn sacrifice: They sacrificed there unto the Lord, having (as is supposed) met at Shiloh, where God's altar was.

Verses 6–23

The angel had foretold that the Canaanites and their idols would be a snare to Israel; now the historian undertakes to show that they were so, and, that this may appear the more clear, he looks back a little, and takes notice, 1. Of their happy settlement in the land of Canaan. Joshua, having distributed this land among them, dismissed them to the quiet and comfortable possession of it (v. 6). 2. Of their continuance in the faith and fear of God's holy name as long as Joshua lived, v. 7. 3. Of the death and burial of Joshua, which gave a fatal stroke to the interests of religion among the people, v. 8, 9. 4. Of the rising of a new generation, v. 10. They were so entirely devoted to the world, so intent upon the business of it or so indulgent of the flesh in ease and luxury, that they never minded the true God and his holy religion, and so were easily drawn aside to false gods and their abominable superstitions.

A general idea of the series of things in Israel during the time of the judges,

I. The people of Israel forsook the God of Israel. In general, they did evil, nothing could be more evil, that is, more provoking to God, nor more prejudicial to themselves, and it was in the sight of the Lord. In particular, 1. They forsook the Lord (v. 12, and again v. 13); this was one of the two great evils they were guilty of, Jer. ii. 13. They had been joined to the Lord in covenant, but now they forsook him, as a wife treacherously departs from her husband. 2. When they forsook the only true God they did not turn atheists, nor were they such fools as to say, There is no God; but they followed other gods: so much remained of pure nature as to own a God, yet so much appeared of corrupt nature as to multiply gods, and take up with any, and to follow the fashion, not the rule, in religious worship. Baalim signifies lords, and Ashtaroth blessed ones, both plural, for when they forsook Jehovah, who is one, they had gods many and lords many.

II. The God of Israel was hereby provoked to anger, and delivered them up into the hand of their enemies, v. 14. 15. 1. The scale of victory turned against them. God would rather give the success to those that had never known nor owned him than to those that had done both, but had now deserted him. 2. The balance of power then turned against them of course.

III. The God of infinite mercy took pity on them in their distresses, though they had brought themselves into them by their own sin and folly, and wrought deliverance for them. Here observe, 1. The inducement of their deliverance. It came purely from God's pity and tender compassion; the reason was fetched from within himself. It is not so much the burden of sin as the burden of affliction that they are said to groan under. It is true they deserved to perish for ever under his curse, yet, this being the day of his patience and our probation, he does not stir up all his wrath. 2. The instruments of their deliverance. God raised up judges from among themselves, as there was occasion, men to whom God gave extraordinary qualifications to reform and deliver Israel, and whose great attempts he crowned with wonderful success: The Lord was with the judges when he raised them up, and so they became saviours. Observe, (1) In the days of the greatest degeneracy and distress of the church there shall be some whom God will make fit to redress its grievances and set things to rights. (2) God endues men with wisdom and courage, gives them hearts to act and venture. All that are in any way the blessings of their country must be looked upon as the gifts of God.

IV. The degenerate Israelites were not effectually and thoroughly reformed, no, not by their judges, v. 17–19. They had been espoused to God, but broke the marriage-covenant, and went a-whoring after these gods. Idolatry is spiritual adultery. They corrupted themselves more than their fathers, strove to outdo them in multiplying strange gods and inventing profane and impious rites of worship, as it were in contradiction to their reformers.

V. God's just resolution hereupon was still to continue the rod over them. After Joshua's death, little was done for a long time against the Canaanites: Israel indulged them, and grew familiar with them, and therefore God would not drive them out any more, v. 21. God chose their delusions, Isa. lxvi. 4. Thus men cherish and indulge their own corrupt appetites and passions, and therefore God justly leaves them to themselves under the power of their sins, which will be their ruin. So shall their doom be; they themselves have decided it.

CHAP. III

I. A general account of Israel's enemies is premised, and of the mischief they did them, ver. 1–7. II. A particular account of the brave exploits done by the first three of the judges. 1. Othniel, whom God raised up to fight Israel's battles against the king of Mesopotamia, ver. 8–11. 2 Ehud, who was employed in rescuing Israel out of the hands of the Moabites, ver. 12–30. 3. Shangar, who signalized himself in an encounter with the Philistines, ver. 31.

Verses 1–7

We are here told what remained of the old inhabitants of Canaan. 1. There were some of them that kept together in united bodies, unbroken (v. 3): The five lords of the Philistines, namely, Ashdod, Gaza, Askelon, Gath, and Ekron, 1 Sam. vi. 17. There was a particular nation called Canaanites, that kept their ground with the Sidonians, upon the coast of the great sea. And in the north the Hivites held much of Mount Lebanon. But, besides these, 2. There were everywhere in all parts of the country some scatterings of the nations (v. 5), Hittites, Amorites, &c.

Now concerning these remnants of the natives observe,

I. How wisely God permitted them to remain. It is mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter as an act of God's justice, that he let them remain for Israel's correction. But here another construction is put upon it, and it appears to have been an act of God's wisdom, that he let them remain for Israel's real advantage, that those who had not known the wars of Canaan might learn war, v. 1, 2. Because their country lay very much in the midst of enemies it was therefore necessary they should be well disciplined, that they might defend their coasts when invaded, and might hereafter enlarge their coast as God had promised them.

II. How wickedly Israel mingled themselves with those that did remain. 1. They joined in marriage with the Canaanites (v. 6), though they could not advance either their honour or their estate by marrying with them. 2. Thus they were brought to join in worship with them; they served their gods (v. 6), Baalim and the groves (v. 7), that is, the images that were worshipped in groves of thick trees, which were a sort of natural temple. In such unequal matches there is more reason to fear that the bad will corrupt the good than to hope that the good will reform the bad, as there is in laying two pears together, the one rotten and the other sound. When they inclined to worship other gods they forgot the Lord their God.

Verses 8–11

We now come to the records of the government of the particular judges, the first of which was Othniel, in whom the story of this book is knit to that of Joshua. In this short narrative of Othniel's government we have,

I. The distress that Israel was brought into for their sin, v. 8. God being justly displeased with them laid them open to the nations, set them to sale as goods he would part with, and the first that laid hands on them was Chushan-rishathaim, king of that Syria which lay between the two great rivers of Tigris and Euphrates, thence called Mesopotamia, which signifies in the midst of rivers. Aiming to enlarge his dominions, he invaded the two tribes first on the other side Jordan that lay next him, and afterwards, perhaps by degrees, penetrated into the heart of the country, and as far as he went put them under contribution, exacting it with rigour, and perhaps quartering soldiers upon them.

II. Their return to God in this distress: When he slew them, then they sought him whom before they had slighted. The children of Israel, even the generality of them, cried unto the Lord, v. 9. Those who in the day of their mirth had cried to Baalim and Ashtaroth now that they are in trouble cry to the Lord.

III. God's return in mercy to them for their deliverance. 1. The deliverer was Othniel, who married Caleb's daughter, one of the old stock that had seen the works of the Lord. He was now, we may suppose, far advanced in years, when God raised him up to this honour. 2. Whence he had his commission, not of man, nor by man; but the Spirit of the Lord came upon him (v. 10), the spirit of wisdom and courage to qualify him for the service, and a spirit of power to excite him to it. 3. What method he took. He first judged Israel, reproved them, and reformed them, and then went out to war. This was the right method. Let sin at home be conquered, and then enemies abroad will be the more easily dealt with. Thus let Christ be our Judge and Law-giver, and then he will save us, and on no other terms, Isa. xxxiii. 22. 4. What good success he had. He prevailed to break the yoke of the oppression, for it is said, The Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim into his hand. 5. The happy consequence of Othniel's good services. The land had rest, forty years; and the benefit would have been perpetual if they had kept close to God and their duty.

Verses 12–30

Ehud is the next of the judges whose achievements are related in this history, and here is an account of his actions.

I. When Israel sins again God raises up a new oppressor, v. 12–14. Perhaps they thought they might make the more bold with their old sins because they saw themselves in no danger from their old oppressor; the powers of that kingdom were weakened and brought low. But God strengthened Eglon king of Moab against them. This oppressor lay nearer to them than the former, and therefore would be the more mischievous to them. The king of Moab took to his assistance the Ammonites and Amalekites (v. 13), and this strengthened him; and we are here told how they prevailed. 1. They beat them in the field: They went and smote Israel (v. 13), not only those tribes that lay next them on the other side Jordan, but those also within Jordan, for they made themselves masters of the city of palm-trees, near the place where Jericho had stood, for that was so called (Deut. xxxiv. 3). 2. They made them to serve (v. 14), that is, exacted tribute from them, either the fruits of the earth in kind or money in lieu of them.

II. When Israel prays again God raises up a new deliverer (v. 15), named Ehud.

1. That he was a Benjamite. The city of palm-trees lay within the lot of this tribe, by which it is probable that they suffered most, and therefore stirred first to shake off the yoke. The weakest of all the tribes, yet out of it God raised up this deliverer.

2. That he was left-handed, as it seems many of that tribe were, ch. xx. 16. Benjamin signifies the son of the right hand, and yet multitudes of them were left-handed; for men's natures do not always answer their names. God chose this left-handed man to be the man of his right hand, whom he would make strong for himself, Ps. lxxx. 17. It was God's right hand that gained Israel the victory (Ps. xliv. 3), not the right hand of the instruments he employed.

3. We are here told what Ehud did for the deliverance of Israel out of the hands of the Moabites.

(1) He put to death Eglon the king of Moab; I say, put him to death, not murdered or assassinated him, but as a judge, or minister of divine justice, executed the judgments of God upon him.

[1] He had a fair occasion of access to him. Being an ingenious active man, and fit to stand before kings, his people chose him to carry a present in the name of all Israel, over and above their tribute, to their great lord the king of Moab, that they might find favour in his eyes, v. 15. Ehud went on his errand to Eglon, offered his present with the usual ceremony and expressions of dutiful respect, the better to colour what he intended and to prevent suspicion.

[2] It should seem, from the first, he designed to be the death of him. That he compassed and imagined the death of this tyrant appears by the preparation he made of a weapon for the purpose, a short dagger, which might easily be concealed under his clothes (v. 16). This he wore on his right thigh, that it might be the more ready to his left hand, and might be the less suspected.

[3] He contrived how to be alone with him, which he might the more easily be now that he had not only made himself known to him, but ingratiated himself by the present. He begged a private audience, and obtained it in a withdrawing-room, here called a summer parlour. He told the king he had a secret errand to him, who thereupon ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 19.

[4] When he had him alone he soon dispatched him. Ehud demands his attention to a message from God (v. 20), and that message was a dagger. The message was delivered, not to his ear, but immediately, and literally, to his heart, into which the fatal knife was thrust, and was left there, v. 21, 22. Eglon signifies a calf, and he fell like a fatted calf, by the knife, an acceptable sacrifice to divine justice. No such commissions are now given, and to pretend to them is to blaspheme God, and make him patronize the worst of villainies.

[5] Providence wonderfully favoured his escape, when he had done the execution. The tyrant fell silently, without any shriek or out-cry, which might have been overheard by his servants at a distance. The heroic executioner of this vengeance shut the doors after him, took the key with him, and passed through the guards with an air of innocence, and boldness, and unconcernedness. The servants that attended in the antechamber, coming to the door of the inner parlour, when Ehud had gone, to know their master's pleasure, and finding it locked and all quiet, concluded he had lain down to sleep. Thus by their care not to disturb his sleep they lost the opportunity of revenging his death. The servants at length opened the door, and found their master had slept indeed his long sleep, v. 25. Ehud by this means made his escape to Sierath, a thick wood, v. 26.

(2) Ehud, having slain the king of Moab, gave a total rout to the forces of the Moabites that were among them, and so effectually shook off the yoke of their oppression. [1] He raised an army immediately in Mount Ephraim, at some distance from the headquarters of the Moabites, and headed them himself, v. 27. The trumpet he blew was indeed a jubilee-trumpet, proclaiming liberty, and a joyful sound it was to the oppressed Israelites, who for a long time had heard no other trumpets than those of their enemies. [2] Like a pious man, and as one that did all this in faith, he took encouragement himself, and gave encouragement to his soldiers, from the power of God engaged for them (v. 28): "Follow me, for the Lord hath delivered your enemies into your hands." [3] Like a politic general, he first secured the fords of Jordan, set strong guards upon all those passes, to cut off the communications. He then fell upon them, and put them all to the sword: There escaped not a man of them. The consequence of this victory was that the power of the Moabites was wholly broken in the land of Israel. The country was cleared of these oppressors, and the land had rest eighty years, v. 30.

Verse 31

The other side of the country which lay south-west was in that time infested by the Philistines, against whom Shamgar made head. 1. It seems Israel needed deliverance, for he delivered Israel; how great the distress was, Deborah afterwards related in her song (ch. v. 6), that in the days of Shamgar the highways were unoccupied, &c. 2. God raised him up to deliver them, as it should seem, while Ehud was yet living. So inconsiderable were the enemies for number that it seems the killing of 600 of them amounted to a deliverance of Israel, and so many he slew with an ox-goad, or, as some read it, a plough share. He that has the residue of the Spirit could, when he pleased, make ploughmen judges and generals, and fishermen apostles. It is no matter how weak the weapon is if God direct and strengthen the arm. An ox-goad, when God pleases, shall do more than Goliath's sword.

CHAP. IV

The history of Deborah and Barak. I. Israel revolted from God, ver. 1. II. Israel oppressed by Jabin, ver. 2, 3. III. Israel judged by Deborah, ver. 4, 5. IV. Israel rescued out of the hands of Jabin. 1. Their deliverance is concerted between Deborah and Barak, ver. 6, 9. 2. Barak takes the field, ver 10. Sisera, Jabin's general, meets him, ver. 12, 13. Deborah encourages him, ver. 14. And God gives him a complete victory, ver. 15, 16. The general forced to flee, ver. 17. And where he expected shelter he had his life stolen from him by Jael while he was asleep (ver. 18–21), which completes Barak's triumph (ver. 22) and Israel's deliverance, ver. 23, 24.

Verses 1–3

I. Israel backsliding from God: They again did evil in his sight. See in this, 1. The strange strength of corruption, which hurries men into sin notwithstanding the most frequent experience of its fatal consequences. 2. The common ill effects of a long peace. The land had rest eighty years, which should have confirmed them in their religion; but, on the contrary, it made them secure and wanton. 3. The great loss which a people sustains by the death of good governors. They did evil, because Ehud was dead.

II. Israel oppressed by their enemies. When they forsook God, he forsook them; and then they became an easy prey to every spoiler. Jabin reigned in Hazor, as another of the same name, and perhaps his ancestor, had done before him, whom Joshua routed and slew, and burnt his city, Josh. xi. 1, 10. But it seems, in process of time, the city was rebuilt. Jabin, and his general Sisera, did mightily oppress Israel. That which aggravated the oppression was, that these Canaanites had formerly been conquered and subdued by Israel, were of old sentenced to be their servants (Gen. ix. 25), and might now have been under their feet if their own slothfulness, cowardice, and unbelief, had not suffered them thus to get ahead.

III. Israel returning to their God: They cried unto the Lord, when distress drove them to him, and they saw no other way of relief.

Verses 4–9

The year of the redeemed at length came, when Israel was to be delivered out of the hands of Jabin.

I. The preparation of the people for their deliverance, by the prophetic conduct and government of Deborah, v. 4, 5. Her name signifies a bee; and she answered her name by her industry, sagacity, and great usefulness to the public, her sweetness to her friends and sharpness to her enemies. She is said to be the wife of Lapidoth; but, the termination not being commonly found in the name of a man, some make this the name of a place: she was a woman of Lapidoth. Others take it appellatively, Lapidoth signifies lamps. The Rabbis say she had employed herself in making wicks for the lamps of the tabernacle. Or she was a woman of illuminations, or of splendours, one that was extraordinarily knowing and wise. Concerning her we are here told, 1. That she was intimately acquainted with God; she was a prophetess. 2. That she was entirely devoted to the service of Israel. She judged Israel at the time that Jabin oppressed them. She judged, not as a princess, by any civil authority conferred upon her, but as a prophetess, and as God's mouth to them. It is said she dwelt, or, as some read it, she sat under a palm-tree, called ever after from her the palm-tree of Deborah. Either she had her house under that tree or she had her judgment-seat in the open air, under the shadow of that tree, which was an emblem of the justice she sat there to administer, which will thrive and grow against opposition, as palms under pressures.

II. The project laid for their deliverance. She was not herself fit to command an army in person, being a woman; but she nominated one that was fit, Barak of Naphtali. He could do nothing without her head, nor she without his hands; but both together made a complete deliverer, and effected a complete deliverance.

1. By God's direction, she orders Barak to raise an army, and engage Jabin's forces, that were under Sisera's command, v. 6, 7. Barak, it may be, had been meditating some great attempt against the common enemy. But two things discouraged him:

(1) He wanted a commission to levy forces; this therefore Deborah here gives him under the broad seal of heaven, which, as a prophetess, she had a warrant to affix to it: "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded it? Go and draw towards Mount Tabor." [1] She directs him what number of men to raise—10,000. [2] Whence he should raise them—only out of his own tribe, and that of Zebulun next adjoining. And, [3] She orders him where to make his rendezvous—at Mount Tabor, in his own neighbourhood.

(2) When he had an army raised, he knew not how he should have an opportunity of engaging the enemy. "Well," says Deborah, "I will draw unto thee Sisera and his army." She gave him an express promise of success: I will (that is, God will, in whose name I speak) deliver them into thy hand.

2. At Barak's request, she promises to go along with him to the field of battle. (1) Barak insisted much upon the necessity of her presence, which would be to him better than a council of war (v. 8): "If thou wilt go with me to direct and advise me, and in every difficult case to let me know God's mind, then I will go with all my heart, and not fear the chariots of iron; otherwise not." Nothing would be a greater satisfaction to him than to have the prophetess with him to animate the soldiers and to be consulted as an oracle upon all occasions. (2) Deborah promised to go with him, v. 9. No toil nor peril shall discourage her from doing the utmost that becomes her for the service of her country. Deborah was the weaker vessel, yet had the stronger faith. But though she agrees to go with Barak, if he insists upon it, she gives him a hint proper enough to move a soldier not to insist upon it: "The journey thou undertakest shall not be for thy honour; not so much for thy honour as if thou hadst gone by thyself; for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a woman"; that is, [1] The world would ascribe the victory to the hand of Deborah. [2] God would complete the victory by the hand of Jael, which would be some eclipse to his glory. But Barak values the good success of his enterprise more than his honour; and therefore will by no means drop his request.

Verses 10–16

I. Barak beats up for volunteers, and soon has his quota of men ready, v. 10. Though the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali were chiefly depended on, yet it appears by Deborah's song that some had come in to him from other tribes (Manasseh and Issachar), and more were expected that came not, from Reuben, Dan, and Asher, ch. v. 14–17. The 11th verse, concerning the removal of Heber, one of the families of the Kenites, out of the wilderness of Judah, in the south, comes in for the sake of what was to follow concerning the exploit of Jael, a wife of that family.

II. Sisera takes the field with a very numerous and powerful army (v. 12, 13). Sisera's confidence was chiefly in his chariots; therefore particular notice is taken of them, 900 chariots of iron, which, with the scythes fastened to their axle-trees, when they were driven into an army of footmen, did terrible execution.

III. Deborah gives orders to engage the enemy, v. 14. Josephus says that when Barak saw Sisera's army drawn up, and attempting to surround the mountain on the top of which he and his forces lay encamped, his heart quite failed him, but Deborah animated him to make a descent upon Sisera, "The Lord hath delivered Sisera into thy hand." It was well for Barak that he had Deborah with him; for she made up what was defective, 1. In his conduct, by telling him, This is the day. 2. In his courage, by assuring him of God's presence.

IV. God himself routs the enemy's army, v. 15. It was not so much the bold and surprising alarm which Barak gave their camp that dispirited and dispersed them, but God's terror seized their spirits. The stars, it seems, fought against them, ch. v. 20. Josephus says that a violent storm of hail which beat in their faces drove them back; so that they became a very easy prey to the army of Israel, and Deborah's words were made good: "The Lord has delivered them into thy hand."

V. Barak pursues the scattered forces, even to their general's headquarters at Harosheth (v. 16), and spares none whom God had delivered into his hand to be destroyed: There was not a man left.

Verses 17–24

We have seen the army of the Canaanites totally routed.

I. The fall of their general, Sisera, captain of the host. Let us trace the steps of this mighty man's fall.

1. He quitted his chariot, and took to his feet, v. 15, 17. How miserable doth Sisera look now he is dismounted! He who but lately trusted to his arms with so much assurance must now trust to his heels only with so little.

2. He fled for shelter to the tents of the Kenites, having no stronghold, nor any place of his own in reach to retire to. And that which encouraged him to go thither was that at this time there was peace between his master and the house of Heber. Sisera thought he might therefore be safe among them.

3. Jael invited him in, and bade him very welcome. Probably she stood at the tent door, to enquire what news from the army, and what was the success of the battle which was fought not far off. (1) She invited him in. Perhaps she stood waiting for an opportunity to show kindness to any distressed Israelite, if there should be occasion for it. (2) She made very much of him, and seemed mighty careful to have him easy, as her invited guest. We must suppose she kept her tent as quiet as she could, and free from noise, that he might sleep the sooner and the faster. And now was Sisera least safe when he was most secure.

4. When he lay fast asleep she drove a long nail through his temples, so fastened his head to the ground, and killed him, v. 21. It was a divine warrant that justified her in the doing of it; and therefore, since no such extraordinary commissions can now be pretended, it ought not in any case to be imitated. The laws of friendship and hospitality must be religiously observed, and we must abhor the thought of betraying any whom we have invited and encouraged to put a confidence in us. And, as to this act of Jael (like that of Ehud in the chapter before), we have reason to think she was conscious of such a divine impulse upon her spirit to do it as did abundantly satisfy herself that it was well done. He that thought to destroy Israel with his many iron chariots is himself destroyed with one iron nail.

II. The glory and joy of Israel hereupon. 1. Barak their leader finds his enemy dead, (v. 22), and no doubt, he was very well pleased to find his work done so well to his hand, and so much to the glory of God and the confusion of his enemies. 2. Israel is completely delivered out of the hands of Jabin king of Canaan, v. 23, 24. They not only shook off his yoke by this day's victory, but they afterwards prosecuted the war against him, till they had destroyed him.

CHAP. V

The triumphal song which was composed and sung upon occasion of that glorious victory which Israel obtained over the forces of Jabin king of Canaan and the happy consequences of that victory. I. It begins with praise to God, ver. 2, 3. II. The substance of this song transmits the memory of this great achievement. 1. Comparing God's appearances for them on this occasion with his appearances to them on Mount Sinai, ver. 4, 5. 2. Magnifying their deliverance from the calamitous condition they had been in, ver. 6–8. 3. Calling those to join in praise that shared in the success, ver. 9–13. 4. Reflecting honour upon those tribes that were forward and active in that war, and disgrace on those that declined the service, ver. 14–19, 23. 5. Taking notice how God himself fought for them, ver. 20–22. 6. Celebrating particularly the honour of Jael, that slew Sisera, ver. 24–30. It concludes with a prayer to God, ver. 31.

Verses 1–5

I. God is praised by a song, which is, 1. A very natural expression of rejoicing. Is any merry? Let him sing; and holy joy is the very soul and root of praise and thanksgiving. 2. A very proper expedient for perpetuating the remembrance of great events. Neighbours would learn this song one of another and children of their parents; and one generation would thus praise God's works to another, and declare his mighty acts, Ps. cxlv. 4, &c.

II. Deborah herself penned this song, as appears by v. 7. 1. She used her gifts as a prophetess in composing the song, and the strain throughout is very fine and lofty, the images are lively, the expressions elegant, and an admirable mixture there is in it of sweetness and majesty. 2. We may suppose she used her power as a princess, in obliging the conquering army of Israel to learn and sing this song. She had been the first wheel in the action, and now is so in the thanksgiving.

1. She begins with a general Hallelujah: Praise (or bless, for that is the word) you the Lord, v. 2. The design of the song is to give glory to God; this therefore is put first, to explain and direct all that follows, like the first petition of the Lord's prayer, Hallowed be thy name.

2. She calls to the great ones of the world, that sit at the upper end of its table, to attend to her song, and take notice of the subject of it: Hear, O you kings! give ear, O you princes! (1) She would have them know that horses and chariots are vain things for safety. (2) She would have them to join with her in praising the God of Israel, and no longer to praise their counterfeit deities. (3) She would have them take warning by Sisera's fate, and not dare to offer any injury to the people of God.

3. She looks back upon God's former appearances, and compares this with them. What God is doing should bring to our mind what he has done; for he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever (v. 4): Lord, when thou wentest out of Sair. This may be understood either, (1) Of the appearances of God's power and justice against the enemies of Israel to subdue and conquer them. God had led his people Israel from the country of Edom; he brought down under their feet Sihon and Og, striking them and their armies with such terror and amazement that they seemed apprehensive heaven and earth were coming together. Or it notes the glorious displays of the divine majesty, and the surprising effects of the divine power, enough to make the earth tremble, the heavens drop like snow before the sun, and the mountains to melt. Or, (2) It is meant of the appearances of God's glory and majesty to Israel, when he gave them his law at Mount Sinai. It was then literally true, the earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, &c. The Chaldee paraphrase applies it to the giving of the law, but has a strange descant on those words, the mountains melted. Tabor, Hermon, and Carmel, contended among themselves: one said, Let the divine majesty dwell upon me; the other said, Let it dwell upon me; but God made it to dwell upon Mount Sinai, the meanest and least of all the mountains. I suppose it means the least valuable, because barren and rocky.

Verses 6–11

I. Deborah describes the distressed state of Israel under the tyranny of Jabin. From the days of Shamgar, who did something towards the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines, to the days of Jael, the present day, in which Jael has so signalized herself, the country has been in a manner desolate. 1. No trade. All commerce ceased, and the highways were unoccupied; no caravans of merchants, as formerly. 2. No travelling. 3. No tillage. The fields must needs be laid waste and unoccupied when the inhabitants of the villages were obliged to take shelter for themselves and their families in walled and fenced cities. 4. No administration of justice. There was war in the gates where their courts were kept, v. 8. 5. No peace to him that went out nor to him that came in. The gates through which they passed and repassed were infested by the enemy; nay, the places of drawing water were alarmed by the archers—a mighty achievement to terrify the drawers of water. 6. Neither arms nor spirit to help themselves with, not a shield nor spear seen among forty thousand, v. 8.

II. She shows in one word what it was that brought all this misery upon them: They chose new gods, v. 8. It was their idolatry that provoked God to give them up thus into the hands of their enemies.

III. She takes notice of God's great goodness to Israel in raising up such as should redress these grievances. Herself first (v. 7): Till that I Deborah arose, to restrain and punish those who disturbed the public peace. Thus she became a mother in Israel, a nursing mother, such was the affection she bore to her people. Under her there were other governors of Israel (v. 9). Of these governors she says, My heart is towards them.

IV. She calls upon those who had a particular share in the advantages of this great salvation, to offer up particular thanks to God for it, v. 10, 11. 1. You that ride on white asses, that is, the nobility and gentry. Let such as are by this salvation restored, not only to their liberty as other Israelites, but to their dignity, speak God's praises. 2. Let those that sit in judgment be sensible of it, and thankful that the sword of justice is not struck out of their hand by the sword of war. 3. Let those that walk by the way, and meet with none there to make them afraid, speak of the goodness of God in ridding the roads of those banditti that had so long infested them. 4. Let those that have not their wells taken from them, or stopped up, nor are in danger of being caught by the enemy when they go forth to draw, rehearse the acts of the Lord, not Deborah's acts, nor Barak's, but the Lord's, taking notice of his hand making peace in their borders. Observe in these acts of his, (1) Justice executed on his daring enemies. (2) Kindness shown to his trembling people, the inhabitants of the villages, who lay most open to the enemy. It is the glory of God to protect those that are most exposed, and to help the weakest.

Verses 12–23

I. Deborah stirs up herself and Barak to celebrate this victory in the most solemn manner. 1. Deborah, as a prophetess, must do it by a song, to compose and sing which she excites herself: Awake, awake, and again, awake, awake. 2. Barak, as a general, must do it by a triumph: Lead thy captivity captive. Though the army of Sisera was cut off in the field, and no quarter given, yet we may suppose in the prosecution of the victory, when the war was carried into the enemy's country, many not found in arms were seized and made prisoners of war.

II. She gives good reason for this praise and triumph, v. 13. 1. The Israelites had become few and inconsiderable, and yet to them God gave dominion over nobles. As long as any of God's Israel remain (and a remnant God will have in the worst of times) there is hope, be it ever so small a remnant, for God can make him that remains, though it should be but one single person, triumph over the most proud and potent. 2. Deborah was herself of the weaker sex, and the sex that from the fall had been sentenced to subjection, and yet the Lord authorized her to rule over the mighty men of Israel, who willingly submitted to her direction. and enabled her to triumph over the mighty men of Canaan.

III. She makes particular remarks on the several parties concerned in this great action, taking notice who fought against them, who fought for them, and who stood neutral.

1. Who fought against them. Jabin and Sisera had been mentioned in the history, but here it appears, (1) That Amalek was in league with Jabin. Ephraim is here said to act against Amalek (v. 14), probably intercepting and cutting off some forces of the Amalekites that were upon their march to join Sisera. (2) That others of the kings of Canaan, who had somewhat recovered themselves since their defeat by Joshua, joined with Jabin, and strengthened his army with their forces. These kings came and fought, v. 19. It is said of these kings that they took no gain of money, they were not mercenary troops hired into the service of Jabin.

2. Who fought for them. The several tribes that assisted in this great exploit are here spoken of with honour.

(1) Ephraim and Benjamin, those tribes among whom Deborah herself lived, bestirred themselves, and did bravely. Herein Benjamin had set them a good example among his people. "Ephraim moved after thee, Benjamin"; though Benjamin was the junior tribe, and much inferior, especially at this time, to Ephraim, both in number and wealth, yet when they led Ephraim followed.

(2) The ice being broken by Ephraim and Benjamin, Machir (the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan) and Zebulun sent in men that were very serviceable to this great design.

(3) Issachar did good service too; though he saw that rest was good, and therefore bowed his shoulder to bear, which is the character of that tribe (Gen. xlix. 15), yet they disdained to bear the yoke of Jabin's tribute, and now preferred the generous toils of war to a servile rest.

(4) Zebulun and Naphtali were the most bold and active of all the tribes, not only out of a particular affection to Barak their countryman, but because, they lying nearest to Jabin, the yoke of oppression lay heavier on their necks than on those of any other tribe.

(5) The stars from heaven appeared, or acted at least, on Israel's side (v. 20): The stars in their courses, according to the order and direction of him who is the great Lord of their hosts, fought against Sisera, by their malignant influences, or by causing the storms of hail and thunder which contributed so much to the rout of Sisera's army.

(6) The river of Kishon fought against their enemies. It swept away multitudes of those that hoped to make their escape through it, v. 21. Ordinarily, it was but a shallow river, and yet now, probably by the great rain that fell, it was so swollen, and the stream so deep and strong, that those who attempted to pass it were drowned.

(7) Deborah's own soul fought against them; she speaks of it with a holy exultation (v. 21): O, my soul, thou hast trodden down strength.

3. In this great engagement she observes who stood neutral, and did not side with Israel as might have been expected. No mention is made of Judah nor Simeon among the tribes concerned, because they, lying so very remote from the scene of action, had not an opportunity to appear.

(1) Reuben basely declined the service, v. 15, 16. Two things hindered them from engaging:—[1] Their divisions. Not only for their division from Canaan by the river Jordan, which needed not to have hindered them had they been hearty in the cause, but it means either that they were divided among themselves, could not agree who should go or who should lead, or that they were divided in their opinion of this war from the rest of the tribes, and thought the attempt either not justifiable or not practicable. [2] Their business in the world: Reuben abode among the sheepfolds, a warmer and safer place than the camp, pretending they could not conveniently leave the sheep they tended.

(2) Dan and Asher did the same, v. 17. These two lay on the seacoast, and [1] Dan pretended he could not leave his ships but they would be exposed, and therefore I pray thee have me excused. [2] Asher pretended he must stay at home to repair the breaches which the sea had in some places made upon his land, and to fortify his works against the encroachments of it, or he abode in his creeks, or small havens, where his trading vessels lay to attend them.

(3) But above all Meroz is condemned, and a curse pronounced upon the inhabitants of it, Because they came not to the help of the Lord, v. 23. Probably this was some city that lay near the scene of action, and therefore the inhabitants had a fair opportunity of showing their obedience to God and their concern for Israel, and of doing good service to the common cause; but they basely declined it, for fear of Jabin's iron chariots, being willing to sleep in a whole skin. God looks upon those as against him that are not with him. This city of Meroz seems to have been at this time a considerable place, since something great was expected from it.

Deborah here concludes this triumphant song,

I. With the praises of Jael, her sister-heroine, whose valiant act had completed and crowned the victory. Her poetry is finest and most florid here in the latter end of the song. How honourably does she speak of Jael (v. 24), who preferred her peace with the God of Israel before her peace with the king of Canaan. Blessed shall she be above women in the tent. Those whose lot is cast in the tent, in a very low and narrow sphere of activity, if they serve God in that according to their capacity, shall in no wise lose their reward.

II. She concludes all with a prayer to God, 1. For the destruction of all his foes: "So, so shamefully, so miserably, let all thy enemies perish, O Lord." 2. For the exaltation and comfort of all his friends. "But let those that love him, and heartily wish well to his kingdom among men, be as the sun when he goeth forth in his strength."

The victory here celebrated with this song was of such happy consequence to Israel that for the best part of one age they enjoyed the peace which it opened the way to: The land had rest forty years.

CHAP. VI

Nothing that occurred in the quiet and peaceable times of Israel is recorded; the forty years' rest after the conquest of Jabin is passed over in silence; and here begins the story of another distress and another deliverance, by Gideon, the fourth of the judges. I. The calamitous condition of Israel, by the inroads of the Midianites, ver. 1–6. II. The message God sent them by a prophet, ver. 7–10. III. The raising up of Gideon to be their deliverer. 1. A commission which God sent him and confirmed by a sign, ver. 11–24. 2. The first-fruits of his government in the reform of his father's house, ver. 25–32. 3. The preparations he made for a war with the Midianites, ver. 33–40.

Verses 1–6

I. Israel's sin renewed: They did evil in the sight of the Lord, v. 1.

II. Israel's troubles repeated. This would follow of course; let all that sin expect to suffer; let all that return to folly expect to return to misery. Now as to this trouble, 1. It arose from a very despicable enemy. God delivered them into the hand of Midian (v. 1), that joined to Moab (Num. xxii. 4), a people that all men despised as uncultivated and unintelligent; a people that Israel had formerly subdued, and in a manner destroyed (see Num. xxxi. 7), and yet by this time so magnified, that they were capable of being made a very severe scourge to Israel. 2. It arose to a very formidable height (v. 2): The hand of Midian prevailed, purely by their multitude. God had promised to increase Israel as the sand on the sea shore; but their sin stopped their growth and diminished them, and then their enemies, though otherwise every way inferior to them, overpowered them with numbers. Here we have, (1) The Israelites imprisoned, or rather imprisoning themselves, in dens and caves, v. 2. This was owing purely to their own timorousness and faint-heartedness, that they would rather fly than fight; it was the effect of a guilty conscience. (2) The Israelites impoverished, greatly impoverished, v. 6. The Midianites made frequent incursions into the land of Canaan. This fruitful land was a great temptation to them. They came up against them (v. 3), pitched their camps among them (v. 4), and penetrated through the heart of the country as far as Gaza on the western side, v. 4. They let the Israelites alone to sow their ground, but towards harvest they came and seized all, and ate up and destroyed it, both grass and corn, and when they went away took with them the sheep and oxen. Now here we may see, [1] The justice of God in the punishment of their sin. [2] The consequence of God's departure from a people; when he goes all good goes and all mischiefs break in.

III. Israel's sense of God's hand revived at last. Seven years, year after year, did the Midianites make these inroads upon them, each we may suppose worse than the other (v. 1), until at last, all other succours failing, Israel cried unto the Lord (v. 6).

Verses 7–10

I. The cognizance God took of the cries of Israel, when at length they were directed towards him. Thus would he show how ready he is to forgive, how swift he is to show mercy, and how inclinable to hear prayer.

II. The method God took of working deliverance for them.

1. Before he sent an angel to raise them up a saviour he sent a prophet to reprove them for sin, and to bring them to repentance, v. 8. His errand was to convince them of sin, that, in their crying to the Lord, they might confess that with sorrow and shame, and not spend their breath in only complaining of their trouble. Note, (1) We have reason to hope God is designing mercy for us if we find he is by his grace preparing us for it. (2) The sending of prophets to a people, and the furnishing of a land with faithful ministers, is a token for good, and an evidence that God has mercy in store for them.

2. We have here the heads of the message which this prophet delivered to Israel, in the name of the Lord.

(1) He sets before them the great things God had done for them (v. 8, 9). [1] He brought them out of Egypt, where otherwise they would have continued in perpetual poverty and slavery. [2] He delivered them out of the hands of all that oppressed them; this is mentioned to intimate that the reason why they were not now delivered out of the hands of the oppressing Midianites was not for want of any power or goodwill in God. [3] He put them in quiet possession of this good land; this not only aggravated their sin, and affixed the brand of base ingratitude to it, but it justified God, and cleared him from blame upon account of the trouble they were now in.

(2) He shows the easiness and equity of God's demands and expectations from them (v. 10): "I am the Lord your God, to whom you lie under the highest obligations, fear not the gods of the Amorites."

(3) He charges them with rebellion against God, who had laid this injunction upon them: But you have not obeyed my voice.

Verses 11–24

It is not said what effect the prophet's sermon had upon the people, but we may hope it had a good effect, and that some of them at least repented and reformed upon it; for here, immediately after, we have the dawning of the day of their deliverance, by the effectual calling of Gideon to take upon him the command of their forces against the Midianites.

I. The person to be commissioned for this service was Gideon, the son of Joash, v. 14. The father kept up in his own family the worship of Baal (v. 25), which we may suppose this son, as far as was in his power, witnessed against. He was of the half tribe of Manasseh that lay in Canaan, of the family of Abiezer; the eldest house of that tribe, Josh. xvii. 2.

II. The person that gave him the commission was an angel of the Lord. This angel is here called Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God (v. 14, 16), and he said, I will be with thee.

1. This divine person appeared here to Gideon, and it is observable how he found him, (1) Retired —all alone. God often manifests himself to his people when they are out of the noise and hurry of this world. (2) Employed in threshing wheat, with a staff or rod, probably because he had but little to thresh, he needed not the oxen to tread it out. The work he was about was an emblem of that greater work to which he was now to be called, as the disciples' fishing was. From threshing corn he is fetched to thresh the Midianites, Isa. xli. 15. (3) Distressed; he was threshing his wheat, not in the threshing-floor, the proper place, but by the wine-press, in some private unsuspected corner, for fear of the Midianites.

2. Let us now see what passed between the angel and Gideon, who knew not with certainty, till after he was gone, that he was an angel, but supposed he was a prophet.

(1) The angel accosted him with respect, and assured him of the presence of God with him, v. 12. By this word, [1] He gives him his commission. [2] He inspires him with all necessary qualifications for the execution of his commission. [3] He assures him of success; for, if God be for us, who can prevail against us?

(2) Gideon gave a very melancholy answer to this joyful salutation (v. 13): O my Lord! if the Lord be with us why then has all this befallen us? Gideon, as if not conscious to himself of anything great or encouraging in his own spirit, fastens only on the assurance the angel had given him of God's presence. The angel spoke in particular to him: The Lord is with thee; but he expostulates for all: If the Lord be with us, herding himself with the thousands of Israel, and admitting no comfort but what they might be sharers in, so far is he from the thoughts of monopolising it, though he had so fair an occasion given him. Gideon was a mighty man of valour, but as yet weak in faith. This was his weakness. We must not expect that the miracles which were wrought when a church was in the forming, and some great truth in the settling, should be continued and repeated when the formation and settlement are completed: no, nor that the mercies God showed to our fathers that served him, and kept close to him, should be renewed to us, if we degenerate and revolt from him.

(3) The angel gave him a very effectual answer to his objections, by giving him a commission to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Midianites, and assuring him of success therein, v. 14. Now the angel is called Jehovah, for he speaks as one having authority, and not as a messenger. [1] There was something extraordinary in the look he now gave to Gideon. He looked upon him, and smiled at the objections he made, but girded and clothed him with such power as would shortly enable him to answer them himself, and make him ashamed that ever he had made them. It was a speaking look, like Christ's upon Peter (Luke xxii. 61), a powerful look, a look that strangely darted new light and life into Gideon's breast. [2] But there was much more in what he said to him. First, He commissioned him to appear and act as Israel's deliverer. Such a one the few thinking people in the nation, and Gideon among the rest, were now expecting to be raised up, and now Gideon is told, "Thou art the man: Go in this thy might, this might wherewith thou art now threshing wheat; go and employ it to a nobler purpose; I will make thee a thresher of men." "Go, not in thy might, but go in this thy might, this which thou hast now received, go in the strength of the Lord God, that is, the strength with which thou must strengthen thyself." Secondly, He assured him of success. Thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites, and so shalt not only be an eye-witness, but a glorious instrument, of such wonders as thy fathers told thee of. Gideon, we may suppose, looked as one astonished at this strange and surprising power conferred upon him.

(4) Gideon made a very modest objection against this commission (v. 15): O my Lord! wherewith shall I save Israel? This question bespeaks him either, [1] Distrustful of God and his power. Or, [2] Inquisitive concerning the methods he must take: "Lord, I labour under all imaginable disadvantages for it; if I must do it, thou must put me in the way." Or rather, [3] Humble, self-diffident, and self-denying. The angel had honoured him, but see how meanly he speaks of himself: "My family is comparatively poor in Manasseh and I am the least, that have the least honour and interest, in my father's house; what can I pretend to do? I am utterly unfit for the service, and unworthy of the honour." God delights to advance the humble.

(5) This objection was soon answered by a repetition of the promise that God would be with him, v. 16. "Surely I will be with thee, to direct and strengthen thee, and be assured thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man, as easily as if they were but one man and as effectually. All the thousands of Midian shall be as if they had but one neck, and thou shalt have the cutting of it off."

(6) Gideon desires to have his faith confirmed touching this commission. He therefore humbly begs of this divine person, whoever he was, [1] That he would give him a sign, v. 17. Now, under the dispensation of the Spirit, we are not to expect signs before our eyes, such as Gideon here desired, but must earnestly pray to God that, if we have found grace in his sight, he would show us a sign in our heart, by the powerful operations of his Spirit there, fulfilling the work of faith. [2] That he would give him a further and longer opportunity of conversation with him, v. 18. Upon the angel's promise to stay to dinner with him, he intended, First, To testify his grateful and generous respects to this stranger, and, in him, to God who sent him. Out of the little which the Midianites had left him he would gladly spare enough to entertain a friend, especially a messenger from heaven. Secondly, To try who and what this extraordinary person was. What he brought out is called his present, v. 18. It is the same word that is used for a meat-offering. If he ate of it as common meat, he would suppose him to be a man, a prophet; if otherwise, as it proved, he should know him to be an angel.

(7) The angel ordered him to take the flesh and bread out of the basket, and lay it upon a hard and cold rock, and to pour out the broth upon it, which, if he brought it hot, would soon be cold there; and Gideon did so (v. 20), believing that the angel appointed it with an intention to give him a sign. [1] He turned the meat into an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour. [2] He brought fire out of the rock, to consume this sacrifice. Hereby he gave him a sign that he had found grace in his sight. This acceptance of his sacrifice evidenced the acceptance of his person, and confirmed his commission. [3] He departed out of his sight immediately.

(8) Gideon, though no doubt he was confirmed in his faith by the indications was put into a great fright till God removed his fears. [1] Gideon speaks peril to himself (v. 22): When he perceived that he was an angel he cried out, Alas! O Lord! God be merciful to me, I am undone, for I have seen an angel. In this world of sense, it is a very awful thing to have any sensible conversation with that world of spirits to which we are so much strangers. Gideon's courage failed him now. [2] God speaks peace to him, v. 23. The Lord had departed out of his sight, v. 21. But though he must no longer walk by sight he might still live by faith. For the Lord said to him, "Peace be unto thee, thou shalt not die."

3. The memorial of this vision which Gideon set up was a monument in the form of an altar, of use to preserve the remembrance of the vision, which was known by the name Jehovah-shalom (v. 24)—The Lord peace. This is, (1) The title of the Lord that spoke to him. Or, (2) The substance of what he said to him: "The Lord spoke peace." Or, (3) A prayer grounded upon what he had said, so the margin understands it, The Lord send peace, that is, rest from the present trouble, for still the public welfare lay nearest his heart.

Verses 25–32

I. Orders are given to Gideon to begin his government with the reformation of his father's house, v. 25, 26. The same night after he had seen God, when he was full of thoughts concerning what had passed, the Lord said unto him in a dream, Do so and so. Bid God welcome, and he will come again. Gideon is appointed, 1. To throw down Baal's altar, which it seems his father had, either for his own house or perhaps for the whole town. He must likewise cut down the grove that was by it. 2. To erect an altar to God, to Jehovah his God. God directs him to the place where he should build it, on the top of the rock. The word here used for the rock on which the altar was to be built signifies a fortress, or stronghold, erected, some think, to secure them from the Midianites. On this altar, (1) He was to offer sacrifice. Two bullocks he must offer: his father's young bullock, and the second bullock of seven years old. The former, we may suppose, he was to offer for himself, the latter for the sins of the people whom he was to deliver. (2) Baal's grove, or image, or whatever it was that was the sanctity or beauty of his altar, must not only be burnt, but must be used as fuel for God's altar. God ordered Gideon to do this, [1] To try his zeal for religion, which it was necessary he should give proofs of before he took the field. [2] That some steps might hereby be taken towards Israel's reformation, which must prepare the way for their deliverance. Sin, the cause, must be taken away, else how should the trouble, which was but the effect, come to an end?

II. Gideon was obedient to the heavenly vision, v. 27. He that was to command the Israel of God must first save his people from their sins, and then save them from their enemies. 1. He had servants of his own, whom he could confide in. 2. He did not scruple taking his father's bullock and offering it to God without his father's consent, because God, who expressly commanded him to do so, had a better title to it than his father had, and it was the greatest real kindness he could do to his father to prevent his sin. 3. He expected to incur the displeasure of his father's household by it; while he was sure of the favour of God, he feared not the anger of men. Yet, 4. To prevent their resistance in the doing of it he prudently chose to do it by night.

III. He was brought into peril of his life for doing it, v. 28–30. 1. It was soon discovered what was done, for the men of the city rose early in the morning to say their matins at Baal's altar. 2. It was soon discovered who had done it. 3. Gideon being found guilty of the fact, these degenerate Israelites require his own father to deliver him up: Bring out thy son, that he may die.

IV. He was rescued out of the hands of his persecutors by his own father, v. 31.

1. There were those that stood against Gideon, that would have him put to death. Notwithstanding the heavy judgments they were at this time under for their idolatry, yet they hated to be reformed.

2. Yet then Joash stood for him; he was one of the chief men of the city.

(1) This Joash had patronised Baal's altar, yet now protects him that had destroyed it, [1] Out of natural affection to his son. If Joash had a kindness for Baal, yet he had a greater kindness for his son. Or, [2] Out of a care for the public peace. The mob grew riotous, and, he feared, would grow more so, and therefore, as some think, he bestirred himself to repress the tumult. Or, [3] Out of a conviction that Gideon had done well. Let us do our duty, and then trust God with our safety.

(2) Two things Joash urges:—[1] That it was absurd for them to plead for Baal. It is bad to commit sin, but it is great wickedness indeed to plead for it, especially to plead for Baal, that idol, whatever it is, which possesses that room in the heart which God should have. [2] That it was needless for them to plead for Baal. If he were not a god, as was pretended, they could have nothing to say for him; if he were, he was able to plead for himself.

(3) Gideon's father hereupon gave him a new name (v. 32); he called him Jerubaal: "Let Baal plead; let him plead against him if he can; if he have anything to say for himself against his destroyer, let him say it."

Verses 33–40

I. The descent which the enemies of Israel made upon them, v. 33. A vast number of Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians, made their headquarters in the valley of Jezreel, in the heart of Manasseh's tribe, not far from Gideon's city. But it proved that the measure of their iniquity was full and the year of recompence had come; they must now make an end to spoil and must be spoiled, and they are gathered as sheaves to the floor (Mic. iv. 12, 13), for Gideon to thresh.

II. The preparation which Gideon makes to attack them in their camp, v. 34, 35. 1. God by his Spirit put life into Gideon: The Spirit of the Lord clothed Gideon (so the word is), clothed him as a robe, to put honour upon him, clothed him as a coat of mail, to put defence upon him. Whom God calls to his work he will qualify and animate for it. 2. Gideon with his trumpet put life into his neighbours, God working with him. (1) The men of Abiezer, though lately enraged against him for throwing down the altar of Baal, and though they had condemned him to death as a criminal, were now convinced of their error, and bravely came in to his assistance. (2) Distant tribes, even Asher and Naphtali, which lay most remote, though strangers to him, obeyed his summons, v. 35.

III. The signs which God gratified him with. for the confirming both of his own faith and that of his followers. Observe, 1. His request for a sign (v. 36, 37): "Let me by this know that thou wilt save Israel by my hand, let a fleece of wool, spread in the open air, be wet with the dew, and let the ground about it be dry." The purport of this is, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief. When he repeated his request for a second sign, the reverse of the former, he did it with a very humble apology, deprecating God's displeasure, because it looked so like a peevish humoursome distrust of God. God's favour must be sought with great reverence, a due sense of our distance, and a religious fear. 2. God's gracious grant of his request. See how tender God is of true believers though they be weak. Gideon would have the fleece wet and the ground dry; but then, lest any should object, "It is natural for wool, if ever so little moisture fall, to drink it in and retain it, and therefore there was nothing extraordinary in this," though the quantity wrung out was sufficient to obviate such an objection, yet he desires that next night the ground might be wet and the fleece dry, and it is done, so willing is God to give to the heirs of promise strong consolation (Heb. vi. 17, 18), even by two immutable things. He suffers himself, not only to be prevailed with by their importunities, but even to be prescribed to by their doubts and dissatisfactions. Is Gideon desirous that the dew of divine grace might descend upon himself in particular? He sees the fleece wet with dew to assure him of it. Does he desire that God will be as the dew to all Israel? Behold, all the ground is wet.

CHAP. VII

Gideon in the field, commanding the army of Israel, and routing the army of the Midianites. I. What direction God gave to Gideon for the modelling of his army, by which it was reduced to 300 men, ver. 1, 8. II. What encouragement God gave to Gideon to attack the enemy, by sending him secretly into their camp to hear a Midianite tell his dream, ver. 9–15. III. How he formed his attack upon the enemy's camp with his 300 men, not to fight them, but to frighten them, ver. 16–20. IV. The success of this attack; it put them to flight, and gave them a total rout.

Verses 1–8

I. Gideon applies himself to do the part of a good general. He pitched near a famous well, that his army might not be distressed for want of water, and gained the higher ground, which possibly might be some advantage to him, for the Midianites were beneath him in the valley. Note, Faith in God's promises must not slacken, but rather quicken, our endeavours.

II. The army consisted of 32,000 men, a small army in comparison with what Israel might have raised, and a very small one in comparison with what the Midianites had now brought into the field; Gideon was ready to think them too few, but God tells him they are too many, v. 2. He would hereby silence and exclude boasting. This is the reason here given by him who knows the pride that is in men's hearts: Lest Israel vaunt themselves against me.

Two ways God took to lessen their numbers:— 1. He ordered all that would own themselves timorous and faint-hearted to be dismissed, v. 3. One would have thought there would be scarcely one Israelite to be found that against such an enemy as the Midianites, and under such a leader as Gideon, would own himself fearful; yet above two parts of three took advantage of this proclamation, and filed off. Some think the oppression they had been under so long had broken their spirits, others, more probably, that consciousness of their own guilt had deprived them of their courage. Sin stared them in the face, and therefore they durst not look death in the face. 2. He directed the cashiering of all that remained except 300 men, and he did it by a sign: The people are yet too many for me to make use of, v. 4. But God saith they are yet too many, which may help us to understand those providences which sometimes seem to weaken the church and its interests. Gideon is ordered to bring his soldiers to the watering, probably to the well of Harod (v. 1) and the stream that ran from it. Now some, and no doubt the most, would kneel down on their knees to drink, and put their mouths to the water as horses do. Others, it may be, would not make such a formal business of it, but as a dog laps with his tongue, a lap and away, so they would hastily take up a little water in their hands, and cool their mouths with that, and be gone. Three hundred and no more there were of this latter sort, that drank in haste, and by those God tells Gideon he would rout the Midianites, v. 7. (1) Men that were hardy, that could endure long fatigue, without complaining of thirst or weariness. (2) Men that were hasty, that thought it long till they were engaged with the enemy, preferring the service of God and their country before their necessary refreshment. It was a great trial to the faith and courage of Gideon, when God bade him let all the rest of the people but these 300 go every man to his place. Thus strangely was Gideon's army purged, and modelled, and reduced instead of being recruited. Let us see how this little despicable regiment, on which the stress of the action must lie, was accoutred and fitted out. Every soldier turns sutler: They took victuals in their hands (v. 8), left their bag and baggage behind, and every man burdened himself with his own provision, which was a trial of their faith, whether they could trust God when they had no more provisions with them than they could carry, and a trial of their diligence, whether they could carry as much as they had occasion for. This was indeed living from hand to mouth. Every soldier turns trumpeter as if they had been going rather to a game than to a battle.

Gideon's army being diminished as we have found it was, he must either fight by faith or not at all; God therefore here provides recruits for his faith, instead of recruits for his forces.

I. He furnishes him with a good foundation to build his faith upon. Nothing but a word from God will be a footing for faith. 1. A word of command to warrant the action. Arise, get thee down with this handful of men unto the host. 2. A word of promise to assure him of the success. I have delivered it into thy hand; it is all thy own. This word of the Lord came to him the same night, when he was greatly agitated and full of care how he should come off; in the multitude of his thoughts within him these comforts did delight his soul.

II. He furnishes him with a good prop to support his faith with. 1. He orders him to be his own spy, and now in the dead of the night to go down privately into the host of Midian, and see what intelligence he could gain: "If thou fear to go down to fight, go first only with thy own servant (v. 10) and hear what they say" (v. 11); and it is intimated to him that he should hear that which would greatly strengthen his faith. He must take with him Phurah his servant, probably one of the ten that had helped him to break down the altar of Baal. 2. Being so, he orders him the sight of something that was discouraging. It was enough to frighten him to discern, perhaps by moonlight, the vast numbers of the enemy (v. 12), the men like grasshoppers for multitude, and they proved no better than grasshoppers for strength and courage; the camels one could not count, any more than the sand. But, 3. He causes him to hear that which was to him a very good omen. He overheard two soldiers of the enemy, that were comrades, talking. (1) One of them tells his dream: He saw a barley-cake come rolling down the hill into the camp of the Midianites, and "methought this rolling cake struck one of our tents with such violence that it overturned the tent, forced down the stakes, and broke the cords at one blow, and buried its inhabitants," v. 13. (2) The other undertakes to interpret this dream, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, v. 14. Gideon, who had threshed corn for his family, and made cakes for his friend (ch. vi. 11–19), was fitly represented by a cake,—that he and his army were as inconsiderable as a cake made of a little flour, as contemptible as a barley-cake, hastily got together as a cake suddenly baked upon the coals, and as unlikely to conquer this great army as a cake to overthrow a tent. It was an evidence that the enemy was quite dispirited, and that the name of Gideon had become so formidable to them that it disturbed their sleep.

Lastly, Gideon was exceedingly encouraged. He was very well pleased to hear himself compared to a barley-cake, when it proved to effect such great things. He gave God the glory of it; and in a short ejaculation thanked God for the victory he was now sure of, and for this encouragement to expect it. He gave his friends a share in the encouragements he had received: Arise, prepare to march presently; the Lord has delivered Midian into your hand.

Verses 16–22

I. The alarm which Gideon gave to the hosts of Midian in the dead time of the night; for it was intended that those who had so long been a terror to Israel should themselves be routed and ruined purely by terror.

Gideon, 1. Divided his army, small as it was, into three battalions (v. 16), one of which he himself commanded (v. 19). 2. He ordered them all to do as he did, v. 17. Such is the word of command which our Lord Jesus, the captain of our salvation, gives his soldiers; for he has left us an example, with a charge to follow it: As I do, so shall you do. 3. He made his descent in the night, when they were secure and least expected it, and when the smallness of his army would not be discovered. In the night all frights are most frightful. He accoutred his army with every man a trumpet in his right hand, and an earthen pitcher, with a torch in it, in his left. The fewness of his men favoured his design. Three ways Gideon contrived to strike a terror upon this army, (1) With a great noise. Every man must blow his trumpet in the most terrible manner he could and clatter an earthen pitcher to pieces at the same time. (2) With a great blaze. The lighted torches were hid in the pitchers, and then, being taken out all together of a sudden, would make a glaring show. Perhaps with these they set some of the tents on the outside of the camp on fire. (3) With a great shout. Every man must cry, For the Lord and for Gideon, so some think it should be read in v. 18, for there the sword is not in the original, but it is in v. 20, The sword of the Lord and of Gideon. The sword of the Lord is all in all to the success of the sword of Gideon, yet the sword of Gideon must be employed always in subserviency and subordination to God.

This method here taken of defeating the Midianites may be alluded to, as typifying the destruction of the devil's kingdom in the world by the preaching of the everlasting gospel, the sounding of that trumpet, and the holding forth of that light out of earthen vessels, 2 Cor. iv. 6, 7. Thus God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, a barley-cake to overthrow the tents of Midian, that the excellency of the power might be of God only; the gospel is a sword, not in the hand, but in the mouth.

II. The wonderful success of this alarm. Gideon's soldiers observed their orders, and stood every man in his place round about the camp (v. 21), sounding his trumpet to excite them to fight one another, and holding out his torch to light them to their ruin. Observe how the design took effect. 1. They feared the Israelites. All the host immediately took the alarm; they had reason to suspect that it was a very great army which was to be ushered in with all those trumpeters and torch-bearers. But there was more of a supernatural power impressing this terror upon them. God himself gave it the setting on. See the power of imagination, and how much it may become a terror at some times, as at other times it is a pleasure. 2. They fell foul upon one another: The Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, v. 22. God often makes the enemies of his church instruments to destroy one another. 3. They fled for their lives.

We have here the prosecution of this glorious victory. 1. Gideon's soldiers that had been dismissed got together again, and vigorously pursued those whom they had not courage to face. Those who were fearful and afraid to fight (v. 3) now took heart, when the worst was over, and were ready enough to divide the spoil, though backward to make the onset. 2. The Ephraimites, upon a summons from Gideon, came in unanimously, and secured the passes over Jordan, by the several fords, to cut off the enemies' retreat into their own country. 3. Two of the chief commanders of the host of Midian were taken and slain by the Ephraimites on this side Jordan, v. 25. Their names perhaps signified their nature, Oreb signifies a raven, and Zeeb a wolf (corvus and lupus).

CHAP. VIII

This chapter further accounts of Gideon's victory over the Midianites, with the story of his life and government. I. Gideon prudently pacifies the Ephraimites, ver. 1–3. II. He bravely pursues the Midianites, ver. 4, 10–12. III. He justly chastises the insolence of the men of Succoth and Penuel (ver. 5–9), and ver. 13–17. IV. He honourably slays the two kings of Midian, ver. 18–21. V. After all this he modestly declines the government of Israel, ver. 22, 23. VI. He foolishly gratified the superstitious humour of his people, by setting up an ephod in his own city, ver. 24–27. VII. He kept the country quiet for forty years, ver. 28. VIII. He died in honour, and left a numerous family behind him, ver. 29–32. IX. Both he and his God were soon forgotten by ungrateful Israel, ver. 33–35.

Verses 1–3

No sooner were the Midianites, the common enemy, subdued, than the children of Israel were ready to quarrel among themselves. The Ephraimites, when they brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon as general, picked a quarrel with him and grew very hot upon it.

I. Their accusation was very peevish and unreasonable: Why didst thou not call us when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? v. 1. Ephraim was very jealous of Manasseh, lest that tribe should at any time eclipse the honour of theirs. How unjust was their quarrel with Gideon! But, 1. Gideon was called of God, and neither took the honour to himself nor did he himself dispose of honours, but left it to God to do all. So that the Ephraimites in this quarrel, reflected upon the divine conduct. 2. Why did not the Ephraimites offer themselves willingly to the service? The case itself called them, they needed not wait for a call from Gideon. Cowards will seem valiant when the danger is over, but those consult their reputation who try not their courage when danger is near.

II. Gideon's answer was intended not so much to justify himself as to please and pacify them, v. 2, 3. He answers them, 1. With a great deal of meekness, and he won as true honour by this command which he had over his own passion as by his victory over the Midianites. 2. With a great deal of modesty, magnifying their performances above his own: Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim, who picked up the stragglers of the enemy, and cut off those of them that escaped, better than the vintage of Abiezer —a greater honour to them, and better service to the country, than the first attack Gideon made upon them? The improving of a victory is often more honourable, and of greater consequence, than the winning of it. Gideon shows us, (1) That humility of deportment is the best way to remove envy. (2) It is likewise the surest method of ending strife.

Now what was the issue of this controversy? The Ephraimites had chidden with him sharply (v. 1), but Gideon's soft answer turned away their wrath, Prov. xv. 1.

Verses 4–17

I. Gideon, as a valiant general, pursuing the remaining Midianites, and, it seems, the two kings of Midian, being better provided than the rest for an escape, with 15,000 men got over Jordan before the passes could be secured by the Ephraimites, and made towards their own country. Gideon thinks he does not fully execute his commission to save Israel if he lets them escape.

1. His firmness was very exemplary under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements. (1) He took none with him but his 300 men. He expected more from 300 men, supported by a particular promise, than from so many thousands supported only by their own valour. (2) They were faint, and yet pursuing. (3) Though he met with discouragement from those of his own people. If those that should be our helpers in the way of our duty prove hindrances to us, let not this drive us off from it. (4) He made a very long march by the way of those that dwelt in tents (v. 11). Now he found it an advantage to have his 300 men such as could bear hunger, and thirst, and toil.

2. His success was very encouraging to resolution and industry in a good cause. He routed the army (v. 11), and took the two kings prisoners, v. 12.

II. Here is Gideon, as a righteous judge, chastising the insolence of the disaffected Israelites, the men of Succoth, and the men of Penuel.

1. Their crime was great. Gideon, with a handful of feeble folk was pursuing the common enemy, to complete the deliverance of Israel. His way led him through the city of Succoth first and afterwards of Penuel. He only begs some necessary food for his soldiers that were ready to faint for want, and he does it very humbly and importunately: Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me, v. 5. The request would have been reasonable if they had been but poor travellers in distress. Nothing could be more just than that their brethren should furnish them with the best provisions their city afforded. But the princes of Succoth neither feared God nor regarded man. For, (1) In contempt of God, they refused to answer the just demands of him whom God had raised up to save them, and were very willing to believe that the remaining forces of Midian, which they had now seen march through their country, would be too hard for him. (2) The bowels of their compassion were shut up against their brethren; they were as destitute of love as they were of faith, and would not give morsels of bread (so some read it) to those that were ready to perish. The men of Penuel gave the same answer to the same request, defying the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, v. 8.

2. The warning he gave them of the punishment of their crime was very fair. (1) He did not punish it immediately because he would not seem to do it in a heat of passion. But, (2) He told them how he would punish it (v. 7, 9), to show the confidence he had of success in the strength of God, and that they might upon second thoughts repent of their folly, sending after him succours and supplies. God gives notice of danger, and space to repent, that sinners may flee from the wrath to come.

3. The warning being slighted, the punishment, though very severe, was really very just.

(1) The princes of Succoth were first made examples. And he punished them with thorns and briers, but, it should seem, not unto death. With these, [1] He tormented their bodies. [2] He instructed their minds: With these he taught the men of Succoth, v. 16. The correction he gave them was intended, not for destruction, but wholesome discipline, to make them wiser and better for the future. He made them know (so the word is), made them know themselves and their folly, God and their duty. Note, Many are taught with the briers and thorns of affliction that would not learn otherwise.

(2) The doom of the men of Penuel comes next. [1] He beat down their tower, in which they trusted, perhaps scornfully advising Gideon and his men rather to secure themselves in that than to pursue the Midianites. [2] He slew the men of the city that were most insolent and abusive, for terror to the rest, and so he taught the men of Penuel.

Verses 18–21

The kings of Midian must now be reckoned with. 1. They are indicted for the murder of Gideon's brethren some time ago at Mount Tabor. When the children of Israel, for fear of the Midianites, made themselves dens in the mountains (ch. vi. 2), those young men, it is likely, took shelter in that mountain, where they were found by these two kings, and most basely and barbarously slain in cold blood. 2. Being found guilty of this murder by their own confession by him must their blood be shed, though they were kings. 3. The execution is done by Gideon himself with his own hand, because he was the avenger of blood; he bade his son slay them. But, (1) The young man himself desired to be excused because he was yet a youth. (2) The prisoners themselves desired that Gideon would excuse it (v. 21), "Thou art at thy full strength; he has not yet come to it; therefore be thou the executioner."

Verses 22–28

I. Gideon's laudable modesty, after his great victory, in refusing the government which the people offered him. 1. It was honest in them to offer it: Rule thou over us, for thou hast delivered us, v. 22. 2. It was honourable in him to refuse it: I will not rule over you, v. 23. What he did was with a design to serve them, not to rule them—to make them safe, easy, and happy, not to make himself great or honourable. "The Lord shall still rule over you, and constitute your judges by the special designation of his own Spirit, as he has done." This intimates, (1) His modesty, and the mean opinion he had of himself and his own merits. (2) His piety, and the great opinion he had of God's government.

II. Gideon's irregular zeal to perpetuate the remembrance of this victory by an ephod made of the choicest of the spoils. 1. He asked the men of Israel to give him the ear-rings of their prey. 2. He himself added the spoil he took from the kings of Midian. 3. Of this he made an ephod, v. 27. (1) It was plausible enough, and might be well intended to preserve a memorial of so divine a victory in the judge's own city. But it was a very unadvised thing to make that memorial to be an ephod, a sacred garment. I would gladly put the best construction that can be upon the actions of good men, and such a one we are sure Gideon was. But we have reason to suspect that this ephod had, as usual, a teraphim annexed to it (Hos. iii. 4), and that, having an altar already built by divine appointment (ch. vi. 26), which he erroneously imagined he might still use for sacrifice, he intended this for an oracle, to be consulted in doubtful cases. So the learned Dr. Spencer supposes. Each tribe having now very much its government within itself, they were too apt to covet their religion among themselves. We read very little of Shiloh, and the ark there, in all the story of the Judges. Note, Many are led into false ways by one false step of a good man. The beginning of sin, particularly of idolatry and will-worship, is as the letting forth of water, so it has been found in the fatal corruptions of the church of Rome; therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. (2) It became a snare to Gideon himself, abating his zeal for the house of God in his old age, and much more to his house, who were drawn by it into sin, and it proved the ruin of the family.

III. Gideon's happy agency for the repose of Israel, v. 28. Gideon, though he would not assume the honour and power of a king, governed as a judge, and did all the good offices he could for his people; so that the country was in quietness forty years. Hitherto the times of Israel had been reckoned by forties. Othniel judged forty years, Ehud eighty—just two forties, Barak forty, and now Gideon forty, providence so ordering it to bring in mind the forty years of their wandering in the wilderness. After these, Eli ruled forty years (1 Sam. iv. 18), Samuel and Saul forty (Acts xiii. 21), David forty, and Solomon forty. Forty years is about an age.

Verses 29-35

The conclusion of the story of Gideon. 1. He lived privately, but retired to the house he had lived in before his elevation. Thus that brave Roman who was called from the plough upon a sudden occasion to command the army when the action was over returned to his plough again. 2. His family was multiplied. 3. He died in honour, in a good old age. 4. After his death the people corrupted themselves, and went all to naught. As soon as ever Gideon was dead they went a whoring after Baalim, v. 33. False worships made way for false deities. They now chose a new god (ch. v. 8), a god of a new name, Baalberith (a goddess, say some); Berith, some think, was Berytus, the place where the Phoenicians worshipped this idol. The name signifies the Lord of a covenant. Perhaps he was so called because his worshippers joined themselves by covenant to him, in imitation of Israel's covenanting with God; for the devil is God's ape. In this revolt of Israel to idolatry they showed, (1) Great ingratitude to God (v. 34): They remembered not the Lord. (2) Great ingratitude to Gideon, v. 35. Israel showed not kindness to Gideon's family. No wonder if those who forget their God forget their friends.

CHAP. IX

The apostasy of Israel after the death of Gideon is punished by intestine broils among themselves. It is an account of the usurpation and tyranny of Abimelech, who was base son to Gideon; so we must call him, and not more modishly his natural son: he was so unlike him. We are here told, I. How he thrust himself into the government at Shechem. II. How his doom was read in a parable by Jotham, Gideon's youngest son, ver. 7-21. III. What strifes there were between Abimelech and his friends the Shechemites, ver. 22-41. IV. How this ended in the ruin of the Shechemites (ver. 42-49), and of Abimelech himself, ver. 50-57.

Verses 1-6

We are here told by what arts Abimelech got into authority, and made himself great. His mother perhaps had instilled into his mind some towering ambitious thoughts, and the name his father gave him, carrying royalty in it, might help to blow up these sparks. He had no call from God to this honour as his father had, nor was there any present occasion for a judge to deliver Israel as there was when his father was advanced.

I. How craftily he got his mother's relations into his interests. Shechem was a city in the tribe of Ephraim, of great note. Joshua had held his last assembly there. If that city would but appear for him, and set him up, he thought it would go far in his favour. None would have dreamed of making such a one king, if he had not dreamed of it himself. And see here, 1. How he wheedled them into the choice, v. 2, 3. He basely suggested that Gideon having left seventy sons, they were designing to keep the power which their father had in their hands. "Now," says he, "you had better have one king than more." Remember that I am your bone and your flesh. The plot took wonderfully. The magistrates of Shechem were pleased to think of their city being a royal city and the metropolis of Israel, and therefore they inclined to follow him; for they said, "He is our brother, and his advancement will be our advantage." 2. How he got money from them to bear the charges of his pretensions (v. 4): They gave him seventy pieces of silver; money out of the house of Baal-berith, that is, out of the public treasury, which, out of respect to their idol, they deposited in his temple to be protected by him. How unfit was he to reign over Israel, because unlikely to defend them, who, instead of restraining and punishing idolatry, thus early made himself a pensioner to an idol! 3. What soldiers he enlisted. He hired into his service vain and light persons, the scum and scoundrels of the country, men of broken fortunes, giddy heads, and profligate lives.

II. How cruelly he got his father's sons out of the way.

1. The first thing he did with the rabble he headed was to kill all his brethren at once, publicly, and in cold blood, threescore and ten men, one only escaping, all slain upon one stone. (1) The power of ambition what beasts it will turn men into! (2) The peril of honour and high birth.

2. Way being thus made for Abimelech's election, the men of Shechem proceeded to choose him king, v. 6. God was not consulted whether they should have any king at all, much less who it should be. But, (1) The Shechemites aided and abetted him in the murder of his brethren (v. 24), and then they made him king. Pretium sceleris tulit hic diadema—His wickedness was rewarded with a diadem. (2) The rest of the Israelites were so very sottish as to sit by unconcerned. It is for this that they are charged with ingratitude (ch. viii. 35): Neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal.

Verses 7-21

Only Jotham, the youngest son of Gideon, who by a special providence escaped the common ruin of his family (v. 5), dealt plainly with the Shechemites. Jotham did not go about to raise an army out of the other cities of Israel but he contents himself with giving a faithful reproof to the Shechemites, and fair warning of the fatal consequences.

I. His preface is very serious: "Hearken unto me, you men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you", v. 7.

II. His parable is very ingenious—that when the trees were disposed to choose a king the government was offered to those valuable trees the olive, the fig tree, and the vine, but they refused it, choosing rather to serve than rule, to do good than bear sway. But the same tender being made to the bramble he accepted it with vain-glorious exultation.

1. He hereby applauds the generous modesty of Gideon, and the other judges who were before him, and perhaps of the sons of Gideon, who had declined accepting the state and power of kings when they might have had them, and likewise shows that it is in general the temper of all wise and good men to decline preferment and to choose rather to be useful than to be great. (1) There was no occasion at all for the trees to choose a king. Nor was there any occasion for Israel to talk of setting a king over them; for the Lord was their king. (2) When they had it in their thoughts to choose a king they did not offer the government to the stately cedar, or the lofty pine, which are only for show and shade, and not otherwise useful till they are cut down, but to the fruit trees, the vine and the olive. Those that bear fruit for the public good are justly respected and honoured. (3) The reason which all these fruit trees gave for their refusal was much the same. The olive pleads (v. 9), Should I leave my fatness? And the vine (v. 13), Should I leave my wine, wherewith both God and man are served and honoured? for oil and wine were used both at God's altars and at men's tables. And shall I leave my sweetness, saith the fig tree, and my good fruit (v. 11), and go to be promoted over the trees? or, as the margin reads it, go up and down for the trees? It is intimated, [1] That government involves a man in a great deal both of toil and care. [2] That those who are preferred to places of public trust and power must resolve to forego all their private interests and advantages, and sacrifice them to the good of the community. [3] That those who are advanced to honour and dignity are in great danger of losing their fatness and fruitfulness. Preferment is apt to make men proud and slothful, and thus spoil their usefulness, for which reason those that desire to do good are afraid of being too great.

2. He hereby exposes the ridiculous ambition of Abimelech, whom he compares to the bramble or thistle, v. 14. The bramble is a worthless plant, not to be numbered among the trees, useless and fruitless, nay, hurtful and vexatious, scratching and tearing, and doing mischief; it began with the curse, and its end is to be burned. Such a one was Abimelech, and yet chosen to the government by the trees, by all the trees. Let us not think it strange if we see folly set in great dignity (Eccles. x. 6), and the vilest men exalted (Ps. xii. 8), and men blind to their own interest in the choice of their guides.

III. His application is very close and plain. In it, 1. He reminds them of the many good services his father had done for them, v. 17. 2. He aggravates their unkindness to his father's family. They had not done to him according to the deserving of his hands, v. 16. Gideon had left many sons that were an honour to his name and family, and these they had barbarously murdered; one son he had left was the son of his maid-servant, whom all that had any respect to Gideon's honour would endeavour to conceal, yet him they made their king. 3. He leaves it to the event to determine whether they had done well. (1) If they prospered long in this villainy, he would give them leave to say they had done well, v. 19. But, (2) If they had, as he was sure they had, dealt basely and wickedly in this matter, let them never expect to prosper, v. 20.

Jotham, having given them this admonition, made a shift to escape with his life, v. 21. But, for fear of Abimelech, he lived in exile, in some remote obscure place.

Three years Abimelech reigned, after a sort, without any disturbance; it is not said, He judged Israel, or did any service at all to his country, but so long he enjoyed the title and dignity of a king. But the triumphing of the wicked is short. The ruin of these confederates in wickedness was from the righteous hand of the God. He sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the Shechemites (v. 23), that is, they grew jealous one of another and ill-affected one to another. This was from God. He permitted the devil, that great mischief-maker, to sow discord between them, and he is an evil spirit, whom God not only keeps under his check, but sometimes serves his own purposes by. Their own lusts were evil spirits; they are devils in men's own hearts; from them come wars and fightings. These God gave them up to, and so might be said to send the evil spirits between them. When men's sin is made their punishment, though God is not the author of the sin, yet the punishment is from him. The Shechemites that countenanced Abimelech's pretensions, aided and abetted him in his bloody project, and avowed the fact by making him king after he had done it, must fall with him, fall by him, and fall first.

I. The Shechemites began to affront Abimelech. 1. They dealt treacherously with him, v. 23. It is not said, They repented of their sin in owning him. 2. They aimed to seize him when he was at Arumah (v. 41), his country seat. Expecting him to come to town, they set liers in wait for him (v. 25). Those who were thus posted, he not coming, took the opportunity of robbing travellers. 3. They entertained one Gaal, and set him up as their head in opposition to Abimelech, v. 26. This Gaal is said to be the son of Ebed, which signifies a servant. As Abimelech was by the mother's side, so he by the father's, the son of a servant. Here was one bramble contesting with another. He was a bold ambitious man, so he went over to them to blow the coals, and they put their confidence in him. 4. They did all the despite they could to Abimelech's name, v. 27. They went into the house of their god, to solemnize their feast of ingathering, and there they did eat, and drink, and cursed Abimelech, praying to their idol to destroy him. That very temple whence they had fetched money to set him up with did they now meet in to curse him and contrive his ruin. 5. They pleased themselves with Gaal's vaunted defiance of Abimelech, v. 28, 29. They loved to hear that impudent upstart speak scornfully, (1) Of Abimelech. (2) Of his good father likewise, Gideon: Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? (3) Of his prime minister of state, Zebul his officer, and ruler of the city. Gaal aimed not to recover Shechem's liberty, only to change their tyrant: "O that this people were under my hand!" This pleased the Shechemites, who were now as sick of Abimelech as ever they had been fond of him. Men of no conscience will be men of no constancy.

II. Abimelech turned all his force upon them, and, in a little time, quite ruined them. Observe the steps of their overthrow.

1. The Shechemites' counsels were betrayed to Abimelech by Zebul his confidant, the ruler of the city, who continued hearty for him. His anger was kindled, (v. 30). He thinks it best that he should march his forces by night into the neighbourhood. How could the Shechemites hope to speed in their attempt when the ruler of their city was in the interests of their enemy?

2. Gaal, that headed their faction, having been betrayed by Zebul, Abimelech's confidant, was most wretchedly bantered by him. "It is but the shadow of the mountains which thou takest to be an army." By this he intended, (1) To ridicule him. (2) To detain him, while the forces of Abimelech were coming up. Then Zebul took another way to banter him, upbraiding him with what he had said but a day or two before, in contempt of Abimelech (v. 38). Now Zebul, in Abimelech's name, challenges him: Go out, and fight with them, if thou darest.

3. Abimelech routed Gaal's forces that sallied out of the town, v. 39, 40.

4. Zebul that night expelled Gaal, and the party he had brought with him into Shechem, out of the city (v. 41), sending him to the place whence he came.

5. Abimelech, the next day, set upon the city, and quite destroyed it, for their treacherous dealings with him. He resolved to follow his blow, and effectually to chastise their treachery. (1) He had intelligence brought him that the people of Shechem had come out into the field, v. 42, to plough and sow. Others think they went out into the field of battle; though Gaal was driven out, they would not lay down their arms. (2) He himself, with a strong detachment, cut off the communication between them and the city, and then sent two companies of his men, who were too strong for them, and they put them all to the sword, and ran upon those that were in the fields and slew them. (3) He then fell upon the city itself, and sowed it with salt, that it might remain a lasting monument of the punishment of perfidiousness. Yet Abimelech prevailed not to make its desolations perpetual; for it was afterwards rebuilt, and became so considerable a place that all Israel came thither to make Rehoboam king, 1 Kings xii. 1.

6. Those that retired into a stronghold of their idol-temple were all destroyed there. These are called the men of the tower of Shechem (v. 46, 47), some castle that belonged to the city, but lay at some distance from it. But that which they hoped would be for their welfare proved to them a snare and a trap, as those will certainly find that run to idols for shelter. All that were in it were either burnt or stifled with the smoke. What inventions men have to destroy one another! Whence come these cruel wars and fightings but from their lusts? About 1000 men and women perished in these flames, many of whom, it is probable, were no way concerned in the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites, yet, in this civil war, they came to this miserable end; for men of factious turbulent spirits perish not alone in their iniquity, but involve many more, that follow them in their simplicity, in the same calamity with them.

Verses 50–57

Thebez was a small city, probably not far from Shechem, dependent upon it, and in confederacy with it.

I. Abimelech attempted the destruction of this city (v. 50), and drove all the inhabitants of the town into the castle, or citadel, v. 51.

II. In the attempt he was himself destroyed, having his brains knocked out with a piece of a millstone, v. 57. Three circumstances are worthy of observation in the death of Abimelech:—1. That he was slain with a stone, as he had slain his brethren all upon one stone. 2. That he had his skull broken. Vengeance aimed at that guilty head which had worn the usurped crown. 3. That the stone was cast upon him by a woman, v. 53. Nothing troubled him so much as this, that it should be said, A woman slew him. See, (1) His foolish pride, in laying so much to heart this little circumstance of his disgrace. Here was no care taken about his precious soul, no concern what would become of that, no prayer to God for his mercy; but very solicitous he is to patch up his shattered credit, when there is no patching his shattered skull. "O let it never be said that such a mighty man as Abimelech was killed by a woman!" (2) His foolish project to avoid this disgrace; nothing could be more ridiculous; his own servant must run him through, not to rid him the sooner out of his pain, but that men say not, A woman slew him.

III. The issue of all is that Abimelech being slain, 1. Israel's peace was restored, and an end was put to this civil war. 2. God's justice was glorified (v 56, 57). Though wickedness may prosper awhile, it will not prosper always.

CHAP. X

1. The peaceable times Israel enjoyed under the two judges, Tola and Jair, ver. 1–5. II. The troublesome times that ensued. 1. Israel's sin that brought them into trouble, ver. 6. 2. The trouble itself, ver. 7–9. III. Their repentance and humiliation, their prayers and reformation, and the mercy they found with God, ver. 10–16. IV. Preparation made for their deliverance out of the hand of their oppressors, ver. 17, 18.

Verses 1–5

Quiet and peaceable were the reigns of these two judges, Tola and Jair, who make but a small figure and take up but a very little room in this history. But no doubt they were both raised up of God to serve their country in the quality of judges, not pretending, as Abimelech had done, to the grandeur of kings, nor, like him, taking the honour they had to themselves, but being called of God to it. 1. Concerning Tola it is said that he arose after Abimelech to defend Israel, v. 1. God animated this good man to appear for the reforming of abuses, the putting down of idolatry, the appeasing of tumults, and the healing of the wounds given to the state by Abimelech's usurpation. 2. Jair was a Gileadite, so was his next successor Jephthah, both of that half tribe of Manasseh which lay on the other side of Jordan. That which is chiefly remarkable concerning this Jair is the increase and honour of his family: He had thirty sons, v. 4. And, (1) They had good preferments, for they rode on thirty ass colts; that is, they were judges itinerant, who, as deputies to their father, rode from place to place in their several circuits to administer justice. (2) They had good possessions, every one a city, out of those that were called, from their ancestor of the same name with their father, Havoth-jair—the villages of Jair; yet they are called cities. Villages are cities to a contented mind.

Verses 6–9

While those two judges, Tola and Jair, presided in the affairs of Israel, things went well, but afterwards,

I. Israel returned to their idolatry. 1. They worshipped many gods; not only their old demons Baalim and Ashtaroth, which the Canaanites had worshipped, but, as if they would proclaim their folly to all their neighbours, they served the gods of Syria, Zidon, Moab, Ammon, and the Philistines. It looks as if the chief trade of Israel had been to import deities from all countries. It is hard to say whether it was more impious or impolitic to do this. Those nations which by their wicked arts they sought to make their friends by the righteous judgments of God became their enemies and oppressors. 2. They did not so much as admit the God of Israel to be one of those many deities they worshipped, but quite cast him off. Those that think to serve both God and Mammon will soon come entirely to forsake God, and to serve Mammon only. If God have not all the heart, he will soon have none of it.

II. God renewed his judgments upon them, bringing them under the power of oppressing enemies. God had appointed that, if any of the cities of Israel should revolt to idolatry, the rest should make war upon them and cut them off, Deut. xiii. 12, &c. God brought the neighbouring nations upon them, to chastise them for their apostasy. The oppression of Israel by the Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, was, 1. Very long. It continued eighteen years. 2. Very grievous. They began with those tribes that lay next them on the other side Jordan, here called the land of the Amorites (v. 8) because the Israelites had so wretchedly degenerated, and had made themselves so like the heathen, that they had become, in a manner, perfect Amorites (Ezek. xvi. 3). But by degrees they pushed forward, came over Jordan, and invaded Judah, and Benjamin, and Ephraim (v. 9), three of the most famous tribes of Israel, yet thus insulted when they had forsaken God, and unable to make head against the invader.

Verses 10–18

I. A humble confession which Israel make to God in their distress, v. 10. They confess their omissions, for in them their sin began— "We have forsaken our God," and their commissions—"We have served Baalim, and herein have done foolishly, treacherously, and very wickedly."

II. A humbling message which God thereupon sends to Israel, whether by an angel (as ch. ii. 1) or by a prophet (as ch. vi. 8) is not certain. Now in this message, 1. He upbraids them with their great ingratitude, reminds them of the great things he had done for them. God had in justice corrected them, and in mercy delivered them, and therefore might reasonably expect that either through fear or through love they would adhere to him and his service. 2. He shows them how justly he might now abandon them to ruin, by abandoning them to the gods that they had served. To awaken them to a thorough repentance and reformation, he lets them see, (1) Their folly in serving Baalim. "Go, and cry unto the gods which you have chosen" (v. 14), try what they can do for you now. It is necessary, in true repentance, that there be a full conviction of the utter insufficiency of all those things to help us. We must be convinced that the pleasures of sense on which we have doted cannot be our satisfaction, nor the wealth of the world which we have coveted be our portion, that we cannot be happy or easy anywhere but in God. (2) Their misery and danger in forsaking God.

III. A humble submission which Israel hereupon made to God's justice, with a humble application to his mercy, v. 15. They not only repeat their confession, We have sinned, but, 1. They surrender themselves to God's justice: Do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. 2. They supplicate for God's mercy.

IV. A blessed reformation set on foot hereupon. They brought forth fruits meet for repentance (v. 16): They put away the gods of strangers (as the word is), strange gods, and they served the Lord. This is true repentance not only for sin, but from sin.

V. God's gracious return in mercy to them, which is expressed here very tenderly (v. 16): His soul was grieved for the misery of Israel. As he is pleased to put himself into the relation of a father to his people that are in covenant with him, so he is pleased to represent his goodness to them by the compassions of a father towards his children; for, as he is the Father of lights, so he is the Father of mercies.

VI. Things are now working towards their deliverance from the Ammonites' oppression, v. 17, 18. God had said, "I will deliver you no more"; but now they are not what they were, they are other men, they are new men, and now he will deliver them. 1. The Ammonites are hardened to their own ruin. They gathered together in one body, that they might be destroyed at one blow, Rev. xvi. 16. 2. The Israelites are animated to their own rescue. They assembled likewise, v. 17. During their eighteen years' oppression, as in their former servitudes, they were run down by their enemies, because they would not incorporate; each family, city, or tribe, would stand by itself, and act independently, and so they all became an easy prey to the oppressors, for want of a due sense of a common interest to cement them: but, whenever they got together, they did well; so they did here. When God's Israel become as one man to advance a common good and oppose a common enemy what difficulty can stand before them?

CHAP. XI

The history of Jephthah, that by faith did great things (Heb. xi. 32). I. The disadvantages of his origin, ver. 1–3. II. The Gileadites' choice of him to be commander-in-chief against the Ammonites, ver. 4–11. III. His treaty with the king of Ammon about the rights of the two nations, that the matter might be determined, if possible, without bloodshed, ver. 12–28. IV. His war with the Ammonites, which he enters upon with a solemn vow (ver. 29–31), prosecutes with bravery (ver. 32), and ends with a glorious victory, ver. 33. V. The straits he was brought into at his return to his own house by the vow he had made, ver. 34–40.

Verses 1–3

The princes and people of Gilead we left, in the close of the foregoing chapter, consulting about the choice of a general. Now all agreed that Jephthah, the Gileadite, was a mighty man of valour, and very fit for that purpose, none so fit as he, but he lay under three disadvantages:—1. He was the son of a harlot (v. 1), of a strange woman (v. 2), an Ishmaelite, say the Jews. If his mother was a harlot, that was not his fault, however, it was his disgrace. Men ought not to be reproached with any of the infelicities of their parentage or extraction. The son of a harlot, if born again, born from above, shall be accepted of God, and be as welcome as any other to the glorious liberties of his children. 2. He had been driven from his country by his brethren. His father's legitimate children, insisting upon the rigour of the law, thrust him out from having any inheritance with them, without any consideration of his extraordinary qualifications, which merited a dispensation, and would have made him a mighty strength and ornament of their family. God often humbles those whom he designs to exalt, and makes that stone the head of the corner which the builders refused; so Joseph, Moses, and David, the three most eminent of the shepherds of Israel, were all thrust out by men, before they were called of God to their great offices. 3. He had, in his exile, headed a rabble, v. 3. Being driven out by his brethren, his great soul would not suffer him either to dig or beg, but by his sword he must live; those that were reduced to such straits, and animated by such a spirit, enlisted themselves under him. Vain men they are here called, that is, men that had run through their estates and had to seek for a livelihood. These went out with him, not to rob or plunder, but to hunt wild beasts. This is the man that must save Israel.

Verses 4–11

I. The distress which the children of Israel were in upon the Ammonites' invasion of their country, v. 4.

II. The court which the elders made to Jephthah hereupon to come and help them. They did not write or send a messenger to him, but went themselves to fetch him. They know him to be a bold man, and inured to the sword, and therefore he must be the man. See how God prepares men for the service he designs them for, and makes their troubles work for their advancement. If Jephthah had not been put to his shifts by his brethren's unkindness, he would not have had such occasion as this gave him to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous. An army without a general is like a body without a head. Any community would humbly beg the favour of being commanded rather than that every man should be his own master. Blessed be God for government, for a good government.

III. The objections Jephthah makes against accepting their offer: Did you not hate me, and expel me? v. 7. Jephthah was very willing to serve his country, but he thought fit to give them a hint of their former unkindness to him, that they might repent of their sin in using him so ill. Thus Joseph humbled his brethren before he made himself known to them. Many slight God and good men till they come to be in distress, and then they are desirous of God's mercy and good men's prayers.

IV. Their urgency with him to accept the government they offer him, v. 8. Let this instance be, 1. A caution to us not to despise or trample upon any because they are mean. Make no man our enemy, because we know not how soon our distresses may be such as that we may be highly concerned to make him our friend. 2. An encouragement to men of worth that are slighted or ill-treated. Let them bear it with meekness and cheerfulness, and leave it to God to make their light shine out of obscurity.

V. The bargain he makes with them. God had forgiven Israel the affronts they had put upon him (ch. x. 16), and therefore Jephthah will forgive. 1. He puts to them a fair question, v. 9. "Now if, by the blessing of God, I come home a conqueror, tell me plainly shall I be your head? If I deliver you, under God, shall I, under him, reform you?" The same question is put to those who desire salvation by Christ. "If he save you, will you be willing that he shall rule you? for on no other terms will he save you. If he make you happy, shall he make you holy? If he be your helper, shall he be your head?" 2. They immediately give him a positive answer (v. 10): "We will do according to thy words; command us in war, and thou shalt command us in peace." Thus was the original contract ratified between Jephthah and the Gileadites, which all Israel, it should seem, agreed to afterwards, for it is said (ch. xii. 7), he judged Israel. He hereupon went with them (v. 11) to the place where they were all assembled (ch. x. 17), and there by common consent they made him head and captain. Jephthah, to obtain this little honour, was willing to expose his life for them (ch. xii. 3), and shall we be discouraged in our Christian warfare by any of the difficulties we may meet with in it, when Christ himself has promised a crown of life to him that overcometh?

VI. Jephthah's pious acknowledgment of God in this great affair (v. 11): He uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh, that is, upon his elevation, he immediately retired to his devotions, and in prayer spread the whole matter before God. He utters before God all his thoughts and cares in this matter; for God gives us leave to be free with him. 1. "Lord, the people have made me their head; wilt thou confirm the choice, and own me as thy people's head under thee and for thee?" "Lord," said Jephthah, "I will not accept the government unless thou give me leave." 2. Thus Jephthah opened the campaign with prayer. That was likely to end gloriously which began thus piously.

Verses 12–28

The treaty between Jephthah, now judge of Israel, and the king of the Ammonites.

I. Jephthah, as one having authority, sent to the king of Ammon, who in this war was the aggressor, to demand his reasons for invading the land of Israel. Now this fair demand shows, 1. That Jephthah did not delight in war, though he was a mighty man of valour, but was willing to prevent it by a peaceable accommodation. War should be the last remedy, not to be used till all other methods of ending matters in variance have been tried. This rule should be observed in going to law. The sword of justice, as well as the sword of war, must not be appealed to till the contending parties have first endeavoured by gentler means to understand one another, and to accommodate matters in variance, 1. Cor. vi. 1. 2. That Jephthah did delight in equity, and designed no other than to do justice.

II. The king of the Ammonites now gives in his demand, which he should have published before he had invaded Israel, v. 13. His pretence is, "Israel took away my lands long since; now therefore restore those lands."

III. Jephthah gives a very full and satisfactory answer to this demand, showing that the Ammonites had no title to this country that lay between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, now in the possession of the tribes of Reuben and Gad.

1. That Israel never took any land away either from the Moabites or Ammonites. He puts them together because they were brethren, the children of Lot, near neighbours, and of united interests, having the same god, Chemosh, and perhaps sometimes the same king. The lands in question Israel took away from Sihon king of the Amorites. If the Amorites, before Israel came into that country, had taken these lands from the Moabites or Ammonites, as it should seem they had (Num. xxi. 26; Josh. xiii. 25), Israel was not concerned to enquire into that or answer for it.

2. That they were so far from invading the property of any other nations than the devoted posterity of cursed Canaan (one of the branches of which the Amorites were, Gen. x. 16) that they would not so much as force a passage through the country either of the Edomites, the seed of Esau, or of the Moabites, the seed of Lot.

3. That in that war in which they took this land out of the hands of Sihon king of the Amorites he was the aggressor, and not they, v. 19, 20. They sent a humble petition to him for leave to go through his land, willing to give him any security for their good behaviour in their march. But Sihon not only denied them this courtesy, but he mustered all his forces, and fought against Israel (v. 20). Israel therefore, in their war with him, stood in their own just and necessary defence, and therefore, having routed his army, might justly, in further revenge of the injury, seize his country as forfeited. Thus Israel came to the possession of this country and it is very unreasonable for the Ammonites to question their title.

4. He pleads a grant from the crown, and claims under that, v. 23, 24. God gave them the land by an express and particular conveyance, such as vested the title in them, which they might make good against all the world. Deut. ii. 24, I have given into thy hand Sihon and his land. To corroborate this plea, he urges an argument ad hominem—directed to the man: Wilt thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee? Not that Jephthah thought Chemosh a god, only he is thy god, and the worshippers even of those dunghill deities that could do neither good nor evil yet thought themselves beholden to them for all they had (Hos. ii. 12). "Now," says Jephthah, "we have as good a title to our country as you have to yours."

5. He pleads prescription. (1) Their title had not been disputed when they first entered upon it, v. 25. (2) Their possession had never yet been disturbed, v. 26. He pleads that they had kept this country as their own now about 300 years, and the Ammonites in all that time had never attempted to take it from them. So that, supposing their title had not been clear at the first, yet, no claim having been made for so many generations, the entry of the children of Ammon, without doubt, was barred for ever. A title so long unquestioned shall be presumed unquestionable.

6. By these arguments Jephthah justifies himself and his own cause and condemns the Ammonites: "Thou doest me wrong to war against me, and must expect to speed accordingly," v. 27. The children of Israel, in the days of their prosperity and power (for some such days they had in the times of the judges) had conducted themselves very inoffensively to all their neighbours. The king of the Ammonites, when he would seek an occasion of quarrelling with them, was forced to look 300 years back for a pretence.

7. For the deciding of the controversy, he puts himself upon God and his sword, and the king of Ammon joins issue with him (v. 27, 28): The Lord the Judge be judge this day.

Neither Jephthah's apology, nor his appeal, wrought upon the king of the children of Ammon; they had found the sweets of the spoil of Israel, in the eighteen years wherein they had oppressed them (ch. x. 8), and hoped now to make themselves masters of the tree with the fruit of which they had so often enriched themselves.

Verses 29–40

We have here Jephthah triumphing, but troubled and distressed by an unadvised vow.

I. Jephthah's victory was clear. 1. God gave him an excellent spirit, and he improved it bravely, v. 29. The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and very much advanced his natural faculties, enduing him with power from on high. Hereby God confirmed him in his office, and assured him of success in his undertaking. Thus animated, he loses no time, but with an undaunted resolution takes the field. 2. God gave him eminent success, and he bravely improved that too (v. 32). Having routed their forces in the field, he pursued them to their cities. But it does not appear that he utterly destroyed the people, nor that he offered to make himself master of the country. Though others' attempting wrong to us will justify us in the defence of our own right, yet it will not authorize us to do them wrong.

II. Jephthah's vow is dark, and much in the clouds. When he was going out from his own house upon this hazardous undertaking, in prayer to God for his presence with him he makes a secret but solemn vow or religious promise to God, that, if God would graciously bring him back a conqueror, whosoever or whatsoever should first come out of his house to meet him it should be devoted to God, and offered up for a burnt-offering. At his return, tidings of his victory coming home before him, his own and only daughter meets him with the seasonable expressions of joy. This puts him into a great confusion; but there was no remedy: after she had taken some time to lament her own infelicity, she cheerfully submitted to the performance of his vow. Now,

1. There are several good lessons to be learnt out of this story. (1) That there may be remainders of distrust and doubting even in the hearts of true and great believers. A fond conceit he had that he could not promise himself a victory unless he proffered something considerable to be given to God in lieu of it. (2) That yet it is very good, when we are in the pursuit or expectation of any mercy, to make vows to God of some instance of acceptable service to him, not as a purchase of the favour we desire, but as an expression of our gratitude to him and the deep sense we have of our obligations to render according to the benefit done to us. (3) That we have great need to be very cautious and well advised in the making of such vows, lest, by indulging a present emotion even of pious zeal, we entangle our own consciences. (4) That what we have solemnly vowed to God we must conscientiously perform, if it be possible and lawful, though it be ever so difficult and grievous to us. (5) That it well becomes children obediently and cheerfully to submit to their parents in the Lord, and particularly to comply with their pious resolutions for the honour of God and the keeping up of religion in their families, though they be harsh and severe, as the Rechabites, who for many generations religiously observed the commands of Jonadab their father in forbearing wine, and Jephthah's daughter here, who, for the satisfying of her father's conscience, and for the honour of God and her country, yielded herself as one devoted (v. 36). (6) That our friends' grievances should be our griefs. Where she went to bewail her hard fate the virgins, her companions, joined with her in her lamentations, v. 38. Those are unworthy the name of friends that will only rejoice with us, and not weep with us. (7) That heroic zeal for the honour of God and Israel, though alloyed with infirmity and indiscretion, is worthy to be had in perpetual remembrance. It well became the daughters of Israel by an annual solemnity to preserve the honourable memory of Jephthah's daughter, who made light even of her own life.

2. Yet there are some difficult questions that do arise upon this story.

(1) It is hard to say what Jephthah did to his daughter in performance of his vow. [1] Some think he only shut her up totally to sequester her from all the affairs of this life, and consequently from marriage, and to employ her wholly in the acts of devotion all her days. That which countenances this opinion is that she is said to bewail her virginity (v. 37, 38) and that she knew no man, v. 39. [2] It seems more probable that he offered her up for a sacrifice, according to the letter of his vow, misunderstanding that law which spoke of persons devoted by the curse of God as if it were to be applied to such as were devoted by men's vows (Lev. xxvii. 29, None devoted shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death). Since he had made such a vow, he thought better to kill his daughter than break his vow, and let Providence bear the blame, that brought her forth to meet him.

(2) But, supposing that Jephthah did sacrifice his daughter, the question is whether he did well. [1] Some justify him in it, and think he did well, and as became one that preferred the honour of God before that which was dearest to him in this world. But, [2] Most condemn Jephthah; he did ill to make so rash a vow, and worse to perform it. He could not be bound by his vow to that which God had forbidden by the letter of the sixth commandment: Thou shalt not kill. God had forbidden human sacrifices, so that it was (says Dr. Lightfoot) in effect a sacrifice to Moloch.

CHAP. XII

I. Jephthah's rencounter with the Ephraimites, and the blood shed on that unhappy occasion (ver. 1–6), and the conclusion of Jephthah's life and government, ver. 7. II. A short account of three other of the judges of Israel: Ibzan (ver. 8–10), Elon (ver. 11, 12), Abdon, ver. 13–15.

Verses 1–7

I. The unreasonable displeasure of the men of Ephraim against Jephthah, because he had not called them in to his assistance against the Ammonites, that they might share in the triumphs and spoils, v. 1. Pride was at the bottom of the quarrel. Proud men think all the honours lost that go beside themselves, and then who can stand before envy? The anger of the Ephraimites at Jephthah was, 1. Causeless and unjust. Why didst thou not call us to go with thee? For a good reason. Because it was the men of Gilead that had made him their captain, not the men of Ephraim, so that he had no authority to call them. 2. It was cruel and outrageous. They get together in a tumultuous manner, pass over Jordan as far as Mizpeh in Gilead, where Jephthah lived, and no less will satisfy their fury but they will burn his house and him in it. Those resentments that have the least reason for them have commonly the most rage in them. Barbarous men take a pleasure in adding affliction to the afflicted.

II. Jephthah's warm vindication of himself. Whether they would be pacified or no, Jephthah takes care.

1. To justify himself, v. 2, 3. He makes it out that they had no cause at all to quarrel with him, for, (1) It was not in pursuit of glory that he had engaged in this war, but for the necessary defence of his country. (2) He had invited the Ephraimites to come and join with him, but they had declined the service. He had more cause to quarrel with them for deserting the common interests of Israel in a time of need. It is no new thing for those who are themselves most culpable to be most clamorous in accusing the innocent. (3) The enterprise was very hazardous. The honour they envied was bought dearly enough; they needed not to grudge it to him; few of them would have ventured so far for it. (4) He does not take the glory of the success to himself but gives it all to God: "The Lord delivered them into my hands. If God was pleased so far to make use of me for his glory, why should you be offended at that?"

2. When this just answer (though not so soft an answer as Gideon's) did not prevail to turn away their wrath, he took care both to defend himself from their fury and to chastise their insolence with the sword, by virtue of his authority as Israel's judge. (1) The Ephraimites had not only quarrelled with Jephthah, but, when his neighbours and friends appeared to take his part, they had abused them. "Who cares for you? All your neighbours know what you are, no better than fugitives and vagabonds, separated from your brethren, and driven hither into a corner." It is an ill thing to fasten names or characters of reproach upon persons or countries, as is common, especially upon those that lie under outward disadvantages: it often occasions quarrels that prove of ill consequence, as it did here. (2) This affront raises the Gileadites' blood, and the indignity done to themselves, as well as to their captain, must be revenged. [1] They routed them in the field, v. 4. [2] The Gileadites, who perhaps were better acquainted with the passages of Jordan than the Ephraimites were, secured them with strong guards, who were ordered to slay every Ephraimite that offered to pass the river. Here was, First, Cruelty. There needed not this severity to cut off all that escaped. Shall the sword devour for ever? Secondly, Cunning enough in the discovery of them. It seems the Ephraimites, though they spoke the same language with other Israelites, yet had got a custom in the dialect of their country to pronounce the Hebrew letter Shin like Samech. Those that first used s for sh, did it either because it was shorter or because it was finer, and their children learnt to speak like them, so that you might know an Ephraimite by it; as in England we know a west-country man or a north-country man, nay, perhaps a Shropshire man, and a Cheshire man, by his pronunciation. Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech betrays thee. If they took a man that they suspected to be an Ephraimite, but he denied it, they bade him say Shibboleth; but either he could not, or he did not, pronounce it aright, but said Sibboleth, and so was known to be an Ephraimite, and was slain immediately. Shibboleth signifies a river or stream: "Ask leave to go over Shibboleth, the river."

3. The punishment of these proud and passionate Ephraimites, which in several instances answered to their sin. (1) They were proud of the honour of their tribe, but how soon were they brought to be ashamed or afraid to own their country! Art thou an Ephraimite? No, now rather of any tribe than that. (2) They had gone in a rage over Jordan to burn Jephthah's house with fire, but now they came back to Jordan as sneakingly as they had passed it furiously, and were cut off from ever returning to their own houses. (3) They had upbraided the Gileadites with the infelicity of their country, lying at such a distance, and now they suffered by an infirmity peculiar to their own country, in not being able to pronounce Shibboleth. (4) They had called the Gileadites, unjustly, fugitives, and now they really and in good earnest became fugitives themselves. He that rolls the stone of reproach unjustly upon another, let him expect that it will justly return upon himself.

III. The end of Jephthah's government. He judged Israel but six years, and then died, v. 7. Perhaps the death of his daughter sunk him so that he never looked up afterwards, but it shortened his days, and he went to his grave mourning.

Verses 8–15

We have here a short account of the short reigns of three more of the judges of Israel, the first of whom governed but seven years, the second ten, and the third eight.

I. Ibzan of Bethlehem, most probably Bethlehem of Judah, David's city, not that in Zebulun, which is only mentioned once, Josh. xix. 15. He ruled but seven years, but by the number of his children, and his disposing of them all in marriage himself it appears that he lived long. That which is remarkable concerning him is, 1. That he had many children, sixty in all. 2. That he had an equal number of each sex, thirty sons and thirty daughters, a thing which does not often happen in the same family, yet, in the great family of mankind, he that at first made two, male and female, by his wise providence preserves a succession of both in some sort of equality as far as is requisite to the keeping up of the generations of men upon earth. 3. That he took care to marry them all. The Jews say, Every father owes three things to his son: to teach him to read the law, give him a trade, and get him a wife.

II. Elon of Zebulun, in the north of Canaan, was next raised up to preside in public affairs, to administer justice, and to reform abuses. Ten years he continued a blessing to Israel, and then died, v. 11, 12. Dr. Lightfoot computes that in the beginning of his time the forty years' oppression by the Philistines began (spoken of ch. xiii. 1), and about that time Samson was born.

III. Abdon, of the tribe of Ephraim, succeeded, and in him that illustrious tribe begins to recover its reputation. This Abdon was famous for the multitude of his offspring (v. 14): he had forty sons and thirty grandsons, all of whom he lived to see grown up. It was a satisfaction to him thus to see his children's children, but he did not see peace upon Israel, for by this time the Philistines had begun to break in upon them.

It is very strange that in the history of all these judges, some of whose actions are very particularly related, there is not so much as once mention made of the high priest, or any other priest or Levite, appearing either for counsel or action in any public affair, from Phinehas (Judges xx. 28) to Eli, which may well be computed 250 years; only the names of the high priests at that time are preserved, 1 Chron. vi. 4–7; and Ezra vii. 3–5. How can this strange obscurity of that priesthood for so long a time, now in the beginning of its days, agree with that mighty splendour with which it was introduced and the figure which the institution of it makes in the law of Moses? Surely it intimates that the institution was chiefly intended to be typical, and that the great benefits that seemed to be promised by it were to be chiefly looked for in its antitype, the everlasting priesthood of our Lord Jesus, in comparison of the superior glory of which that priesthood had no glory, 2 Cor. iii. 10.

CHAP. XIII

Samson, the last of the judges of Israel whose story is recorded in this book, and next before Eli. The figure he makes in this history is vastly different from that of his predecessors. We never find him at the head either of a court or of an army, never upon the throne of judgment nor in the field of battle, yet, in his own proper person, a great patriot of his country, and a terrible scourge and check to its enemies and oppressors. The history of the rest of the judges commences from their advancement to that station, but Samson's begins with his birth. I. The occasion of raising up this deliverer was the oppression of Israel by the Philistines, ver. 1. II. His birth is foretold by an angel to his mother, ver. 2–5. III. She relates the prediction to his father, ver. 6, 7. IV. They both together have it again from the angel (ver. 8–14), whom they treat with respect (ver. 15–18), and who, to their great amazement, discovers his dignity at parting, ver. 19–23. V. Samson is born, ver. 24, 25.

Verses 1–7

The first verse gives us a short account of the great distress that Israel was in, which gave occasion for the raising up of a deliverer. They did evil, as they had done, in the sight of the Lord. The enemies God now sold them to were the Philistines, their next neighbours, an inconsiderable people in comparison with Israel (they had but five cities of any note), and yet, when God made use of them as the staff in his hand, they were very oppressive and vexatious. And this trouble lasted longer than any yet: it continued forty years, though probably not always alike violent. When Israel was in this distress Samson was born; and here we have his birth foretold by an angel. Observe,

I. His extraction. He was of the tribe of Dan, v. 2. Dan signifies a judge or judgment, Gen. xxx. 6. The lot of the tribe of Dan lay next to the country of the Philistines, and therefore one of that tribe was most fit to be made a bridle upon them. His parents had been long childless. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been kept a great while in the want of the blessing of children, as Isaac, Joseph, Samuel, and John Baptist, that the mercy might be the more acceptable when it did come.

II. The glad tidings brought to his mother, that she should have a son. The messenger was an angel of the Lord (v. 3), yet appearing as a man, with the aspect and garb of a prophet, or man of God. It was not so much for the sake of Manoah and his wife, obscure Danites, that this extraordinary message was sent, but for Israel's sake, whose deliverer he was to be, and not only so but for the Messiah's sake, whose type he was to be, and whose birth must be foretold by an angel, as his was. The angel, in the message he delivers, 1. Takes notice of her affliction: Behold now, thou art barren and bearest not. "Now thou art barren, but thou shalt not be always so," as she feared, "not long so." 2. He assures her that she should conceive and bear a son (v. 3) and repeats the assurance, v. 5. To show the power of a divine word, the strongest man that ever was was a child of promise. 3. He appoints that the child should be a Nazarite from his birth, and therefore that the mother should be subject to the law of the Nazarites (though not under the vow of a Nazarite) and should drink no wine or strong drink so long as this child was to have its nourishment from her, either in the womb or at the breast, v. 4, 5. Other judges had corrected their apostasies from God, but Samson must appear as one, more than any of them, consecrated to God; and, notwithstanding what we read of his faults, we have reason to think that being a Nazarite of God's making he did exemplify, not only the ceremony, but the substance of that separation to the Lord in which the Nazariteship did consist, Num. vi. 2. The mother of this deliverer must therefore deny herself, and not eat any unclean thing; what was lawful at another time was now to be forborne. Women with child ought conscientiously to avoid whatever they have reason to think will be any way prejudicial to the health or good constitution of the fruit of their body. And perhaps Samson's mother was to refrain from wine and strong drink, not only because he was designed for a Nazarite, but because he was designed for a man of great strength, which his mother's temperance would contribute to. 4. He foretells the service which this child should do to his country: He shall begin to deliver Israel. Observe, He shall begin to deliver Israel. This intimated that the oppression of the Philistines should last long. He shall only begin to deliver Israel, which intimates that the trouble should still be prolonged. Now herein Samson was a type of Christ, (1) As a Nazarite to God, a Nazarite from the womb. For, though our Lord Jesus was not a Nazarite himself, yet he was typified by the Nazarites, as being perfectly pure from all sin, not so much as conceived in it, and entirely devoted to his Father's honour. (2) As a deliverer of Israel; for he is Jesus a Saviour, who saves his people from their sins. But with this difference: Samson did only begin to deliver Israel (David was afterwards raised up to complete the destruction of the Philistines), but our Lord Jesus is both Samson and David too, both the author and finisher of our faith.

III. The report which Manoah's wife, in a transport of joy, brings in all haste to her husband, of this surprising message, v. 6, 7. 1. Of the messenger. It was a man of God, v. 6. His countenance she could describe; it was very awful: he had such a majesty in his looks, that according to the idea she had of an angel he had the very countenance of one. But his name she can give no account of, nor to what tribe or city of Israel he belonged. She was abundantly satisfied that he was a servant of God; his person and message she thought carried their own evidence along with them, and she enquired no further. 2. Of the message. She gives him a particular account both of the promise and of the precept (v. 7), that he also might believe the promise. Thus should yoke-fellows communicate to each other their experiences of communion with God, that they may be helpful to each other in the way that is called holy.

Verses 8–14

An account of a second visit which the angel of God made to Manoah and his wife.

I. Manoah earnestly prayed for it, v. 8. 1. He takes it for granted that this child of promise shall in due time be given them, and speaks without hesitation of the child that shall be born. Blessed are those that have not seen and yet, as Manoah here, have believed. 2. All his care is what they should do to the child that should be born. Note, Good men are more solicitous and desirous to know the duty that is to be done by them than to know the events that shall occur concerning them; for duty is ours, events are God's. 3. He therefore prays to God to send the same blessed messenger again, to give them further instructions concerning the management of this Nazarite, fearing lest his wife's joy for the promise might have made her forget some part of the precept, in which he was desirous to be fully informed, and lie under no mistake. Would we have God's messengers, the ministers of his gospel, to bring a word proper for us, and for our instruction? Entreat the Lord to send them to us, to teach us, Rom. xv. 30, 32.

II. God graciously granted it: God hearkened to the voice of Manoah, v. 9.

1. The angel appears the second time also to the wife, when she is sitting alone, probably tending the flocks. Solitude is often a good opportunity of communion with God; good people have thought themselves never less alone than when alone, if God be with them.

2. She goes in all haste to call her husband, doubtless humbly beseeching the stay of this blessed messenger till she should return and her husband with her, v. 10, 11. The man of God is very willing she should call her husband, John iv. 16. Manoah is not disgusted that the angel did not this second time appear to him, but very willingly goes after his wife to the man of God. If the wife will lead, let not the husband think it any disparagement to him to follow her in that which is virtuous and praiseworthy.

3. Manoah having come to the angel, and being satisfied by him that he was the same that had appeared to his wife, does, with all humility, (1) Welcome the promise (v. 12): Now let thy words come to pass; this was the language, not only of his desire, but of his faith, like that of the blessed Virgin, Luke i. 38. "Be it according to thy word. Lord, I lay hold on what thou hast said, and depend upon it; let it come to pass." (2) Beg that the prescriptions given might be repeated: How shall we order the child? The directions were given to his wife, but he looks upon himself as concerned to assist her in the careful management of this promised seed, according to order; for the utmost care of both the parents, and their constant joint endeavour, are little enough to be engaged for the good ordering of children that are devoted to God and to be brought up for him. Let not one devolve it on the other, but both do their best. Those to whom God has given children must be very careful how they order them, and what they do unto them, that they may drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts, form their minds and manners well betimes, and train them in the way wherein they should go. Herein pious parents will beg divine assistance. "Lord, teach us how we may order our children, that they may be Nazarites, and living sacrifices to thee."

4. The angel repeats the directions he had before given (v. 13, 14). There is need of a good deal both of caution and observation, for the right ordering both of ourselves and of our children. Those that would preserve themselves pure must keep at a distance from that which borders upon sin or leads to it. When she was with child of a Nazarite, she must not eat any unclean thing; so those in whom Christ is formed must carefully cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and do nothing to the prejudice of that new man.

Verses 15–23

I. What further passed between Manoah and the angel at this interview. It was in kindness to him that while the angel was with him it was concealed from him that he was an angel. We could not bear the sight of the divine glory unveiled. God having determined to speak to us by men like ourselves, prophets and ministers, even when he spoke by his angels, or by his Son, they appeared in the likeness of men, and were taken but for men of God. Now,

1. The angel declined to accept his treat, and appointed him to turn it into a sacrifice. Manoah begged he would take some refreshment with him (v. 15), but the angel told him (v. 16) he would not eat of his bread, any more than he would of Gideon's, but directed him to offer it to God, ch. vi. 20, 21. Though we cannot live without meat and drink, yet we eat and drink to the glory of God, and so turn even our common meals into sacrifices.

2. The angel declined telling him his name. Manoah desired to know his name (v. 17), and of what tribe he was, "That when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour." What Manoah asked for instruction in his duty he was readily told (v. 12, 13), but what he asked to gratify his curiosity was denied. God has in his word given us full directions concerning our duty, but he never designed to answer all the enquiries of a speculative head. We must never indulge a vain curiosity in our enquiries concerning these things, Col. ii. 18. Nescire velle quæ Magister maximus docere non vult erudita inscitia est—To be willingly ignorant of those things which our great Master refuses to teach us is to be at once ignorant and wise.

3. The angel assisted and owned their sacrifice. Thus we must bring our hearts to God as living sacrifices, and submit them to the operation of his Spirit. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God. But it is Christ in the heart by faith that makes it an offering of a sweet-smelling savour: without him our services are offensive smoke, but, in him, acceptable flame. We may apply it to Christ's sacrifice of himself for us; he ascended in the flame of his own offering, for by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, Heb. ix. 12.

II. An account of the impressions which this vision made upon Manoah and his wife. 1. In Manoah's reflection upon it there is great fear, v. 22. He had spoken with great assurance of the son they should shortly be the joyful parents of (v. 8, 12), and yet is now put into confusion. We shall surely die. It was a vulgar opinion generally received among the ancient Jews that it was present death to see God or an angel; and this notion quite overcame his faith for the present, as it did Gideon's, ch. vi. 22. 2. In his wife's reflection upon it there is great faith, v. 23. Here the weaker vessel was the stronger believer, which perhaps was the reason why the angel chose once and again to appear to her. Yoke-fellows should piously assist each other's faith and joy as there is occasion. None could argue better than Manoah's wife does here: We shall surely die, said her husband; "Nay," said she, "the tokens of his favour which we have received forbid us to think that he designs our destruction. Had he thought fit to kill us, (1) He would not have accepted our sacrifice. (2) He would not have shown us all these things, nor would he have given these exceedingly great and precious promises of a son that shall be a Nazarite and a deliverer of Israel." Note, Hereby it appears that God designs not the death of sinners that he has accepted the great sacrifice which Christ offered up for their salvation. And let those good Christians who have had communion with God in the word and prayer, to whom he has graciously manifested himself, take encouragement thence in a cloudy and dark day. "God would not have done what he has done for my soul if he had designed to forsake me, and leave me to perish at last; for his work is perfect, nor will he mock his people with his favours." Learn to reason as Manoah's wife did.

1. Samson's birth. The woman that had been long barren bore a son, according to the promise. 2. His name, Samson, has been derived, by some, from Shemesh, the sun, turned into a diminutive, sol exiguus —the sun in miniature, perhaps because, being born like Moses to be a deliverer, he was like him exceedingly fair, his face shone like a little sun, because of his great strength. The sun is compared to a strong man (Ps. xix. 5). A little sun, because the glory of, and a light to, his people Israel, a type of Christ, the Sun of righteousness. 3. His childhood. He far outgrew other children of his age; it appeared that the Lord blessed him, qualified him, both in body and mind, for something great and extraordinary. 4. His youth. When he grew up a little the Spirit of the Lord began to move him, v. 25. The Spirit of God moved Samson in the camp of Dan to oppose the incursions of the Philistines; there Samson, when a child, appeared among them, and signalized himself by some very brave actions, excelling them all in manly exercises and trials of strength: and probably he showed himself more than ordinarily zealous against the enemies of his country.

CHAP. XIV

The idea which this chapter gives us of Samson is not what one might have expected concerning one who, by the special designation of heaven, was a Nazarite to God and a deliverer of Israel; and yet really he was both. Here is, I. Samson's courtship of a daughter of the Philistines, and his marriage to her, ver. 1–5, 7, 8. II. His conquest of a lion, and the prize he found in the carcase of it, ver. 5, 6, 8, 9. III. Samson's riddle proposed to his companions (ver. 10–14) and unriddled by the treachery of his wife, ver. 15–18. IV. The occasion this gave him to kill thirty of the Philistines (ver. 19) and to break off his new alliance, ver. 20.

Verses 1–9

I. Samson, under the extraordinary guidance of Providence, seeks an occasion of quarrelling with the Philistines, by joining in affinity with them—a strange method, but the truth is Samson was himself a riddle, a paradox of a man, and did that which was really great and good, by that which was seemingly weak and evil.

1. As the negotiation of Samson's marriage was a common case, we may observe, (1) That it was foolish to set his affections upon a daughter of the Philistines. Shall one that is not only an Israelite, but a Nazarite, devoted to the Lord, covet to become one with a worshipper of Dagon? Shall one marked for a patriot of his country match among those that are its sworn enemies? His parents did well to dissuade him from yoking himself thus unequally with unbelievers. "Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or, if none of our tribe, never a one among all thy people, never an Israelite, that pleases thee, or that thou canst think worthy of thy affection, that thou shouldest marry a Philistine?"

(2) If there had not been a special reason for it, it certainly would have been improper in him to insist upon his choice, and in them to agree to it at last. This Nazarite, in his subjection to his parents, asking their consent, and not proceeding till he had it, was an example to all children.

2. But this treaty of marriage is expressly said to be of the Lord, v. 4. Not only that God afterwards overruled it to serve his designs against the Philistines, but that he put it into Samson's heart to make this choice, that he might have occasion against the Philistines. It should seem, the way in which the Philistines oppressed Israel was, not by great armies, but by the clandestine incursions of their giants and small parties of their plunderers. In the same way therefore Samson must deal with them; let him but by this marriage get among them, and he would be a thorn in their sides.

II. Samson, by a special providence, is animated and encouraged to attack the Philistines. God prepared him for it by two occurrences:—

1. By enabling him, in one journey to Timnath, to kill a lion, v. 5, 6. (1) Samson's encounter with the lion was hazardous. It was a young lion, one of the fiercest sort, that set upon him, roaring for his prey. He was all alone in the vineyards, whither he had rambled from his father and mother, probably to eat grapes. Had Samson met with this lion in the way, he might have had more reason to expect help both from God and man than here in the solitary vineyards, out of his road. But there was a special providence in it, and the more hazardous the encounter was, (2) The victory was so much the more illustrious. It was obtained without any difficulty: he strangled the lion, and tore his throat as easily as he would have strangled a kid. Christ engaged the roaring lion, and conquered him in the beginning of his public work (Matt. iv. 1, &c.), and afterwards spoiled principalities and powers, triumphing over them in himself. He was exalted in his own strength. He did not boast of it, did not so much as tell his father nor mother that which many a one would soon have published through the whole country. Modesty and humility make up the brightest crown of great performances.

2. By providing him, the next journey, with honey in the carcase of this lion, v. 8, 9. When he came down the next time he found the carcase of the lion; the birds or beasts of prey, it is likely, had eaten the flesh, and in the skeleton a swarm of bees had knit, and made a hive of it, and had not been idle, but had there laid up a good stock of honey, which was one of the staple commodities of Canaan. Samson, having a better title than any man to the hive, seizes the honey with his hands. This supposes an encounter with the bees; but he that dreaded not the lion's paws had no reason to fear their stings. By dislodging the bees he was taught not to fear the multitude of the Philistines; though they compassed him about like bees. Of the honey he here found, (1) He ate himself, asking no questions for conscience's sake. John Baptist, that Nazarite of the New Testament, lived upon wild honey. (2) He gave to his parents, and they did eat; he did not eat all himself. He let his parents share with him. Let those that by the grace of God have found sweetness in religion themselves communicate their experience to their friends and relations, and invite them to come and share with them. He told not his parents whence he had it, lest they should scruple eating it. Honey is honey still, though in a dead lion.

Verses 10–20

An account of Samson's wedding feast and the occasion it gave him to fall foul upon the Philistines.

I. Samson conformed to the custom of the country in making a festival of his nuptial solemnities, which continued seven days, v. 10. It is no part of religion to go contrary to the innocent usages of the places where we live: nay, it is a reproach to religion when those who profess it give just occasion to others to call them covetous, sneaking, and morose. A good man should strive to make himself, in the best sense, a good companion.

II. His wife's relations paid him the accustomed respect of the place upon that occasion, and brought him thirty young men to keep him company during the solemnity, and to attend him as his grooms-men (v. 11): When they saw him, they brought these, seemingly to be his companions, but really to be a guard upon him, or spies to observe him.

III. Samson, to entertain the company, propounds a riddle to them, and lays a wager with them that they cannot find it out in seven days, v. 12–14. The usage, it seems, was very ancient upon such occasions. Now, 1. Samson's riddle was his own invention, for it was his own achievement that gave occasion for it: Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. Read my riddle, what is this? This riddle is applicable to many of the methods of divine providence and grace. When God, by an overruling providence, brings good out of evil to his church and people,—when that which threatened their ruin turns to their advantage,—when their enemies are made serviceable to them, and the wrath of men turns to God's praise,—then comes meat out of the eater and sweetness out of the strong. See Phil. i. 12.

IV. His companions, when they could not expound the riddle themselves, obliged his wife to get from him the exposition of it, v. 15. If she would not use means with the bridegroom to let them into the meaning of it, they would burn her and her father's house with fire. Could anything be more brutish?

V. His wife, by unreasonable importunity, obtains from him a key to his riddle. It was on the seventh day, that is, the seventh day of the week (as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures), but the fourth day of the feast, that they solicited her to entice her husband (v. 15), and she did it, 1. With great art and management (v. 16). 2. With great success. At last, being quite wearied with her importunity, he told her what was the meaning of his riddle, and though we may suppose she promised secrecy, and that if he would but let her know she would tell nobody, she immediately told it to the children of her people; nor could he expect better from a Philistine. The riddle is at length unriddled (v. 18): What is sweeter than honey, or a better meat? Prov. xxiv. 13. What is stronger than a lion, or a greater devourer? Samson generously owns they had won the wager. But he thought fit to tell them: If you had not ploughed with my heifer, made use of your interest with my wife, you would not have found out my riddle. Satan, in his temptations, could not do us the mischief he does if he did not plough with the heifer of our own corrupt nature.

VI. Samson pays his wager to these Philistines with the spoils of others of their countrymen, v. 19.

VII. This proves a good occasion of weaning Samson from his new relations. He found how his companions had abused him and how his wife had betrayed him, and therefore his anger was kindled, v. 19. And, meeting with this ill usage among them, he went up to his father's house. It were well for us if the unkindnesses we meet with from the world, and our disappointments in it, had but this good effect upon us, to oblige us by faith and prayer to return to our heavenly Father's house and rest there. The inconveniences that occur in our way should make us love home and long to be there.

CHAP. XV

Samson, when he courted an alliance with the Philistines, did but seek an occasion against them, ch. xiv. 4. I. From the perfidiousness of his wife and her father, he took occasion to burn their corn, ver. 1–5. II. From the Philistines' barbarous cruelty to his wife and her father, he took occasion to smite them with a great slaughter, ver. 6–8. ¶ II. From the treachery of his countrymen, who delivered him bound to the Philistines, he took occasion to kill 1000 of them with the jaw-bone of an ass, ver. 9–17. IV. From the distress he was then in for want of water, God took occasion to show him favour in a seasonable supply, ver. 18–20.

Verses 1–8

I. Samson's return to his wife, whom he had left in displeasure; when time had a little cooled his resentments, he came back to her, visited her with a kid, v. 1. It was intended as a token of reconciliation, and perhaps was then so used. When differences happen between near relations, let those be ever reckoned the wisest that are most forward to forgive and forget injuries.

II. The repulse he met with. Her father forbade him to come near her; for truly he had married her to another, v. 2. He endeavours, 1. To justify himself in this wrong: I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her. 2. He endeavours to pacify Samson by offering him his younger daughter. Samson scorned his proposal; he knew better things than to take a wife to her sister, Lev. xviii. 18.

III. The revenge Samson took upon the Philistines for this abuse. He looks upon himself as a public person, and the affront as done to the whole nation of Israel. Now the way Samson took to be revenged on them was by setting their cornfields on fire, which would be a great weakening and impoverishing to the country, v. 4, 5. 1. The method he took to do it was very strange. He sent 150 couple of foxes, tied tail to tail, into the cornfields; every couple had a stick of fire between their tails, with which, being terrified, they ran into the corn for shelter, and so set fire to it; thus the fire would break out in many places at the same time. We never find Samson, in any of his exploits, making use of any person whatsoever, either servant or soldier. By the meanness and weakness of the animals he employed, he designed to put contempt upon the enemies he fought against. This stratagem is often alluded to to show how the church's adversaries have often united in a fire-brand, some cursed project or other, to waste the church of God, and particularly to kindle the fire of division in it. 2. The mischief he hereby did to the Philistines was very great. It was in the time of wheat harvest (v. 1), so that the straw being dry it soon burnt the shocks of corn that were cut, and the standing corn, and the vineyards and olives.

IV. The Philistines' outrage against Samson's treacherous wife and her father. Understanding that they had provoked Samson to do this mischief to the country, the rabble set upon them and burnt them with fire, perhaps in their own house, v. 6. The Philistines had threatened Samson's wife that, if she would not get the riddle out of him, they would burn her and her father's house with fire, ch. xiv. 15. She, to save herself and oblige her countrymen, betrayed her husband. The very thing that she feared, and sought by sin to avoid, came upon her; she and her father's house were burnt with fire. The mischief we seek to escape by any unlawful practices we often pull upon our own heads.

V. The occasion Samson took hence to do them a yet greater mischief, which touched their bone and their flesh, v. 7, 8. "I have Israel's cause to plead as a public person, and for the wrongs done to them I will be avenged on you." So he smote them hip and thigh with a great stroke, so the word is. And, when he had done, he retired, to a natural fortress in the top of the rock Etam, where he waited to see whether the Philistines would be tamed by the correction he had given them.

Verses 9–17

I. Samson violently pursued by the Philistines. They pitched in Judah, and spread themselves up and down the country, to find out Samson, whom they heard had come this way, v. 9. Here was an army sent against one man, for indeed he was himself an army. Thus a whole band of men was sent to seize our Lord Jesus, that blessed Samson, though a tenth part would have served now that his hour had come, and ten times as many would have done nothing if he had not yielded.

II. Samson basely betrayed and delivered up by the men of Judah, v. 11. Of Judah were they? Degenerate branches of that valiant tribe! Perhaps they were disaffected to Samson because he was not of their tribe. Out of a foolish fondness for their forfeited precedency, they would rather be oppressed by Philistines than rescued by a Danite. Often has the church's deliverance been obstructed by such jealousies and pretended points of honour. Sin dispirits men, nay, it infatuates them, and hides from their eyes the things that belong to their peace. Probably Samson went into the border of that country to offer his service, supposing his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, as Moses did, Acts vii. 25. They begged of him that he would suffer them to bind him, and deliver him up to the Philistines. Cowardly unthankful wretches!

III. Samson tamely yielding to be bound by his countrymen, and delivered into the hands of his enraged enemies, v. 12, 13. He patiently submitted, 1. That he might give an example of great meekness, mixed with great strength and courage; as one that had rule over his own spirit, he knew how to yield as well as how to conquer. 2. That, by being delivered up to the Philistines, he might have an opportunity of making a slaughter among them. Justly is their misery prolonged who, to oblige their worst enemies, thus abuse their best friend. Never were men so infatuated except those who thus treated our blessed Saviour.

IV. Samson making his part good even when he was delivered fast pinioned with two new cords. The Philistines, when they had him among them, shouted against him (v. 14), so triumphing in their success, and insulting over him. When they shouted against him as a man run down, confident that all was their own, then the Spirit of the Lord came upon him. Thus fired, 1. He presently got clear of his bonds. The two new cords, upon the first struggle he gave, broke, and were melted (as the original word is) from off his hands, no doubt to the great amazement and terror of those that shouted against him, whose shouts were hereby turned into shrieks. Observe, Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty, and those are free indeed who are thus freed. This typified the resurrection of Christ by the power of the Spirit of holiness. In it he loosed the bands of death, and its cords, the graveclothes, fell from his hands without being loosed, as Lazarus's were, because it was impossible that the mighty Saviour should be holden of them; and thus he triumphed over the powers of darkness that shouted against him, as if they had him sure. 2. He made a great destruction among the Philistines, who all gathered about him to make sport with him, v. 15. See how poorly he was armed: he had no better weapon than the jaw-bone of an ass, and yet what execution he did with it! he never laid it out of his hand till he had with it laid 1,000 Philistines dead upon the spot. Had it been the jaw-bone of a lion, especially that which he himself had slain, it might have helped to heighten his fancy and to make him think himself the more formidable; but to take the bone of that despicable animal was to do wonders by the foolish things of the world, that the excellency of the power might be of God and not of man.

V. Samson celebrating his own victory, since the men of Judah would not do even that for him. He composed a short song, which he sang to himself. The burden of this song was, With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, have I slain a thousand men, v. 16. The same word in Hebrew (chamor) signifies both an ass and a heap, so that this is an elegant paronomasia, and represents the Philistines falling as tamely as asses. He also gave a name to the place, to perpetuate the Philistines' disgrace, v. 17. Ramath-lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone.

I. The distress which Samson was in after this great performance (v. 18). He found himself reduced to the last extremity for want of water and ready to faint. Josephus says, It was designed to chastise him for not making mention of God and his hand in his memorial of the victory he had obtained, but taking all the praise to himself: I have slain a thousand men.

II. His prayer to God in this distress. Those that forget to attend God with their praises may perhaps be compelled to attend him with their prayers. Afflictions are often sent to bring unthankful people to God. Two things he pleads with God in this prayer, 1. He owns himself God's servant in what he had been doing: He calls his victory a deliverance, a great deliverance; for, if God had not helped him, he had not only not conquered the Philistines, but had been swallowed up by them. Note, Past experiences of God's power and goodness are excellent pleas in prayer for further mercy. 2. His being now exposed to his enemies: Lest I fall into the hands of the uncircumcised, and then they will triumph, will tell it in Gath, and in the streets of Ashkelon.

III. The seasonable relief God sent him. God heard his prayer, and sent him water. I rather incline to our marginal reading: God clave a hollow place that was in Lehi: the place of his action was, from the jaw-bone, called Lehi; even before the action we find it so called, v. 9, 14. And there God caused water to spring up in abundance. Of this fair water he drank, and his spirits revived. We should be more thankful for the mercy of water did we consider how ill we can spare it.

IV. The memorial of this, in the name Samson gave to this upstart fountain, Enhakkore, the well of him that cried, thereby keeping in remembrance both his own distress and God's favour to him. Many a spring of comfort God opens to his people, which may fitly be called by this name; it is the well of him that cried. Samson had given a name to the place which denoted him great and triumphant—Ramath-lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone; but here he gives it another name, which denotes him needy and dependent.

V. The continuance of Samson's government after these achievements, v. 20. At length Israel submitted to him whom they had betrayed. It was a mercy to Israel that, though they were oppressed by a foreign enemy, yet they had a judge that preserved order and kept them from ruining one another. Twenty years his government continued, but of the particulars we have no account, save of the beginning of his government in this chapter and the end of it in the next.

CHAP. XVI

Samson's name signifies a little sun; we have seen this sun rising very bright, and we take it for granted that the middle of the day was proportionably illustrious, while he judged Israel twenty years; but this chapter gives us such an account of his evening as did not commend his day. This little sun set under a cloud, and yet, just in the setting, darted forth one such strong and glorious beam as made him even then a type of Christ, conquering by death. I. Samson greatly endangered by his familiarity with one harlot, and hardly escaping, ver. 1–3. II. Samson quite ruined by his familiarity with another harlot, Delilah. Observe, 1. How he was betrayed to her by his own lusts, ver. 4. 2. How he was betrayed by her to his sworn enemies, the Philistines, who, (1) By her means got it out of him at last where his great strength lay, ver. 5–17. (2) Then robbed him of his strength, ver. 18–20. (3) Then seized him, blinded him, imprisoned him, abused him, and, at a solemn festival, made a show of him, ver. 21–25. But, lastly, he avenged himself of them by pulling down the theatre upon their heads, and so dying with them, ver. 26–31.

Verses 1–3

1. Samson's sin, v. 1. His taking a Philistine to wife, in the beginning of his time, was in some degree excusable, but to join himself to a harlot that he accidentally saw among them was a profanation of his honour as an Israelite, as a Nazarite. Tell it not in Gath. 2. Samson's danger. Notice was sent to the magistrates of Gaza, perhaps by the treacherous harlot herself, that Samson was in the town, v. 2. The gates of the city were thereupon shut, guards set, all kept quiet, that Samson might suspect no danger. Now they thought they had him in prison, and doubted not but to be the death of him the next morning. O that all those who indulge their sensual appetites in drunkenness, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts, would see themselves thus surrounded by their spiritual enemies! 3. Samson's escape, v. 3. He rose at midnight, perhaps roused by the checks of his own conscience. He arose with a penitent abhorrence (we hope) of the sin he was now committing, and of himself because of it, and with a pious resolution not to return to it. It was bad that he lay down without such checks; but it would have been worse if he had lain still under them. He makes immediately towards the gate of the city, stays not to break open the gates, but plucks up the posts, takes them, gates and bar and all, up to the top of a hill, in disdain of their attempt to secure him with gates and bars, proof of the great strength God had given him and a type of Christ's victory over death and the grave. He not only rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre, and so came forth himself, but carried away the gates of the grave, bar and all, and so left it, ever after, an open prison to all that are his.

Verses 4–17

The burnt child dreads the fire; yet Samson, that has more than the strength of a man, in this comes short of the wisdom of a child; for, though he had been more than once brought into the highest degree of mischief and danger by the love of women and lusting after them, yet he would not take warning, but is here again taken in the same snare, and this third time pays for all. This bad woman, that brought Samson to ruin, is here named Delilah, an infamous name, fitly used to express the person that by flattery or falsehood brings destruction on those to whom kindness is pretended.

I. The affection Samson had for Delilah: he loved her, v. 4. Whether she was an Israelite or a Philistine is not certain. If an Israelite, which is scarcely probable, yet she had the heart of a Philistine.

II. The interest which the lords of the Philistines made with her to betray Samson, v. 5. 1. That which they told her they designed was to humble him, or afflict him; they would promise not to do him any hurt, only they would disable him not to do them any. 2. That which they desired was to know where his great strength lay, and by what means he might be bound. They engaged Delilah to get it out of him, telling her what a kindness it would be to them, and perhaps assuring her it should not be improved to any real mischief, either to him or her. 3. For this they bid high, promised to give her each of them 1,100 pieces of silver, 5,500 in all. With this she was hired to betray one she pretended to love.

III. The arts by which he put her off from time to time. She asked him where his great strength lay, and whether it were possible for him to be bound and afflicted (v. 6), pretending that she thought it was impossible he should be bound otherwise than by her charms.

1. When she urged him very much, he told her, (1) That he might be bound with seven green withs, v. 7. The experiment was tried (v. 8), but he broke the withs as easily as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire, v. 9. (2) When she still continued her importunity (v. 10) he told her that with two new ropes he might be so cramped and hampered that he might be as easily dealt with as any other man, v. 11. This experiment failed: the new ropes broke from off his arm like a thread, v. 12. (3) He then told her that the weaving of the seven locks of his head would make a great alteration in him, v. 13. This came nearer the matter than any thing he had yet said. His strength appeared to be very much in his hair, when, upon the trial of this, purely by the strength of his hair, he carried away the pin of the beam and the web.

2. In the making of all these experiments, it is hard to say whether there appears more of Samson's weakness or Delilah's wickedness. (1) Could anything be more wicked than her restless and unreasonable importunity with him to discover a secret which she knew would endanger his life. What could be more base and disingenuous, more false and treacherous, than to lay his head in her lap, as one whom she loved, and at the same time to design the betraying of him to those by whom he was mortally hated? (2) Could anything be more weak than for him to continue a parley with one who, he so plainly saw, was aiming to do him a mischief?

IV. The disclosure he at last made of this great secret; and, if the disclosure proved fatal to him, he must thank himself, who had not power to keep his own counsel from one that manifestly sought his ruin. Delilah signifies a consumer; she was so to him. Observe, 1. How she teased him, telling him she would not believe he loved her, unless he would gratify her in this matter (v. 15): How canst thou say, I love thee, when thy heart is not with me? She continued many days vexatious to him with her importunity, so that he had no pleasure of his life with her (v. 16). 2. How she conquered him (v. 17): He told her all his heart. God left him to himself to do this foolish thing, to punish him for indulging himself in the lusts of uncleanness. No razor should come upon his head, ch. xiii. 5. His consecration to God was to be his strength. Therefore the badge of his consecration was the pledge of his strength; if he lose the former, he knows he forfeits the latter. "If I be shaven, I shall no longer be a Nazarite, and then my strength will be lost." The making of his bodily strength to depend so much on his hair, which could have no natural influence upon it either one way or other, teaches us to magnify divine institutions, and to expect God's grace, and the continuance of it, only in the use of those means of grace wherein he has appointed us to attend upon him, the word, sacraments, and prayer.

The fatal consequences of Samson's folly in betraying his own strength. Observe, 1. What care Delilah took to make sure of the money for herself. It would have grieved one's heart to have seen one of the bravest men in the world sold and bought, as a sheep for the slaughter. 2. What course she took to deliver him up to them according to the bargain. See what a treacherous method she took (v. 19): She made him sleep upon her knees. See the fatal consequences of security. Satan ruins men by rocking them asleep, flattering them into a good opinion of their own safety, and so bringing them to mind nothing and fear nothing, and then he robs them of their strength and honour and leads them captive at his will. When he was asleep she had a person ready to cut off his hair, which he did so silently and so quickly that it did not awake him. 3. What little concern he himself was in at it, v. 20. He could not but miss his hair as soon as he awoke, and yet said, "I will shake myself as at other times after sleep." He soon found in himself some change, and yet wist not that the Lord had departed from him: he did not consider that this was the reason of the change. Note, Many have lost the favourable presence of God and are not aware of it; they have provoked God to withdraw from them, but are not sensible of their loss. 4. What improvement the Philistines soon made of their advantages against him, v. 21. The Philistines took him when God had departed from him. If we sleep in the lap of our lusts, we shall certainly wake in the hands of the Philistines. It is probable they had promised Delilah not to kill him, but they took an effectual course to disable him. The first thing they did, when they had him in their hands and found they could manage him, was to put out his eyes, by applying fire to them, says the Arabic version. They considered that his eyes would never come again, as perhaps his hair might, and that the strongest arms could do little without eyes to guide them, and therefore, if now they blind him, they for ever blind him. His eyes were the inlets of his sin: he saw the harlot at Gaza, and went in unto her (v. 1), and now his punishment began there. They brought him down to Gaza, that there he might appear in weakness where he had lately given such proofs of his strength (v. 3). They bound him with fetters of brass who had before been held in the cords of his own iniquity, and he did grind in the prison. Poor Samson, how hast thou fallen! How is thy honour laid in the dust!

Verses 22–31

Though the last stage of Samson's life was inglorious there was honour in his death. No doubt he greatly repented of his sin, for that God was reconciled to him appears, 1. By the return of the sign of his Nazariteship (v. 22): His hair began to grow again, as when he was shaven, that is, to be as thick and as long as when it was cut off. It seems to have been extraordinary, and designed for a special indication of the return of God's favour to him upon his repentance. 2. By the use God made of him for the destruction of the enemies of his people, and that at a time when it would be most for the vindication of the honour of God, and not immediately for the defence and deliverance of Israel. Observe,

I. How insolently the Philistines affronted the God of Israel, 1. By the sacrifices they offered to Dagon, his rival. This Dagon they call their god, a god of their own making, represented by an image, the upper part of which was in the shape of a man, the lower part of a fish, purely the creature of fancy; yet it served them to set up in opposition to the true and living God. It was only such a dunghill-deity as Dagon that was fit to be made a patron of the villainy. 2. By the sport they made with Samson, God's champion, they reflected on God himself. They made one another laugh to see how, being blind, he stumbled and blundered. They said, Where is now thy God? Being a penitent, his godly sorrow makes him patient, and he accepts the indignity as the punishment of his iniquity.

II. How justly the God of Israel brought sudden destruction upon them by the hands of Samson.

Thousands of the Philistines had got together, to attend their lords in the sacrifices and joys of this day, and to be the spectators of this comedy. They were all slain. Observe,

1. Who were destroyed: All the lords of the Philistines (v. 27), who had by bribes corrupted Delilah to betray Samson to them. Samson had been drawn into sin by the Philistine women, and now a great slaughter is made among them.

2. When they were destroyed. (1) When they were merry, secure, and jovial, and far from apprehending themselves in any danger. (2) It was when they were praising Dagon their god. (3) It was when they were making sport with an Israelite, a Nazarite, and insulting over him, persecuting him whom God had smitten. Those know not what they do, nor whom they affront, that make sport with a good man.

3. How they were destroyed. Samson pulled the house down upon them. (1) He gained strength to do it by prayer, v. 28. That strength which he had lost by sin he, like a true penitent, recovers by prayer. He prayed to God to remember him and strengthen him this once, thereby owning that his strength for what he had already done he had from God, and begged it might be afforded to him once more, to give them a parting blow. Samson died praying, so did our blessed Saviour; but Samson prayed for vengeance, Christ for forgiveness. (2) He gained opportunity to do it by leaning on the two pillars which were the chief supports of the building. The vast concourse of people that were upon the roof contributed to the fall of it. Few could escape being either stifled or crushed to death. Now in this, [1] The Philistines were greatly mortified. All their lords and great men were killed; the temple of Dagon (as many think the house was) was pulled down, and Dagon buried in it. [2] Samson may very well be justified, and brought in not guilty of any sinful murder either of himself or the Philistines. Nor was he felo de se, or a self-murderer, in it; for it was not his own life that he aimed at. [3] God was glorified in pardoning Samson's great transgressions, of which this was an evidence. [4] Christ was plainly typified. He pulled down the devil's kingdom, as Samson did Dagon's temple; and, when he died, he obtained the most glorious victory over the powers of darkness. Then when his arms were stretched out upon the cross, as Samson's to the two pillars, he gave a fatal shake to the gates of hell, and, through death, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil (Heb. ii. 14, 15), and herein exceeded Samson, that he not only died with the Philistines, but rose again to triumph over them.

Lastly, The story of Samson concludes, 1. With an account of his burial. 2. With the repetition of the account we had before of the continuance of his government: He judged Israel twenty years.

CHAP. XVII

What is related in the rest of the chapters to the end of this book was done soon after the death of Joshua, in the days of Phinehas the son of Eleazar, ch. xx. 28. But it is cast here that it might not interrupt the history of the Judges. That it might appear how happy the nation was in the judges it is here shown how unhappy they were when there was none. I. Then idolatry began in the family of Micah, ch. xvii. II. Then it spread itself into the tribe of Dan, ch. xviii. III. Then villainy was committed in Gibeah of Benjamin, ch. xix. IV. Then that whole tribe was destroyed for countenancing it, ch. xx. V. Then strange expedients were adopted to keep up that tribe, ch. xxi. In this chapter we are told how Micah an Ephraimite furnished himself, 1. With an image for his god, ver. 1–6. 2. With a Levite, such a one as he was, for his priest, ver. 7–13.

Verses 1–6

I. Micah and his mother quarrelling. 1. The son robs the mother. The old woman had hoarded, with long scraping and saving, a great sum of money, 1,100 pieces of silver. It is likely she intended, when she died, to leave it to her son. 2. The mother curses the son, or whoever had taken her money. See what mischief the love of money makes, how it destroys the duty and comfort of every relation. Outward losses drive good people to their prayers, but bad people to their curses.

II. Micah and his mother reconciled. 1. The son was so terrified with his mother's curses that he restored the money. 2. The mother was so pleased with her son's repentance that she recalled her curses, and turned them into prayers for her son's welfare: Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son.

III. Micah and his mother agreeing to turn their money into a god, and set up idolatry in their family. And though this was only the worship of the true God by an image, against the second commandment, yet this opened the door to the worship of other gods, Baalim and the groves, against the first and great commandment. Observe,

1. The mother's contrivance of this matter. When the silver was restored she pretended she had dedicated it to the Lord (v. 3) before it was stolen. "Come," said she to her son, "the money is mine, but thou hast a mind to it; let it be neither mine nor thine, but let us both agree to make it into an image for a religious use." Probably this old woman was one of those that came out of Egypt, and would have such images made as she had seen there; and perhaps told her son that this way of worshipping God by images was, to her knowledge, the old religion.

2. The son's compliance with her. It should seem, when she first proposed the thing he stumbled at it, knowing what the second commandment was. But, when the images were made, Micah, by his mother's persuasion, was not only well reconciled to them, but greatly pleased. But observe how the old woman's covetousness prevailed, in part, above her superstition. She had wholly dedicated the silver to make the graven and molten images (v. 3), but, when it came to be done, she made less than a fifth part serve, even 200 shekels, v. 4. Now observe,

(1) What was the corruption here introduced, v. 5. The man Micah had a house of gods, a house of God, so the LXX, for so he thought it, as good as that at Shiloh, and better, because his own, for people love to have their religion under their girdle, to manage it as they please. A house of error, so the Chaldee, for really it was so, a deviation from the way of truth and an inlet to all deceit. He made teraphim, little images which he might advise with as there was occasion, and receive informations, directions, and predictions from. Thus, while the honour of Jehovah was pretended (v. 3), yet, his institution being relinquished, these Israelites unavoidably lapsed into downright idolatry and demon-worship. Some room or apartment in the house of Micah was appointed for the temple or house of God; an ephod, or holy garment, was provided for his priest to officiate in, in imitation of those used at the tabernacle of God, and one of his sons he consecrated, probably the eldest, to be his priest. Here idolatry began, and it spread like a fretting leprosy. Dr. Lightfoot would have us observe that as 1,100 pieces of silver were here devoted to the making of an idol, which ruined religion, especially in the tribe of Dan, so 1,100 pieces of silver were given by each Philistine lord for the ruin of Samson.

(2) What was the cause of this corruption (v. 6): There was no king in Israel, no judge or sovereign prince to take cognizance of the setting up of these images. Every man did that which was right in his own eyes, and then they soon did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. See what a mercy government is, and what reason there is that not only prayers and intercessions, but giving of thanks, should be made for kings and all in authority, 1. Tim. ii. 1, 2. Nothing contributes more, under God, to the support of religion in the world, than the due administration of those two great ordinances, magistracy and ministry.

Verses 7–13

An account of Micah's furnishing himself with a Levite for his chaplain. I. By his mother's side he was of the family of Judah, and lived at Bethlehem. Thence he went to sojourn where he could find a place, and in his travels came to the house of Micah in Mount Ephraim, v. 8. Some think it was his unhappiness that he was under a necessity of removing, because he was neglected and starved, at Bethlehem. Israel's forsaking God began with forsaking the Levites. It is a sign religion is going to decay when good ministers are neglected and at a loss for a livelihood.

II. What bargain Micah made with him. Micah courts him into his family (v. 10), and promises him, 1. Good preferment: Be unto me a father and a priest. He asks not for his credentials. He might serve for a priest to a graven image, like Jeroboam's priest of the lowest of the people, 1 Kings xii. 31. No marvel if those who can make any thing serve for a god can also make any thing serve for a priest. 2. A tolerable maintenance. He will allow him meat, and drink, and clothes, a double suit, so the word is in the margin, a better and a worse, one for every day's wear and one for holy days, and ten shekels, about twenty-five shillings, a year for spending money—a poor salary in comparison of what God provided for the Levites that behaved well; but those that forsake God's service will never better themselves, nor find a better master. The ministry is the best calling but the worst trade in the world.

III. The Levite's settlement with him (v. 11): He was content to dwell with the man; though his work was superstitious and his wages were scandalous. Micah, thinking himself holier than any of his neighbours, presumed to consecrate this Levite, v. 12.

IV. Micah's satisfaction in this (v. 13): Now know I that the Lord will do me good. 1. He thought it was a sign of God's favour to him and his images that he had so opportunely sent a Levite to his door. 2. He thought now that the error of his priesthood was amended all was well, though he still retained his graven and molten image. Note, Many deceive themselves into a good opinion of their state by a partial reformation. They think they are as good as they should be, because, in some one particular instance, they are not so bad as they have been. 3. He thought the making of a Levite into a priest was a very meritorious act, which really was a presumptuous usurpation. 4. He thought that having a Levite in the house with him would of course entitle him to the divine favour. Having a Levite to be their priest, amounts to no security at all that God will do them good, unless they be good themselves, and make a good use of these advantages.

CHAP. XVIII

How idolatry crept into the family of Micah we read in the preceding chapter, how it was translated thence into the tribe of Dan we have an account in this chapter. The tribe of Dan had their lot assigned them last of all the tribes, and a considerable city in the utmost corner of Canaan northward was added to it. Now here we are told, I. How they sent spies to bring them an account of the place, who, by the way, got acquainted with Micah's priest, ver. 1–6. II. What an encouraging report these spies brought back, ver. 7–10. III. What forces were sent to conquer Laish, ver. 11–13. IV. How they, by the way, plundered Micah of his gods, ver. 14–26. V. How easily they conquered Laish, ver. 27–29, and, when they had it, set up the graven image in it, ver. 30, 31.

Verses 1–6

1. The eye which these Danites had upon Laish, not the whole tribe of Dan, but one family of them, to whose lot, in the subdivision of Canaan, that city fell. Hitherto this family had sojourned with their brethren, who had taken possession of their lot, which lay between Judah and the Philistines, and had declined going to their own city, because there was no king in Israel to rule over them, v. 1. But at length necessity forced them to arouse themselves, and they began to think of an inheritance to dwell in. 2. They sent five men to search the land (v. 2). The men they sent were men of valour, who, if they fell into their enemies' hands, knew how to look danger in the face. 3. The acquaintance which their spies got with Micah's priest. It seems, they had known this Levite formerly, he having in his rambles been sometimes in their country. They knew him again by his voice, v. 3. They, understanding that he had an oracle in his custody, desired he would tell them whether they should prosper in their present undertaking, v. 5. They seem to have had a greater opinion of Micah's teraphim than of God's urim; for they had passed by Shiloh, and, for aught that appears, had not enquired there of God's high priest, but Micah's shabby Levite shall be an oracle to them. He made them believe he had an answer from God encouraging them to go on, and assuring them of good success (v. 6).

Verses 7–13

1. The observation which the spies made upon the city of Laish, v. 7. Never was place so ill governed and so ill guarded, which would make it a very easy prey to the invader.

1. It was ill governed, for every man might be as bad as he would, and there was no magistrate, no heir of restraint (as the word is), so that by the most impudent immoralities they provoked God's wrath, and by all manner of mutual mischiefs weakened and consumed one another. See here, (1) What the office of magistrate is. They are to be heirs of restraint, for the restraining of that which is evil. They are possessors of restraint, entrusted with their authority for this end, that they may check and suppress every thing that is vicious and be a terror to evil doers. It is only God's grace that can renew men's depraved minds and turn their hearts; but the magistrate's power may restrain their bad practices and tie their hands, so that the wickedness of the wicked may not be either so injurious or so infectious as otherwise it would be. (2) See what method must be used for the restraint of wickedness. Sinners must be put to shame, that those who will not be restrained by the shamefulness of the sin before God and their own consciences may be restrained by the shamefulness of the punishment before men. All ways must be tried to dash sin out of countenance and cover it with contempt, to make people ashamed of their idleness, drunkenness, cheating, lying, and other sins, by making reputation always appear on virtue's side. (3) See how miserable, and how near to ruin, those places are that either have no magistrates or none that bear the sword to any purpose.

2. It was ill guarded. The people of Laish were careless, quiet, and secure, their gates left open, their walls out of repair, because under no apprehension of danger in any way. It was a sign that the Israelites, through their sloth and cowardice, were not now such a terror to the Canaanites as they were when they first came among them, else the city of Laish, which probably knew itself to be assigned to them, would not have been so very secure. And, lastly, they had no business with any man, which bespeaks either the idleness or the independency they affected: they scorned to be either in subjection to or alliance with any of their neighbours. They cared for nobody and therefore nobody cared for them. Such as these were the men of Laish.

II. The encouragement which they consequently gave to their countrymen that sent them to prosecute their design upon this city, v. 8–10. 1. They represent the place as desirable (v. 9), better than the mountainous country into which they were crowded by the Philistines. 2. They represent it as attainable. They do not at all question but, with God's blessing, they may soon get possession of it; for the people are secure, v. 10.

III. The Danites' expedition against Laish. This particular family of them, to whose lot that city fell, now at length make towards it, v. 11–13. The military men were but 600 in all. It was strange that none of their brethren of their own tribe came in to their assistance; but it was long after Israel came to Canaan before there appeared among them anything of a public spirit. It appears (by v. 21) that these 600 were the whole number that went to settle there, for they had their families and effects with them, their little ones and cattle. The second day's march brought them to Mount Ephraim, near Micah's house (v. 13), and there we must pause awhile.

Verses 14–26

The Danites had sent out their spies to find out a country for them. Now that they came to the place they oblige them with a further discovery—they can tell them where there are gods: "Here, in these houses, there are an ephod, and teraphim, and a great many fine things for devotion, such as we have not the like in our country; now therefore consider what you have to do, v. 14. We consulted them, and had a good answer from them; they are worth having, and, if we can but make ourselves masters of these gods, we may the better hope to prosper, and make ourselves masters of Laish." So far they were in the right, that it was desirable to have God's presence with them, but wretchedly mistaken when they took these images (which were fitter to be used in a puppet-play than in acts of devotion) for tokens of God's presence. The place they were going to settle in being so far from Shiloh, they thought they had more need of a house of gods among themselves than Micah had that lived so near to it. Being determined to take these gods along with them, we are here told how they stole the images, cajoled the priest, and frightened Micah from attempting to rescue them.

I. The five men that knew the house and the avenues to it, and particularly the chapel, went in and fetched out the images, with the ephod, and teraphim, and all the appurtenances, while the 600 kept the priest in talk at the gate, v. 16–18. See what little care this sorry priest took of his gods. See how impotent these sorry gods were, that could not keep themselves from being stolen. O the sottishness of these Danites! They must have gods to go before them, not of their own making indeed, but, which was as bad, of their own stealing. Their idolatry began in theft, a proper prologue for such an opera. In order to the breaking of the second commandment, they begin with the eighth, and take their neighbour's goods to make them their gods.

II. They set upon the priest, and flattered him into a good humour, not only to let the gods go, but to go himself along with them; for without him they knew not well how to make use of the gods. Observe, 1. How they tempted him, v. 19. They assured him of better preferment with them than what he now had. 2. How they won him. A little persuasion served: His heart was glad, v. 20. He takes the images with him, and carries the infection of the idolatry into a whole city. If ten shekels won him (as Bishop Hall expresses it), eleven would lose him; for what can hold those that have made shipwreck of a good conscience? The hireling flees because he is a hireling.

III. They frightened Micah back when he pursued them to recover his gods. His neighbours got together, and pursued the robbers, who, having their children and cattle before them (v. 21), could make no great haste. The pursuers called after them, desiring to speak a word with them; those in the rear turned about and asked Micah what he would have, v. 23. He argues with them, and pleads his right, which he thought should prevail; but they, in answer, plead their might, which, it proved, did prevail.

1. He insists upon the wrong they had certainly done him (v. 24): "You have taken away my gods, my images of God. I made them myself." What a folly was it for him to call those his gods which he had made, when he only that made us is to be worshipped by us as a God!

2. They insist upon the mischief they would certainly do him if he prosecuted his demand. They would not hear reason, nor do justice, nor so much as offer to pay him the prime cost he had been at upon those images. They would not so much as give him good words, but resolved to justify their robbery with murder if he did not immediately let fall his claims, v. 25. Micah has not courage enough to venture his life for the rescue of his gods, so little opinion has he of their being able to protect him and bear him out, and therefore tamely gives them up (v. 26). If the loss of our idols cure us of the love of them, and make us say, What have we to do any more with idols? the loss will be unspeakable again. See Isa. ii. 20; xxx. 22.

Verses 27–31

I. Laish conquered by the Danites. They proceeded on their march, and, because they met with no disaster, perhaps concluded they had not done amiss in robbing Micah. Many justify themselves in their impiety by their prosperity. Observe, 1. The people of Laish were quiet and secure, which made them a very easy prey to this little handful of men that came upon them, v. 27. 2. What a complete victory they obtained over them: They put all the people to the sword, and burnt down so much of the city as they thought fit to rebuild (v. 27, 28). 3. How the conquerors settled themselves in their room, v. 28, 29. They built the city, or much of it, anew and called the name of it Dan, to be a witness for them that, though separated so far off from their brethren, they were nevertheless Danites by birth.

II. Idolatry immediately set up there. God had graciously performed his promise, in putting them in possession of that which fell to their lot. But the first thing they do after they are settled is to break his statutes. As soon as they began to settle themselves they set up the graven image (v. 30), perversely attributing their success to that idol. Their Levite, who officiated as priest, is at length named here—Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh. The word Manasseh, in the original, has the letter נ, n, set over the head, which, some of the Jewish rabbis say, is an intimation that it should be left out, and then Manasseh will be Moses, and this Levite, they say, was grandson to the famous Moses, who indeed had a son named Gershom. The vulgar Latin reads it Moses. And if indeed Moses had a grandson that was rakish, and was picked up as a fit tool to be made use of in the setting up of idolatry, it is not the only instance of the unhappy degenerating of the posterity of great and good men. Children's children are not always the crown of old men. But the learned Bishop Patrick takes this to be an idle conceit of the rabbis, and supposes this Jonathan to be of some other family of the Levites. How long these corruptions continued we are told in the close. The posterity of this Jonathan continued to act as priests to this family of Dan that was seated as Laish. These images continued till Samuel's time, for so long the ark of God was at Shiloh; and it is probable that in his time effectual care was taken to suppress and abolish this idolatry. See how dangerous it is to admit an infection, for spiritual distempers are not so soon cured as caught.

CHAP. XIX

The three remaining chapters of this book contain a most tragical story of the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, patronised by the tribe of Benjamin. This seems to have been when there was no king, no judge, in Israel (ver. 1, and ch. xxi. 25). These iniquities, the Danites' idolatry, and the Benjamites' immorality, let in that general apostasy, ch. iii. 7. The abuse of the Levite's concubine is here related. I. Her adulterous elopement from him, ver. 1, 2. II. His reconciliation to her, and the journey he took to fetch her home, ver. 3. III. Her father's kind entertainment of him, ver. 4–9. IV. The abuse he met with at Gibeah, 1. He was neglected by the men of Gibeah (ver. 10–15) and entertained by an Ephraimite that sojourned among them, ver. 16–21. 2. They set upon him in his quarters, as the Sodomites did on Lot's guests, ver. 22–24. 3. They villainously forced his concubine to death, ver. 25–28. V. The course he took to send notice of this to all the tribes of Israel, ver. 29, 30.

Verses 1–15

This Levite was of Mount Ephraim, v. 1. He married a wife of Bethlehem-Judah. It does not appear that he had any other wife, and the margin calls her a wife, a concubine, v. 1.

I. This Levite's concubine played the whore and eloped from her husband, v. 2. The Chaldee reads it only that she carried herself insolently to him, or despised him, and, he being displeased at it, she went away from him, and was received and entertained at her father's house. When she treacherously departed from her husband to embrace the bosom of a stranger, her father ought not to have countenanced her sin. Children's ruin is often owing very much to parents' indulgence.

II. The Levite went himself to court her return. She is addressed in the kindest manner by her injured husband, who takes a long journey on purpose to beseech her to be reconciled, v. 3. It is part of the character of the wisdom from above that it is gentle and easy to be entreated. He spoke friendly to her, or comfortably (for so the Hebrew phrase of speaking to the heart commonly signifies), which intimates that she was in sorrow, penitent for what she had done amiss.

III. Her father made him very welcome. 1. He entertains him kindly, rejoices to see him (v. 3), treats him generously for three days, v. 4. And the Levite, to show that he was perfectly reconciled, accepted his kindness, and we do not find that he upbraided him or his daughter with what had been amiss. It becomes all, but especially Levites, to forgive as God does. Every thing among them gave a hopeful prospect of their living comfortably together for the future. 2. He is very earnest for his stay, as a further demonstration of his hearty welcome. The affection he had for him, and the pleasure he took in his company, proceeded, (1) From a civil regard to him as his son-in-law and an ingrafted branch of his own house. Note, Love and duty are due to those to whom we are related by marriage as well as to those who are bone of our bone. (2) From a pious respect to him as a Levite, a servant of God's house. [1] He engages him to stay as long as he possibly could. The Levite, though nobly treated, was very urgent to be gone. A good man's heart is where his business is. It is a sign a man has either little to do at home, or little heart to do what he has to do, when he can take pleasure in being long abroad where he has nothing to do. [2] He forces him to stay till the afternoon of the fifth day, and this, as it proved, was unkind, v. 8, 9. Had they set out early, they might have reached some better lodging-place than that which they were now constrained to take up with, nay, they might have got to Shiloh.

IV. In his return home he was forced to lodge at Gibeah, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, afterwards called Gibeah of Saul, which lay on his road towards Shiloh and Mount Ephraim. When night came they could not pursue their journey. 1. The servant proposed that they should lodge in Jebus, afterwards Jerusalem, but as yet in the possession of Jebusites. If they had done so, it is probable they would have had much better usage than they met with in Gibeah of Benjamin. Debauched and profligate Israelites are worse and much more dangerous than Canaanites themselves. 2. Having passed by Jebus they stopped at Gibeah (v. 13–15); there they sat down in the street, nobody offering them a lodging. This traveller, though a Levite (and to those of that tribe God had particularly commanded his people to be kind upon all occasions), met with very cold entertainment at Gibeah: No man took them into his house.

When the Levite, and his wife, and servant, were beginning to fear that they must lie in the street all night (and as good have laid in a den of lions) they were at length invited into a house, and we are here told,

I. Who that kind man was that invited them. 1. He was a man of Mount Ephraim, and only sojourned in Gibeah, v. 16. Of all the tribes of Israel, the Benjamites had most reason to be kind to poor travellers, for their ancestor, Benjamin, was born upon the road, his mother being then upon a journey, and very near to this place, Gen. xxxv. 16, 17. Yet they were hard-hearted to a traveller in distress, while an honest Ephraimite had compassion on him, and, no doubt, was the more kind to him, when, upon enquiry, he found that he was his countryman, of Mount Ephraim likewise. 2. He was an old man, one that retained some of the expiring virtue of an Israelite. The rising generation was entirely corrupted; if there was any good remaining among them, it was only with those that were old and going off. 3. He was coming home from his work out of the field at eventide. The rest had given themselves up to sloth and luxury, and no marvel there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of uncleanness, when there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of idleness, Ezek. xvi. 49.

II. How free and generous he was in his invitation. He did not stay till they applied to him to beg for a night's lodging. Thus our good God answers before we call. Note, A charitable disposition expects only opportunity, not importunity, to do good, and will succour upon sight, unsought unto. Charity is not apt to distrust, but hopeth all things (1 Cor. xiii. 7).

Verses 22–30

I. The great wickedness of the men of Gibeah. The sinners are here called sons of Belial, that is, ungovernable men, men that would endure no yoke, children of the devil (for he is Belial), resembling him, and joining with him in rebellion against God and his government.

1. They made a rude and insolent assault, in the night, upon the habitation of an honest man, that not only lived peaceably among them, but kept a good house and was a blessing and ornament to their city.

2. They had a particular spite at the strangers that were within their gates, that only desired a night's lodging among them, contrary to the laws of hospitality, which all civilized nations have accounted sacred, and which the master of the house pleaded with them (v. 23).

3. They designed in the most filthy and abominable manner (not to be thought of without horror and detestation) to abuse the Levite. Bring him forth that we may know him. Now, (1) This was the sin of Sodom, and is thence called Sodomy. What did it avail them that they had the ark of God in Shiloh when they had Sodom in their streets—God's law in their fringes, but the devil in their hearts? (2) This was the punishment of their idolatry, that sin to which they were, above all others, most addicted. He gave them up to these vile affections, by which they dishonoured themselves as they had by their idolatry dishonoured him and turned his glory into shame, Rom. i. 24, 28.

4. They were deaf to the reproofs and reasonings of the good man of the house, who, being well acquainted (we may suppose) with the story of Lot and the Sodomites, set himself to imitate Lot, v. 23, 24. Compare Gen. xix. 6–8. But in one thing he conformed too far to Lot's example in offering them his daughter to do what they would with. He had not power thus to prostitute his daughter, nor ought he to have done this evil that good might come. But they would not hearken to him, v. 25. Headstrong lusts are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; they sear the conscience and make it insensible.

5. They got the Levite's wife among them, and abused her to death, v. 25. They slighted the old man's offer of his daughter to their lust.

II. The notice that was sent of this wickedness to all the tribes of Israel. The poor abused woman made towards her husband's lodgings as soon as ever the approach of the daylight obliged these sons of Belial to let her go (for these works of darkness hate and dread the light), v. 25. Down she fell at the door, with her hands on the threshold, and in that posture of a penitent, with her mouth in the dust, she expired. There he found her (v. 26, 27), soon perceived she was dead (v. 28), took up her dead body, waived his purpose of going to Shiloh, and went directly home. There was no king in Israel to appeal to, and demand justice from. He has therefore no other way left him than to appeal to the people: let the community be judge. To each of the tribes, in their respective meetings, he sent by special messengers a remonstrance of the wrong that was done him, in all its aggravating circumstances, and with it a piece of his wife's dead body (v. 29), to represent their barbarous usage of his wife. All that saw the pieces of the dead body, and were told how the matter was, expressed the same sentiments upon it. 1. That the men of Gibeah had been guilty of a very heinous piece of wickedness, the like to which had never been known before in Israel, v. 30. 2. That a general assembly of all Israel should be called, to debate what was fit to be done for the punishment of this wickedness, that a stop might be put to this threatening inundation of debauchery, and the wrath of God might not be poured upon the whole nation for it. We have here the three great rules by which those that sit in council ought to go in every arduous affair. (1) Let every man retire into himself, and weigh the matter impartially and fully in his own thoughts, and seriously and calmly consider it, without prejudice on either side, before he speaks upon it. (2) Let them freely talk it over, and every man take advice of his friend, know his opinion and his reasons, and weigh them. (3) Then let every man speak his mind, and give his vote according to his conscience. In the multitude of such counsellors there is safety.

CHAP. XX

Into the book of the wars of the Lord the story of this chapter must be brought, but it looks as sad and uncomfortable as any article in all that history: for there is nothing in it that looks in the least bright or pleasant. And yet this happened soon after the glorious settlement of Israel in the land of promise, upon which one would have expected everything to be prosperous and serene. In this chapter we have, I. The Levite's cause heard in a general convention of the tribes, ver 1–7. II. A unanimous resolve to avenge his quarrel upon the men of Gibeah, ver. 8–11. III. The Benjamites appearing in defence of the criminals, ver. 12–17. IV. The defeat of Israel in the first and second day's battle, ver. 18–25. V. Their humbling themselves before God upon that occasion, ver. 26–28. VI. The total rout they gave the Benjaminites in the third engagement, by a stratagem, by which they were all cut off, except 600 men, ver. 29–48.

Verses 1–11

I. A general meeting of all the congregation of Israel to examine the matter concerning the Levite's concubine, and to consider what was to be done upon it, v. 1, 2. They came together by the consent and agreement, as it were, of one common heart, fired with a holy zeal for the honour of God and Israel. 1. The place of their meeting was Mizpeh; they gathered together unto the Lord there, for Mizpeh was so very near to Shiloh that their encampment might very well be supposed to reach from Mizpeh to Shiloh. Shiloh was a small town, and therefore, when there was a general meeting of the people to present themselves before God, they chose Mizpeh for their headquarters. 2. The persons that met were all Israel, from Dan in the north to Beersheba in the south, with the land of Gilead (that is, the tribes on the other side Jordan), all as one man, so unanimous were they in their concern for the public good. In this assembly of all Israel, the chief (or corners) of the people (for rulers are the cornerstones of the people, that keep all together) presented themselves as the representatives of the rest. They rendered themselves at their respective posts, at the head of the thousands and hundreds, the fifties and tens, over which they presided; for so much order and government, we may suppose, at least, they had among them, though they had no general or commander-in-chief. So that here was, (1) A general congress of the states for counsel. (2) A general rendezvous of the militia for action, all that drew sword and were men of war (v. 17).

II. Notice given to the tribe of Benjamin of this meeting (v. 3): They heard that the children of Israel had gone up to Mizpeh. But the notice they had of this meeting rather hardened and exasperated them than awakened them to think of the things that belonged to their peace and honour.

III. A solemn examination of the crime charged upon the men of Gibeah. The Levite gives a particular account of the matter. He concludes his declaration with an appeal to the judgment of the court (v. 7): You are all children of Israel, and therefore you know law and judgment, Esther i. 13, therefore give your advice and counsel what is to be done.

IV. The resolution they came to hereupon, which was that, being now together, they would not disperse till they had seen vengeance taken upon this wicked city, which was the reproach and scandal of their nation. Observe, 1. Their zeal against the lewdness that was committed. They would not return to their houses, how much soever their families and their affairs at home wanted them, till they had vindicated the honour of God and Israel. 2. Their prudence in sending out a considerable body of their forces to fetch provisions for the rest, v. 9, 10. 3. Their unanimity in these counsels, and the execution of them. The resolution was voted, Nemine contradicente—Without a dissenting voice (v. 8). This was their glory and strength, that the several tribes had no separate interests when the common good was concerned.

Verses 12–17

I. The fair and just demand which the tribes of Israel, now encamped, sent to the tribe of Benjamin, to deliver up the malefactors of Gibeah to justice, v. 12, 13. The Israelites were zealous against the wickedness that was committed, yet they were discreet in their zeal, and did not think it would justify them in falling upon the whole tribe of Benjamin unless they, by refusing to give up the criminals, and protecting them against justice, should make themselves guilty, ex post facto—as accessories after the fact.

II. The wretched obstinacy and perverseness of the men of Benjamin, who seem to have been as unanimous and zealous in their resolutions to stand by the criminals as the rest of the tribes were to punish them, so little sense had they of their honour, duty, and interest. They took it ill that the other tribes should meddle with their concerns; they would not do that which they knew was their duty because they were reminded of it by their brethren, by whom they scorned to be taught and controlled.

2. They were so prodigiously vain and presumptuous as to make head against the united force of all Israel. How could they expect to prosper when they fought against justice, and consequently against the just God himself, against those that had the high priest and the divine oracle on their side, and so acted in downright rebellion against the sacred and supreme authority of the nation. It should seem they depended upon the skill of their men to make up what was wanting in numbers, especially a regiment of slingers, 700 men, who, though left-handed, were so dexterous at slinging stones that they would not be a hair's breadth beside their mark, v. 16. But these good marksmen were very much out in their aim when they espoused this bad cause.

The defeat of the men of Israel in their first and second battle with the Benjamites.

I. Before their first engagement they asked counsel of God concerning the order of their battle and were directed, and yet they were sorely beaten. The whole army lay siege to Gibeah, v. 19. The Benjamites advance to raise the siege, the army prepares to give them a warm reception (v. 20), and turns upon them to fight them, v. 20. But between the Benjamites that attacked them in the front with incredible fury, and the men of Gibeah that sallied out upon their rear, they were put into confusion and lost 22,000 men, v. 21.

II. Before their second engagement they again asked counsel of God, and more solemnly than before; for they wept before the Lord until evening (v. 23). Also at this time they did not ask who should go up first, but whether they should go up at all. God bade them go up; he allowed the attempt for, though Benjamin was their brother, he was a gangrened member of their body and must be cut off. Upon this they encouraged themselves, perhaps more in their own strength than in the divine commission, and made a second attempt upon the forces of the rebels, in the same place where the former battle was fought (v. 22). But they were this second time repulsed, with the loss of 18,000 men, v. 25. But what shall we say to these things, that so just and honourable a cause should thus be put to the worst once and again? Were they not fighting God's battles against sin? 1. God's judgments are a great deep, and his way is in the sea. We may be sure of the righteousness, when we cannot see the reasons, of God's proceedings. 2. God would hereby show them, and us in them, that the race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong, that we are not to confide in numbers, which perhaps the Israelites did with too much assurance. We must never lay the weight on an arm of flesh, which only the Rock of ages will bear. 3. God designed hereby to correct Israel for their sins. They did well to show such a zeal against the wickedness of Gibeah: but were there not with them, even with them, sins against the Lord their God? Some think it was a rebuke to them for not witnessing against the idolatry of Micah and the Danites. 4. God would hereby teach us not to think it strange if a good cause should suffer defeat for a while, nor to judge of the merits of it by the success of it. The interest of grace in the heart, and of religion in the world, may be foiled, and suffer great loss, and seem to be quite run down, but judgment will be brought forth to victory at last. Vincimur in praelio, sed non in bello—We are foiled in a battle, but not in the whole campaign. Right may fall, but it shall arise.

Verses 26–48

A full account of the complete victory which the Israelites obtained over the Benjamites in the third engagement: the righteous cause was victorious at last.

I. How the victory was obtained. Two things they had trusted too much to in the former engagements —the goodness of their cause and the superiority of their numbers. It was true that they had both right and strength on their side, which were great advantages; but they depended too much upon them, to the neglect of those duties to which now, this third time, when they see their error, they apply themselves.

1. They were previously so confident of the goodness of their cause that they thought it needless to address themselves to God for his presence and blessing. They took it for granted that God would bless them, nay, perhaps they concluded that he owed them his favour. Before they only consulted God's oracle, Who shall go up first? And, Shall we go up? But now they implored his favour, fasted and prayed, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings (v. 26), to make an atonement for sin and an acknowledgment of their dependence upon God. And when they were in this frame, and thus sought the Lord, then he not only ordered them to go up against the Benjamites the third time, but gave them a promise of victory: Tomorrow I will deliver them into thy hand, v. 28.

2. They were previously so confident of the greatness of their strength that they thought it needless to use any art, to lay any ambush, or form a stratagem, not doubting but to conquer purely by a strong hand; but now they saw it was requisite to use some policy, as if they had an enemy to deal with them that had been superior in number; accordingly, they set liers in wait (v. 29), and gained their point, as their fathers did before Ai (Josh. viii).

(1) Observe the method they took. The body of the army faced the city of Gibeah, as they had done before, advancing towards the gates, v. 30. The Benjamites, the body of whose army was now quartered at Gibeah, sallied out upon them, and charged them with great bravery. The besiegers gave back, retired with precipitation, as if their hearts failed them upon the sight of the Benjamites. But, when the Benjamites were all drawn out of the city, the ambush seized the city (v. 37), gave a signal to the body of the army (v. 38, 40), which immediately turned upon them (v. 41), and, it should seem, another considerable party that was posted at Baal-tamar came upon them at the same time (v. 33); so that the Benjamites were quite surrounded, which put them into the greatest consternation that could be. A sense of guilt now disheartened them. Every man's hand was against them.

(2) Observe in this story, [1] That the Benjamites, in the beginning of the battle, were confident that the day was their own. Sometimes God suffers wicked men to be lifted up in successes and hopes, that their fall may be the sorer. See how short their joy is, and their triumphing but for a moment. [2] Evil was near them and they did not know it, v. 34. [3] Though the men of Israel played their parts so well in this engagement, yet the victory is ascribed to God (v. 35). They trode down the men of Benjamin with ease when God fought against them, v. 43.

II. How the victory was prosecuted and improved in a military execution done upon these sinners against their own souls. 1. Gibeah itself, that nest of lewdness, was destroyed in the first place. 2. The army in the field was quite routed and cut off. 3. Those that escaped from the field were pursued, and cut off in their flight. 4. Even those that tarried at home were involved in the ruin. So that of all the tribe of Benjamin, for aught that appears, there remained none alive but 600 men that took shelter in the rock Rimmon, and lay close there four months, v. 47.

This affair of Gibeah is twice spoken of by the prophet Hosea as the beginning of the corruption of Israel and a pattern to all that followed (Hos. ix. 9): They have deeply corrupted themselves as in the days of Gibeah; and (Hos. x. 9), Thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah; and it is added that the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not (that is, did not at first) overtake them.

CHAP. XXI

The ruins of the tribe of Benjamin we read of in the foregoing chapter; now here we have, I. The lamentation which Israel made over these ruins, ver. 1–4, 6, 15. II. The provision they made for the repair of them out of the 600 men that escaped, for whom they procured wives. 1. Of the virgins of Jabesh-Gilead, ver. 5, 7–14. 2. Of the daughters of Shiloh, ver. 16–25.

Verses 1–15

I. The ardent zeal which the Israelites had expressed against the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, as it was countenanced by the tribe of Benjamin. 1. While the general convention of the states was gathering together, they bound themselves with the great execration, which they called the Cherum, utterly to destroy all those cities that should not send in their representatives, for they would look upon such refusers as having no indignation at the crime committed, no concern for the securing of the nation from God's judgments by the administration of justice, nor any regard to the authority of a common consent, by which they were summoned to meet. 2. When they had met and heard the cause they made another solemn oath that none of all the thousands of Israel then present, nor any of those whom they represented (not intending to bind their posterity), should, if they could help it, marry a daughter to a Benjamite, v. 1. This was made an article of the war, not with any design to extirpate the tribe, but because in general they would treat those who were then actors and abettors of this villainy in all respects as they treated the devoted nations of Canaan, whom they were not only obliged to destroy, but with whom they were forbidden to marry.

II. The deep concern which the Israelites did express for the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin when it was accomplished. Observe,

1. The tide of their anger at Benjamin's crime did not run so high and so strong before but the tide of their grief for Benjamin's destruction ran as high and as strong after: They repented for Benjamin their brother, v. 6, 15. They did not repent of their zeal against the sin. But they repented of the sad consequences of what they had done, that they had carried the matter further than was either just or necessary. It would have been enough to destroy all they found in arms; they needed not to have cut off the husbandman and shepherds, the women and children. Note, (1) There may be over-doing in well-doing. Great care must be taken in the government of our zeal, lest that which seemed supernatural in its causes prove unnatural in its effects. That is no good divinity which swallows up humanity. Many a war is ill ended which was well begun. (2) Even necessary justice is to be done with compassion. God does not punish with delight, nor should men. (3) Strong passions make work for repentance. What we say and do in a heat our calmer thoughts commonly wish undone again. Now,

2. How did they express their concern? (1) By their grief for the breach that was made. They came to the house of God, for thither they brought all their doubts, all their counsels, all their cares, and all their sorrows. There is one tribe lacking. Benjamin become a Benoni, the son of the right hand a son of sorrow! In this trouble they built an altar, to atone for their folly in the pursuit of victory, and to implore the divine favour in their present strait. Every thing that grieves us should bring us to God. (2) By their amicable treaty with the poor distressed refugees that were hidden in the rock Rimmon, to whom they sent an act of indemnity, assuring them, upon the public faith, that they would now no longer treat them as enemies, but receive them as brethren, v. 13. (3) By the care they took to provide wives for them, that their tribe might be built up again, and the ruins of it repaired. All heads were at work to find out ways and means for the rebuilding of this tribe. While the poor distressed Benjamites that were hidden in the rock feared their brethren were contriving to ruin them, they were at the same time upon a project to prefer them. Four hundred virgins that were marriageable were found in Jabesh-Gilead, and these were married to so many of the surviving Benjamites, v. 14. Perhaps the alliance now contracted between Benjamin and Jabesh-Gilead made Saul, who was a Benjamite, the more concerned for that place (1 Sam. xi. 4), though then inhabited by new families.

We have here the method that was taken to provide the 200 Benjamites that remained with wives.
